IN 1925, Richard Strauss, then 61 and the Twentieth Century's elder statesman of Romanticism—a musician internationally acclaimed both as conductor and composer—wrote "Ten Golden Rules for a Young Conductor."

Among these he prescribed: You must not perspire while conducting; only the public must get warm.

Direct "Salome" and "Elektra" as if they had been written by Mendelssohn, Elfin music.

If you think that the brass is not blowing loud enough, mute it by several degrees.

It is not enough that you yourself understand the singer's every word, which you know from memory; the public must be able to follow it without effort. If the audience does not understand the text, it falls asleep.

Always accompany the singer so that he can sing without strain.

When you think you have reached the most extreme prestissimo, take the tempo half as fast.

International Cast

Erich Leinsdorf, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an extraordinary interpreter of Strauss's music, and in his direction of "Salome" in its newest recorded version, he demonstrates uncommon obedience to Strauss's conducting commandments.

On an RCA Red Seal recording, he has assembled a stellar international cast. Montserrat Caballe, soprano, is heard as Salome, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone, as Jokanaan, John the Baptist; Richard Lewis, tenor, is Herold, and Regina Resnick, mezzo-soprano, as his wife Heriodas, while James King, tenor, is Narraboth. The soloists are joined by the London Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor, LSC 7053; two records).

In the title role, Mme. Caballe is both restrained and svelte. She can spin a pianissimo with the naivete of an adolescent, and she can sing with the fury of a woman scored.

Marvelously depicted, too, is Heriodas by Regina Resnick, her portrayal malevolent and intense. She is, in fact, a formidable singing actress; her voice can assume a bright and hard cutting edge, and her accentuation and rhythmic emphasis of the text become themselves not only musical devices but theatrical elements.

And as John the Baptist, Mr. Milnes presents a personality of dignity, his vocalism resonant, at times impassioned, and always elegant.

It is, however, Leinsdorf in the pit whose presence and pacing cause this production to be the most rewarding and sensitive recorded version of Strauss's masterpiece now available. He is able to guide the orchestra with extraordinary flexibility and freedom; he is able to provoke moments of soloistic intensity, but shrewdly, he does so only when no vocalism is indicated in the score.

The moment that the instruments are joined by the vocal soloists, he makes the orchestra subservient in dynamic volume and in plasticity of tempo to the color of the respective voices—and to the text.

NO SALOME in the world can make a super impression with the part unless staunchly supported by a great conductor. Normally, my tastes would not allow me to so characterize Erich Leinsdorf, who conducts Caballe's set. But here he rises to greatness.

One would not have suspected so compelling a performance of "Salome" remembering his recording of an interlude, the dance and the final scene made a few years back with Leontyne Price. It has none of the broad-based excitement with which he lights up every page of the score with Caballe.

SOLTI, OF COURSE, was the ideal conductor for Nilsson. His "Salome" is one possessed, one which rivets a listener. By the same token, Leinsdorf is ideal for Caballe, reenforcing the sensuality of her concept.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939
OCT 19 1969

The Dallas Morning News
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 236,267 SUN. 276,380
NOV 9 1969

Erich Leinsdorf's legacy—a superb feeling for Mozart

LOOKING back over his years in Boston, Erich Leinsdorf pointed with special pride to the improvement in his orchestra's playing of Mozart. This recording is only the most recent evidence of it. Leinsdorf's recording of the Linz begins with a brisk and dramatic introduction. At the outset of the Allegro one fruit of Leinsdorf's tenure is obvious in the meticulously even balance of the strings. They are notably more peaceful, too, ready to hold a note to its full duration without adding extraneous inflections. The Poco Adagio is attractive, though one would hardly call it spacious. As in the first movement the repeat is declined; the turn in the melody is omitted. The Minuet is superbly stylish (a strong, natural interpretation), and the phrasing of the Trio is really special. The last movement is well played (the repeat is observed), though I was surprised to hear the bassoon doubling the bass line at the beginning of the movement. Of course the fault is a minor one in the context of such an excellent interpretation; being atypical, it can be easily ignored. The very end of the movement (from the fortissimo) is model Mozart, both in the superb playing of the strings and the subtle contribution of the horns. Leinsdorf's performance of the K. 543 is well scaled and well played (listen to the ensemble on the /dumm-dadadumm-dadadumm-dada/dumm rhythm), though other interpreters have dug deeper into the substance of the music. The Andante con moto, with a lovely flowing tempo and most cogently phrased, is a beautifully considered interpretation. This, the Minuet and Trio of the Linz, as well as both finales, are eloquent testimony to the superb feeling for Mozart now to be found in the Boston Symphony. One hopes that the BSO audiences will remember Leinsdorf well for this; there is no finer gift he could have left them. —M.N.K.

MOZART: Symphonies No. 36 in C, K. 425 ("Linz"); No. 39 in E flat, K. 543; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3097, $5.98.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
NOV 1969

Sherrill Milnes—equal to both Schoenberg's Survivor and Beethoven's Ninth.

BEETHOVEN: Symphonies: No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67; No. 9, in D minor, Op. 125 ("Choral"). SCHOENBERG: A Survivor from Warsaw, Op. 46. Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo; Placido Domingo, tenor; Sherrill Milnes, baritone and narrator (in the Schoenberg); Chorus Pro Musica (in the Symphony No. 9); New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 7055, $11.96 (two discs).

BEETHOVEN: Symphonies: No. 1, in C, Op. 21; No. 8, in F, Op. 93. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3098, $5.98.

Leinsdorf's Beethoven Symphony cycle ends on a real sardonic note: it is more than a bit sobering to have the Ninth, with its frenzied Ode to Joy (on the brotherhood of man) preceded by Arnold Schoenberg's A Survivor from Warsaw. Schoenberg wrote the brief work in 1947. It concerns a group of Polish Jews in a Warsaw ghetto facing imminent slaughter at the hands of the Nazis. As they go to their death, the group impulsively starts chanting the ancient prayer Shema Yisroel. The admixture of languages and the stark brutality of the setting does not—and was not intended to—paint a pretty picture. Nor does Leinsdorf soften the blow: the orchestral playing and choral singing are obviously inspired, and Sherrill Milnes exhibits impeccable diction and a wonderful sense of timing in his narration.

Leinsdorf sounds inspired too for most of the Choral Symphony. His first movement is swift, headlong, and galvanic—very much in the Toscanini tradition. The Scherzo (with the double exposition repeat) is also energetic, though the rhythm almost runs ahead of itself in one or two places. The Adagio is analytical, brightly detailed, and perhaps a bit too dry-eyed and con moto for its own good. The soloists in the fourth movement all acquit themselves with distinction—the two male voices are especially well matched in terms of lean, ringing, incisive vocalism. In one or two spots I felt that Leinsdorf's immense energy was operating in spasmodic fits and starts rather than being driven by a steady impulse as was the case with Toscanini. But perhaps this is merely an impression deriving from the conductor's essentially intellectualized, objective approach to music. Certainly, the present edition of the Ninth is one of Leinsdorf's finest performances on disc.

The Fifth Symphony, on the other hand, gets into real difficulties from such cerebral treatment. The Boston maestro sacrifices everything in order to achieve precisely measured fermatas in that work's first movement. This is the only performance of the first movement I have ever heard that is totally devoid of emotional drive. Only the finale generates any kind of vitality, for the Andante goes nowhere while the third movement is a positive dirge. But even the finale is beset with sluggish orchestral playing and indecisive rhythm all the way. This reading is as bad as the Ninth Symphony is good.

The First and Eighth are somewhere in between the two polarities. The tempos of the First are well chosen, but there is a certain stiffness in transitional passages and a neutrality of tone that I find disagreeable. Leinsdorf observes all repeats here, even the unusual one in the Andante. The Eighth gets off to a robust, energetic start but before long, little details of careless ensemble and tiny lapses of rhythmic incisiveness crop up and debilitate the performance. Not really bad, but not very interesting either.

The reproduction is a bit bloodless and over-reverberant. It is at its best and most compact in the Ninth and in the Schoenberg, and at its worst in the Fifth. I wish that the tape editors had allowed a little more breathing space between the movements—for this editorial impatience tends to militate against the cumulative impact of these interpretations. H.G.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 "Pastoral." Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf. RCA LSC 3074 stereo ($5.98)

Perhaps it was unconscious mental indigestion on my part—but I did not react with any favor to this Sixth Symphony. It is all too American in an opulent sense, played by this self styled "aristocrat of orchestras" in a fashion that somehow says to me, look how good we are, how big and powerful, too. It is not, for my ear, dedicated to Beethoven. It is dedicated to Erich Leinsdorf and the BSO.

The whole thing is both too hard and too smooth, too much the mailed fist in the nylon glove. The Pastoral is the toughest of all the Symphonies to project convincingly, for it is both subtle and naive, a wonderfully organized and yet utterly trusting work; it must be approached, somehow, with a compassionate humanity of feeling, in the playing as in the conducting.

Instead, when this disc began to spin I received a strong mental image of the prosperous BSO, best pro players in the world, sitting there sleekly doing their thing, professionally perfect, even if this was the 99th time that old chestnut had hit the Boston boards. An evil approach to any Beethoven, but especially the Sixth. As for Leinsdorf, my inner ear tells me he is fussily self-conscious about effects, exaggerating each pp, each sf, as though double strength might give double value. The opening movement is pure Madison avenue. The jolly scherzo in the village is violent enough to sweep Beethoven's peasants off their jolly feet. As for the famed storm, it is as you might expect, literally the loudest, fiercest version imaginable—and insincere for it. Beethoven does not make good Berlioz. Only the quiet, gentle finale variations begin to take off into sincere, meaningful musical expression. So I heard it.

Sorry. I'll have to take a tums next time.

Performance: C+ Sound: B

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 21,000
NOV 1969

BERIO: Visage—See Webern: Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10.

BERLIOZ: Symphonie fantastique, Op. 14. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georges Pretre, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3096, $5.98.

One of Prêtre's most successful endeavors to date, this Fantastique recording offers a far more cogent view of Berlioz than the same conductor's recent Harold en Italie. To be sure, temperate refinement is the rule here, rather than swashbuckling bravura, but at least the architectural lines are clean-limbed, dry-eyed, and not permitted to wilt like raspberry ice cream left in 90-degree sunlight. The conductor draws lovely varicolored playing from the Boston orchestra. Everything is very precise, but this is a genteel sort of cleanliness, not that familiar insistent, febrile, hair-trigger excitement. Categorizing performances into generalized groups is always a dangerous (and sometimes misleading) thing to do. Be that as it may, I think it fairly accurate to say that Prêtre's interpretation combines Karajan's smooth-skinned tonal refinement (DGG), a bit of Markevitch's introspection (also DGG), Monteux's poetical classicism (RCA Victrola), with just a touch of Munch's sense of the fantastic (RCA and Angel).

Tempos are rather fast throughout, enabling the slow movement to be contained on one side. There are no cornets in Un Bal, and, as usual, the repeats in the first and fourth sections are not observed (Colin Davis' Philips edition remains the only one to offer all of these refinements). The chimes in the Witches' Sabbath are a bit weak but RCA's engineering is spacious, velvet-toned, and resonant. H.G.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
NOV 1969

by Paul Henry Lang

Leinsdorf's Mozart, a Feast for the Ear

EVERY ONCE IN a while the maestro of one of our great orchestras, used to the splendors of the hundred-piece band, is permitted the luxury of making music for himself. This opportunity is usually provided by the recording industry and constitutes its most attractive feature. This recording of two Mozart symphonies is such an occasion: Erich Leinsdorf has simply assembled a small group from the Boston Symphony to play, seemingly, for their own delectation, and a delight it is from first to last note. What Leinsdorf does is to let the music speak for itself. Now surely this sounds like a pious truism—but is it? Leinsdorf is a master conductor whose technical prowess is undisputed, and his control of the orchestra is complete in this recording; but he does not wield a whip, does not "interpret." He puts everything in good order, establishes the stylistic guidelines for his superbly trained players, then lets the music unfold naturally. This is a great and near-forgotten art, especially welcome in the presentation of this crystalline music, where balances, accents, and dynamics are measured in milligrams.

In the case of an eighteenth-century symphony, the success of such an undertaking depends on the conductor's ability to make the winds equal partners with the strings, something that a "reduced" (i.e., original) orchestra alone will not insure. Though bona fide orchestral music, much in these symphonies is only once removed from chamber music, requiring close attention to the individual parts. There are in K. 425 only four woodwinds: two oboes and two bassoons; in K. 543 there are only five: one flute and pairs of clarinets and bassoons. Both symphonies also call on the usual pairs of horns, trumpets, and timpani. Every note counts, and in this recording every note is heard. Well, I must qualify this to a certain extent. There is absolutely no flaw in the C major Symphony, but in the E flat, which has more solos than the earlier work, the flute is not always clearly in evidence. When it is, it does not blend well with the other winds; the performance is otherwise equally impeccable. This only goes to show that if a single wind instrument is not on a par with the others, musical intelligibility is instantly in jeopardy. The trouble is that the flutist, though an accomplished artist, steps right out of The Afternoon of a Faun—this is French playing, too soft and too liquid for the classical Viennese style.

What a difference it makes when the chord-defining tone is clearly heard! To obtain this in the normal modern concert hall the player must either blow louder than he should, or he must be doubled, or the strings must be kept down; whatever the remedy, it can seldom be carried out with the natural smoothness heard in this performance. The horns, the pedals of the orchestra, are handled with extraordinary finesse, while the trumpets and drums join the ensemble with vigor, as they should, for in this style they are responsible for the delineation of form and the nailing down of the cadences. While everything said above is valid for both symphonies, there is considerable difference between the two works. The Linz Symphony is Haydnesque in almost every detail, except in the slow movement, which is pure Christian Bach. While it is a sunny and beguiling work, it only suggests the consummate symphonist that is before us in the E flat Symphony, which is Mozart's Eroica. For the first time Mozart uses clarinets in the symphony. He was well acquainted with the instrument and wrote for it felicitously in his operas; but the symphony, always a little behind the more advanced opera orchestra, was just beginning to admit the clarinet to its ranks. Even Mozart was unwilling to abandon the standard five-woodwind arrangement, so he left out the oboes to make room for the clarinets. This change, however, created an altogether new aural situation. In the early eighteenth-century symphony when full four-part harmony was desired from the winds, the usual combination was oboes and horns. Now Mozart shifts to clarinets and bassoons, a warmer and darker sound later much favored by Beethoven; this quartet plays a prominent role in the E flat Symphony. Leinsdorf does not miss the significance of this changed sonority. In the finale, where clarinets and bassoons usher in the recapitulation, all of Mozart's infinite grace and aural imagination are conveyed by the remarkable quartet of woodwinds. Listen to this spot—one of many—and you will realize why this recording is such a feast for the ear. In a large concert hall, so delicate an equilibrium can seldom be achieved. Unfortunately, we never hear Mozart as he should be heard—in a music room like that of the "old Count Thun" for whom the C major Symphony was composed or in a 300-seat concert hall. But this recording gives us a remarkably close approximation; and a memorable achievement it is, to be cherished by all lovers of unadulterated music-making.

MOZART: Symphonies: No. 36, in C, K. 425 ("Linz"); No. 39, in E flat, K. 543. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal 3097, $5.98.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
NOV 1969

96.

ENTERTAINMENT WORLD
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 7 1969

"A GERMAN REQUIEM" by Brahms (Montserrat Caballe, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, baritone, The New England Conservatory Chorus, Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf) "FOUR SERIOUS SONGS" by Brahms (Sherrill Milnes, baritone, Erich Leinsdorf, pianist) RCA LSC-7054 Two Discs.

One of the most poignant creations in the romantic repertoire, "A German Requiem" deserves only the best of performances. Unfortunately, Leinsdorf succeeds in only a few respects. His tempi are well chosen, though metronomic, and the orchestral playing is eloquent, but what prevents the performance from capturing the true spirituality of the work is overcaution. Leinsdorf holds back from becoming rhapsodic. This should be a requiem for the dead, not BY the dead. Leinsdorf's is an over-somber treatment, the quiet moments sounding rather sleepy, the dramatic ones ponderous. Inner tension and momentum are lost because of the failure to complete a dramatic statement emphatically. One phrase liquidly runs into the next, then a movement ends and where are we? It is a particularly pale account when compared with Klemperer's grand monumental approach to this music on Angel. His is one of those transcendentally great recordings which realizes the ideal. Leinsdorf does have contributions of excellent vocalism from Caballe and Milnes, but their expressiveness seems inconsistent with the otherwise dull account.

The "Four Serious Songs" are late Brahms works which contain difficult interpretive problems. Few singers combine a convincing balance of restraint, expression and clarity. Milnes' interpretation can compare with the best. Leinsdorf's pianism is delightfully alive—Alex Segal

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

NOV 9 1969

MUSIC

Fiery Scharwenka Piano Concerto

Record Player

By Paul Hume

If you took piano lessons a generation ago, the chances are that you may have worked your way through a Polish dance by Franz Xavier Scharwenka. It became such a hit tune with many piano teachers that it sold over three million copies. But that is just about all that anyone heard of Scharwenka for a long time in spite of the fact that he headed a conservatory in Berlin, wrote hundreds of works, and toured this country as a concert pianist.

When he played in New York in January, 1891, just a few months before the opening of Carnegie Hall, Scharwenka played his First Piano Concerto in B Flat. It contains some of the technical fireworks we know from Liszt and Tschaikowsky, but it has its own ideas and they are eminently worth hearing. The orchestra is busy nearly all the time and the soloist busier.

Earl Wild and the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf have put out a stunning account of the concerto on Victor 3080. The sound is brilliant, and the playing all round is super-duper. It would be great if this concerto were played in place of any by Tschaikowski or Rachmaninoff for the next, say, three years. Wild also plays, in wizard fashion, Balakireff's Reminiscences from Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar," a Medtner Improvisation, and a d'Albert Scherzo that is a barn-burner. The Balakireff comes off with great style. The whole disc is grand.

One of the best current offerings of chamber music is by the leading players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor LSC-6189). This is one of a series of such albums containing both classic and modern works and is a fine, representative sampling in both idioms.

Considering that these are symphony players with limited time for such music, the readings are remarkable, especially the Schubert "Trout" Quintet. The superlative pianist in this—and the Brahms Piano Trio in B, a Poulenc Sextet and the Webern Concerto for small ensemble—is Richard Goode.

The Webern is "must" listening, for it contains much of what in new is music today—sudden changes, drifting tonality and dramatic percussive effects.

The Poulenc and Martinu Nonet, on the other hand, are ingratiating and full of good humor, while the Ingolf Dahl Duettino Concertante for flute and percussion is . . . well, wow!

Ledger-Star
NORFOLK, VIRGINIA
D. 106,121

NOV 8 1969

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036

NOV 9 1969

Well Ordered

Yet another version of Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" (RCA LSC-3096) has the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Georges Pretre. It is a well-ordered account, lacking only in the tension and intensity of emotion that some others bring to it.

It is beautifully played, with much elegance, and quite notable tonal clarity and sheen.

Sampling Records

The Evening Press
BINGHAMTON, NEW YORK
D. 79,881 SUN. 83,105

NOV 8 1969

IF YOU HAVE money to splurge on a three-record chamber music album you'll find the new one of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players appealing for its programing as well as for its displays of virtuosity.

It begins with Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, goes to Brahm's delightful piano trio in B, then to a sextet of Poulenc, to Werbern's concerto for nine instruments, Martinu's "Nonet" also for nine and winds up with the 1966 "Duettino" for flute and percussion of Dahl.

From 19th Century romanticism to late 20th Century "modern," from two instruments to nine — those are the jumps (RCA 6189).

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
ENTERTAINMENT WORLD
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 14 1969

"SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE" by Hector Berlioz (Leonard Bernstein, The New York Philharmonic Orchestra). Produced by John McClure. Columbia MS-7278. Compared to the same work performed by Georges Pretre and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Produced by Peter Delheim. RCA LSC-3096.

Berlioz has more than 25 conductors playing his "Symphonie Fantastique" on discs at last count. Among the foremost interpreters are Barbirolli, Ansermet, Boulez, Rozdestvensky, Davis, Klemperer, Mitropoulos, Munch and Stokowski, each giving an account from his own point of view. RCA's new Pretre version is that label's fourth now in the catalog and, judging by the quality of performance, quite unwarranted. Not that Pretre is a bad conductor, but he is much more convincing in other Romantic repertoire — his Poulenc being one notable example. His Berlioz is mannered, superficially striving for effect by awkward tempo changes and exaggerated dynamics. Occasionally his phrasing is wonderfully graceful, but not always appropriate. Berlioz really did have an architectural plan to his work which reveals itself when every musical element falls into place.

Bernstein comes much closer to achieving a convincing realization than does Pretre, although his performance is characterized by some of the same faults. He can get rambunctious and carried away with the drama in the score, but he maintains a more consistent and cohesive concept. The second movement, "A Ball," is imbued with a rhythmic verve completely absent from Pretre's limp account. "The Witches' Sabbath" is similarly more dramatic than Pretre's, and more sinister. The bells used in this movement differ in the two recordings, Boston's sounding almost like those from an ice-cream wagon compared with the resonance of New York's. The Boston Symphony plays with precision, New York being less accurate but more spirited. Bernstein's Technicolor approach should appeal to many and included with the Columbia album is a 7-inch bonus Lp lecture titled "Berlioz takes a Trip," providing an amusing listening experience. —Alex Segal.

Scharwenka's Piano Concerto Recorded

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—To Earl Wild and Erich Leinsdorf we owe gratitude for reviving a super-spectacular pianistic circus of the late 19th century when such orgiastic displays were a major form of musical entertainment. It is Xaver Scharwenka's 1st piano concerto now recorded by Wild as soloist and the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf conducting (RCA 3080).

Both Scharwenka and his music are largely forgotten but in his day he was a kingly figure both as piano virtuoso and in the larger world of music. He composed to give himself awesome feats to perform on the keyboard, and to beguile romantically minded audiences with schmaltz.

To current ears his prize showoff piece, this 1st concerto, is much fun and no enlightenment. But what's wrong with that? While laughing at the trickery you can admire Wild for his mastery of it, for his ability not only to play the long piece but to play it well. Also on the record are virtuoso pieces of the same genre, by Balakireff, Medtner and D'Albert.

One can feel some gratitude to Aldo Ciccolini for recording a review of the piano music of Emmanual Chabrier, including 10 of his "Pieces Pittoresques," "Feuillet d'album," and "Bourree Fantasque." He was an original, both as composer and personality. (Angel-36627.)

Nor should Robert Casalesve and George Szell be overlooked in their collaboration in two Mozart concertos, No. 15 and 17, with a reduced Cleveland Orchestra. Theirs is the correct way to perform Mozart concertos in their opinion. It is possible to take exceptions here and there, but certainly their way is effective and more effective than some others (Columbia-7245).

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 30 1969

DISCOLOGY

BSO's Requiem 'noble'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The performances of Brahms' German Requiem in 1962 and 1968 were among the most distinguished of Erich Leinsdorf's performances as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, and it is good to have a recording of the piece from him based on the performances in Boston a year ago (RCA, 2 records). It is good, too, that the recording captures something of the power of the live performances as, for example, Leinsdorf's recording of the Verdi Requiem does not.

What you hear in the new album is a performance that is, above all, superbly paced as a whole, and magnificently sustained. It is noble, but not pompous, and it is gentle, but not sentimental. The playing by the Boston Symphony is beautiful, and there is very good singing by the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The story on the solists is complicated, characteristic for the relations between orchestras and the recording companies with which they have contracts, and typical as well of the kind of thing that drives music directors of those orchestras to the edge of despair. The soloists at Tanglewood in 1968 were Helen Boatwright (singing "Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit" more beautifully than I have ever heard it sung) and Sherrill Milnes. For the long string of performances in Boston in the Winter, Boatwright was replaced by the late Saramae Enrich, and Milnes by David Clatworthy.

Meanwhile, RCA had its own ideas about soloists for the recording, and those were ideas more concerned with promoting RCA singers than with finding the appropriate people for the Brahms Requiem. In the baritone department, the two aspects coincided nicely: Sherrill Milnes sings very effectively, not giving a great performance to be compared, say, with Hotter's on the old Karajan recording, but one that is more eloquent and riper than the one he gave at Tanglewood, and not, I think, inferior to any other currently availablle on records.

In the soprano department, however, RCA was concerned with pushing Montserrat Caballe, and if the result is not quite a disaster, it is still a severe blemish on what otherwise comes close to an ideal recording of the Requiem. The voice is lovely and the phrasing tasteful, though hardly enlivening: the trouble is that Caballe does almost nothing with the words and that she is flat. It is not the persistent, very slight flatness on several of her earlier recordings, but an odd mixture that has her on pitch on the strong beats, but sagging below it the rest of the time. It is no pleasure.

The fourth side of the album is interesting. It has Brahm's Biblical solo cantata, Four Serious Songs, sung by Milnes with Leinsdorf at the piano. Milnes is in rather rough voice, but his singing is otherwise strong and compelling. Leinsdorf's playing has its peculiarities, the most striking of them being the exaggerated articulation of the pairs of quarter notes in "O Tod," but most of the time it is beautiful, informed by a warmth, spontaneity, and urgency that only seldom finds its way into his conducting.

Albany Times-Union News
Friday, November 28, 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 13 1969

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

Georges Pretre's traversal of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" with the BSO (RCA LSC-3096) seems somewhat undernourished next to the Columbia disc with Leonard Bernstein reviewed a few months back. The comparison left me with much more respect for Bernstein's accomplishments, which, in spite of apparent one-row-deep acoustics, must rate among the most exciting interpretations of this program music. Bernstein's is the red-hot version and Pretre's totally cool.

When the Boston Pops goes to Deutsche Grammophon next year RCA will not be without its Pops orchestra. They have added to their roster the Philadelphia Orchestra Pops which makes its debut under the baton of Henry Mancini (LSC 3106). Mr. Mancini has composed and/or arranged all the items, from Beaver Valley—'37, a suite in three parts which occupies side one, through several short pieces featuring Philadelphia soloists and instrumental choirs in Strings on Fire!, Dream of a Lifetime, and the like culminating in Speedy Gonzales. Lots of fun for the interested.

MIAMI, FLA.
VILLAGE POST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1969

Arnold Schoenberg's A Survivor From Warsaw, Op. 46, scheduled for the Greater Miami Philharmonic concerts of January 11 and 19, is a terrifyingly dramatic work for narrator, men's chorus and orchestra. It is a 12-tone work of six and a half minutes' duration in which the narrator recounts a horrifying tale from the concentration camp. The Survivor, the narrator, tells his story in speech-song. As the group of Jews is about to be sent to their death, they suddenly begin to sing the Hebrew prayer Shema Yisroel in a desperate last minute appeal for salvation. The prayer, sung by men's chorus, is the only part of the work to be sung.

Erich Leinsdorf has just recorded the Survivor with the Boston Symphony and Sherrill Milnes as Narrator, for RCA. As in his concert programs, Leinsdorf conducts the Schoenberg immediately before the Beethoven Ninth Symphony which begins on the second band of side one. The juxtaposition of a work exemplifying the horror of mankind with one identified with the brotherhood of mankind is startling and stunning. Brilliant programming coupled with the Boston Symphony's dramatic realization of both scores makes this album a must.

The Detroit News
D. 702,591 SUN. 953,929

NOV 23 1969

BERLIOZ: Symphonie fantastique. Georges Pretre conducting the Boston Symphony, RCA 3096. This animated, individualistic and boldly theatrical performance is among the most persuasive in a cluster of fine readings crowding the catalog.

PROKOFIEV: Piano Concerto No. 5. WEILL: Music from "The Threepenny Opera." Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony with John Browning, pianist, RCA 3121. Browning completes his Prokofiev cycle and this final performance is marked by the same characteristics of the first four outings: drive, bite, fleetness and pungent accord between soloist and conductor. The surprise here is the Weill Suite, which Leinsdorf serves up with idiomatic acidity and verve. A strong coupling.

SEVENTEEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,362,000

NOV 1969

Devoting himself to a quartet of sorely neglected bravura composers of the last century, pianist Earl Wild stars in a triumphant RCA album, playing Scharwenka's Concerto No. 1 with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, and solo pieces by Balakireff, Medtner, d'Albert

By LARRY KLEIN

AUDIO QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

Quadrasonic Stereo

Q. I have seen several reports on four-channel stereo techniques in your magazine and others. Assuming that you have had a chance to hear it, would you care to comment on the system in use?

IVAN WRIGHT
Detroit, Mich.

A. First of all, for those who have not yet heard of the technique, it is necessary to make it quite clear that quadrasonic stereo requires four independent channels in the same way that ordinary stereo requires two independent channels. These four channels must pass through four separate amplification chains and drive four separate speakers.

As of this writing I have heard two different demonstrations of the technique: one presented by Vanguard Records to interested parties and members of the press, and the other a private demonstration at Acoustic Research's laboratories in Cambridge, Mass. Both use specially made four-channel tapes playing through a pair of normal stereo amplifiers.

I was not quite as taken with the Vanguard demonstration as some other members of the press seem to have been. What I was hoping to hear was not sound coming both from in front of and from behind me (as though I were seated in the midst of a rather scattered group of instrumentalists), but rather a closer simulation of the live concert-hall sound than can be provided by normal two-channel stereo. This to me would mean that while I would still hear the orchestra as if it were spread out in front of me across the concert stage, the sound coming from the right and left rear speakers would embody delay and frequency-response characteristics typical of sounds reflected from those areas in a concert hall. Ideally, the overall effect would be the replacement of the listening-room's acoustics with the reverberation characteristics (the "acoustic ambiance") of the concert hall. Such an effect could occasionally be heard with the Vanguard tapes, and, when present, it certainly demonstrated the potential of the four-channel technique. I asked the Vanguard people how the microphone positions had been established—the answer was by extensive trial and error. But Vanguard repeatedly emphasized that what we were hearing was part of on-going experiments and did not represent any final technique.

My visit to Acoustic Research a couple of weeks later was enlightening for several reasons. Acoustic Research has for some time now been engaged in a computer analysis of concert-hall reverberation in an effort to come up with some hard data usable in determining recording procedures, particularly in the matter of microphone placement for quadrasonic recording. They first played on their specially converted four-channel Ampex studio machine the results of their early experimental recording and continued on through to the latest done at live Boston Pops concerts. The quadrasonic sound produced by their early tapes was, to my ears, neither more nor less successful than the Vanguard efforts. In general, my feeling as of that moment was that the improvement afforded by four channels, though noticeable, was simply not worth the effort required to set them up. Then, however, they played some of their latest Boston Pops tapes, and, to put it mildly, I was overwhelmed! The effect was the nearest to "I am there" that I have ever heard other than when listening through headphones to a true binaural recording —i.e., program material recorded specifically for headphone use. The acoustic ambiance of AR's listening room was, in effect, replaced by that of Symphony Hall in Boston. I could hear the champagne corks popping to my right, my left, and from behind me; it was "live," it was "real," it was GREAT!

The two front mikes for the Boston Pops recordings were placed in their "normal" stereo positions, and the two rear mikes were located in positions that were determined by the fact that there were two holes in the ceiling of the auditorium through which the mikes could conveniently be lowered. For playback in the approximately 15 x 20-foot AR listening room, two speakers were placed up front against the wall in normal stereo listening locations at about ear level, and two more speakers in the upper rear corners of the room were playing at volumes substantially below those of the front speakers.

By the time you read this, Telex will have a moderately low-cost playback machine available in addition to its professional-level unit, and 3M, Téac, and Crown will have more expensive machines in their lines. Both Michigan Magnetics and Nortronics have four-channel heads available, and Nortronics has various adaptor kits that make it possible to install four-channel heads on almost any standard tape machine. There are also rumors of cassette machines that will be suitable for four-channel use. However, the problem of quadrasonic cassettes is not a technical one: it depends on whether Philips, the company that licenses manufacturers of cassette machines, will allow four parallel straight-ahead tracks to be used or whether it will insist on maintaining the original two-forward-tracks, two-reverse-tracks format. As far as commercial quadrasonic reel-to-reel tapes are concerned, by the time you read this Vanguard will have several releases—both classical and popular—and other companies will surely follow soon. As we go to press, word has come of a compatible quadrasonic disc that does not employ multiplex techniques. I do not have enough information at present to speculate in depth as to what the inventors are doing, but I suspect that a matrixing system would have to be used. I have been promised a demonstration of the disc two weeks from the time of this writing.

Quadrasonic FM broadcasts are being sponsored by Acoustic Research in the Boston area through March of 1970. At least two such broadcasts have already taken place in New York through the cooperation of WNYC and WKCR, and at the time of this writing there is a good chance that the series will be continued. The equipment needed to receive these broadcasts consists of two stereo receivers with their associated speakers.

Although integrated quadrasonic amplifiers will be on the market by the time this appears in print, I see no need for the audiophile to scrap his present equipment, since no special control facilities are required other than those that are provided adequately by two separate amplifiers.

To sum up, while most of the quadrasonic tapes I've heard have not been very impressive, the ones that did do the job left no doubt in my mind that the technique is a very large step forward in sound reproduction. Potentially, quadrasonic recordings for home playback represent as much of an advance as stereo did eleven years ago.

(Continued on page 34)

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.
MONTHLY 1
DEC

Prokofieff: Piano Concerto No. 5; Weill: Music from "The Threepenny Opera."
John Browning, pf., Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf.
RCA LSC 3121 stereo ($5.98)

An interesting "period piece," this record, with two very different works from the 1930 era at the turn of the Great Depression. Both still sound very much of the twenties; but where the music of the early part of that gaudy time tended to sound naughty and a bit simple minded, by the later years it had again become both more serious and more complex—even if still full of those tell-tale clankings and clatterings like a noisy cafeteria at lunch hour. That was the prevailing style—from Prokofieff to Weill.

The Prokofieff Concerto came at the tail end of his long Western period, before his return to the Soviet Union and such subsequently mellifluous music as "Peter and the Wolf," "Romeo and Juliet," and the well known Symphony No. 5. Like most of his piano-and-orchestra music, the Concerto is immensely "busy" and complex—the piano scarcely stops for a moment—yet with disconcertingly sudden cadence-endings as plain as an old hymn tune. In two seconds you'll know we are still technically in the twenties, though the date was 1932. All rattly clanks and clatters, the Prokofieff tunefulness carefully hidden (for it was still too soon to write an old fashioned tune straight out). John Browning's skilled piano is recorded in RCA's 1940 style, close-up with the orchestra remarkably distant behind him. Shows him off, but the music would be easier to absorb if the piano weren't so close.

The suite from the familiar 1928 "Threepenny Opera" is in the original small-band semi-jazz orchestration, with the song parts taken over by solo instruments, and RCA has reduced the reverb to a suitably intimate level on this side. The performance is certainly good humored and affectionate but somehow it still sounds like the Boston Symphony—these impeccable players don't really know how to unbutton in a 1928 fashion. Curious mike balance, with the all-important banjo and the clop-clop of the wood blocks somehow much too faint. I enjoyed it a lot, but I'd prefer the oldie 78 versions any day, fi or no fi, or any version with the irreplaceable Lotte Lenya, whose voice is Kurt Weill.

Performance: B Sound: B–

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 22,000
DEC 1969

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1 in C, Op. 21; Symphony No. 8 in F, Op. 93; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3098, $5.98.

ⓢTHE First Symphony is given a strong reading. Admittedly the Introduction seems fast to me (the marking is Adagio molto), and I do not care for the intrusive miking of the oboes and clarinets in the sixth measure. Someone should have noticed that they should be playing at the same volume for the full measure preceding. The Allegro con brio is fast, with Leinsdorf really stressing the repeated Cs; and the violin resolutions starting at measure 46 are pellucid. Leinsdorf has details he wants to bring to our attention, such as the accenting of the two 16th notes going onto the third beat at the end of the codetta or his lovely attention to the rising bassoon and (then) clarinet line at measure 61. There is the slightest crescendo for the last chords of the movement. The second movement is also fast, and less "pretty" than many despite such felicitous details as we get from the two horns beginning at measure 13. The accenting at the end of the Minuet (each time through) is excellent, and the oboe leads unusually well at the end of the first repeated section of the Trio. The finale is the best movement of the four. The phrasing is good (if not exceptional in the way Toscanini's BBC performance is) and, though the climax itself is a bit weak and the violin ensemble at the start of the Allegro molto is off, the performance has the fine spirit of true music-making (e.g., the wind-string exchange starting at 218). As in the first movement Leinsdorf makes some useful clarifications (the winds have two measures at forte volume before going to piano after the climax), and the sfs are hit squarely. There is also the slight crescendo on the final chords. All repeats are observed. Leinsdorf's Eighth, despite an impressive development section in the first movement and a pert second movement, is less successful. The Minuet is ordinary, and the Trio uninspired. The first movement suffers from incomplete expression of the dolce elements and a lack of alertness at the start of the recapitulation. The last movement is taken at a very rapid tempo. But too many cross-rhythms are indistinct for the finale to be adjudged a success. Leinsdorf was attempting, I believe, to downplay the "humor" of the score in favor of an emphasis on the sheer power of the composition. That there is room for such a view has been better demonstrated than it is here. RCA's recording is something less than its best. —M.N.K.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
DEC 1969

97

THE DAILY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
D. 175,703 SUN. 220,405
DEC 21 1969

Records, Tapes Greatest Lasting Last-Minute Gifts

By John Acord III

Records and tape are the greatest last-minute Christmas gifts!

Records and tapes also are lasting gifts that keep giving month after month, long after the Christmas tree has been forgotten.

Here are a few of the better tapes and records released recently.

Probably the most popular rock and jazz oriented album released this year is "Blood Sweat and Tears," a great effort by some very talented musicians and great singer, David Clayton-Thomas.

"BST" is available on discs, 4 and 8 track cartridges and cassette.

Music for the piano is featured this month by various labels and probably one of the best to hit the market is the classical field this year is a recording of a relatively unknown work by Xaver Scharwenka. RCA finally has recorded a work by this much-talked-about but unrecorded composer. His "Concerto No. 1 in B-Flat" is probably the most Romantic of all romantic-styled concer- joins forces with the Boston Symphony under Eric Leinsdorf to give a forcetuostic. It is filled with exceedingly difficult hammer-like clusters and arpeggios. Earl Wild is just the man to fulfill every facet of the work and the Boston gives him excellent support. The sound on both tape and disk is stupendous.

Diskords With Acord

I still find the RCA recording of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9" with Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston one of the best in the category. Leinsdorf's vocal quartet on the final movement has the best blend of voices of any on the market. Sherill Milnes and Placido Domingo are outstanding. Of interest is the recording of Sehoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," also contained in the two-disk set.

The Beethoven "Symphony No. 5," most popular of all Beethoven symphonies, is also on the set. The Beethoven readings are expert and the Schoenberg is superb.

Another Beethoven piece, "Wellington's Victory" a piece originally written for a mechanical player, gets a new recording on the DGG label that is highly stereistic and exciting. In stero you have the opposing armies represented by the orchestra, coming at you from both sides of the room. Beethoven utilized almost every trick in the book including cannons, rifles and the rest of the percussion battery, to compose a piece that is almost as corny as Tchaikovsky's "1812."

Janis Joplin's newest album for Columbia is the gift I have reserved for the editor of Showcase Magazine, Jon Denton. It is called "I Got Dem Ol' Kozmic Blues Again Mama!."

Also a good one for the teens is the new Beatles: "Abbey Road" on the Apple label. After several really bad albums the Beatles are back in good form for this release. You might also take a listen to the New York Rock & Roll Ensemble "Flattering Foe" on the Atco label. This "Baroque" rock group plays pretty music.

THE ADVERTISER TRIBUNE
TIFFIN, O.
PM CIRC 11,284
DEC 4 - 69

Debussy's Music Is Being Played Less

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Since the early 1950s professional pianists have been playing Debussy less and less. A cogent reason could have been Walter Gieseking. He was then emerging from the shadows of World War II and again asserting his mastery of this composer of such pianistic subleties only pianists with very strong affinities realize their full values.

Gieseking had the affinities. His commonly used label, "Debussy specialist," was earned. Many felt they had never really heard the pianistic Debussy before they heard Gieseking interpret him. It is more than likely that many pianists, after listening to Gieseking, dropped Debussy from their repertories.

The definitive Debussy recordings Gieseking made a few years before his death in 1956 have been reissued under the budget-price Odyssey label (32360021) and justify the stock Odyssey claim to "Legendary Performances." They're of Debussy's two books of preludes, the Children's Corner suite and the Suite Bergamasque.

Relatively few claimed "legendary performances" really are, but they're turning up with interesting frequency under the budget-price labels. Among the initial releases of "Great Recordings of the Century" under the Seraphim label, the reviewer would give such a distinction to Aksel Shiotz's singing of 14 songs of Carl Nielsen (600112) and to Hans Hotter's singing of two Schubert song cycles and of individual songs of Schubert, Brahms and Wolf (6051).

Schiotz made his recordings in 1938 through 1941. His superlativeness is in unique timbres and techniques which make Nielsen an emotional experience for non-Scandanavian listeners. Hotter made his in 1946-55 when he was at the height of his lieder command. Other interpretations are no less valid but his impart insights which belong to him.

If you have money to splurge on a three-record chamber music album you'll find the new one of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players appealing for its programming as well as for its displays of virtuosity. It begins with Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, goes to Brahms' delightful piano trio inB, then to a sextet of Poulenc, to

98

Recordings

By STELLA MILLS

LAST DECEMBER Erich Leinsdorf, conducting the Boston Symphony, with pianist Earl Wild, presented a concert at New York's Philharmonic Hall, the feature work the Concerto No. 1 in B-Flat by Scharwenka.

"It is a wing-ding of a romp, one in which the pianist starts with a great splurge and scarcely removes his hands from the keys for the next half hour," wrote a noted New York Times critic.

You can hear it on a new RCA album, with the same artists, and it certainly is a bravura piece of work. Scharwenka (surely every former piano student remembers his Polish Dance), a transplanted Pole living in Berlin, was an extraordinary composer and pianist of the late 19th century whose works faded into relative obscurity following his death in 1924. This concerto, the first of four, was written when Scharwenka was 27, and dedicated to Franz Liszt.

In addition to the concerto, Earl Wild plays three unknown virtuoso vehicles for solo piano: Balakireff's Reminisces of Glinka's Opera "A Life for the Tsar"; Medtner's Improvisation No. 1; and D'Albert's Scherzo Op. 16, No. 2. The latter piece is just one of the many works which has become rather obscure since the days when the composer was around to play it (he died in 1932). In his prolific career, D'Albert composed 20 operas and had six wives! He must have been a busy man!

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181

JAN 4 1970 New England

BRAHMS: Ein Deutches Requiem, Op. 45; Vier ernste Gesänge, Op. 121. Montserrat Caballé, soprano; Sherrill Milnes, baritone; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. (in the Requiem); Sherrill Milnes, baritone; Erich Leinsdorf, piano (in the songs). RCA Red Seal LSC 7054, $11.96 (two discs).

Leinsdorf has always been fond of performing large choral works and one of his favorites is evidently the Brahms German Requiem. He gave the work quite frequently throughout his tenure as Boston's musical director, and finally recorded it during his last season with the BSO. His conception is poised, clear, and tasteful, with crisply precise orchestral work, two admirable soloists, and acceptable singing from the New England choristers. His tempos are sound, balances are excellent, and he avoids the cloying Gemütlichkeit that so many other musicians of Viennese origin deem de rigueur for this music.

With so many fine points to admire, I feel that I ought to like the performance better than I do. For the most part, however, I find Leinsdorf's well-intentioned direction rather antiseptic. He gets a finely arched line in the first section and brings out many relevant details, but there is something aesthetically strait-jacketed about his inflexible, metronomic beat. In the processional second movement, where the pulse ought to be carved out of granite, Leinsdorf, for all his exactitude, sounds stodgy and listless. Why does he permit his timpanist to use soft sticks here? Both Karajan (DGG) and Toscanini (Arturo Toscanini Society) insist upon hard sticks in this section, and the inexorable heartbeat comes across with fervent and, in Toscanini's case, shattering power. The Boston maestro's misplaced stringency at the end of this second movement vitiates any sense of a true climax and RCA's rather arch effort to achieve a "churchly" effect through distant microphoning further aggravates the situation. The muscular sixth section also suffers from Leinsdorf's caution (though the engineering from the third movement onward does have more impact). At any rate, the quasi-contrapuntal writing here sounds much less effective under Leinsdorf than it does under the magnificently broad, muscular ministrations of both Karajan and Toscanini. Caballé sings her fifth-movement solo with lovely tone and impeccable lyricism, but Agnes Giebel and Ernest Ansermet are more appealing in their intimate, leisurely reading for London. All the conductors thus far mentioned do well with the fourth section, though Toscanini and Ansermet supply the sprightliest rhythmic pointing and instrumental detail. Sherrill Milnes is a tasteful artist, but he sounds a bit light and reticent for an assignment that ideally calls for a weightier voice with a darker timbre such as Jerome Hines (Ormandy) or Herbert Janssen (Toscanini).

When Seraphim has made the masterful Kipnis/Gerald Moore version of the Four Serious Songs available once again for a pittance, there seems little reason to settle for any other edition. RCA's fourth-side filler in the present album is, nevertheless, not without interest. Most praiseworthy is Leinsdorf's work in the meaty keyboard part. His piano playing is incisive, authoritative, and directional. He is patently more interested in shape than in color, but the economy of means befits the prevailingly grim mood of the music. Milnes too is admirably straightforward and disinclined to soften the severity as Fischer-Dieskau did (to cite the worst offender), although Milnes's young voice does tend to sound rather collegiate and raw. H.G.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JAN 1970

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1970

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JAN 1970

WEILL: Kleine Dreigroschenmusik. PROKOFIEV: Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 5, in G, Op. 55. John Browning, piano (in the Prokofiev); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3121, $5.98.

A recording of Weill's Suite from the Three Penny Opera has been urgently needed since the recent deletion of the Angel version conducted by Klemperer. Leinsdorf takes quite a different view of the music than did his predecessor: he never lets you forget that this is essentially light music. The former Boston maestro presents the Overture in a brisk, very staccato, scherzando fashion, and throughout, his instrumentalists (all mentioned by name on the record jacket) furnish gleaming, polished sonorities and brightly defined ensemble. Some of the livelier movements (The Song of the Big Guns Charleston, especially) go at a terrific clip, and the whole enterprise is done, as Toscanini used to say, "with smile." Klemperer, on the other hand, indulged in much more poker-faced humor. His unrelentingly accented Overture emphasized how very much like Stravinsky's Histoire du soldat that piece can sound; throughout the score, in fact, the low-keyed, slightly stiff-jointed approach to the cabaret rhythms made for a raspy, slightly uncouth effect that one imagines Weill had in mind. If both records were still readily available, I myself would choose the Angel, even though Klemperer omitted the Anstatt dass song included in the Leinsdorf presentation. Both approaches, however, are valid and well executed.

Prokofiev's last Piano Concerto was given its world premiere in 1932 amid the same festering German atmosphere that had spawned the Weill/Brecht score a few years earlier. The conductor was Wilhelm Furtwängler and the soloist, of course, was the composer himself. It is a difficult score to hold together convincingly, but John Browning succeeds. As in his other Prokofiev concerto performances (the present record completes the cycle), the American pianist understates lyricism and color, and strives for as lean and classical a statement possible. He is less percussive and fiercely brittle than Lorin Hollander (RCA, also with Leinsdorf and the BSO), less fuzzy around the edges than Samson François (Angel), and less oppressively Teutonic than Alfred Brendel (Turnabout). But to my mind, Sviatoslav Richter (DGG) remains supreme in this music. The Soviet virtuoso obtains a wealth of nuance and color, plus a degree of playful humor, sardonic wit, and sheer lyricism that make his well-recorded performance a treat. With all due respect to the present team, the Browning/Leinsdorf collaboration is not in the same league. H.G.

BRAHMS: A German Requiem, Op. 45. Montserrat Caballé (soprano); Sherrill Milnes (baritone); New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. Four Serious Songs, Op. 121. Sherrill Milnes (baritone); Erich Leinsdorf (piano). RCA LSC 7054 two discs $11.96.

Performance: Cool Requiem; impassioned songs
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good

Leinsdorf's reading of the German Requiem differs relatively little in terms of pacing from Klemperer's classic performance on Angel, but the internal choral balances set the two recorded performances poles apart. Klemperer has the benefit of a chorus with mature tenors and basses who can set forth the firm low lines so all-important in Brahms. The lack of a solid choral bass-line in the Leinsdorf recording makes for a cooler ambiance than the music should have for its most effective realization, at least in this reviewer's opinion. Sherrill Milnes, however, does a wonderfully eloquent job in the "Herr, lehre doch mich" episode, and Montserrat Caballé is fascinatingly ethereal in "Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit."

The real worth of this album for me, however, lies in the Milnes-Leinsdorf collaboration in the Vier ernste Gesänge—Brahms' "biblical cantata" out of Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, and Corinthians I, and surely one of the most musically eloquent discourses on the human condition since J. S. Bach.

Whereas the German Requiem, to my way of thinking, demands all-out drama and passion within the bounds of properly proportioned tempo and phrasing, the Serious Songs gain by a more Olympian approach of the type offered here by Milnes and Leinsdorf. Outside of a touch of strain in spots of high tessitura in the last song, Milnes comes through with as convincing and wholly satisfying a vocal realization of this music as I have yet heard, and he is most ably supported by Leinsdorf's finely powerful and expressive pianism. I trust that this performance will one day be issued as part of a single lieder disc by Milnes. D. H.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1970

Berlioz' Symphonic Fantastique, Op. 14 is royally romanticized by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Georges Prêtre. Composed by Hector Berlioz in 1830 after his unfulfilled idyll with Irish actress Harriet Smithson, it is a powerful vision of passion, jealousy, and tenderness RCA.

TOWN AND COUNTRY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 111,000

JAN 1970

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

SCHARWENKA: Concerto No. 1, in B-flat Minor, Op. 32. BALAKIREV: Reminiscences of Glinka's Opera "A Life for the Tsar." MEDTNER: Improvisation, Op. 31, No. 1. D'ALBERT: Scherzo, Op. 16, No. 2. Earl Wild (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA LSC 3080 $5.98.

Performance: Superb
Recording: Top-notch
Stereo Quality: Super

When I was a little boy (that was back in the Neolithic Age), I played my first Scharwenka piano piece—a short Barcarolle in E Minor with a "gondola rhythm" in the left hand and a soupy melody in the right. Already well acquainted then with the composer's once-famous Polish Dance, I remember wondering why a Pole should have spent his time recreating a Venetian scene, and it was years before I found out that Scharwenka was, stylistically speaking, more echt deutsch than anything else.

When I grew older, I heard some of his piano rolls—one could tell that he was a fabulous performer—and learned about the Scharwenka Conservatory in Berlin, its American counterpart in New York, and the composer's career as Court Pianist to the Emperor of Austria—it would take a book to describe it all. Anyway, Xaver Scharwenka composed an opera, Mataswintha, performed by the Met in 1907 (they've rarely been as adventurous since), many piano pieces, and four (count them!) piano concertos. The first of them, praise be to heaven, has finally been recorded and, surprisingly enough, the piece turns out to be such fun it might well bring tears to your ears.

Magnificently—and even triumphantly—played by Earl Wild with top-notch support from Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concerto is a marriage of the incredible lushness, pompous rhetoric, and technical bravura of the Romantic Age. It's an exaggeration of everything you can imagine, bigger than life, decadent as hell, and fiendishly difficult, demanding a pianist who sits like a god on his piano stool calling forth the harmonies and thunderbolts of heaven with a mere flick of his fingers.

Three whopping virtuoso pieces by Balakirev, Medtner, and d'Albert complete the disc. In super stereo, it's the nineteenth-century "grand manner" startlingly brought to life again. Don't under any circumstances miss it. Leonard Altman

RECORDINGS OF SPECIAL MERIT

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 9, in D Minor, Op. 125 ("Choral"); Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67. SCHOENBERG: A Survivor from Warsaw, Op. 46. Jane Marsh (soprano); Josephine Veasey (mezzo-soprano); Placido Domingo (tenor); Sherrill Milnes (baritone); Chorus Pro Musica and New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA LSC 7055 two discs $11.96.

Performance: Intensely absorbing Recording: Full and spacious
Stereo Quality: Good

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 9, in D Minor, Op. 125 ("Choral"). Frances Yeend (soprano); Martha Lipton (mezzo-soprano); David Lloyd (tenor); Mack Harrell (baritone); Westminster Choir; New York Philharmonic, Bruno Walter cond. ODYSSEY (M) 32 16 0322 $2.98.

XAVER SCHARWENKA (1850-1924)
The "grand manner" for his First Concerto

Performance: Powerful
Recording: Shows its age

To say that Erich Leinsdorf, in prefacing this recorded performance of the Beethoven Ninth and Fifth symphonies with Schoenberg's terrifying and defiant A Survivor from Warsaw, has tried to convey a message may be assuming too much. But intended or not, these two discs do indeed convey a message to those of us who care to hear and feel and ponder, and they do so with a deep and absorbing eloquence.

I listened twice through to the two earlier recordings I own of the Schoenberg piece: the Hans Swarowsky version recorded in Vienna (1953) and the Robert Craft performance (1962), both on Columbia. On every count—precision of performance, dramatic impact, clarity of texture, quality of narration and choral singing—the new Leinsdorf version comes out on top. Sherrill Milnes is a stunning narrator, communicating a maximum of emotion and drama with a minimum of bathos; he is obviously aware at every moment of the musical aspects of the work's six-and-a-half minute course. The concluding choral entry of "Shema Yisroel" comes through with enormous impact, yet without a trace of artificially hyped-up dynamics. The recorded sound effectively realizes the exacting balances demanded between narrator, complex orchestral textures, and male chorus—it is altogether splendid.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1970

To have the opening bare fifths of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony steal in just five seconds after the shattering conclusion of the Schoenberg is in itself a jolting experience, one that cannot help but affect the attitude of mind in which the remaining three-and-a-half sides of this release are heard. There is nothing overtly spectacular or startling about Leinsdorf's reading of the Ninth Symphony, and yet it is no ordinary experience. It could best be summed up as a thoughtfully eloquent interpretation, rather than the heaven-storming type those of us who remember Arturo Toscanini have come to favor over the years. The slow movement, in particular, emerges here in a different light—lambent rather than seraphic—and it is perhaps more than usually moving thereby. The tricky inner balances of the later variations are beautifully handled here. Unusually effective, too, is the manner in which Leinsdorf has assured that the entries of the subsidiary theme will achieve a sense of true structural integration rather than of mere interruption, as is too often the case. In the finale, Leinsdorf saves his thunder for the later pages, beginning with the choral reprise that follows the big orchestral fugal episode. The entry of the chorus at this point in the recording is indeed powerful. Up to this point—and including the celebrated bass solo—the proclamation of "Freude, schöner Götterfunken" has had more the character of a vision than that of a realized fact of existence. Sherrill Milnes' solo work is superb in its special way, and it is fascinating to hear him treat Schiller's opening verse almost thoughtfully.

And what of the Beethoven Fifth, of which some two dozen previous versions are currently available? Again Leinsdorf takes an unspectacular and slightly different tack from much of his competition. Proportion in phrasing, dynamics, and rhythmic articulation are the outstanding characteristics. The drama, in a sense, is allowed to take care of itself, it being inherent in the music—so one might read Leinsdorf's thoughts regarding his approach. The result as a listening experience is akin to the classic Felix Weingartner interpretations of a generation and more ago.

The recorded sound of the Leinsdorf Beethoven performances is not of the blockbusting type. It is full-bodied, comfortably spacious in room tone, and in general an honest rendering of the Boston Symphony sound à la Leinsdorf in its home quarters at Symphony Hall, Boston.

In reviewing the initial Odyssey reissue of the Bruno Walter-New York Philharmonic Beethoven Ninth recording in the October 1967 issue of this magazine, at which time it was part of a complete mono Beethoven cycle by Walter, I noted that the reading was one of the more powerful and disciplined of the series. The assessment still holds, though I find that the 1949-1953 sound is now really beginning to show its age. But this disc belongs with those of Toscanini, Furtwängler, and Weingartner as a document of a major musical interpreter in the great tradition. D. H.

(Continued on page 94)

New Releases Will Please Boston Symphony Enthusiasts

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Boston Symphony Orchestra enthusiasts will thoroughly appreciate several new RCA album releases. The records are exceptional.

The first is a brilliant recording of fire-breathing music featuring pianist Earl Wild playing Scharwenka's "Concerto No. 1 in B-Flat Minor." Eric Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra.

Wild's interpretation of Scharwenka is a triumph of bravura—cascades of wildly romantic music, all of which is a joy to hear. Further, it is actually fun to hear.

As far as this reviewer knows, this is the first recording of a Scharwenka concerto (he wrote four of them) and for listeners who appreciate flashy Romantic music, this recording is a must.

The record also includes Balakirev's "A Life for the Tsar," Medtner's "Improvisation No. 1" and D'Albert's "Scherzo No. 2." All require virtuoso playing and the orchestra is at its best. The album's recording quality is exceptional. With a good stereo set, one's living room will become a second Symphony Hall.

The album's stock number is RCA LSC 3080.

★

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players also are featured in a three-record "Works for Chamber Ensemble," RCA Red Seal LSC 6189. Music is by Schubert, Brahms, Poulenc, Webern, Martinu and Dahl.

Indeed, the variety of music is both a strength and a weakness—strong in that the variety is balanced and provides a program in and of itself; weak, in that some numbers (Schubert and Brahms) have already been recorded in quality productions by other artists in ways that exceed the Chamber Players' offerings.

Best numbers on the albums are Webern's "Concerto for Nine Instruments" and Dahl's "Duettino Concertante for Flute and Percussion."

Fine performances are given by guest pianist Richard Goode, who is exceptional in chamber playing, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer and percussionist Everett Firth. Particular praise must go to Dwyer and Firth—they are musicians of the first magnitude.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

JAN 4 1970

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JAN 4 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700

JAN 18 1970

Leinsdorf conveys power of 'Warsaw'

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

At his last Friday-Saturday subscription pair as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Beethoven Ninth, which has been the standard conductor's farewell here since Henschel, and prefaced that with Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw." RCA had planned to record the Beethoven and to issue it in album together with the Fifth, but astonished apparently by the power of the Schoenberg, its success in performance, and perhaps as well by its effectiveness as a vehicle for Sherrill Milnes, they made a last-minute decision to record it as well and to include it in the album with the two Beethoven symphonies.

"A Survivor from Warsaw" was written in 1947, and it is Schoenberg's last completed piece for orchestra. It takes a bit over six minutes, and it is an intensely concentrated drama about the battle in the Warsaw ghetto in the Spring of 1943. A survivor tells the story of a group of Jews, who, at the moment of their deportation to the death camp, suddenly, in a last flaring of spirit and faith, burst into singing the prayer "Shema Yisroel." I wrote at the time that "the compression of the music, its rhythmic life, the ferocious energy of impulse, the richness of cross-reference of languages and characteristic vocal techniques (speech-song English, spoken German, sung Hebrew), the vividness of musical imagery, the unsurpassed orchestral virtuosity through which that imagery is articulated, all this produces a work that is terrifyingly adequate to its subject."

Leinsdorf's is the third recording of the work, but the first really to convey its power. The Boston Symphony's playing is sharply defined in detail and integrated into a coherent succession, and the men of the New England Conservatory chorus do their brief assignment well.

The most "special" accomplishment, however, is Sherrill Milnes's delivery of the narration. Here too, I would as soon quote as try to paraphrase my reaction last April: "It was done without a trace of cheap pathos, with an astonishing ability to project situation and character, with complete comprehension of the purpose and effect of Schoenbergain speech-song, with rhythmic vitality, with an extaordinary range of tone color, volume, intensity of attack (all used with the utmost virtuosity, though quite unobtrusively.) and most significantly, with evident understanding and depth of feeling. It was one of the greatest vocal performances I have ever heard."

MUSIC, Page A-37

Sherrill Milnes excellent in Schoenberg recording

95

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-36

RCA's packaging is understandable, but it is also a nuisance. Because of the Schoenberg, the album is one that many people will consider indispensable: the two Beethoven performances, on the other hand, do not fall into that category. The performance of the Ninth is straightforwrd and effective in the allegros, but, for my taste, too cool, too low in rhetorical expansiveness and force in the Adagio and in the great slow variations of the finale. The Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus do their work well; the soloists range from superb (Milnes) through good (Placido Domingo and Josephine Veasey) to shrill and undistinguished (Jane Marsh). The performance of the Fifth Symphony is flaccid, and Leinsdorf's theory about the fermates at the beginning (explained in the annotations) is a typical and sad example of the intellectual self-torture which that gifted man would sometimes allow to paralyze some of the processes of music-making.

Another Leinsdorf recording, Beethoven's Sixth also with the BSO (RCA), is an effective one in a straight-forward, characteristically low-pressure way. It has some fine playing, too, and, with the earlier recording of the Symphony No. 7, it is probably the most satisfying of the Beethoven series Leinsdorf made here.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 26 1970

Electronic Sound Offering Much That Is New, Exciting

By RAY LaROCQUE
Of The Telegram Staff

The new decade is just a few days old and already many experts have classified the '60s as the decade of rock. On the surface this would seem to be a logical conclusion.

But the '60s also have brought to maturation a musical art form that surely will have a more lasting impact on all types of music in the '70s and the decades to follow.

Along with rock, electronic music also grew up in the '60s. Engineers and musicians began toying with ways to make music electronically several decades ago. Remember the Theremin? It was one of the attractions of the 1939 World's Fair.

Experimental Record

The experiments that followed took many forms. But it wasn't until a man named Robert A. Moog created the Moog Synthesizer that these experiments began to bear fruit. Then came Walter Carlos, a genius who is sort of engineer - composer-musician. He made an experimental record called "Switched-On Bach."

The LP came out just a little more than a year ago. It has since sold well over a half-million copies to pop and serious music lovers alike. Now Carlos has completed his second LP and Columbia has released "The Well-Tempered Synthesizer."

This one again sticks to baroque music featuring short pieces by Monteverdi, Scarlatti, Handel and a recording of the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 that pianist Glenn Gould has called "the finest performance of the Brandenburgs — live, canned or intuited."

But there is much more to enjoy than the Bach on this fascinating LP. The Scarlatti Sonata in D Major, L 164, is a delicate minuet that is turned into a tantalizing electronic tidbit that effervesces with pleasant sounds. The Handel "Water Music" arranged for the Moog and played by Carlos is a new listening experience.

The Climax

But the climax is in the Monteverdi "Domine Ad Adjuvandum" from the 1610 Vespers. Here, Carlos has created electronic choir-like sounds that are magnificent, impressive and overpowering. It's like nothing ever heard before on records.

RECORDS

Ray LaRocque

Many others have toyed with the versatility of the Moog Synthesizer, but mostly to try to imitate existing musical instruments. Carlos has found the Moog an entirely new way to express musical thoughts. The synthesist, as the composer-performer who plays the synthesizer is called, must be able to arrange, manipulate the keyboard, handle a serious of controls and switches, and understand the workings of a computer. Right now qualified performers are few, but with Carlos leading the way, I look for much that is new and exciting in electronic records in the '70s. This includes jazz, rock and pop music as well as new LPs from the standard classical repertoire.

BOSTON SYMPHONY LPs, new ones that is, are plentiful this season. Perhaps the most impressive of all is a two-record album that combines a dramatic presentation of Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw" with a masterful presentation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Serrill Milnes is narrator on the Schoenberg and baritone soloist on the Beethoven. The set also contains the Boston's interpretation of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

Other new Boston Symphony recordings: A superb Brahms' "A German Requiem" with Montserrat Caballe and Sherrill Milnes on vocals; a delightful LP that combines Mozart's No. 36 ("Linz") and No. 39 Symphonies; Another LP that has Beethoven's First and Eighth symphonies in rather undistinguished interpretations; a Beethoven's Sixth Symphony that is plainly pastoral but has little to distinghish it over dozens of other versions; a novelty featuring Earl Wild, pianist in the Scharwenka Concerto in B Flat Minor; and an LP with pianist John Browning that leads off with the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 5, but finishes with the choicest morsel of them all, a truly exhilarating performance of the Kurt Weill music from "The Three Penny Opera."

"THE WORLD of Harry Partch" is a modern collection of musical sounds melded into three compositions by Harry Partch using such innovations as a chromelodeon, a harmonic canon, a boo (a bamboo marimba), a gourd tree, and a gizmo he calls simply "the spoils of war." Listening is an interesting sonic experience.

JOURNAL HERALD
DAYTON, OHIO

FEB 19 1970

BERLIOZ: SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE — Pretre, Boston Symphony (RCA LSC 3096)

I have long been partial to this work, and to the later Munch-Boston version of this work, and to the later Munch-Orchestre de Paris version on Angel. The Boulez version is a fascinating alternative. Onnpast performancd I would expect a good reading from Pretre, but nothing quite like this.

One gets the feeling of a slower reading, but performance times are not that much different.

In contrast to a certain sense of driven inevitability which marks both Munch versions, one might with slight overstatement say that you almost get a contact high from the opium fumes in the Boulez. And with Pretre you get a spooky sense of the creatures of hell lurking behind every note and a strong whiff of brimstone in the last movement. I am hesitant to call any one of such strong versions "best," but if I had to pick one I think it would be Pretre.

Records in Review

Schubert and Mod Mozart

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

In this year of Beethoven we might expect some other composers to be slighted, most particularly the closest contemporaries, such as Franz Schubert. Interestingly, the finding of a new Schubert piano sonata is but the least of reasons for three new Schubert discs.

In question is the Schubert "Grazer" Fantasie, discovered little over a year ago with other known items and music of Anselm Huettenbrenner. Lili Kraus gave it an American premiere over CBS's "Camera Three" television program last November. Now it appears on Odyesey 32 16 0380 with a Landler Suite selected by Miss Kraus from seventen Landler, D.366 and two German Dances, D. 974, and Mozart's Fantasies in c and d, K.475 and 397. The new work gives no revolutionary insights to the work of its composer. The performance seems capable, though no score is yet available to me for a detailed judgment. Miss Kraus' way with Mozart is, however, winning, and the familiar and popular K.475 is worth the disc, particularly for those who have not yet explored the Mozartian approach to the piano fantasy.

More rewarding to Schubertophiles would be the release by Wilhelm Kempff on DGG 139 323 of Schubert's ultimate piano sonata, in B flat, D.960. Hitherto I have contented myself with the rendition by Fou T'song on a now withdrawn Westminster release. Kempff's rendition is winning, containing all the music since he is among rare pianists who observe the long first movement repeat. His ability to distinguish among slight changes of mood by minute performance techniques recalls similar artistry in the vocal realm of Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Kempff serves up an encore, the Scherzo in B flat, D. 593.

William Steinberg's premiere recording as music director of the BSO opens the last season under RCA Victor's recording auspices. One would wish for success, but the Symphony No. 9 in C, "The Great," (LSC 3115), though boasting a lovely warm acoustic, fails to get above the earth to that rarified heavenly atmosphere where this music must sail. Steinberg does not fall prey to the temptation to take the "Andante con moto" as a normal classical slow movement, but keeps it moving. Nonetheless, it is solidly earthbound. A short comparison with the Szell recording from Cleveland should convince most any listener that that is the disc to buy unless, of course, one already owns the Munch disc with a BSO more than a decade younger than Steinberg's organization.

Moogified Mozart! Heavens to electronics! Can the delicate rococo adapt to the assault of hundreds of watts? Why not, if the item being adapted is the most naturally updatable of all Mozart's operas, "Cosi fan Tutte," for "Women are like that," now as then.

On the first weekend of this month the Institute of the Arts of Hofstra University presented "Cosi a Go-Go," or "They All Swing," or a mod version of "Cosi Fan Tutte," in their Little Theatre. From the old libretto of two young men who, disguised, trick their fiances into infidelity, sprung a story of two young college students, disguised as hippies, guided by their cynical psychology professor who is aided by the girls' secretary, Despina, achieving the expected same results in the 1970's. It is all very modern and was, consequently, aided by an orchestra that consisted of a piano, an harpsichord a Moog synthesizer and percussion.

Let it first be noted that none of the Moogifying nor special lighting effects nor projections overpowered the efforts of the singing actors. As Don Alfonso, William Goleeke projected a marvelous character suave to the nth degree, bent on winning his bet but not on destroying the happiness of the lovers, so that humanity triumphed over melodrama. His diction served the Ruth and Thomas Martin English adaptation (with minor alterations) admirable and his rich voice was perfectly balanced to the size of the auditorium. Herbert Porum, Ferrando, was everything one could hope for from an heroic tenor. Opening the show sunning on a beach, he engaged in sit-ups while nearly overpowering everything and everyone with a mighty ring that defines the stentorian character of his vocalizing. Richard Klimkowski's Guglielmo was a fitting quiet contrast. Corrie Sims, a go-go dancer for the first of four performances, got carried away with go-going wherever the chance offered it; this was a real swinging Despina who was helping the Don more for the satisfaction of see her too-too reserved ladies join in the swinging than for the monetary returns, however considerable they were (in this case, a Jaguar). Betty Tepper (Fiordiligi) and Deborah Litwak (Dorabella) both had tentative vocal beginnings, but each warmed to their roles quickly. Hofstra's Pershing Rifles Crack Drill Team momentarily upstaged the proceedings as the two students took their leave of their lady loves.

The Moog synthesizer was played by Herbert Deutsch and for that we must offer a rousing cheer. The Moog machine can sound like the worst of Hammond organs. In the wrong hands it is no more like a Stradivarius played by Nathan Milstein than your next door neighbor's practice model played by his nine-year-old. Deutsch not only orchestrated the overture ond the march, but improvised with the percussionist, Ben Velella, at many appropriate times. Martin Smith of N.E.T. Opera Theatre accompanied much of the performance at the piano, and Gene Gilroy added further color from the Harpsichord. One still left the performance with Moog sounds in one's ear and hoping that a production of this sort might soon lead to a Cosi accompanied by two or three synthesizers capable of generating electronic sounds that would fully replace the symphony orchestra.

Credit for the idea for this electronic Cosi and its deft stage realization goes to Herbert Beattie, himself a basso of high merit whose stage direction deserves wider circulation. He conducted, yet the singers were so well coached that one was rarely aware of his presence. Equally unobtrusive were the design effects of Raymond Waterman. Really, the unique quality of this production was that all the new ideas and special effects, design and direction were unobtrusive; what stood out was the magic of Mozart, still fresh after nearly two centuries.

100.

Quadrasonics On-The-Air

LEONARD FELDMAN

The state-of-the-art of "simultaneous 4-channel stereo" from a single stereo FM station

THE COMING OF 4-CHANNEL SOUND in the home has been discussed more than once in recent issues of AUDIO. Suddenly, a long-dormant interest in multi-channel sonic reproduction seems to be coming from all segments of the audio and high-fidelity industry.

Fig. 1—Suggested speaker arrangement for the Boston Symphony 4-channel broadcasts.

The first practical program source to supply material for 4-channel listening was, of course, pre-recorded tape. Computer technology has, for many years, been utilizing 8, 12, 24, and even more channels of information on a single reel of tape. It is therefore rather surprising that more than three decades of time have elapsed since we were treated to the marvelous aural experience of Walt Disney's Fantasia. Those of us who are old enough to remember our first reaction to that version of "total surround stereo" have perhaps wondered over the years why such an all-encompassing sonic experience has been denied us. Apparently our patience is about to be rewarded.

If and when the history of 4-channel sound is ever written in the future, several individuals and firms will be mentioned as having been responsible for this new interest in 4-channel sound. There will be those, too, who will skeptically maintain that this new approach to home music listening is nothing more than a sales gimmick thought up by greedy manufacturers intent upon selling "another pair of everything." These skeptics simply haven't heard total surround stereo. To hear it is to realize what has already become a cliche in this brand-new technique: "the difference between 4-channel and conventional stereo sound is perhaps greater than between 2-channel stereo as we know it and monophonic reproduction."

Vanguard Recording Company and Acoustic Research, Inc., must be credited with stimulating the initial new interest in this field. In cooperation with FM radio stations WGBH and WCRB in the Boston area, these two firms have been sponsoring a series of live symphonic concerts utilizing the regular subscription series of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Figure 1 illustrates the layout of the four loudspeakers and the two FM stereo receivers required in a home listening situation. Two things are apparent when you examine this figure. A great deal of equipment is needed and the distribution of 4-channel information is very odd. When we first saw this diagram we questioned the wisdom of putting the front-left and rear-left on one FM station while the other station carried front-right and rear-right information. What sort of a lopsided program would the listener equipped with only one stereo receiver hear?

Recently we had an opportunity to discuss this problem with Mr. Richard Kaye, one of the directors of participating station WCRB. Once he explained the microphone placement used in the concert hall and diagramed in Fig. 2, we realized the nature of the problem. Had WCRB elected to broadcast front-left and front-right and relegated the rear-left and rear-right to cooperating station

Fig. 2—Placement of microphones.

Fig. 3—In New York experiments, the "primary" stereo channels are carried by WNYC-FM, while WKCR carries the rear-right and rear-left channels.

WGBH, can you imagine the phone calls that WGBH would have received from its irate listeners? The microphone placement shown in Fig. 2 was an attempt to offer all things to all listeners. While the left two microphones were designated as left-front and left-rear, the left-rear microphone was, in fact, considerably further to

Admittedly, WKCR must be making a supreme sacrifice in agreeing to FM in the late 1960s), and myself, have proposed at least one solution to states a reduction in deviation of the main and stereo subchannels to a

Fig. 4—Presently authorized modulation and frequency distribution for stereo FM plus SCA broadcasting. (Only one half of spectrum is shown—other half is mirror image to left of the "0" or carrier-frequency line.)

Fig. 5—Proposal for 4-channel FM multiplex broadcasting system, again showing only one half of the entire spectrum.

EXTRA: TAPE RECORDER BUYING GUIDE

Splicing Tape & Applications

Construct a Variable-Frequency Source

The 8-Track/Cassette Cold War

The 4-Channel Disc & Quadrasonics on the Air

Stereo Equipment & Record Reviews

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

JAN 1970

ABOUT THE COVER:

Four-channel stereo is exemplified by a disc and a stereo FM scope photo, both of which are being touted as four-channel media. AUDIO has articles concerning both in this issue.

the left than the left-front and only four or five feet behind it. The same arrangement applied to the two right microphones. In this way, it was hoped that a listener equipped with a single stereo receiver would still experience a fair amount of separation, while the hearty souls able to set up dual stereophonic systems would experience some of the ambient qualities of the symphony hall—the avowed purpose of the 4-channel experiment in this instance. Listeners have been most enthusiastic, but we wonder if this enthusiasm is prompted by the novelty of the 4-channel listening experience rather than by its state of perfection.

Beginning October 26, 1969, New York City audiophiles were able to duplicate the experience of the Boston listeners. Harry Maynard, host of the popular "Men of Hi-Fi" program broadcast weekly over WNYC, has crusaded for 4-channel stereo. With the assistance of members of the New York Audio Society who helped to publicize the broadcast and the cooperation of radio stations WNYC-FM and WKCR, (WNYC-FM is the municipally run broadcasting facility and WKCR is operated by Columbia University), 4-channel stereo broadcasting is a regular event in the New York City area. Unlike the Boston experiment, however, the channel arrangement is as shown in Fig. 3.

Admittedly, WKCR must be making ing a supreme sacrifice in agreeing to carry just the rear-right and rear-left channels. As of this writing we don't know what the reaction will be from listeners attempting to tune in to WKCR on Sunday night at 10 p.m. utilizing either a single monophonic FM receiver or even a conventional 2-channel stereophonic receiver. Those of us involved in the New York experiment felt, however, that this microphone arrangement will provide greater impact for 4-channel listeners than would be possible with the Boston arrangement. It is apparent, I think, that both arrangements have serious limitations. We are reminded of similar compromises that took place in the mid-1950s when early attempts at stereophonic broadcasting were confined to AM/FM combinations. True, the problems inherent in those early experiments were even greater, since the quality of the AM channel was so inferior with respect to noise and frequency response. Although the current experiments at least involve all-FM transmission, there do exist somewhat more subtle problems, such as: phase relationships between the cooperating stations, distances from each transmitter to a given receiver, compounded multipath effects, etc.

As was true in the 1950s, a better way will have to be found. William S. Halstead, a noted pioneer in the field of multiplex FM (and one of the many system proponents for stereo FM in the late 1950s), and myself, have proposed at least one solution to the problem. Before describing our proposal, I would like to make it clear that this is by no means the only method possible. When 2-channel stereo FM was being considered by the FCC, some 17 systems were proposed before the presently adopted system was approved. We have no doubt that others will come forward now as well. In any event, the system we are proposing does work, permits a single FM station to broadcast four distinct channels of information simultaneously and (subject to certain qualifications which will be discussed in a moment) is compatible with the requirements of effective 4-channel musical reproduction as we presently understand them.

Figure 4 shows presently approved spectrum distribution of a single FM channel engaged in stereo and SCA (background music, etc.) transmission. Main-channel material occupies the range from 50 to 15,000 Hz. The stereo pilot subcarrier can be seen at 19,000 Hz, modulating the main carrier approximately 10 per cent of the total. Stereophonic (L−R) information is contained in the range from 23,000 to 53,000 Hz. Finally, the SCA subchannel is located at a nominal frequency of 67,000 Hz and since it is an FM subcarrier, is seen to occupy the total range from 59 kHz to 75 kHz. The presence of the private-subscriber SCA subchannel necessitates a reduction in deviation of the main and stereo subchannels to a

Fig. 4—Presently authorized modulation and frequency distribution for stereo FM plus SCA broadcasting. (Only one half of spectrum is shown—other half is mirror image to left of the "0" or carrier-frequency line.)

Fig. 5—Proposal for 4-channel FM multiplex broadcasting system, again showing only one half of the entire spectrum.

EXTRA: TAPE RECORDER BUYING GUIDE

Splicing Tape & Applications

Construct a Variable-Frequency Source

The 8-Track/Cassette Cold War

The 4-Channel Disc & Quadrasonics on the Air

Stereo Equipment & Record Reviews

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

JAN 1970

ABOUT THE COVER:

Four-channel stereo is exemplified by a disc and a stereo FM scope photo, both of which are being touted as four-channel media. AUDIO has articles concerning both in this issue.

maximum of 80 per cent. Thus, total deviation consists of 80 per cent main and stereo subchannel, 10 per cent pilot carrier and 10 per cent SCA.

Figure 5 illustrates the new spectral distribution proposed by Mr. Halstead and myself. All we have done is to add a second FM subcarrier at a frequency of 89 kHz (or thereabouts), shift the previously used SCA subcarrier to approximately 69 kHz, and back off the main and stereo subchannels an additional 10 per cent so as not to exceed 100 per cent modulation for the total composite signal. In terms of s/n it is interesting to note that our two "rear" subchannels (for we intend to use them for rear-left and rear-right information) are expected to be as good or possibly better than the presently used stereo subcarrier sidebands. This is so because the presently used L−R sidebands are AM in nature whereas our proposed subchannels will be modulated in an FM mode.

What about frequency response for our two additional channels? Our early experiments indicate that it will be possible to broadcast frequencies as high as 10,000 Hz. We realize that the purists will scream and call this "lo-fi." To evaluate the adequacy (or inadequacy) of these parameters accurately, we must examine just what it is we're trying to accomplish with the addition of the third and fourth channels. If we are trying to duplicate more realistically the reverberant effects experienced in the live concert hall, there is sufficient evidence on hand to justify this modest frequency limitation imposed upon the extra channels, since their function is that of reinforcement and not that of providing primary musical information. If, on the other hand, the many popular musical forms on the scene plan to use the four channels for new creative effects (such as putting each member of a four-piece combo in his own corner), then it might be argued that all four channels must be equal in fidelity.

It is our contention that unless the recording session is "gimmicked" to the extent of recording these four instrumentalists in totally separate studios (a trick resorted to very often in the early days of stereo), primary spatial information is sensed from fundamental tones rather than from harmonics or overtones. If this is so, then limitation in frequency response of the third and fourth channels will not perceptibly degrade the listenability of the end product.

Currently, radio station WNYC-FM has requested permission from the FCC to transmit this system on an experimental basis. If, and when, the FCC grants permission, these questions and a great many technical-feasibility questions will be answered in short order. Since such requests

(Continued on page 78)

Fig. 6—Block diagram of 4-channel stereo FM adapter used to recover the 3rd and 4th channels.

Fig. 7—The author about to measure performance of the first decoder designed to work with the Halstead 4-channel stereo FM broadcasting system.

Fig. 8—Typical ratio-detector circuit, showing connection point for "3rd-&-4th-channel" decoder.

Check No. 25 on Reader Service Card →

Quadrasonics

(Continued from page 24)

for experimental transmission are usually granted sooner or later, it would be of interest to detail the nature of an adapter or decoder which might be needed to recover channels 3 and 4. Such an adapter has been built by the author. A block diagram of it is shown in Fig. 6, while its physical dimensions are shown in the photograph of Fig. 7. This adaptor could be connected easily to virtually any FM tuner or receiver presently in use. Older tuners equipped with a so-called multiplex jack (built before the days of FM stereo) would not have to be tampered with at all, since the adaptor would plug right into this multiplex jack. Later vintage equipment could be adapted in minutes by connecting the proposed adaptor to the output of the detector (whether it be of a ratio-detector or discriminator type) of the tuner or receiver in question.

The typical point of connection, in the case of a ratio detector, is shown in Fig 8. Referring to Fig. 6, the entire composite signal derived at the detector output is fed to a pair of high-input-impedance isolation amplifiers. Each amplifier feeds a band-pass filter. The upper filter passes the 69-kHz subchannel, while the lower one passes the 89-kHz subchannel. Futher amplification follows, as well as mute and level controls in each channel. In the case of the 89-kHz channel, the signal is fed to a muting amplifier. The output of the muting amplifier controls a pair of reed relays (or other solid-state switches). In the absence of an 89-kHz signal, both outputs of the decoder are normally shorted so that no output is obtained. In the presence of an 89-kHz signal, the shorts are removed and L-rear and R-rear outputs are obtained.

While this muting function may seem like an unnecessary embellishment (after all, one could turn down the related volume controls on the amplifiers in the absence of 4-channel transmission), it has been incorporated specifically to protect SCA (background music) operators from "piracy." You will recall that SCA operations generally employ a subcarrier of 67 kHz which is very close in frequency to our proposed third channel at 69 kHz. By having the decoder outputs "turned on" only in the presence of the upper (89-kHz) subchannel, inadvertent reception of background music will not occur when the tuner is tuned to a station engaged in that service. Æ

FOR "DOUBTING THOMASES"

The proposal described herein for 4-channel broadcasting from a single FM station may cause some concern over possible excessive spectral distribution in the FM channel. There is a great deal of misconception concerning this matter. Many people suppose that because total permissible deviation is limited to ±75 kHz and because channel bandwidth is nominally 150 kHz, no energy is permitted beyond 75 kHz from center frequency. This is not true!

The FCC permits energy to fall as far as 240 kHz beyond center frequency providing that this energy is attenuated at least 25 dB. Furthermore, subcarriers such as proposed in the main article featured here utilize a deviation ratio no greater than 1, which means that only a single sideband above and below subcarrier center frequency is generated. Thus, if we modulate the 89-kHz subcarrier with a frequency of 8 kHz (audio) and cause the subcarrier to be deviated ±8 kHz, then sidebands will be generated only at 97 kHz and at 81 kHz. It should be remembered, too, that the injection of each of these subcarriers is only 10 per cent of the total injection of 20 dB below the 100-per-cent reference to begin with.

To convince disbelievers of the foregoing, we assembled a formidable amount of test equipment in order to prove these points. Included were a Boonton Model 202-B FM/AM Generator, a Moseley SG-4T Subcarrier Generator, and a Model LA-17 Panoramic Analyzer made by Lavoie Laboratories, Inc. A Crosby SG-292 Stereo Composite Signal Generator served to provide the regular stereo composite signal.

Figure 1 serves to establish the horizontal scale of the Panoramic Analyzer display. In (A) we see an unmodulated r.f. carrier. In (B) the carrier has been detuned by 240 kHz in one direction, whereas in (C) it has been detuned an equal amount in the other direction. Thus, the length of the entire scale, horizontally, is equivalent to 480 kHz.

In the photos of Fig. 2, the vertical amplitude sensitivity has merely been increased by 18 dB. This has been done because this particular Panoramic Analyzer's vertical scale is logarithmic and some of the minute energy bursts which we wish to show would have been invisible had the vertical scale been maintained at its previous sensitivity. Figure 2(A), therefore, is merely a repeat of the unmodulated r.f. carrier presented on this expanded scale. In (B), an unmodulated 69-kHz subcarrier has been added at proper 10 per cent (−20-dB) injection level. In (C), this subcarrier was modulated by 10-kHz audio at a deviation maximum of 10 kHz. Notice that no additional significant sidebands appear. Figure 2(D) shows the introduction of the second subcarrier at 89 kHz, while (E) displays both subcarriers with modulation having been applied to each. Note again that no unexpected additional sidebands appear anywhere.

The next and final group of figures may come as a shock to many readers. Figure 3(A) shows what happens to spectral distribution when a left-only stereo signal is applied. Main carrier modulation audio frequency is 15 kHz.

Yes, there seems to be substantial energy content up to around 150 kHz on either side of center frequency. In (B), we have introduced our pair of subcarriers and even modulated each one with an 8-kHz audio tone, but they are all but lost in the high-amplitude spectral contributions on the still-present left-only signal.

In (C), we applied an L + R signal of 15 kHz + a 10-per cent pilot signal + the two additional subcarriers as before. The L + R signal was allowed to deviate the main carrier ± 50 kHz. Spectral distribution seems almost identical to that of (B).

Next, in (D) we modulated the carrier by independent L and R signals of 10 kHz and 15 kHz, respectively. A 19-kHz pilot carrier is present also, as it was in the previous three figures. We have, however, removed our extra subcarriers and thereby can increase the remaining deviation to a full 100% (75 kHz).

The only conclusion we can draw from this presentation (which actually seems to occupy more spectral distribution than any of the previous ones) is that present stereo broadcasting techniques, when full modulation is applied, actually occupy more bandwidth under certain conditions than our proposed 4-channel system would under any conditions. In other words, by backing off 20 per cent in main and stereo subchannel modulation to accommodate the new pair of subcarriers, we are actually more than compensating for their addition. Æ

?-kHz subcarriers are
ed by 8-kHz tones,
kHz.

with an L-only signal
; 45 kHz plus 10%
Hz pilot signal. Main quency is 15 kHz. (B)
t that two subcarriers ch modulated 8 kHz
-Carrier with L-R sig-ng a total of 50 kHz, l, plus 10% each of
of which is moduas before; deviation s; (D)—Carrier mod-kHz L and R signals, us 19-kHz pilot. No
otal deviation of all (75 kHz).

With the Pickering XV-15 Cartridge You Get 100% Music Power—You Hear It All!
Only Pickering's XV-15 series of cartridges features 100% Music Power. With the Pickering, a harp sounds like a harp, a trumpet has the biting sound that you expect from a brass instrument, the flute has a rich romantic tone, the orchestra is the full-throated instrument the composer called for. So choose Pickering — and make the enjoyment of 100% Music Power a part of your life.
PICKERING
For those who can HEAR the difference
THE NEW PICKERING XV-15/750E PREMIER MODEL OF THE XV-15 SERIES, TRACKS AT ¾ TO 1 GRAM. DYNAMIC COUPLING FACTOR OF 750 FOR USE IN FIRST-CONTENDER SYSTEMS. $50.00. OTHER XV-15 COMPONENTS FROM $29.95. PICKERING & CO. PLAINVIEW, L. I., N. Y.
LOST MUSIC POWER
USEFUL MUSIC POWER
CARTRIDGE "A" at 75% Music Power
VIOLIN
SOPRANO CLARINET TRUMPET
SNARE DRUM
FREQUENCY Hz
. . . the instruments seem a little faded in the upper frequencies: because cartridge "A" attenuates higher frequencies as much as 25%.
USEFUL MUSIC POWER
XV-15 at 100% Music Power
. . . the instruments, all of them, are distinct and clear throughout the entire fundamental frequency range.
EXTRA: TAPE RECORDER BUYING GUIDE
Splicing Ta
Construct a Vari
The 8-Track
Stereo Eq

EXTRA: TAPE RECORDER BUYING GUIDE

Splicing Tape & Applications

Construct a Variable-Frequency Source

The 8-Track/Cassette Cold War

The 4-Channel Disc & Quadrasonics on the Air

Stereo Equipment & Record Reviews

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

JAN 1970

ABOUT THE COVER:

Four-channel stereo is exemplified by a disc and a stereo FM scope photo, both of which are being touted as four-channel media. AUDIO has articles concerning both in this issue.

the left than the
four or five feet b arrangement applie microphones. In hoped that a listen
single stereo recei
perience a fair am
while the hearty s
dual stereophonic
perience some of t
of the symphony
purpose of the 4-in this instance. I most enthusiastic,
this enthusiasm i novelty of the 4-c
perience rather t
perfection.

Beginning Octo
York City audio duplicate the expe
listeners. Harry M popular "Men
broadcast weekly
crusaded for 4-c
the assistance of
York Audio Soc
publicize the br
operation of radio
and WKCR, (WN
cipally run broa
WKCR is operat
versity), 4-chann
is a regular eve
City area. Unlik
ment, however,
ment is as show
Admittedly, W
a supreme sa

F 4—Presently for stereo FM is shown—o

maximum of 80 per cent. Thus, total deviation consists of 80 per cent main and stereo subchannel. 10 per cent

Recorded Tape Reviews

BERT WHYTE

Berlioz—Romeo and Juliet
Patricia Kern, contralto; Robert Tear, tenor; John Shirley-Quirk, bass; John Aldis Choir
Colin Davis conducting the London Symphony Orchestra
Ampex/Phillips PTF909 open reel, 3¾ ips ($9.95)

One thing I find confusing about tape releases is what decision prompts the release of some material at 7½ ips and other material at 3¾. Presumably some evaluation for sonic values is made of the copy of the master sent to Ampex. No doubt certain economic conditions also influence the choice of speed. I have found that musical values evidently have minimal considerations in these decisions. Take this taping of "Romeo and Juliet" as an example. It is a major work . . . it is conducted by Colin Davis, a Berlioz specialist who is being compared favorably with the late Sir Thomas Beecham and Charles Munch . . . and this is the first stereo recording of the work in some years. Nevertheless, it was released at 3¾ ips speed and in my opinion this was unfortunate. I have the disc version of this recording and while there are some poor surfaces to contend with, the overall sound was quite good. It probably would have been even better in a 7½-ips version. Musically the performance is outstanding. Colin Davis essays what would be in some hands a disastrously fast pace, but he gets away with it by exquisite refinement of detail and superb balances between the orchestral and vocal elements. His "Queen Mab" scherzo is sheer poetry, with the London Symphony contributing enormously with their brilliant playing. The soloists are all good without any of them being really outstanding. The acoustic perspective orchestral de
The voices a good intelligi tempt at gim
probably in
What was m dynamic ran more weight
case here fo since using preamp only sound mudd disc was no
all basis, th
and better t the 7½-ips s equalled or disc in soun an importan mance it is opted for the can't always solace in the version gives
The President
Ampex/Astr
ips ($24.95)

Fig. 1—(A)—Unmodulated carrier; (B)—Unmodulated carrier shifted 240 kHz downward to establish horizontal scale; (C)—Carrier shifted 240 kHz upward to establish other end of horizontal scale.

Fig. 2—(A) Scale amplified so top of dB scale is now + 18 dB so components of smaller amplitude will be disclosed in later photos. (This scale used in all subsequent displays.) (B)—Carrier (unmodulated) with added 67-kHz subcarrier (unmodulated). (C)—Carrier (unmodulated plus 67 kHz subcarrier modulated by 10-kHz audio; deviation maximum of 8 kHz. (D)—Carrier (unmodulated) plus 67-kHz subcarrier (unmodulated) plus 92-kHz subcarrier, each contributing 10% total deviation of main carrier. Main carrier has been monitored continuously to ensure that overall levels have not changed. (E)—Same as (D) except both 67- and 92-kHz subcarriers are now being modulated by 8-kHz tones, with a deviation of 8 kHz.

Fig. 3—(A)—Carrier with an L-only signal applied; deviation is 45 kHz plus 10% contribution of 19-kHz pilot signal. Main carrier modulation frequency is 15 kHz. (B) Same as Fig. 1, except that two subcarriers have been added, each modulated 8 kHz by 8-kHz tones. (C)—Carrier with L-R signals at 15 kHz deviating a total of 50 kHz, plus 10% pilot signal, plus 10% each of two subcarriers, each of which is modulated by 8-kHz tones, as before; deviation is 8 kHz for subcarriers; (D)—Carrier modulated by 10- and 15-kHz L and R signals, full stereo mode, plus 19-kHz pilot. No subcarriers applied. Total deviation of all components is 100% (75 kHz).

LAFAYETTE
Dept. 27010
Syosset, L.I.
Mail the C for your Catalog 7

With the Pickering XV-15 Cartridge You Get 100% Music Power—You Hear It All!

Only Pickering's XV-15 series of cartridges features 100% Music Power. With the Pickering, a harp sounds like a harp, a trumpet has the biting sound that you expect from a brass instrument, the flute has a rich romantic tone, the orchestra is the full-throated instrument the composer called for. So choose Pickering — and make the enjoyment of 100% Music Power a part of your life.

PICKERING

For those who can HEAR the difference

THE NEW PICKERING XV-15/750E. PREMIER MODEL OF THE XV-15 SERIES. TRACKS AT ¾ TO 1 GRAM. DYNAMIC COUPLING FACTOR OF 750 FOR USE IN FIRST TONEARMS. $60.00. OTHER XV-15 CARTRIDGES FROM $29.95. PICKERING & CO., PLAINVIEW, L.I., N.Y.

LOST MUSIC POWER — USEFUL MUSIC POWER — FREQUENCY Hz

CARTRIDGE "A" at 75% Music Power

VIOLIN — SOPRANO CLARINET — TRUMPET — SNARE DRUM — FREQUENCY Hz

. . . the instruments seem a little faded in the upper frequencies: because cartridge "A" attenuates higher frequencies as much as 25%.

USEFUL MUSIC POWER — FREQUENCY Hz

XV-15 at 100% Music Power

VIOLIN — SOPRANO CLARINET — TRUMPET — SNARE DRUM — FREQUENCY Hz

. . . the instruments, all of them, are distinct and clear throughout the entire fundamental frequency range.

the left than the
four or five feet b arrangement applic
microphones. In hoped that a listen
single stereo recei
perience a fair am
while the hearty s
dual stereophonic
perience some of t
of the symphony
purpose of the 4-
in this instance. I
most enthusiastic,
this enthusiasm i novelty of the 4-c
perience rather t
perfection.

Beginning Octo
York City audiop
duplicate the expe
listeners. Harry M popular "Men
broadcast weekly
crusaded for 4-c
the assistance of
York Audio Soc
publicize the br
operation of radio
and WKCR, (WN
cipally run broa
WKCR is operat
versity), 4-chann
is a regular eve
City area. Unlik
ment, however,
ment is as show

Admittedly, W ing a supreme sa

Fig. 4—Presently tion for stereo FM
trum is shown—o

% MODULATION (1

100 15 23
90
80
70
L + R MAIN CHANNEL
60
50 40 maximum of 80 per cent. Thus, total deviation consists of 80 per cent main and stereo subchannel. 10 per cent pi

di ar
ac qu sh ca ba ne no tio ter tha we an pe bet sul cau bar pro late

our ear be as I the "lo-inac cura it is the char mor fect hall, hand limit
char

Fig. 3
code

Recorded Tape Reviews

BERT WHYTE

Berlioz—Romeo and Juliet
Patricia Kern, contralto; Robert Tear, tenor; John Shirley-Quirk, bass; John Aldis Choir
Colin Davis conducting the London Symphony Orchestra
Ampex/Phillips PTF909 open reel, 3¾ ips ($9.95)

One thing I find confusing about tape releases is what decision prompts the release of some material at 7½ ips and other material at 3¾. Presumably some evaluation for sonic values is made of the copy of the master sent to Ampex. No doubt certain economic conditions also influence the choice of speed. I have found that musical values evidently have minimal considerations in these decisions. Take this taping of "Romeo and Juliet" as an example. It is a major work . . . it is conducted by Colin Davis, a Berlioz specialist who is being compared favorably with the late Sir Thomas Beecham and Charles Munch . . . and this is the first stereo recording of the work in some years. Nevertheless, it was released at 3¾ ips speed and in my opinion this was unfortunate. I have the disc version of this recording and while there are some poor surfaces to contend with, the overall sound was quite good. It probably would have been even better in a 7½-ips version. Musically the performance is outstanding. Colin Davis essays what would be in some perspective

orchestral de
The voices a good intellig tempt at gim
probably in
What was m dynamic ran more weight
case here fo
since using t preamp only sound mudd disc was no
all basis, th
better t
½-ips s ed or n soun portan
it is for th always n the gives esident'
pex/Astr
$24.95)

Fig. 1—(A)—Unmodulated carrier; (B)—Unmodulated carrier shifted 240 kHz downward to establish horizontal scale; (C)—Carrier shifted 240 kHz upward to establish other end of horizontal scale.

Fig. 2—(A) Scale amplified so top of dB scale is now + 18 dB so components of smaller amplitude will be disclosed in later photos. (This scale used in all subsequent displays.) (B)—Carrier (unmodulated) with added 67-kHz subcarrier (unmodulated). cept both 67- and 92-kHz subcarriers are now being modulated by 8-kHz tones, with a deviation of 8 kHz.

Fig. 3—(A)—Carrier with an L-only signal applied; deviation is 45 kHz plus 10% contribution of 19-kHz pilot signal. Main carrier modulation frequency is 15 kHz. (B) Same as Fig. 1, except that two subcarriers have been added, each modulated 8 kHz by 8-kHz tones. (C)—Carrier with L-R sig-

EXTRA: TAPE RECORDER BUYING GUIDE

Splicing Tape & Applic

Construct a Variable-Freque

The 8-Track/Cassette C

The 4-Channe & Quadrasonic

Stereo Equipment & Rec

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

JAN 1970

101.

Carter On the Record

By RAYMOND ERICSON

WHAT is a repertory piece? Elliott Carter says he isn't sure. He thinks too many people dismiss contemporary works out of hand because they do not find a place in the repertory. Yet his own Double Concerto for Harpsichord, Piano and Two Chamber Ensembles has had five performances recently. Does not that make it a repertory piece? His Piano Concerto has been played by Jacob Lateiner in Boston, Minneapolis, Chicago, Buffalo, Berlin and Cleveland and is scheduled shortly for Amsterdam, Paris and London.

No one, he says, wanted to hear the music of Ives or Bartok or many of Stravinsky's compositions back in the 1930's, yet now they are played all the time. The implication for today's music is plain.

The composer was discussing this and related matters recently in connection with the premiere of his Concerto for Orchesrta, which the New York Philharmonic will give under the direction of Leonard Bernstein this week. It is one of several works commissioned by the orchestra for its 125th anniversary season two years ago, but it was only completed while Carter was in residence at the American Academy in Rome last year. ("It is not as noisy as New York, but almost.")

The music was inspired by St. John Perse's "Vents" ("Winds"). Carter has admired the Nobel prize-winner's poem for a long time, and he has written that it "attracted me by its expansive, almost Whitmanesque, descriptions of a United States constantly swept by forces like winds, forces that are always transforming, remolding, or obliterating the past and introducing the fresh and the new." His score, in turn, deals "primarily with the poetry of change, transformation, reorientation of feelings and thoughts."

The composer has not followed the poem literally; the music has its own architecture, unquestionably its own flavor. It will incorporate Carter's esthetic: "I regard my scores as scenarios — auditory scenarios—for performers to act out with their instruments, dramatizing the players as individuals and as participants in the ensemble."

Thus, in "Vents" he has written different music for each cellist at one point, which, Carter said, the cellists resented at the first rehearsal. They are too used to following the leader. Carter also points out that, despite his being a native, resident New Yorker, this is the first major work of his to be played by the Philharmonic. If they had experienced other music of his, he feels the players wouldn't have had so much difficulty with his style of composing.

Carter, himself, was initially resentful when he found out that the Philharmonic would not record the work. It wasn't so much a question of money, although it cost the Boston Symphony $21,000 to record his Piano Concerto; the heavy recording schedule that Leonard Bernstein and the orchestra have with Columbia Records just would not allow it. He believes, however, that eventually he can get it recorded in England.

Carter was just as regretful about two of the other Philharmonic commissions which didn't make it to the recording studio. These were Roger Sessions's Symphony No. 8 and Roberto Gerhard's Symphony No. 4, both of which he felt were among the respective composers' best works. (Gerhard, incidentally, died on Jan. 5, at his home in Cambridge, England, a fact unnoticed in the New York papers.)

But Carter has also seen a slackening in Columbia Records' dedication to contemporary music. And, although the Ford Foundation has started a series of $7,500 grants for recording purposes, Carter finds this sum unrealistic in today's inflationary world. He is afraid the grants will end up in none-too-well-rehearsed recordings of small-scale pieces.

This past week also saw a new production of Carter's ballet, "The Minotaur," which he wrote for the Ballet So-

Continued on Page 26

Alix Jeffry

BY CARTER—Composer Elliott Carter, whose Concerto for Orchestra will receive its premiere performance Thursday by the Philharmonic. But the Philharmonic won't record it

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
FEB 1 1970

Elliott Carter

Continued from Page 23

ciety in 1947. It was revived by the Boston Ballet Company and the Boston University Symphony Orchestra, in connection with the centennial celebration of the university's Division of Music. The performance was a preview of sorts. Choreographed by John Butler, the work will enter the ballet company's repertory later this year.

Now 61 and a much-honored composer, Carter says that he has lived long enough to find today's avant-garde rehashing the avant-garde of the 1920's and 1930's, with less sense of responsibility toward music's need for form. The electronic and mixed-media works he has observed seem to him primitive and unimaginative. He himself dipped his foot in the electronic sea a couple of years back when he was living in Berlin. (The electronic studio in West Berlin was always in use, so he journeyed to East Berlin, where theirs was never in use.) Aside from finding the composition of electronic music time-consuming, he didn't care for the results and scrapped them.

STATEMENT

"This year's festival is going to be a jazz festival for everyone who loves jazz," writes George Wein, producer of the Newport Jazz Festivals, in announcing next summer's event. "Last year we tried an experiment and attempted to combine rock with jazz. It was a valid experiment musically . . . what happened, however, overwhelmed this musical concept. So many rock fans came who were more interested in 'the scene' and 'a happening' which had nothing to do with the music that the musical atmosphere . . . was destroyed.

"Since Newport, of course, we have seen what went on in Atlanta, Dallas, and most significantly, at Woodstock. These are gatherings of the youth, where they celebrate their own culture. As such, they are exclusive. There are few blacks, virtually no one over thirty, and the music is really incidental to 'the scene.' . . .

"Jazz is open to young, old, black, white, rich, poor. It swings, it is musical, it has important things to say about America's most pressing problem—the state of the black man in our society—and it continues to attract the cream of the most creative young musicians playing today. . . ."

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 409,414 SUN. 545,032
FEB 15 1970

NEW RECORDS

Schubert 'Great' recordings show conductors' touches

Reviewed by JUDITH GERSTEL
Minneapolis Star Staff Writer

William Steinberg, who this season assumed the position of music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen to make his recording debut with that orchestra in a performance of the Schubert Symphony No. 9 in C Major, "The Great" (RCA LSC-3115).

In doing so, he adds another interpretation of this work to the 17 other recordings of the symphony currently available (including, incidentally, one by the Minnesota Orchestra under Stanislaw Scrowaczewski). Among the 17 is another RCA recording by the Boston Symphony, but with Charles Munch conducting.

A comparison of the same work by substantially the same orchestra — allowing for personnel changes over the years —under two different conductors is interesting for what it reveals both about the conductor's art in general, and about the particular artistic temperaments of these two Boston Symphony music directors.

Listening to both records makes vivid the music director's role in shaping a performance, most obviously by determining tempi and dynamics, more subtly by nuances of expression and emphasis.

In fact, a comparison like this one provides a perfect answer to the inevitable question, "What does a conductor do?"

What Munch does in his recording is to wash the music with a haze of French romanticism, slightly blurring the lines of the music and for the most part flying through the symphony. It conveys an impression of Schubert.

Steinberg, on the other hand, approaches the same symphony with Prussian authority and punctiliousness. The tempi of the individual movements are more nearly similar than in Munch's interpretation, and the phrasing is more formal.

Nowhere is this more evident than in the oboe solo of the first movement, played on both recordings by the Boston Symphony's Ralph Gomberg. On the Munch recording, Gomberg is allowed to dip into a retard, disappear sweetly into a pianissimo, and rise majestically to a crescendo. On the Steinberg recording, he treads a straight and narrow path with hardly a hint of a rise or dip.

This contrast is characteristic of the entire comparison of the two interpretations. Which is preferable? Neither is perfect, and unfortunately for the prospective purchase determined to own a Boston Symphony recording of the Schubert "Great," each has certain movements to recommend it.

Munch's slow, misty opening movement is appealing; Steinberg's pace is too military for my taste. And Munch's speeding up of the second movement, exceeding Steinberg's tempo, also seems more appropriate. It is the third movement where I defect to the Steinberg camp, for here Munch moves so quickly that he obliterates some of the music, whereas Steinberg approaches this much more leisurely and musically. The fourth movements are more nearly similar in interpretation and tempi than any of the others, and both recordings provide pleasant listening here.

Nevertheless, neither of these is the definitive Schubert "Great."

SYMPHONY NO. 9 (THE GREAT) by Schubert. (William Steinberg conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.) Produced by Peter Delheim. RCA LSC-3115.

Schubert's Great Symphony continues to be a problem symphony. Few conductors ever get beneath the surface enough to clarify its big, almost clumsy structure of movement leading toward a climax. If coherence deteriorates, the work seems impossibly long and repetitive. When paced correctly, however, Schubert's grandly monumental concept can be realized.

Every major conductor has accepted the challenge of the 9th, not unlike that of Beethoven's. Results vary. Karl Bohm delivers a leisurely, graceful and flowing account, achieving drama by speeding up tempi at climactic moments. Klemperer produces a steady, monolithic, carefully plotted reading of monumental proportions. Toscanini's performance is sharp, incisive, well calculated, somewhat choppy. Mengelberg's unmatched verve adds a joyous element not commonly expressed. Furtwangler's passionate commitment overwhelms with drama. Where does the new Steinberg version fit?

Steinberg's first recording as the Boston Sumphony's new leader testifies to his total command of an orchestra. His distinctive style represents detachment almost to the point of disinterest. Although this may be the most transparent and cleanly played 9th ever recorded, it seems so for its own sake. His clinical approach ignores Schubert's songful qualities as well as his power. Steinberg takes no chances, makes no interpretive "mistakes" and leaves no impression.

—Alex Segal

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 220,895
FEB 11 1970

ENTERTAINMENT WORLD
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
MAR 13 1970

BEETHOVEN POTPOURRI: Better than average budget label versions of Piano Concertos Nos. 3 and 5 are offered by the young Bruno Leonardo Gelber and the New Philharmonia Orchestra on Seraphim S-61030 and S-60131 . . . A three-disc set, "The Six Quarters," on Odyssey 32-26 0023, wonderfully played by the Budapest String Quartet, are budget label gems. These are the classic 1951 discs, re-mastered for cleaner sound . . . Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony rush through Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The quartet: Soprano Jane Marsh, mezzo-soprano Josephine Veasey, tenor Placido Domingo, and baritone (instead of basso) Sherrill Milnes. Speed (musically) does not necessarily mean excitement. RCA LSC-7055.

The Cleveland Press
D. 393,191
MAR 3 1970

Steinberg gives his Boston best off the records

By Emerson Batdorff

The Boston Symphony has fallen into good hands.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, a position he holds for life, took the helm at Boston last fall.

He now has given a recorded sample in his new surroundings, the Schubert No. 9, also known as "The Great." Of this symphony he makes a great singing noise, which is as it should be.

He is workmanlike in his art or craft with no annoying mannerisms. Yet he retain a certain individualism. It is Victor LSC 3115.

RESPIGHI was a great believer in sounds. Usually didly done by Istvan Kertesz conducting the London Symphony (London CS 6624) oddly enough is named "Kertesz in Rome," although he went there on this occasion only spiritually.

In "The Pines of Rome" a man of imagination can hear the wind in the trees. I am fairly sure a man could do this even if Respighi had called his piece Symphonic Poem No. 2, or something

A GREAT deal of unexplored territory lurks in the mind of Sibelius which he opens up in his Symphony No. 2. Here too can be heard wind in the trees, but this is a cold northern wind.

His second symphony is elemental but admirably restrained. The lightning flashes, but there is little thunder. This quality of command of a tumultuous situation is the strong point of Bernstein conducting the New York Philharmonic for Columbia (MS 7337).

Glenn Gould plays only on

Bartok Concerti

By ROBERT PINCUS

Two of the most famous artists today, Pierre Boulez and Daniel Barenboim, team up on Angel S-36605 in Bartok's piano concerti Nos. 1 and 3. They work well together and perform up to their reputations throughout, although some problems beset the disc. The solo-orchestra balance is poor, the piano dominating too often. This is not typical of Boulez, and is certainly an engineering error.

These concerti composed in 1926 and 1945 are fine examples of Bartok's art and are widely contrasted in content and structure. Characteristic of the third concerto is its second movement, a sustained rhapsody full of lyricism and delicate rhythmic and tonal contrasts between the piano and orchestra. The strong, syncopated rhythmic structure of the first concerto, on the other hand, gives it a more violent, aggressive mood.

ON COLUMBIA Odyssey (32-16-0382), Robert and Gaby Casadesus play Bach's concerti for two pianos in c-minor and c-major. As with most early concerti, these works were composed for one set of solo instruments and later transcribed for others, the c-major, for example, was originally in d-minor for oboe and violin. Bach, himself, did the transcribing.

Harpsichords do better justice to the music, the pianos not being angular and crisp enough. Poor production compounds the problem, as the soloists sound indistinct.

William Steinberg makes his premiere recording as director of the Boston Symphony with Schubert's Ninth Symphony on RCA LSC-3115. It is hard for any conductor to say anything novel about this popular masterpiece.

Steinberg's account is like most others from the German school, emphasizing the rich lyricism of the music. The Bostonians have a great ensemble sound, and obviously like their new leader.

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
SAT. 109,108 SUN. 117,137
MAR 8 1970

102.

In Praise of Steinberg's Schubert

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 9 in C. William Steinberg conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA stereo, LSC 3115, $5.98.

IT IS only weeks ago that a new version of this work by Yehudi Menuhin and the Menuhin Festival Orchestra on Angel was being extolled for qualities above and beyond the ordinary. Such is the magnitude of the work, and the opportunities for exposition it contains, that this one, too, can be extolled for qualities equally striking and as personal to Steinberg as Menuhin's were to him. That it also happens to be the first Steinberg recording with the Boston Symphony and finds the orchestra more relaxed and robust-sounding than it has for many months past is a further contribution to its distinction.

In the aggregate of recorded versions of this work, Steinberg's is outstanding for the largeness of the symphonic scale on which the treatment is conceived while comprehending much of the sentiment and spirit in its inner being. There have been some with greater tenderness and warmth—the music lends itself naturally to expansiveness in these respects—as well as a few with vaster propulsion (Toscanini's with the NBC, for example). But there have been very few of recent years in which the dramatically opposed content of the work has been so sensitively balanced, the two sides of its greatness reconciled as comprehendingly as they have by Steinberg.

At bottom this is a triumph of experience, of scholarship and mature judgment, in which almost all the temptations to overstatement and understatement have been reckoned with and rejected. The one exception I have noted comes at the end of the first movement (measures 672-685), in which Steinberg broadens the tempo more than slightly though there is no justifying instruction in the score. However, conductors without number have been doing the same thing for decades, and it may be justified as inherent in the musical sense of this long movement. The counter-contention has to be that in a score so replete with markings it would have been simple for Schubert to write the six letters r-i-t-a-r-d had he wanted one there.

On the other hand, Steinberg is noticeably meticulous in respecting the con moto portion of Schubert's direction for the performance of the slow movement (andante con moto), rejecting the temptation to sentimentalize it. The procedure also sustains an underlying pulse from the first movement to the scherzo and through the finale—which begins with a dynamic charge that is sustained through. In the purely sonorous aspect, it is noteworthy that Steinberg's strings sing as Boston Symphony strings should, and the trombones have the mellow, unbrassy sound appropriate to Schubert's specialized usage of them in this work. All the signs are auspicious for a long, productive collaboration between men and maestro whether in the near future for RCA or, in the longer term, with DGG (whose acquisition of the Boston Symphony at the end of its present RCA contract was announced months ago).

SR MARCH 28, 1970

Recorded Tape Reviews

BERT WHYTE

DEBUT!—Henry Mancini conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra Pops RCA TR3-1006, open reel, 3¾ ips, ($6.95)

As you are probably aware, RCA has either lost or given up (take your choice) the Boston Symphony to Deutsche Grammophon, and naturally this also means no more Fiedler and the Boston Pops on this label. Having acquired the Philadelphia Orchestra, it would seem that the popular Henry Mancini has been chosen as Fiedler's replacement and it is certainly easy enough to label the orchestra as a "Pops" group. This tape is presumably the first in a Pops series with Mancini, although one imagines that this is sort of a "look see" venture to sample public reaction. All the music on this tape was composed and arranged by Mr. Mancini. On the first sequence of the tape are six "musical vignettes," fancifully titled such as "Strings On Fire" and "Drummers' Delight," and so on, which are designed to show off the virtuosity of the various sections of the orchestra and the lushness of the "Philadelphia Sound." The second sequence is an autobiographical suite entitled "Beaver Valley—'37." Mr. Mancini has a deservedly high reputation for writing some of the more interesting pop and mood music of today, but on this tape he hasn't given us anything that is very memorable. The music designed to show off the orchestra is pleasant enough and the arrangements facile, slick and professional. The "Beaver Valley—'37" suite is in three sections—the first two rather rambling and without much flesh on the musical bones. The third section subtitled "The Sons of Italy" is a rousing affair with a few "catchy" moments reminiscent of some of this composer's better work. Certainly it is the best music on this tape. In matters of sound we have a mixed bag. This recording was made in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where the orchestra usually performs. This has musical advantages of course, but the hall is very dry acoustically and Columbia eschewed using it when they were recording the Philadelphians. RCA has been using a controversial method of adding reverb to the original sound, involving feeding the signals into another room and remixing. Apparently it is complicated and problemsome and the overall reception of the first few RCA/Philadelphia recordings has not been favorable. I understand that as a result, recording in the Academy of Music will be abandoned. On this tape there are sections where the sound is quite good, with especially clean and articulate percussion. But unfortunately, there is an unpleasant shrillness in high-register ensemble string passages and frequent instances where the acoustic perspective and orchestral balance are decidedly at variance with good stereo recording. In summation, this impressionistic-type music isn't vintage Mancini, and the best that can be said for it is that it can serve as a somewhat different kind of background music. Mr. Mancini and RCA can do much better and the new recording location should certainly help.

Chicago Transit Authority (Vol. 1)—Columbia 8-track cartridge. 18-10-0726 ($6.95)

First off in this review let me confess that a fan of rock music—"hard," "acid" or otherwise—I ain't. Oh, I've listened to the Beatles (but admire them mostly for their compositional efforts) and to a few other of the "better" groups that exhibit a certain interesting "creativity." But by and large most of the stuff sounds like sheer cacophony to me. A great deal of it sounds like a big "put-on," and an affront even to the permissive tastes of the young. I especially decry the absurd "intellectualizing" of much of this puerile pap by certain critics who are afraid the young will label them as "squares," if they don't react properly to this "new music." Okay, I'm not worried about my image. I'm a square—so be it. But I'm a curious square. That is why every now and then I'll play something with these outlandish titles. Chicago Transit Authority! That stops me. I figger maybe this group has incorporated the sound of a Chicago subway into their music. Typical square thinking, right? Well, I set my pre-amp at the usual level, inserted the cartridge . . . and was nearly blown off my feet! How Columbia managed to put such a level on an 8-track cartridge without distortion would be interesting to know. I mean this thing is loud! The musical content has plenty of what I abhor. It also has the redeeming values of a certain originality and I suppose what you might call structural interest, rather than clever arrangements. The members of the group really know how to play their instruments well, a marked and refreshing contrast from most rock groups. The vocal aspects of this production can be dismissed as pure caterwauling, a situation which is distressingly common with the vast majority of rock albums I have heard. There is little question that the group in this recording is a few cuts above average. I consulted with a few of my "under thirty" experts, who were unanimous in their opinion that the CTA was a "real groovy crew." Certainly the relentless hard driving beat generated a lot of excitement among my young friends. Good clean sound throughout the tape.

Classical Cassettes

Tchaikovsky—Piano Concerto #1—Van Cliburn, piano Kiril Kondrashin, cond. RCA RK1002, $6.95
Rimsky-Korsakov—"Le Coq d'Or" Suite
Stravinsky—"Firebird Suite"
Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orch. RCA RK1031, $6.95
Tchaikovsky—Violin Concerto, Pinchas Zukerman, violin, Bernstein/NY Phil.
Mendelssohn—Violin Concerto, Pinchas Zukerman, violin, Dorati, London Sym. Columbia 16110162, $6.95

In the early days of pre-recorded cassettes, very little classical product was issued. And just as well, for the medium just wasn't ready for the demands of classical music. Very obtrusive tape hiss, hum, distortion, restricted dynamics and frequency response, poor transient response—it all added up to a pretty dismal picture. Today, there still is not a great number of classical cassettes released, but the situation has improved and is rapidly getting better. The three cassettes listed above are typical of what is being released presently. As you can see, for the most part it is duplicating the tried and true "pot-boilers" to be found on disc and open-reel tape. Nothing much need be said about the performances which have received their share of accolades over the past few years. The improvement in sound quality has been dramatic. Of course there is still too much hiss, extraneous noises and dropouts, and occasional overload distortion. But a comparison with the early product shows how much reduction has been effected in these areas. What really makes the difference, is the broader dynamics, better transients and better frequency response both at the high end and in the bass. A good example is in the Firebird

(Continued on page 81)

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

MAR 1970

Recorded Tape Reviews

(Continued from page 78)

Suite. At the beginning of the "Infernal Dance" and throughout this section, there is a tremendous bass drum, which on the disc and open-reel tape was often used to demonstrate loudspeakers. This drum has great power and projection and has a fundamental of about 35-40 hertz. On the cassette tape, with the benefit of about 2.5 dB of bass boost, the drum is reproduced amazingly well. The piano transients in the Tchaikovsky Concerto are nice and clean with no blurring or "fuzzing." In the violin concertos, the string tone is brilliant with overtones, yet smooth and clean. On many lesser stereo systems, played at "apartment level," these cassettes would be perfectly acceptable to many people. For the audiophile, in spite of recent improvements, the classical cassettes cannot compete with his disc or open-reel tape. However, the immediate future is very bright for high-quality cassettes, with some startling developments I cannot reveal to you at this moment.

Classical Records

By CRAIG PALMER

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 9; William Steinberg; Boston Symphony Orchestra; RCA Red Seal LSC 3115.

Just what can be expected from the BSO now that Steinberg's in the driver's seat?

The orchestra's first release under its new maestro offers an unclear prognosis.

Steinberg presents his credentials as the esteemed orchestra's new spiritual leader in an appropriately well road-tested vehicle, and one, incidentally, which seems to have recently induced a proliferation of alternate interpretations.

From that aspect, at least, I think Steinberg would have been wise to consider a different work—even another Schubert symphony, for that matter.

There's no denying that the ninth is well suited for the BSO. I mean, you can bet the BSO didn't play its inaugural concert under Steinberg in bermuda shorts.

And so to Steinberg.

Of the Schubert symphonies, the ninth would seem to be the most unairworthy, because of its extended length if nothing more.

The problem immediately presented the conductor then is one of maintaining listener involvement over some very (forgive me Franz), barren stretches.

In this respect, Steinberg fell short of the mark. Particularly in the long opening movement, he reads redundant passages with an almost instant replay accuracy.

The opening horn theme failed to achieve the spiritual flexibility reflected in Schubert's own inventive musical reweaving of the theme.

But as the first movement was all brawn, the second movement and the remainder of the symphony to a lesser extent was all brain.

The second movement unfolded in magic mesmerizing waves of melody.

Steinberg obviously enjoyed an almost self indulgent emergence in the languidly flowing, interminable melody.

Third and fourth movements received individual treatments thankfully leaner, more sinewy than the opening movement.

At this point, about all the recorded repertoire has received from the Steinberg BSO marriage is another, albeit individual and in many respects meritorious, reading of the Schubert ninth symphony.

PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR-NEWS
D. 35,500

MAR 1 1970

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 132,950

APR 19 1970

'Happy Birthday' Dear Ludwig!

Bohm Gives 'Fidelio' I

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Happy Birthday, dear Ludwig.

Boston has had its share of Beethoven this month—a brilliant, thorough share. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with guest soloists and conductors, has given the city a superlative Beethoven festival recently.

785

However, let's not neglect Beethoven in opera. Some say he might have written the greatest opera of all: "Fidelio."

As if to make up for the slight, Deutsche Grammophon has on the stands a superb set of three records—the whole of "Fidelio."

The cast is Gwyneth Jones (soprano), Leonore; James King (tenor), Florestan; Edith Mathis (soprano), Marcellina; Theodore Adam (bass), Pizarro; Franz Crass (bass), Rocco; Peter Schreier (tenor), Jaquino; Eberhard Buechner (tenor), first prisoner; Martti Talvela (bass), Don Fernando, and Gunter Leib (baritone), second prisoner.

A new disc in London's Phase Four Stereo series offers Erich Leinsdorf directing the London Symphony Orchestra in a suite from Richard Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier" and the Overture and Venusberg Music from Wagner's "Tannhauser" (London SPC21037, $5.98).

It is not a very distinguished effort. Interpretively Leinsdorf is a fine Wagnerian, as he proved with his magnificent RCA set of the complete "Die Walkure," and he is also a specialist in music of Richard Strauss, as displayed by his recent "Salome."

Here he is sabatoged by the sonic limitations of the recording and, in the case of the Strauss, by the arrangement of the music.

This "Rosenkavalier" suite is a hodge-podge, omitting two important sections that are included in almost every recording of an orchestral suite from this opera, the Presentation of the Silver Rose, and the estatic final Trio with its magnificent climax, represented here only by the final pages following the climax.

The Venusberg Music includes the brief choral passages, although this is not indicated anywhere on the record or jacket.

Sonically, the disc is a clear case of too many microphones. The opening horns in the Strauss jump out excessively, and the reproduction is generally congested and lacking in dypamic range, with no natural resonant beauty.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

MAY 24 1970

Chicago
today
American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418

MAR 15 1970

Records

The 19th century on new disks...

BY ROGER DETTMER

Classical

ORCHESTRAL grooving, in the 19th century. . . . The ebbuleient First Symphonies of 16-year-old Schubert and 15-year-old Mendelssohn are played back to back by the Cleveland Orchestra on Columbia MS-7391. Louis Lane conducts punctiliously, if such is sufficient for your listening needs. . . . Schubert's Ninth marries William Steinberg to the Boston Symphony on RCA Red Seal LSC-3115, but the union on this evidence would appear merely convenient rather than compatible. Untidy brass playing, but brighter [altho echoier] sound than Erich Leinsdorf earned from another RCA recording team . . . Mendelssohn's first and final works for piano and orchestra—an A minor Concerto, and the Op. 43 Serenade and Allegro Giocoso—get world premiere recordings on Turnabout TV-34170 in the company of Rondo Brilliante, Op. 29. Rena Kyriakou and Viennese jobbers, led alternately by Mathieu Lange and Hans Swarowsky, give more dutiful than dashing performances, with add-a-part recorded sound, yet the repertotry survives on its own merit.

MORE FAMILIAR Mendelssohn—the Violin Concerto, with a hectic accompaniment by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony—is included by RCA Red Seal in a Heifetz omnibus featuring, on 2 disks in VCS-7058, his incisive performances of the Brahms and Tchaikovsky Concertos, recorded in 1955 and 1957 with Fritz Reiner and the Chicago Symphony. Early stereo but still impressive sound for these statements of singular thrust and compactness. . . . Brahms of the Third Symphony and Tragic Overture would seem to be Carlo Maria Giulini's natural habitat, but recordings [not recent] with the former Philharmonia Orchestra on Seraphim S-60101 sound more rhetorical than architectonic, and sonics betray their vintage. . . . "Rinaldo," Op. 50, a cantata for tenor, Maennerchor and orchestra, is the rarest of Brahms to be met—not a vivid setting, perhaps, of Goethe's ballad about a Ulyssian crusader, but mature in style and interestingly influenced by Wagner's "Dutchman." James King is a stentorian solist, and Claudio Abbado conducts fervent performances from the Ambrosian chorus and New Philharmonia Orchestra on London OS-26106—with, as a notable bonus, a fine new "Shicksalslied" [or "Song of Destiny"]. . . . Finally, from the mittel-Europa repertory, on Mercury SR-90516, Antal Dorati shapes a beautiful performance of Dvorak's Brahmsian Second Symphony and "Carneval" Overture. Not especially bright or spacious sound, but extraordinarily communicative conducting of the London Symphony.

In every respect, an attractive album:

Late Beethoven and Schoenberg by Erich Leinsdorf: first-rate

By MARK KANNY

IN A RECENT television interview, Erich Leinsdorf admitted to singular satisfaction that his recording of the Beethoven Ninth was to be released with Schoenberg's last completed orchestral work, A Survivor from Warsaw. The juxtaposition of a text about one of mankind's most shameful episodes with Beethoven's paean to brotherhood is indeed thoughtful programming. So was the further decision to couple the Fifth Symphony with the Ninth. Thus in every respect this is an attractive album, for the performances and the engineering are first-rate.

Leinsdorf's Ninth is one of the finest recordings he has made in Boston. All of the movements are excellent, and that is in itself a rarity. The Allegro maestoso is quick but well played (particular honors to the horns, e.g. starting at measure 387); and, while straightforward in conception, is fully cognizant of the attitudes to be assumed (Leinsdorf does the whole section from measure 511 to the end with a clear but unobtrusive vision of the Wagnerian portent). The Scherzo is particularly praiseworthy, for Leinsdorf takes both repeats (the second, not often heard, contains the famous passage in rhythms of three and four measures); and the timpanist is very prominently recorded, so that one can really feel the clubbing effect of the drums. (This is not meant to imply anything other than fine musicianship. In more than one passage the timpanist makes a very impressive contribution.) I am obliged to protest Leinsdorf's changes of orchestration, though the adventurousness of the trumpet in the second part of the Scherzo is less objectionable than the added timpani notes at the end. Leinsdorf adds two such notes (whereas Mahler found one to be sufficient in his touch-up), and I feel that Beethoven was unlikely to have been careless enough to omit the timpani part in this, of all, movements. The third movement is played very rapidly; indeed, this one may be the fastest since Toscanini. Leinsdorf does, nevertheless, give a wonderful performance. It is not a be-all and end-all (that is for the finale), but it is pretty and sweet if not all sunshine; and it benefits particularly from the warm, sensitive string-playing and well-sustained phrasing of the woodwinds. The performance of this movement proclaims both the orchestra's idiomatic assurance (which Leinsdorf emphasized during his tenure) and the conductor's understanding of this music—specifically, how to play it quickly without sacrificing all meaning. Leinsdorf's finale is fine throughout. The orchestral fugato after the tenor is joined by the chorus is very effective. The trombones sound excellent in the Seid umschlungen section, and the coda is fast and unusually festive. The soloists vary in quality. Jane Marsh, though obviously a fine soprano, is too stiff; and tenor Placindo Domingo is poor in his long solo. Sherrill Milnes starts well, but his tone is occasionally pinched in tone and his singing of the Ode itself is rather dull up to the entry of the chorus.

To perform the C minor Symphony in an unselfconscious way is no mean feat, and it is precisely the musicality of Leinsdorf's reading that is its most compelling trait. If we find the opening less urgent than usual, and the second theme a bit choppy, the first movement's contour (most powerfully in the coda) is communicated without distortion. The second movement, though less poised, is unusually songful, most strikingly by the woodwinds. The third movement (so often heavily laden with "significance") for once is straightforward, and the thematic continuity is always maintained. The Trio benefits particularly from the clarity of woodwind accenting. (The transition to the finale is not so mysterious as a continuation of the grotesque bassoon-pizzicato strings section.) The finale, like the first movement, maintains equilibrium so that the music can easily build to a climax without vulgarity.

Schoenberg's A Survivor from Warsaw was written in 1947. The text is by the composer himself. And the cap on the Survivor's tale (in Sprechstimme) is a chorus of the Hebrew prayer, Shema Yisroel. It is a very moving piece, and Leinsdorf's performance is finer than the one by Robert Craft (though we must always be thankful for the latter's pioneering work). The Boston Symphony players are better than their Canadian counterparts, and Leinsdorf is less antiseptic in his conducting. But most important in my preference for the RCA performance is the narration by Sherrill Milnes. Craft's narrator, John Horton, was a liability; his reading was stuffy. Milnes really projects a feeling that he has suffered, and in addition he is more accurate in speaking the rhythm Schoenberg prescribed. If he does not pitch his voice at the relative intervals of Sprechstimme called for, at least he moves in the right direction. The RCA recording is also the better planned. To hear the orchestra properly the volume must be set so as to make it seem that Milnes is in the room with you. The immediacy of the work hardly could be more effectively emphasized. The only readily noticeable inaccuracy in the orchestral performance is that the celli in measures three and four, marked col legno, ponticello (!), instead are played with the hair and not the wood of the bow (though at the bridge).

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 9 in D minor, Op. 125; Jane Marsh (soprano); Josephine Veasey (mezzo-soprano); Placido Domingo (tenor); Sherrill Milnes (baritone); Chorus Pro Musica (Alfred Nash Patterson, director); New England Conservatory Chorus (Lorna Cooke de Varon, director); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67; SCHOENBERG: A Survivor from Warsaw, Op. 46; Sherrill Milnes (narrator); New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf (in all three performances). RCA Stereo set LSC-7055, four sides, $11.96.

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 363,795 SUN. 542,109

JUN 28 1970

Are the big American recording companies gradually easing out of the classical record business? It would seem so, according to an article in the July issue of High Fidelity magazine.

"It is hardly a state secret that comparatively few classical records are now made in the US, owing to a number of complex reasons," the magazine noted. "Two of the most obvious ones are the prohibitive musician union fees and the growing reluctance of America's two largest producers of classical recordings, Columbia and RCA, to expand in an area that promises relatively meager financial rewards," the magazine stated.

Three major orchestras — the Chicago Symphony, Los Angeles Philharmonic and Boston Symphony — are now recording for foreign labels. The Chicago Symphony, which had recorded for American companies for 53 years, now makes records for two British companies, EMI (Angel) and Decca/London. The Los Angeles Philharmonic also has a Decca/London contract, and the Boston Symphony already is recording for Deutsche Grammophon (after nearly 60 years with RCA), although the contract isn't effective until Sept. 1.

"The state of the arts in this country has never been so precarious," the magazine surmises, "and this situation is indicative of the times: As American companies hesitate to record native orchestras, it's a clear case of Angel rushing in where RCA fears to tread."

What isn't explained is why the foreign recording companies are willing to take on the burden, as a kind of reverse Marshall Plan. Surely they have to pay the same musician union fees and cannot reasonably expect to have higher sales than Columbia or RCA did. A puzzlement.

Records in Review

Peter Maag and Sundry Items

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

Of all the conductors worthy of the music/artistic directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and available if asked, Peter Maag has gotten perhaps the worst hearing. Many likely candidates have had the advantage of the world's great orchestras and a long list of recording triumphs. Maag, more often than not, is stuck with second rate organizations, yet obtains first rate results. Two recordings, reissues, with the London Symphony champion his cause admirably.

The first is a disc of Mozart, his thirty-second and thirty-eighth symphonies as normally numbered. The former is a light-weight work with the orchestration of the latter augmented by two additional horns. "The Prague", as the latter is known, does not usually share the spotlight with the others of the composer's last great six symphonies. Maag's recording should right much of this wrong. First, it is a solid, dark, reading of considerable magnitude, less elegant than my otherwise favorite under Josef Keilberth's baton and consequently more commanding. Secondly, Maag takes all the repeats as Mozart specified in all three movements. This adds ten whole minutes of glorious musical invention to the performance. The recorded sound is sometimes rough, but this is also a suitably rough and ready interpretation. This is London Stereo Treasury STS 15087.

To hear Mendelssohn with the weight and tension that is his due is rare; most conductors see him as a light-weight. The authority apparent in Maag's command of the Mendelssohnian idiom is astonishing and his reading of the Scotch Symphony, No. 3, is marvelous, a real bargain on STS 15091. On London's full-priced line Claudio Abbado gives not as good a performance. The Hebrides Overture, also known as Fingal's Cave, is the bonus filler—a magnificent rendering that eclipses Ansermet's careful tone painting.

And, glory be praised, Mozart's thirty-second and the Mendelssohn overture are placed before the major works on these discs, allowing the listener the easiest choice of whether or not to listen to them. Thank you, London engineers!

More Bach by Glenn Gould. The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 2, Preludes and Fugues 9-16 (Columbia MS 7409). Gould is at his usual scintillating best, running circles around the keyboard. Thirty-four minutes of music is, however, short shrift these days.

Menotti's The Medium was one of the first operas to truly engage my attention. So much so that I finally directed it for the Lyric Opera Theatre of Toledo, Ohio, last spring. Thus I am particularly delighted when I note that the second recording, first in stereo, of this modern masterpiece adopts tempi virtually identical to those we chose, for dramatic as well as musical reasons, in our production. Jorge Mester gets credit for this in a recording by the Opera Society of Washington and Columbia gains its second performance of the work (MS 7387), their first featuring Marie Powers. This set offers Regina Resnik, than who I can think of no better choice. Judith Blegen is the Monica and her voice has suitable youthfulness and charm as a balance for the weight of Miss Resnik. Mr. Gobineau is taken by a Boston familiar, Julian Patrick. Menotti's orchestral textures have rarely been heard to such advantage as in this disc, yet Jorge Mester never allows the ensemble to cover the singers. A superb disc.

That Bartok revival I have written of is still with us. Since last fall we have had items dribbling in, but where with many another composer this would spell nothing, as half of the dribble would be worthless, second and third rate renderings, nothing that has come to this reviewer has been less than first rate. Now we get only half a disc of Bartok, but what a half disc. Stephen Bishop, just entering his fourth decade of life, teams with Colin Davis for the Second Piano Concerto (Philips 3779).

Bartok was born at a piano, or so the myth should read. His most orchestral of works still bear the imprint of the percussive nature of the keyboard instrument. His second piano concerto is symetrically structured around its scherzo, with an adagio before and variations of it after, and an opening allegro, and closing variations of this, allegro molto. The pattern is similar to that of the composers antipenultimate and penultimate quartets. In its orchestration, the finale smacks so much of the Music for Strings, Percussion and Celeste that one may find oneself doing a momentary doubletake.

The performance is stunning, revealing a meeting of minds between conductor and soloist and composer that is uncanny. This compatibility is even more crucial to the coupling; Stravinsky's Concerto for Piano and Wind Instruments is perhaps texturally more close knit than the Bartok work. It was premiered in Paris in 1924, Koussevitzky conducting. It is a fitting contrast to and perfect filler for the nine year younger Hungarian's piano masterpiece.

That this disc should not be coupled with another of Bartok's concerti actually commends it the more; both for the magnificence of the Stravinsky composition and for the fact that it then fits in nicely between the Barenboim/Boulez coupling of Concerti 1 and 3 for a complete set without unnecessary duplication. Is this any way to run a Bartok Revival? You bet it is!

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAY 28 1970

104.

OTHER ANNOUNCEMENTS & COMMENTARY
(numbers refer to page numbers)

MUSIC
- About the Season:
  - Pre-Season announcements - 105,106,107,108,115
  - Comments on programming - 106,107,115,117,121,136
  - Pittsburgh's opening - 110
    - (reviews) Boston opening events and commentary may be found among the reviews on pages 2,3,4, and 5.
  - War with the critics - 144,145,146,149,150,151,152,171, 174,177,190
  - Season wrap up - 189
- Other:
  - Articles about music that mention or feature the Boston Symphony - 131,147,161,162,163,164,171,172, 174,185,190,194,196
    - Articles that feature other orches. and mention the B.S.O.(in music or money problem reference) 112,185,194
    - Music among the Arts - 135,153,183,185
    - National Endowment for the Arts - 165
  - Articles about music criticism - 143
  - Esplanade Concerts - 196
  - Youth Concerts - 111,126,129,139,140,162,167,168,190,191,
  - Wrap-ups
    - End of 1969 - best music of the year(concerts)- 161
    - End of a decade - all music, serious & pop - 162,163

MUSICIANS
- The Conductors:
  - Erich Leinsdorf - 130,131,137,147
  - William Steinberg - 105,108,109,110,111,116,132,137,147, 171,182,193
  - Michael Tilson Thomas - 123,124,128,166,173,185,186,
- The Orchestra members:
  - Harry Ellis Dickson - 129,139,181; in reference to his book, Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!- 139,142,145,154, 155,156,157,181,182,189; (154,155,156 are reprints)
  - Ann Hobson - 122,132,142
  - Ikuko Mizuno - 184
  - William Rhein - 126,
  - William Sokking - 157
- Joseph Silverstein's conducting debut - 177
- Performances of personnel with other organizations or associations than the B.S.O. - 127,128,153,160,167,173,179, 180,181,191
- Blacks and the B.S.O - 113,122,132,174

MANAGEMENT
- Money and Music - 105,121,125,133,135,138,174
  - Article featuring B.S.O. in International Musician - 133,134
  - "Accounting For the Arts" - 135
- Personnel
  - Mrs. Ann Banks, an obituary - 179
  - Richard White - 174
- Trustees - 126,127,138,142
  - Joan Kennedy's Washington Party - 181,184,
- Friends Events - 4,106,107,128,138,139,140,141,142,148,169, 170,175,176,182,184,185,186,187,188,189,191,193,196,197
- Grants - 111,129,147,165
  - Munch fund for concertmasters chair - 174,189
  - Walter Piston principal flute chair - 174,189
- Special Events
  - American Academy of Science Concert - 153
  - Arthur Fiedler's 75th Birthday - 158,159,160
  - 90th Anniversary Ball - 175,176,178,179,182,186,187,188, 189,192,193,
  - War Moratorium - 118,119,120

(Items on page 198, the insides of the covers and the guest conductor and performer biographies located with each particular concert program and reviews are from the Program booklets.)

PASTE OVER

105.

URBANE MANAGER

Orchestra Funds His Big Problem

UNION PROFILE

Tod Perry sighed the other day when he was asked how managing the Boston Symphony Orchestra now is different from the way it was when he first took over the job in 1954.

Problems Stickier

"We are facing stickier problems," he said, frowning into the sun from his seat on a bench on the grass near the 6000-seat shed at Tanglewood.

A frown is not common on the face of Tod Perry, full name — Thomas Doane Perry Jr. He has presented an amiable, soft-voiced, almost leisurely, genteel and surprisingly youthful (for 55) appearance around Tanglewood since 1946 when he became assistant to George E. Judd, longtime manager of the orchestra.

By the time he became manager the annual budget of the orchestra had risen to $1,500,000 probably the highest orchestral budget in the nation because the Boston organization was the first to try to provide work for its members throughout the year.

Works 48 Weeks

In 1954 his first managerial year, the orchestra worked 45 weeks of 52. Now it works 48, and the budget is up to about $4,500,000.

More important, and one of the reason for his sighs and frowns, is the inability of earned income to increase at the same rate as expenses.

A few years ago the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras were proud to say that they earned 85-90 per cent of their expenses from recordings, broadcasts and the box office.

Income About Same.

The earned-income percentage for the 1967-68 season was 67, and the press office estimates that the 1968-69 season which ended this month, will come out about the same.

TOD PERRY

The decline in earned income has become a serious problem because the sources of gifts that have made up the deficits have been asked to contribute up to $1,500,000 a year, and they have let it be known that it is just about their limit.

Other orchestras are facing the same problem and they are all searching, says Perry, for sources of income unusual for symphony orchestras.

It accounts for the increase of Tanglewood's Tuesday Trends concerts, a series that already has presented a program that has set the one-night attendance record (21,500 for Jefferson Airplane, Aug. 12).

However, the increasing complexity of orchestral financing has not seemed to ruffle Perry's normally placid appearance.

He smiles with benign affability, greets visiting muscial artists with the urbanity of a diplomat and is a most graceful handler of the English language when obliged to make a short speech of introduction of announcement.

With his wife, Helen (who owns the sunniest smile in the state), he has established permanent residence in an octagonal house of modern design on the west side of the mountain between Tanglewood and West Stockbridge.

Has Two Sons

Their winter home is an apartment on the Fenway in Boston.

Their sons are Rodney, 27, a graduate of Swarthmore who is married and employed as a librarian at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston, and Doane, 25, a graduate of Yale who is in India on his way home from a two-year stint with the Peace Corps in Uganda, East Africa.

This week Perry is between operations. Tanglewood and the orchestra's 1968-69 year has ended (except for two pops concerts this weekend) and the next official year doesn't begin until the end of September.

Most of his staff (40 in winter, 140 at Tanglewood) are on vacation, and the new season will be the first of three with a new music director, William Steinberg, who will also retain his directorship of the Pittsburgh orchestra.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 26 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 31 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG, Music Director

89th SEASON — 1969 - 1970

SUBSCRIPTIONS AVAILABLE

Tuesday A Series — 10 concerts at 8:30

Sept 30—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Oct 28—MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Nov 11—CARLO MARIA GIULINI
Nov 25—SEIJI OZAWA
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violinist
Jan 6—WILLIAM STEINBERG
MAUREEN FORRESTER contralto
JON VICKERS tenor
Jan 27—CLAUDIO ABBADO
ALEXIS WEISSENBERG pianist
Feb 17—COLIN DAVIS
Mar 3—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Mar 17—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Apr 21—WILLIAM STEINBERG
EVELYN LEAR soprano
ARNOLD VOKETATIS tenor

Subscription prices: $24, 34, 46, 59, 72.

Thursday B Series — 3 concerts at 8:30

Jan 8—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Feb 19—COLIN DAVIS
INGRID HAEBLER pianist
Mar 19—WILLIAM STEINBERG

Subscription prices: $6.50 sold out; 10, 13.50, 16.50, 18.50

Tuesday B Series — 6 concerts at 7:30

Oct 14—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Nov 4—CARLO MARIA GIULINI
Dec 2—ERICH LEINSDORF
EVELYN LEAR soprano
Jan 13—MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Feb 10—CLAUDIO ABBADO
ALEXIS WEISSENBERG pianist
Apr 14—WILLIAM STEINBERG
EDITH PEINEMANN violinist

Subscription prices: $13 sold out; 20, 27, 33, 37.

Thursday A Series — 6 concerts at 8:30

Oct 2—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Nov 20—SEIJI OZAWA
EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone
Dec 18—MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Jan 29—CLAUDIO ABBADO
ALEXIS WEISENBERG pianist
Mar 12—WILLIAM STEINBERG
Apr. 16—WILLIAM STEINBERG

Subscription prices: $13 sold out; 20, 27, 33, 37.

Programs subject to change.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Subscription Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115

Enclosed is my check for $.....for.....subscriptions at $.....each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ..... Series..... concerts. Checks should be made payable to Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Name.....(please print)

Address.....

City.....State.....Zip Code.....

STEINBERG JOINS CASALS AT FETE

Cellist Finds He 'Was Right' in His Prophecy of '29

By HENRY RAYMONT

(Special to The New York Times)

SAN JUAN, P. R., June 7—In the spring of 1929, a young German conductor who had just taken over Frankfurt's Museumsgesellschaft Orchestra, saw a dream come true. The world's most celebrated cellist appeared as one of his soloists.

After the concert the cellist said to the conductor: "Young man, you have great talent and you will go far."

The speaker was Pablo Casals, whose prediction about the conductor, William Steinberg, was, if anything, an understatement.

The 92-year-old Casals and Mr. Steinberg, 69, have met again for the first time in 40 years at the Casals Festival here.

The Spanish-born cellist was at hand during Friday's concert to hear Mr. Steinberg lead the festival orchestra in compositions by Mozart, Strauss and Wagner before a capacity audience at the University of Puerto Rico's amphitheater.

"You are a marvelous musician," Casals said in his heavily accented English as he embraced Mr. Steinberg while the audience cheered its approval. "You see, my prediction was right."

Mr. Steinberg, after a long career as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will also take charge of the Boston Symphony this fall—the first conductor to head two major symphonies on a full-time basis.

Earlier this week, a younger musician brought tears to Casal's eyes with a performance of the Elgar cello concerto, a work he had performed in London in the early 1920's before King George V.

Here it was Jacqueline du Pré, the 23-year-old English cellist, who performed the difficult piece, with Daniel Barenboim, her 26-year-old Israeli husband, conducting the orchestra.

Miss du Pré, a tall girl with long wavy fair hair, was called back to the stage six times by a standing ovation. Backstage, after the concert, the two young artists were embraced by Casals, who had listened to the performance from a high-backed chair placed in the wings.

"I always said you can't be English with such a temperament," he told the beaming Miss du Pré. "Of course it must come from your father's French ancestors. It was beautiful, beautiful. Every note in its place and every emphasis so right. Beautiful."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUN 9 1969

GIVE TO FRESH AIR FUND.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, September 1, 1969

'Terrifying' Financial Future for Music in America

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

The High Price of Music:

"Cultural organizations face a dismal future of rising costs, lessened income, longer seasons and potential bankruptcy. The problem looks all but insoluble . . ."

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

(C) New York Times News Service

NEW YORK—It is now certain that the curtain of the Metropolitan Opera will not rise on Sept. 15. Some informed observers are talking about December, and others believe there may be no season at all. In the meantime the negotiations between labor and management have all but come to a halt.

As in previous years, each side is accusing the other of arrogance and bad faith. And each side honestly believes that it has God on its side. The Metropolitan Opera, in a financial squeeze, is horrified at the wage hikes that musicians and chorus members are asking. The musicians and chorus members claim that they are underpaid, and some of them demonstrably are. Both sides will have to meet somewhere in the middle, but right now neither is taking the first step.

ALL THIS IS INDICATIVE of the mess that American musical organizations currently find themselves in. Cultural organizations are faced with a dismal future of rising costs, lessened income, longer seasons and potential bankruptcy. The problem looks all but insoluble, and it is compounded by stupidity in certain top levels of labor and management. Throughout the country there are high officials of symphony orchestras who know and care nothing about music, who detest unions and who secretly would like to see those troublemakers and agitators get a kick in a place where it would do the most good.

Nor have unions made it any easier, and some of their policies are aimed to kill. Unions, for instance, have virtually priced out of the market any domestic recording of opera and symphony. Some union officials are as small-minded as their opposite numbers on symphony boards. And a lot of them are geared not to the needs of orchestral musicians, who are artists, but to the musicians who play in roadhouses and other places of entertainment. That is where the majority of the membership of the various musicians' locals lies. For some years there has been talk of symphony musicians breaking away and forming a craft union of their own.

So terrifying is the future that some of the smaller orchestras of the United States may be forced either to disband or to merge with nearby groups. Studies are being made of a merger of Buffalo and Rochester, or Cincinnati and Indianapolis. There is solid reasoning behind the talk. At least, solid economic rather than artistic reasoning. These orchestras seldom play to full houses. Yet with each round of union negotiations, longer seasons are demanded. But can the communities absorb longer seasons? Managers of these orchestras say emphatically not. A merger, on the other hand, would give (they say) each community a better orchestra, give the community just as much music as it can absorb, and yet give the musicians full employment.

THE BIG FIVE of American orchestras — Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia, in alphabetical order—are approaching the problem differently. They are not talking merger, but cooperation. Worried about the future, they have been meeting to discuss mutual problems. And they have much to discuss. A set of figures published by them last May shows that since 1963-64 costs have increased by 59 per cent while operating revenues have risen only by 44 per cent. Annual losses have risen from $300,000 to $1.6 million over the same period. The projection for the 1971-72 season indicates an aggregate operating deficit approaching $8 million. This may be equivalent merely to the cost of three helicopters used by the army, but it nevertheless is a lot of money.

How to survive? The conclusion of the big five calls for the complete cooperation, for "a setting in which the presidents and general managers would share ideas and make decisions on questions facing the orchestras — individually and as a group." A program for fund-raising will have to be developed to obtain more funds from the federal government, foundations and corporate donors. These efforts will have to be coordinated. In addition, management and musicians will have to work more closely together.

It is interesting that the report of the big five carefully steers away from the touchy subject of government subsidy, aside from one line about seeking more federal funds. Some orchestra managers and presidents believe that government subsidy creates more problems than it solves; and, in some of the more conservative sections of the United States, government subsidy is equated with creeping socialism. The reasoning is faulty, for the government seems to be subsidizing everything in sight—farmers, railroads, airlines, steamship companies, oil companies—and there is no cry of creeping socialism from those beneficiaries.

WHETHER OR NOT the managers like it, the time is going to come when the various governments—federal, state and local—are going to step in. That, or watch some fine cultural groups go under. It is preposterous that this country does not have in operation the equivalent of the Canadian or British arts council. The costs are minuscule, the advantages overwhelming. We do not have a kind of arts council in Washington. It was headed by Roger Stevens, who resigned when the new administration came in. Nobody has been named to replace him. Whoever does come in will find that Congress, in its infinite goodness, has provided him with $7 million to minister to the cultural needs of the entire country. During the same period, Austria, with a population of 7.3 million (less than New York City), will be laying out $20 million for its state-owned theaters alone.

THE BIG FIVE of American orchestras — Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia — are approaching the ... They are ... in a place where it would do the most good.

Nor have unions made it any ... of their poli-subject of government subsidy, aside from one line about seeking more federal funds. Some orchestra managers and presidents believe that government subsidy creates more problems ... selves; and, in some of ... rvative sections States, govern- ... s equated with ... sm. The reason- ... the government ... sidizing everyth- ... farmers, rail- ... steamship com- ... of creeping so- ... ose beneficiar-

... NOT the man- ... time is going ... e various gov- ... eral, state and ... ing to step in ... me fine cultur- ... er.

... rous that thi ... have in opera

... tion the equivalent of the Canadian or British arts council. The costs are minuscule, the advantages overwhelming. We do have a kind of arts council in Washington. It was headed by Roger Stevens, who resigned when the new administration came in. Nobody has been named to replace him.

Whoever does come in with find that Congress, in its infinite goodness, has provided him with $7 million to minister to the cultural needs of the entire country. During the same period, Austria, with a population of 7.3 million (less than New York City), will be laying out $20 million for its state-owned theaters alone.

106.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 30 1969 New England Newsclip

★

Latest music news at home deals with the Boston Symphony and one of its staunchest friends, Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock. Fran and members of the Women's Council are busy whipping up Thursday's reception for the new music man of the B.S.O., William Steinberg. Guest conductor both here and at Tanglewood, the conservative, German-born Mr. Steinberg, who celebrated his 70th birthday on Aug. 1, has used a talented baton in many parts of the world, beginning with the conductorship of the Cologne Opera in Germany before he was 25.

He was the first director for the Israel Philharmonic and has conducted both the Metropolitan Opera and waved a guest baton over just about every major orchestra there is.

And though he's standing on two podiums, since he will still keep his music directorship of the Pittsburgh Symphony where he's been top man since 1952, he's used to it, since he divided a whole season between Pittsburgh and the London Philharmonic. He's also principal guest conductor for the New York Philharmonic, doesn't look his age, and has a son who's an archeologist on the faculty of M.I.T.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

SEP 3 1969 New England

B.S.O. Lists Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced a rich and varied program for the 1969-70 season, in which William Steinberg will begin his tenure as Music Director. He will open the season in Symphony Hall with a program featuring Schubert's Ninth Symphony, Beethoven's Consecration of the House overture, Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra op. 6 and Richard Strauss's Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche.

This program will be given on Friday September 26 at 2 p.m. and Saturday September 27 at 8:30 p.m.

Mr. Steinberg will conduct twelve of the Orchestra's Friday-Saturday programs and over half the concerts offered in the Orchestra's other series.

Gunther Schuller will be Guest Conductor on Friday and Saturday, March 27 and 28, 1970 with a program including music from Wagner's Parsifal, Paris: the son of a great city by Delius, Haydn's Symphony no. 31 and a work of his own to be announced.

Michael Tilson Thomas, newly appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Orchestra on Friday and Saturday October 10 and 11. His debut with the Boston Symphony will include Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Charles Ives Three Places in New England, Stravinsky's Variations and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture-fantasy.

Guest artists who will perform during the season include sopranos Judith Blegen and Martina Arroyo, mezzo-soprano Lili Chooksasian and many others. Choral groups participating in the season include the New England Conservatory Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Ticket information may be obtained from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 6 1969

Symphony's new season

The Boston Symphony has announced complete plans for its 1969-70 season, which begins on Friday afternoon, Sept. 26, with a program of music by Beethoven, Schubert, Webern, and Strauss, under the leadership of William Steinberg, the orchestra's new music director.

Included in the roster of conductors who will appear with the BSO besides Mr. Steinberg are Erich Leinsdorf, who retired in August as music director, Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini, Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, and the orchestra's newly appointed assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas.

In Boston, there will be 24 programs in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series; on Tuesdays, 10 in the A, six each in the B and Cambridge series; on Thursdays, six in the A, three in the B series. In April, there will be a Beethoven Festival of five nonsubscription concerts. The orchestra will also make numerous appearances out of town, including five-concert series in Providence and at Philharmonic Hall in New York.

Sololists to be heard in Boston concerts include: vocalists — Martina Arroyo, Judith Blegen, Lili Chookasian, Maureen Forrester, Evelyn Lear, Evelyn Mandac; Philip Cho, Stanley Kolk, Richard Lewis, Sherrill Milnes, Thomas Paul, Vern Shinall, and Arnold Voketaitis; pianists—Robert Casadesus, Rudolf Firkusny, Ingrid Haebler, Theodore Lettvin, Rudolf Serkin, and Alexis Weissenberg; violinists—Edith Peinemann, Joseph Silverstein, and Isaac Stern; and cellists—Jules Eskin and Zara Nelsova.

The BSO Pension Fund will benefit from a special concert to be announced, and from seven open rehearsals on Thursday evenings at 7:30 p.m. for which series tickets are available.

There will be radio broadcasts of selected Tuesday concerts, and of each of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening programs—the latter in four-channel stereo by WCRB-FM and WGBH-FM in collaboration. Dates of six live telecasts of Tuesday concerts, in color, by WGBH (Channel 2) will be announced later.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 4 1969 New England

★

You read it in the Globe last week — and now it's announced.

First party in Boston for the new conductor of the BSO, William Steinberg, will be Sept. 25 in Symphony Hall. That will be the day before he takes over the city's most hallowed stage to lift a baton over Beethoven.

The balding 70-ish new music director of the Boston Symphony has one of the most agile batons in our time, since he's seldom been conductor for less than two major symphony orchestras. Now it's Boston and the Pittsburgh Symphony, which sternly points out in this year's program that he is their Permanent Conductor.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 4 1969 New England

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Council of Friends of BSO Plan Fete for New Conductor

A NEW SYMPHONY SEASON with a new conductor begins at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Sept. 26. William Steinberg, who starts his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this fall, will open the 1969-70 season with Boston's favorite Beethoven, Schubert and Strauss.

In honor of Mr. Steinberg, the Council of Friends has planned a reception at Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon, Sept. 25, at 5 o'clock. Members and wives of the orchestra and staff, the trustees, overseers and the annual contributors, known as the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been invited. Mayor Kevin H. White will join Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees, and other dignitaries in welcoming the new conductor.

A native of Cologne, Germany, Mr. Steinberg began his distinguished career conducting opera in Europe. During the Nazi regime, he left Germany to help found the Israel Philharmonic and later came to the United States at the request of Toscanini as associate conductor in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

In 1945, Mr. Steinberg was appointed music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and seven years later was engaged as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony with whom he now has a lifetime contract. While holding this position, he has had extensive engagements guest conducting in Europe, as well as from coast-to-coast in this country. For several years he was principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic for 12 weeks each year.

As this season opens, William Steinberg is the only conductor who holds the post of music director of two of the world's foremost orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the Pittsburgh Symphony. However, this dual role is not unknown to him as he traveled regularly between London and Pittsburgh while he was music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, will be assisted by members of the Steering Committee and the chairmen of areas surrounding Boston and including Worcester and New Hampshire, at the Steinberg reception the day before the opening of the Symphony season.

Among them are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Howard W. Davis, Mrs. Charles Devens and Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr.

Also, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Robert W. Kistner, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. H. Barton Loomis, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. James H. Perkins, Mrs. Jerome M. Rosenfeld, Mrs. Josiah R. Spaulding and Mrs. Sherman Thayer.

Area chairmen include Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Herbert C. Lee, Mrs. Walter J. Cahners, Mrs. Allen P. Joslin, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. Richard B. Higgins, Mrs. James Jackson Jr., Mrs. Richard M. Burnes, Mrs. Robert Siegfried, Mrs. Edwin M. Cole and Mrs. Albert C. England Jr.

Others are Mrs. Herbert Abrams, Mrs. Lewis Lane, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Richard S. Russell, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mrs. Francis Devlin, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Harlan Pierpont Jr., Mrs. Robert Whipple, Mrs. Charles T. Gallagher and Mrs. John Kennard.

* * *

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

SEP 7 1969 New England

Symphony Schedule Is Surprising, Disappointing

By GEORGE GELLES
Sunday Advertiser Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just released its programs for the coming season—its first under the direction of William Steinberg—and the list is both surprising and disappointing.

The big jolt is that a full 60 percent of the pieces to be heard on Friday afternoons, in Symphony Hall, are 20th Century.

Stravinsky will have more pieces played than Schubert, Schumann and Strauss combined, more than Beethoven, Brahms, and Bruckner together (though Beethoven gets a special week to himself, commemorating his 200th birthday, in April).

Though the ladies will hear seven works by Stravinsky, they needn't start dashing up the aisles quite yet. For there's a catch. With the exception of the "Variations," written in memory of Aldous Huxley and well - buried in an otherwise traditional program to be led by BSO Assistant Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, none of the Stravinsky is of recent vintage. (I'm excepting here the "Greetings Prelude," which is fairly new, but an arrangement of "Happy Birthday" and hardly a serious piece.)

★

The rest of the works were written between 1908 (the "Scherzo Fantastique") and 1931 (the Violin Concerto). They are thus time - tested and shock - proof, nothing to stir tempers or send patrons scurrying.

After Stravinsky with his seven pieces comes Mozart with six; Haydn, five; Tchaikovsky, four; Brahms, Schubert, Elgar and Bartok, each with three; Bruckner, Mahler, Strauss, Wagner and Webern, two apiece.

★

Each of the other 29 composers to be heard gets one piece, and it's here that the 20th Century scores so heavily.

Let's look at the 'modern' composers.

Of the 25, I would consider 11 firmly established, their music in the fund of 'classic' repertory on which conductors universally draw. Many popular composers are included — Ives, Bartok, Orff, Prokofieff, Elgar, Walton and Stravinsky — and some whom a truly popular success has eluded — Delius, Reger, Berg and Webern.

★

But the disappointment comes when we move to the other composers of our century, those who are contemporaries. First, we should sift out the exceptional cases, because several times this season a guest conductor — out of national pride — will bring a work from home that might not otherwise get programmed.

So, we'll get Claudio Abbado leading Donatoni, Carlo Maria Guilini leading Casella and Pizzetti, Seiji Ozawa leading Takemitsu, Colin Davis leading Tippett, Gunther Schuller leading a work of his own.

What's left will be led by Steinberg himself. He has chosen — as representative of our time — works by Starer and Lees and Barber and Lopatnikoff and Toch and Read and Shifrin.

★

With the exception of Shifrin, whose music represents the most forward - looking side of things; the other men, as I hear it, are tradition - bound and highly conventional.

And though they might represent a mainstream of sorts, this is a river run dry, because the most interesting and exciting music no longer flows from their pens.

Steinberg might have moved the mainstream a bit further to the left. He didn't and I'm sorry.

A 15 BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 7, 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

SEP 5 1969 New England

Framingham Choral Society To Sing With Boston Symphony

FRAMINGHAM — Performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the presentation of J.S. Bach's "Mass in B Minor" will highlight the 1969-70 concert season of the Framingham Choral Society, conducted by John S. Oliver.

Now in his fourth year with of the Framingham Choral Society, Oliver has chosen an ambitious program for this season. Fall and winter concerts will be held in Framingham . . . in November the Haydn "Mass in D Minor" (the Nelson Mass) and "Two Psalms" of Gustav Holst and in December Handel's "Messiah" performed by chamber chorus and orchestra.

New Music Director

January and March the male sections of the Framingham Choral Society will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new music director William Steinberg, in four performances of Liszt's "Faust Symphony."

The 1969-70 season will conclude in the late spring with a performance of J.S. Bach's "Mass in B Minor" at a location in the Boston-Cambridge area.

Rehearsals of the Framingham Choral Society are held each Monday evening at 8:00 p.m. at Scott Hall of the First Parish (Unitarian-Universalist) in Framingham Center. The first rehearsal will be held Monday. Auditions will be held after three open rehearsals. There are openings in all sections. Membership in the Framingham Choral Society is open to singers of eastern Massachusetts. Further information may be obtained from Mrs. Donald Love, Membership Chairman, 435-4306.

107.

The Lively Arts

Orchestra tools up For Edsel season

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

When Detroit posts its prices for the year, the automobile market is set. The picture is similar for the musical audience when the Philadelphia Orchestra pastes up its posters in the fall.

The posters are up and the ticket buyers have a feeling that the shiny new 1970 Philadelphia Orchestra program has been designed to hug the middle of the road and that its chief sales point is it adherence to old, straight lines and well-tried sounds.

The official word is that in this 70th anniversary year, it is time to look back, to find some acknowledged masterpieces which have not found their way into the Orchestra's repertory. Laudable as the idea is, it might also be stated another way: A couple of essays in new music last season brought outraged mail, threats of subscription cancellations, controversy, and these are expressions to be avoided.

New look at old favorites

Where a 70th anniversary might have been the occasion for a commissioned work, or a thorough and probing look at music written in those 70 years, the season shapes up as one which will make an obeisance to Beethoven in his anniversary year, and renew acquaintance with the Brahms Symphony No. 1 and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5.

True, some of the present century is represented. Bartok appears three times, Messiaen once, Dallapiccola once, Hindemith, Prokgofiev, Dello Joio and Harris, too. By weight, however, the emphasis is regressive.

The programming, while alarming as an isolated event in a historical continuum, also illustrates the dilemma which this Orchestra faces. Eugene Ormandy can never hope to please everybody with every program, nor should he try. His audience is made up of listeners with enormously varying interests and sophistication. The Brahms First is for the young person who has never heard it before; the Dallapiccola Variations for the students who are eager for something beyond a tune which can be whistled on the way out of the Academy. To please one group is to anger another.

In a biting valedictory to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Erich Leinsdorf pointed his finger full at the audience and the managers and said not enough has been done to identify the elements in this audience and to satisfy their needs. "My dear Boston audience takes this orchestra too much for granted," he said. "We needed the stimulation of audiences outside the Boston-Washington corridor, and in Carnegie Hall. I thrive on non-subscription audiences."

The problem he addressed is no less real in Philadelphia.

The subscription dilemma

Subscription audiences have been recognized for a long time as the backbone of orchestral support: the guaranteed annual audience is the pedestal on which the plans for the season are made. The subscription sales, however, are predicated on quantity. The assumption is that the audience is the same for all concerts and that only the number of programs it wants to hear is the measurable difference. Thus, if one buys Thursday tickets, the choice is seven or fourteen, not chamber music, contemporary music, classical or romantic.

Only the Friday night-Saturday night series promises repertory different from the rest of the series.

Leinsdorf's impatience with the subscription idea is admittedly impractical, but like many impractical dreams, they often put a mark on subsequent events. The symphony orchestra continues to find itself in crisis. Its problems are financial, sociological and musical. Because it represents the finest flowering of an idea that grew in the 19th century ,it may be fighting an inexorable trend that will make it only a curiosity in its time, a notable relic of a glorious period.

Because it is so expensive to maintain, it cannot take time to rehearse complex new pieces or explore music outside its normal channels. And because it cannot explore, it no longer encourages composers to write for it, to provide the repertory that might insure its continuation.

The expedient reaction to the effect of these forces is to seek the safe repertory, the one that guarantees a complacent audience, a house full of familiar faces.

The Leinsdorf thesis would ask another course. Rather than continue the treadmill, why not seek way to stop it? If significant numbers of potentially interested persons do

Continued on Page 6, Col. 1

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458
SEP 7 1969

Edsel season looms

Continued from First Page

not attend the concerts, could some way be found to meet their needs? Is the answer to the orchestral dilemma to be found in more players rather than fewer, but with greater flexibility? Ideally, the Orchestra would become a complex, a unit capable of providing chamber music outside the Academy, with a wing for the avant garde and one for musical theater.

A chamber group might be touring, supplying the state with top quality concerts, while other elements provided a broad spectrum of works for the city's listeners. And, at the risk of sounding like an envious antique, some means of finding and holding an audience of young people could come from such a complex.

The idea of a mobile and dynamic orchestra instead of a static and conservative one appeals as a practical matter. Even the most traditional listener has begun to feel that something must change. The continued reliance on the audience the Orchestra has always had is a dead one. It produces hesitant programing, tired performance, managerial interest only in what will sell. The Orchesra's new contract includes a clause to allow performance by smaller groups from wthin the main body, and hopefuly the clause will be used imaginatively.

Meanwhile, the posters are up and the Orchestra offers a commodity of considerable gloss, reminiscent of the excitement generated by the Edsel announcements.

Steinberg Opens Boston Symphony Season Sept. 26-27 Weekend

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
SEP 11 1969

William Steinberg who begins his tenure as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this fall, opens the 1969-70 season in Symphony Hall, Boston with music of Beethoven, Schubert, Webern, and Strauss, Friday-Saturday, Sept. 26 and 27. Schubert's Ninth Symphony is the major work on the program, which opens the Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture and also includes Webern's "Six pieces for Orchestra" op. 6 and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel". Mr. Steinberg will conduct twelve of the Orchestra's Friday-Saturday programs and over half the concerts offered on the Orchestra's other series.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Two names have been added to the list of conductors for this season. Gunther Schuller will be guest conductor on Friday-Saturday March 27-28. His program includes music from Wagner's "Parsifal" "Paris", by Delius, Haydn's Symphony no. 31 and a work of his own, to be announced.

On Friday-Saturday Oct. 10 and 11, Michael Tilson Thomas, newly appointed Assistant Conductor will conduct the orchestra for the first time. Haydn's Symphony no. 98 opens the concert, followed by "Three Places in New England" by Charles Ives, Stravinsky's "Variations" (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy.

Serveral guest artists have been added since the season's highlights were first announced. They include, Judith Blegen and Martina Arroyo, sopranos; Lili Chookasian, mezzo-soprano; Philip Cho and Richard Lewis, tenors and Thomas Paul, bass.

Choral groups participating in the season are the New England Conservatory Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and Chorus Pro Musica.

Musical Schedules Announced for Area

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230
SEP 13 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
SEP 10 1969
New England

The Worcester musical picture for '69-'70 continues to unfold slowly, but meanwhile tremendous amounts of music have been announced for central New England.

Boston Symphony Orchestra has released complete programs for the season. William Steinberg will conduct the opening concerts in Symphony Hall Sept. 26 and 27, to be repeated there Sept. 30 and Oct. 2, and in Providence on Oct. 9.

(The initial concerts will feature Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C major ("The Great") and music of Beethoven, Webern and Richard Strauss.

On Oct. 3, 4 and 14 in Symphony Hall, and Oct. 7 in Cambridge, Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, principals in the orchestra, will play the Starer Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra under Steinberg's direction. Parts of this program will be repeated at New York Philharmonic Hall on Oct. 22 and 24.

Boston Symphony

On Oct. 10 and 11, Michael Tilson Thomas, recently appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead a concert, to be repeated Oct. 28, at Symphony Hall.

Boston Philharmonia will announce shortly a principal conductor, to lead three of the season's six concerts. Five will be at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, one in Jordan Hall, Boston. Opening Cambridge concerts will be on Oct. 5 and 26.

Hartford Symphony Orchestra opens its season [illegible] under [illegible]

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
SEP 14 1969

Steinberg to Open Symphony Season With Beethoven

William Steinberg, who begins his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this fall, opens the 1969-70 season with music of Beethoven, Schubert, Webern, and Strauss. Schubert's Ninth Symphony is the major work on the program, which opens with Beethoven's Consecration of the House overture and also includes Webern's Six pieces for Orchestra op. 6 and Richard Strauss's Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche. Steinberg will conduct 12 of the orchestra's Friday/Saturday programs and more than half the concerts offered on the orchestra's other series.

Gunther Schuller will be guest conductor on Friday/Saturday, March 27-28, 1970. His program includes music from Wagner's Parsifal, Paris: the song of a great city by Delius, Haydn's Symphony No 31, 'Hornsignal,'" and a work of his own, to be announced. On Friday/Saturday, Oct. 10-11, Michael Tilson Thomas, newly-appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 opens the concert, followed by "Three places in New England" by Charles Ives, Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture-fantasy.

Several guest artists have been added to the Boston Symphony's schedule since the 1969/70 season's highlights were announced in March. These include Judith Blegen and Martina Arroyo, sopranos; Lili Chookasian, mezzo-soprano; Philip Cho and Richard Lewis, tenors; and Thomas Paul, bass.

Autumn Fetes Draw Women Into Boston

By RITA JEAN DUNN
WOMEN'S EDITOR

The clear beauty of autumn days signifies a time of beginning even more than the traditional advent of the new year.

After the lull of summer women's groups are active again and there are great things on the horizon.

Boston offers special events that should not be missed. It's great fun with children safe in college or local classroom to escape to symphony, a special lecture followed by luncheon in the Back Bay, or a tour of interesting city apartments and homes.

All these and more are planned for the coming weeks.

A new symphony season with a new conductor begins at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, September 26. In honor of the new conductor, William Steinberg, the Council of Friends has planned a reception at Symphony Hall Thursday afternoon, September 25, at five o'clock.

Members and wives of the orchestra and staff, the trustees, overseers and the annual contributors, known as the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been invited.

Mayor Kevin H. White with Talcott Bankcs, president of the board of trustees, and other dignitaries will welcome the new conductor.

The party is planned by Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. as co-chairman with the assistance of chairmen of surrounding Boston and suburban areas.

Among the North Shore women working on the large committee for this gala party are Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham, Mrs. Josiah R. Spaulding of Manchester and no doubt others.

Steinberg will open the 1969-70 symphony season with Boston's favorite Beethoven, Schubert and Strauss selections.

A native of Cologne, Germany, Steinberg began his career conducting opera in Europe. During the Nazi regime, he left Germany to help found the Israel Philharmonic and later came to the United States at the request of Toscanini as associate conductor in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

As the season opens, Steinberg is the only conductor who holds the post of music director of two of the world's foremost orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the Pittsburgh Symphony. However, this dual role is not new to him as he traveled regularly between London and Pittsburgh while he was music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

108

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,000

SEP 21 1969

MUSIC

Busy Year For Big 3

By JOHN THORNTON

IN HONOR of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, the Boston Symphony's new director, William Steinberg, has planned an April Beethoven Festival involving six soloists and the Rutgers University Choir.

Rudolf Serkin will play all five of the piano concerti, Isaac Stern is scheduled to perform the Violin Concerto and soloists Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis and Thomas Paul will join with the Rutgers choir for the Missa Solemnis.

Serkin will schedule four concertos in two concerts, which is very unusual: Op. 15 and Op. 37 April 8, Op. 19 and 73 April 9, and the Fourth Concerto, Op. 58, April 10. On that same concert he will play the Fantasia in C. Minor for chorus, orchestra and piano with the Chorus Pro Musica. The last day of the festival will feature the Missa Solemnis. This will be a non-subscription series that will sell out quickly once prices are announced.

In assuming his duties, Steinberg conducts 12 of the BSO's Friday-Saturday programs and over half the concerts of the remaining series. The rest of the time he will be at Pittsburgh, where he still remains music director.

Of the guest conductors at Boston this season it is interesting to note two Italians, Carlo Maria Giulini, once a strong candidate to succeed Charles Munch, and young Claudio Abbado, highly thought of to replace Bernstein at New York until Pierre Boulez was appointed. Abbado is still my choice to eventually head a prominent American symphony.

Other guest conductors include Seiji Ozawa from San Francisco, Colin Davis from London (he made a tremendous impression last season), Gunther Schuller, recently appointed director of the New England Conservatory of Music, Michael Tilson Thomas, just made the BSO assistant conductor, and Leinsdorf.

Among the interesting works to be performed: Ozawa will direct Orff's "Carmina Burana" late in November (Vermel has the score scheduled for April with the Portland Symphony) and "Bluebeard's Castle" with Steinberg in April.

SCHULLER CONDUCTS a concert rarity, Delius' "Song of a Great City," and a new work of his yet to be announced. Davis has scheduled another unusual item in Tippett's Symphony No. 2. Giulini plans the little Italian poem, "La Giara" of Cassella.

Steinberg's out of the way pieces are Dvorak's Piano Concerto in G Minor, Op 33 and Bruckner's Symphony No 6 on the same program Jan. 16 and 17; Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, his best orchestral work of size, Jan. 9 and 10, and Starer's Concerto for Violin, Cello, and Orchestra Oct. 3 and 4. Tchaikovsky's magnificent and neglected work, "Manfred," will be performed Dec. 19 and 20.

Steinberg's opening concert takes place at Symphony Hall Sept. 26 and 27 when he directs Beethoven's Consecration of the House Overture, Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 6, the Strause poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" and the big work, Schubert's C Major Symphony.

What will be most interesting will be to watch and listen to the difference between William Steinberg as guest conductor and Steinberg as music director. In the former role, he has been a visitor to Boston many times. But a guest conductor takes a vastly inferior position to one who is boss.

Now that Leinsdorf is gone, the men probably look forward to a friendlier rehearsal association with its new director.

When Munch succeeded Koussevitzky, the orchestra had been under a powerful dictatorship for 25 years. Munch's easy manner was welcomed with glee, returned with affection.

But Munch's conviviality and his reluctance to scold musicians for less than polished performing led in the end to an orchestra that suffered from lack of discipline. Leinsdorf, of course, quickly corrected the latter fault, but at the cost of a loss of the affection.

In my interviews with Steinberg years back, I discovered him to be amiable but reserved, a man of good humor and positive opinions. Like the late Charles Munch, in his off-time he likes to browse through museums and art galleries.

AT PHILADELPHIA, the orchestra is celebrating its 70th anniversary and Eugene Ormandy his 34th season as music director, a record unequalled by any living conductor of a major orchestra.

During the season the orchestra will perform 103 concerts in the Academy of Music. The subscription season offers 88 programs and will also schedule 11 youth concerts. Ormandy takes the orchestra to Europe following the Philadelphia subscription series for a four week tour covering 12 cities and seven countries. Back at home, the ensemble will travel to Saratoga Springs for a month after five weeks at Robin Hood Dell.

Abbado and Ozawa also guest direct at Philadelphia, along with Mehta, Skrowaczewski, Comissiona, Kertesz and Maazel. Philadelphia engages 17 soloists, some for the first time. Its concert schedule is more adventuresome than Boston's: Ormandy has arranged for 18 new works, an American premiere of Bartok's Four Pieces for Orchestra, Reger's Requiem and five large choral works.

Ormandy's program dedicated to the Beethoven 200th anniversary is not as ambitious as Steinberg's. At Philadelphia on March 6-7, he plans the "Pastorale" Symphony, Overture to "The Creatures of Prometheus" and the familiar C Minor Symphony.

His large works of the season will be Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony and Vaughan Williams' Magnificat, new to the orchestra's repertoire.

THE REMAINING orchestra of The Big Three, the New York Philharmonic, celebrates its 128th season without a permanent director until Boulez takes over in a year. George Szell will lead for eight weeks, Bernstein returns as Laureate Conductor for five and the remaining portion of the season will be divided between Abbado, Maazel, Ozawa (they should form a fraternity) Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos from Spain, Kertesz and Kostelanetz.

Fourteen pianists, four violinists, three cellists and 20 singers will appear as soloists. Two of these latter are Hungarian, set for the Philharmonic's first presentation of "Bluebeard's Castle."

Bernstein's most ambitious program will be scenes from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung" and a complete concert version of Beethoven's "Fidelio."

The Philharmonic's real adventure comes with Russo's "Concerto Grosse For Blues Band and Orchestra" directed by Ozawa, who will also lead the Corky Siegel Blues Band of Chicago.

Premieres include Elliott Carter's "Concerto For Orchestra" and new pieces by William Schuman and Alberto Ginastera.

And the Philharmonic also plans to perform "Carmina Burana," that score which survives by exposure from our largest orchestras despite its being held in contempt by some musicologists who sneer at Orff's primitivism.

So, there you have the seasonal grand plans for the three major symphony organizations of the United States.

This column will soon contain information about the Portland Symphony concert agenda for 1969-70, its new budget and its problems of replacing key players who left with the expiration of the Music In Maine project.

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181

SEP 14 1969

Society

ANOTHER opening of the season highlight but on traditional lines, is Thursday's reception sponsored by The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, the day before the opening of the Symphony season, to its distinguished new conductor, German-born William Steinberg. Members and wives of the orchestra and staff, the trustees, overseers and the annual contributors, known as Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been invited.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., chairman of the Council of Friends, will be assisted by the 22 members of the steering committee and the 29 chairmen of areas surrounding Boston and including Worcester and New Hampshire.

WELCOME PARTY, Symphony Hall, Boston, for William Steinberg, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 21 1969

Symphony Season Opens Friday

BOSTON, William Steinberg opens the 89th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the first pair of Friday Saturday concerts next Friday afternoon, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 27 at 8:30 p.m. The major works of the programs are Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C and Anton Webern's "Six pieces for orchestra Op. 6." Beethoven's" The consecration of the house overture opens and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" closes the program.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,001

SEP 19 1969

CONDUCTOR STEINBERG—HIS CIVILIZED BEHAVIOR COMMANDS RESPECT

B.S.O.'s new director

Steinberg: man of many faces

William Steinberg begins his first season as music director of the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon. The 14th conductor to hold the Boston post, he is the first to share its duties with another orchestra, the Pittsburgh Symphony, which he has led since 1952.

By CARL APONE
Pittsburgh Press

Through the ages, the temper tantrums of great conductors have rivaled those of Rumpelstiltskin, the angry little fairy-tale character who stomped himself into the ground.

In the 17th century, for example, during rehearsals, French conductor Jean Lully would not hesitate to grab a violin from a player and smash it to pieces. Composer-conductor J. S. Bach once ripped off his wig and hurled it at an offending musician.

Beethoven's miserable temper kept orchestras in an uproar. Berlioz was known to pull his hair and smash music stands. Handel once threatened to throw a prima donna out the window for failure to sing the notes as written.

These temper tantrums are by no means limited to great European conductors in earlier times. In his fine book, "The Great Conductor," Harold Schonberg notes that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony until 1949, exploded in "Dostoevskian rages." And presently George Szell of the Cleveland Orchestra plays second fiddle to none as a podium villain.

Our own Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra players have felt the sting of two of the sharpest tongues in the business. Its founder, Otto Klemperer, had an uncontrollable temper. And Fritz Reiner? "He was more than tough, sarcastic and mean," said one violinist who played under Reiner, "at times he could be downright sadistic."

The barbs thrown by the Bachs, Beethovens, Bulows, and Reiners have left a mark. Scratch an orchestra player and underneath the skin you find the same feeling for conductors that recruits have for the drill sergeant, the convict for the chain gang guard.

This overture of conductor-orchestra hostilities is a long one but has a purpose in a story about William Steinberg. To show contrast: For on the podium, William Steinberg, 70, is unlike most of the great conductors of the past. And as a result of his civilized behavior, he is, for orchestra players, perhaps the most respected, admired and loved conductor since Pierre Monteaux. Monteaux, the venerable Frenchman, had no known enemies when he died at age 89.

STEINBERG Continued on Page A-44

DR. WILLIAM STEINBERG

STEINBERG

Dr. William Steinberg has been Music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra since 1952. This season he has also accepted the head post of the Boston Symphony, making him the only conductor to be Music Director of two of the world's greatest orchestras. German born and trained, Steinberg came to the United States in 1938 to assist Toscanini in creating the NBC Symphony. In 1964 he held the newly created post of principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic, sharing the concerts at Lincoln Center with Leonard Bernstein. The same year he was guest conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. Steinberg has established a reputation for his skillful mixture of classic and modern.

SARASOTA SCENE
SARASOTA, FLA.
CIRC.N.AVAIL.

FALL 1969

109

'I work at music 26 hours a day'

★ STEINBERG

Continued from Page A-41

Steinberg has enemies among the public and the press, but enemies are hard to find among orchestral people. John Edwards, former manager of the local orchestra now manager of the Chicago Symphony, has strong ideas on why Steinberg is held in such high regard in the trade. "Steinberg commands colossal respect because of his musical and personal integrity. He commands loyalty because he never connives. He never plays favorites. He's friendly but impersonal, sympathetic when players ask for help. He's a manager's dream."

Present manager Seymour Rosen voices similar sentiment: "Steinberg's a gentleman whose demands are reasonable, logical and for the best interest of the orchestra. That's why we break our backs for him."

'He listens to your ideas'

From orchestra players you hear this crescendo of praise for Steinberg's personal qualities. "He's a very decent human being" . . . "he has a sense of humor" . . . "he combines authority with courtesy" . . . "he listens to your ideas and if they are half-decent, he accepts them" . . . "his humanity above all, he doesn't set himself apart from the players" . . . "he's pleasant to work for, there's not a lot of pressure."

His professional qualities draw just as much praise as his personal qualities. "He knows the score from A to Z," said one string player who performed with leading orchestras of the world before coming here. And from another: "He's not a narrow specialist. He does all music well."

One musician who quit the Cleveland Orchestra (considered by many to be the nation's finest) and now plays here said: "The programs at Cleveland under Szell were terribly narrow and repititious. Here we have the widest kind of repertoire. Szell was a walking Univac as far as knowledge of the score went, but his fanaticism for precision detracted from the music. His human reaction to music was missing, terribly missing. Steinberg, on the other hand, feels music. There's terrific inspiration and spontaneity. As for the musical enjoyment and freedom we know here, after Szell it's like heaven."

Steinberg consciously sets out to establish a heaven-like atmosphere. For him, the only way to make music is "in an atmosphere of goodwill." Because of the pleasant atmosphere, the turnover in orchestra personnel here is exceedingly small.

He is also one of the rare orchestral conductors on good terms with most of the major conductors and soloists. He and Eugene Ormandy of the Phila-

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 21 1969 E

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW MAESTRO . . .

delphia Orchestra are the closest of friends and Ormandy is one of the few persons who calls him "Bill." Steinberg embraced violinist Nathan Milstein warmly in a New York hotel, despite the tiff of a few years ago where Milstein stormed out of a rehearsal and refused to perform.

As for the public, they respect and admire Steinberg. In a community which lives with the losing ways of the Steelers, Panthers, Pirates, Penquins, Steinberg seems to be one of the few winning performers in town. His public image is good. People like him. But for some of those who have had personal contact with Steinberg, love is hardly the word to describe their reaction.

Many things to many people

In encounters with those he regards as less than his musical equal, he can be arrogant, brusque, sarcastic, aloof, ar pleasant, depending on his mood. Thus, this strong personality, is many things to many people.

Local music leaders outside the orchestral family get huffy over Steinberg because he avoids them like the plague. Said one of them: "He always seems afraid you might want something from him, when really I don't."

Steinberg's sarcasm can cut deeply. When an aide proudly told him he had to stand in the crowded hall during the entire Pittsburgh Symphony concert, Steinberg responded icily: "So did I." And when irked the conductor lets fly at the nearest person. While on tour with the orchestra in the South, he scorched a college professor of the host school for the inadequacy of the college auditorium. The poor man had nothing to do with the booking or building of the hall.

Despite his barbs and sometime coolness toward the press, Dr. Steinberg does take pains to grant interviews as soon as his schedule permits. When he is in a good mood the interview can be very pleasant indeed. Aides can remember one occasion, however, when he fiercely opposed a press conference. That was in West Berlin a few years ago. For Steinberg, a Jew who had fled Nazi persecution, the idea of a press conference with German reporters was unthinkable. He gave in to the request at the last minute but not without a battle.

When the conference took place, it turned out to be a monologue. "He gave one of the best lectures on democracy and music-making in America that I have ever heard," said an aide. "He really waved the flag. Then before they could ask questions or even say 'danka schoen' he quickly turned heel and walked out of the hall."

Some society leaders also resent Dr. Steinberg. For while conductors Leonard Bernstein and Zubin Mehta often appear as prize guests at society functions, Steinberg steadfastly refuses to be a social ballet dancer. He maintains a proper perspective toward society and benefactors. Said one member of the orchestral family, "he is grateful but he doesn't believe a conductor should camp on a widow's doorstep to insure a donation to the orchestral fund."

Those close to Steinberg admit his personal failings in dealing with the public, and offer these explanations. He is sometimes brusque because he is a shy, sensitive man who wants desperately to protect his privacy. He regards his English as deficient (it isn't) and for this reason is reluctant to meet the public. He is out of touch with social and practical aspects of living because of his total concern with music. The man is really full of great warmth, but because of his position, is afraid to let the warmth flow.

Is is true Dr. Steinberg is far from being an impossible man. He is fond of the put-on, and often the jesting is misinterpreted. It is also true he reserves his affections for the few. His eyes mirror affection for them and the depth of his feelings for them may be revealed only with the passing of a long period of time. And for those he dislikes? The dislike is usually unchanging.

. . . WAS "A FOOT OFF THE GROUND . . ."

Talent balances shortcomings

His late wife, Lotti, perhaps came closest to explaining this complicated man. Mrs. Steinberg, a warm and well-liked woman who died in 1967, said: "I feel sorry for him. He's so one-minded in all he does. He's lonely, so consumed with music he excludes everybody, everything . . . But his personal shortcomings are more than balanced by his talent."

Dr. Steinberg admits music occupies all of his time but hardly regards his total commitments a drawback. "I am one of those lucky men whose profession is also my hobby," he said. "I work at music 26 hours a day." At his home or while traveling Dr. Steinberg thinks about, reads about, or studies a musical score with all the concentration and devotion of a Biblical scholar.

At the TWA VIP lounge in New York, Dr. Steinberg studied a Bruckner score while waiting for a plane, completely oblivious to the celebrities around him. At the Steinberg vacation home in East Hampton, L.I., the conductor frequently dresses for the beach, then studies a score, completely oblivious of family and friends around him. His powers of concentration are colossal.

He does his homework thoroughly. A few years ago when the local orchestra performed the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" in New York, Dr. Steinberg not only studied the score, he immersed himself in the philosophy, politics and social climate of Berlioz's time by reading two volumes of 1500 pages each.

Dr. Steinberg's scholarly bent is apparent upon entering his downtown apartment in the Gateway Towers. His huge library dominates the living room.

He dresses conservatively, and buys his suits off the rack, but he insists his pipes come from a Columbus, O., shop and his tobacco from a Philadelphia tobacconist. He despises recorded music in restaurants, airplanes and elevators and will go to great lengths to have it turned off.

Often pokes fun at himself

He enjoys walking several miles a day, and sometimes swings a cane jauntily while in this pursuit. His physical condition is excellent and his swift pace while walking can tire men half his age. A devoted family man, he speaks fondly of his stepdaughter, Sylvia; his son, Arthur, and his four children.

Dr. Steinberg laughs easily. He often pokes fun at himself, including the claim that he speaks 4½ languages, the half being English. He can, however, on occasions be extremely thin-skinned. At times his enthusiasm for new experiences is almost boyish. His first visit to Washington, D.C., for example, left him wide-eyed. He once climbed up behind the trumpet section of the Glenn Miller band to more closely observe their work.

At rehearsals, Steinberg dresses casually, as do the other orchestra members. He sits on a high stool and often sings along with the music. National Education Television had a microphone attached during one of these rehearsals and Steinberg's singing sounded very much like that of a wounded coyote. He accomplishes music in little time. His instructions to the orchestra are made in calm, courteous fashion, without shouting. On interpretation, he will discuss without shouting. On interpretation, he will discuss such matters with the soloist, and accept those conceptions which fit together as an artistic entity with his own ideas.

Aides can usually tell if he will re-engage soloists. If he is exceptionally warm toward them, he likes their music. If coldly formal, they aren't likely to return. Both Rudolf Serkin and Artur Rubinstein are usually greeted with warm embraces.

. . . WHEN HE HEARD OF BOSTON INVITATION

Steinberg goes out of his way to make young players feel at ease during an audition. He also freely gives his time to student musicians who seek his advice. Those seeking autographed photographs sometimes get a kidding about wanting his photo for "the rogues" gallery."

At concerts his podium motions are spare in comparison to some of the Gene Kelly-like choreography of younger conductor. Said Steinberg: "The more my younger colleague dance. Said Steinberg: "The more my younger colleagues dance, the quieter I will be. Jumping distracts from the music. Great conductors do not dance." He has made a serious offer to conduct behind a screen so that audiences will concentrate on listening.

Smiles, grimaces, eyes flash

Steinberg's face is most expressive when he directs. He smiles, grimaces, his eyes flash and his jowls shake. In the wings off-stage he still bubbles enthusiastically about works he has heard hundreds of times.

Dr. Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, Aug. 1, 1899. After conducting at opera houses in Cologne, Frankfurt and Berlin, he left Germany for Palestine in 1936. He trained the Palestine Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic) so well that Arturo Toscanini signed him as associate conductor of the NBC Symphony.

After several seasons with the NBC, Steinberg appeared as guest conductor with U.S. orchestras before becoming music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945 and the Pittsburgh orchestra in 1952. In 1958 he headed the local orchestra and the London Philharmonic concurrently. And in the 1964 season he got a leave of absence here to conduct the New York Philharmonic and Metropolitan Opera. At present he also appears as guest conductor throughout the world. This season he will serve as musical director of both the Boston and Pittsburgh orchestras.

Those close to Steinberg say he regarded the invitation from the Boston orchestra as a "supreme accolade. He was a foot off the ground when he heard the news," said one friend.

110.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
OCT 15 1969

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
OCT 5 1969

THE PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY
OCT 4 1969

Symphony rush seats Saturday

The Boston Symp has set aside its 24 S
OCT 2 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

Symphony rush seats Saturdays

n Symphony set aside 150 seats ts 24 Saturday eve-ts to be sold as $1
OCT 2 1969

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

Symphony rush seats Saturdays

ston Symphony
s set aside 150
of its 24 Saturday
OCT 2 1969

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

Symphony rush seats Saturdays

ston Symphony Ors set aside 150
OCT 2 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
SEP 22 1969

Coming to Boston

Steinberg Effort Is Disappointing

By GEORGE GELLES
Special to the HT

PITTSBURGH — William Steinberg is our most distinguished cultural commuter. His trip isn't the town-to-town treadmill that most soloists and conductors are on, but rather the 80-minute air journey between Boston — where on Friday he will make his Symphony Hall debut as Music Director of the Boston Symphony — and this western Pennsylvania industrial center — where this past Friday night he began his 18th season as head of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

THE ORCHESTRA itself is in its 43rd year. It numbers a handful over 100 players, half a dozen of whom are women. The ensemble's sound is handsome and rugged, occasionally rough at the edges, and its intonation excellent.

As does the Boston orchestra, the PSO spreads its season from September to May, with 24 paired concerts played in the 3800-seat Syria Mosque, in the Oakland section of the city. Architecturally, the Mosque is Middle Shriner, a far less fanciful rendering, say, of the old New York City Center, and acoustically it is neutral, not really damaging, but not overly complimentary either.

Steinberg's program was the sort of solid affair he will often play in Boston — a Beethoven overture (Leonore 3), Chopin piano concerto (F Minor), and Schubert symphony (No. 9) — and if this shows no great imagination, it at least promises a regular review of standard repertory.

SOLOIST IN THE Chopin was Jacob Gimpel, who did a poor job. It's not that Gimpel can't play his instrument, for he can and technically he was more than adequate. But in tearing his way through the piece he missed entirely what it was about.

All the filigree, for example which needs to be richly appreciated and savored, all this marvelous lace-work was mumbled through mousily and thoroughly thrown away. And in general the reading was without breadth of grandeur or any real feel of verve.

Rhythmically things were often tentative on Gimpel's part, creating problems of ensemble between soloist and orchesta that were great and not fully solved by Steinberg. An incomplete performance, at best.

AS FOR THE REST of the program, Steinberg's readings must be among the heaviest around. I don't mean in intellectual content, but in terms of sheer sound and articulation.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
SEP 25 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
SEP 25 1969

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516
SEP 25 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
SEP 25 1969

Steinberg's Pittsburgh opening unexciting

MICHAEL STEINBERG

PITTSBURGH — Wil-
m Steinberg, who will gin his first season as e Boston Symphony's usic director Friday
ternoon, began his 18th
th the Pittsburgh Symony last Friday night.

The major selection on e program was Schurt's Symphony No. 9 in (It will be on the first ogram in Boston as ell). It was preceded by eethoven's Overture, conore" No. 3, and by opin's F minor Piano ncerto with Jacob Gim-l as soloist.

The original plan had en to open the season
th a concert perform-ce of "Fidelio." Some-w, in the last couple of eks, Beethoven's opera s shifted to the middle May and replaced by the her program, one that is ceedingly cautious, even r Pittsburgh, where the venture threshold is low.

There is, of course, a vel of performance at hich even so well trodden program becomes an ex-ting experience. We got lid musicianship in the yria Mosque here Friday,
d a decent level of pro-ssionalism in execution, t nothing revelatory or irring, and little sense of esh and vital contact ith the music.

The Pittsburgh Sympho-
, newly enlarged by ven players and some-hat improved since I last ard it in 1968, plays well not delicately, but attentively, with firm and well balanced sound and admirable intonation.

Steinberg's work with the orchestra is unobtrusively efficient. There is no showmanship, not even the negative sort like Reiner's, where a whole big point was made out of how little was being done. Steinberg did nothing Friday that one could not imagine him doing in rehearsal.

His conducting of the Beethoven and Schubert pieces was clear and straightforward, without quirks, not highly detailed; generally on the deliberate side, though disturbingly slow only in the Schubert Scherzo; and heavy, not greatly differentiated, accents.

Steinberg seems to think that Schubert made a mistake in not supplying the first movement of his Symphony with a slow coda, undertaking, therefore, to compensate for the composer's oversight by simply cutting the tempo more or less in half where the strings play the opening horn call idea in unison. The results were a little vulgar and more than a little silly.

Jacob Gimpel is a pianist with musicianship and taste. He played with beguilingly fragile delicacy, but with little assertiveness or projection. The orchestral contribution to the Concerto was unarticulated note-grinding of a particularly dismal sort. The performance altogether sounded as though maybe the Schumann Concerto had been rehearsed but at 8:25 someone suddenly had the idea that it would be fun to try the Chopin F minor instead.

BSO Concert

The second pair of Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Oct. 3 at 2 o'clock and Oct. 4 at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by the Orchestra's concertmaster and principal cellist respectively, will be soloists in the program's principal work, Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra. Haydn's Symphony no. 55 opens the program and Elgar's Symphony no. 2 closes the program.

'B.S.O. will offer 'rush' tickets

The Boston Symphony has set aside 150 "rush" seats for each of its 24 Saturday evening concerts this season. Priced at $1, the tickets go on sale two hours before the 8:30 concert and are on a first-come, first served basis.

The orchestra's Friday afternoon concerts have had a tradition of rush seats for many years; Friday's rush seats go on sale at noon before the 2 p.m. program.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
SEP 24 1969

Symphony Offers $1 'Rush' Seats For Saturdays

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has set aside 150 seats for each of its 24 Saturday evening concerts to be sold as $1 'rush' tickets each Saturday evening, beginning Saturday the first Saturday concert of the 1969-1970 season.

The Saturday evening 'rush' seats are soldonafirst-come, first-served basis beginning two hours before the 8:30 concerts. The $1 ticket is an extension of the orchestra's long standing tradition of rush seats for the Friday afternoon concerts.

The Saturday evening 'rush' seats will encourage students and others who are unable to take advantage of the Friday afternoon 'rush' seats to attend Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Friday afternoon concerts begin at 2 p.m., with rush seats on sale from 12 noon.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
SEP 26 1969

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
SEP 27 1969

THE BSO

by Gaffney Jon Feskoe

The distinctively conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra has stood fast in its tradition of appointing sober-minded, German trained Music Directors with its choice of William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Steinberg begins his first season with the BSO on September 26-27. Since this will be his first year as Music Director, he will undoubtedly be compared to his predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf, who resigned as of last August. Steinberg follows closely, literally and figuratively, in Leinsdorf's footsteps. Both were trained in the time honored German tradition and heritage of music. They both maintain absolute control over the orchestra and conduct with precise and disciplined movements. A characteristic quote of Steinberg's concerning his style of conducting is: "The more they dance, the quieter I stand." This implication of discipline is the German conducting tradition. By way of contrast, Leonard Berstein does not particularly maintain a disciplined decorum about his conducting technique. The musical results may sound nearly the same, but the means of communication is nearly opposite.

Leinsdorf and Steinbergs' common German heritage is the music of the Germanic masters – most particularly that of Beethoven and Gustav Mahler. Mr. Steinberg's Beethoven is solid, sober, and correct, interpreted in the best of German taste. There is drive and power in the reading: what it lacks in emotion is made up for in nobility.

Leinsdorf won a "granny" award for his recording of the Mahler sixth. Steinberg has equal talents with Mahler's Fourth, which is the program for this season. Since Mahler is a relatively recent composer, writing in the early part of this century, audiences have not grown as accustomed to his ten symphonies as they have to Beethoven's nine. So a conductor can't be irreverent to Mahler in the way he can with Beethoven, unless there evolves a more or less direct way to perform Mahler. His music, even in the slow movements, is characterized by an inextinguishable inertia and demonic power, as some of his Symphonies subtitles suggest; Sym. no. 1–"The Titan", Sym. no. 10–"The Symphony of a Thousand".

However, there is a difference between the two conductors. There will not be as much Mozart with Steinberg as there was with Leinsdorf. Leinsdorf, upon his leaving as Music Director, was particulary proud of the Orchestra's accomplishments with the music of Mozart. Leinsdorf has always been known for his sympathetic understanding of Mozart's works, and he molded the Boston Symphony Ochestra into one of the best Mozart Ochestras. Mr. Steinberg, on the other hand, is equally appealing with his performances of Schubert; so it may be the trend to replace Mozart with Schubert. Aside from this there will not be that great a change, except in the personage, in the post of Music Director – very much in keeping with the procedure of the past Music Director.

The BSO was founded in 1881 by a wealthy Boston financier and frustrated musician, as a fulfillment of his ambition to create an orchestra in Boston equal to the great ones in Europe. Since the "greats" of Europe were dominated by Germans – so too was the BSO. The past music director's list reads like the Who's Who of the great German conductors. George Henchel, Arthur Nirkish (actually he was Hungarian), Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, the Alsatian Charles Munch (he preferred being known as a Frenchman, though), and Erich Leinsdorf. Of course there was the Russian Serge Kovssevitsky (a name to which Bostonians tip their hats), but he was so special as to be in a class by himself for he was one of the few creative conductors. The best way to explain that definition is by way of a quote from Toscanini: "Any asino can conduct – but to make music . . . eh? Is difficile!" Kovssevitsky made music for 25 years with BSO.

Another Music Director of the BSO who had the sympathy of the Boston audience was the Frenchman, Pierre Monteux. With his elan, Monteux was able to restore the BSO to its premiere position after some temporary union and fiscal difficulties. However, Monteux's countrymen – Emil Paur and Heri Rabaud (who was tolerated only for one season) were definitely not of the German tradition and therefore not in keeping with the nature of the BSO. Paur and Rabaud tampered with the revered German classics by reading the French manner, emotion and grandeur into them. This did not appeal to the Boston audience and Rabaud was hired only during WWI.

As Hans Wilhelm Steinberg's biography attests, he is of German tradition and infuence. Born in Cologne, Germany in 1889, he studied piano and composition. He studied conducting with the great German master Abendroth. Steinberg became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. He held conducting posts in Frankfort and Prague. When Steinberg left Nazi Germany in 1933, after forming with his colleagues semi-underground orchestras which in some instances proved to be superior to the Aryan ensembles, he went to Palestine to conduct the Israel Philharmonic. In 1938 he came to the U.S. upon an invitation by Toscanini to conduct the NBC symphony. He became director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, and the Pittsburgh Symphony, as well as becoming senior guest conductor of the N.Y. Philharmonic.

The BSO plays six concert series in Boston on Friday/Saturday, Tuesday, and Thursday. There will also be a series of 7 open rehearsals on selected Thursday evenings. For the first time in BSO history, 150 seats will go on sale for $1 apiece for the Fri./Sat. concerts two hours before the performance. Besides the recently appointed assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, there will be guest performances by Erich Leinsdorf, Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo M. Gudini, Seji Ozawa, and Gunther Schuller.

For his first concert, Mr. Steinberg has chosen a diverse program consisting of works by Beethoven (Overture to the Consecration of the House), Shubert (Symphony No. 9 in C, "The Great"), Strauss, and the contemporary Anton von Webern. Program booklets for the season may be had for the asking at Symphony Hall.

William Steinberg

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,480

SEP 18 1969 New England

Youth Concert Tickets To Be Distributed in Schools

Youth Concerts At Symphony Hall, a sellout attraction for young people from all over the State since their beginning in 1959, will again return this fall for the eleventh season, it was announced by Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, Vice - Chairman of the Board of Directors.

Harry Ellis Dickson, Music Director, will conduct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three programs on Saturdays at 11 a.m. in Symphony Hall. Concerts last approximately one hour. They will be presented on November 15, January 17, and March 21.

Music selected to appeal to young peoole is featured at these concerts, to acquaint them with the great classical works as well as those of contemporary composers, and to give them the benefit of hearing these works performed in Symphony Hall by men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The popular series celebrated its Tenth Anniversary in the past, and its programs included many of the outstanding highlights of previous seasons, such as Giam - Carlo Minotti's "The Telephone." The season was concluded with a Festival Program featuring a new work by Michael Colgrass, entitled "The Earth's A Baked Apple," which was commissioned by the Youth Concerts. Performing witn the Orchestra for this piece was the Lincoln - Sudbury Regional High School Chorus under the direction of Mr Robert Wentworth.

Tickets for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall are sold by the series only for three concerts, and may be ordered by local chairmen all over the State.

Applications will be distributed to the children in grades five through nine in Newton Public School on September 23. The Town Chairman in Newton is Mrs Herbert Kotzen. Mrs. Morris Goldberg is Chairman o

PRESS
LITCHFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,743

SEP 24 1969

To hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in person — what a marvelous musical experience awaits our fifth through twelfth graders. What better way to introduce your child to the diversity of great music as performed by a world - renown orchestra!

Have you read carefully the announcement your child brought home that the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall have begun again for this season? Under the leadership of Harry Ellis Dickson sixty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are presenting a program series on Saturday mornings designed to appeal to young people.

This group of four program is patterned after the very successful television series by Leonard Bernstein with brief explanatory introductions. At $6.00 for the entire series its an incredible bargain compared to the price you pay for one concert ticket.

Contact Mrs. Robert Jorgensen at 769-1264 in order to assure your child the opportunity to participate in this cultural activity.

NASHOBA FREE PRESS
HARVARD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,700

SEP 25 1969

YOUTH CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL subscriptions for the 1969-1970 series of concerts must be returned by SEPTEMBER 26 local co-chairmen, Mrs. M. E. Shepherd (456-8708) and Mrs. Bernard Fine (456-3216), announced today.

The youth concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. These concerts are presented on Saturdays at Symphony Hall at 11 a.m., with this year's programs scheduled for November 8, January 10 and March 14.

The programs are planned to simulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions, played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the tradition-filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall. In addition, The Ancient Instruments Room with its priceless collection of rare and unusual instruments is open to the young concert-goers before and after the concert.

Notices are being distributed throughout the schools. Should interested parents not receive a notice, please contact one of the local chairmen.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 26 1969 E1

Kennedy Foundation gives BSO grant

Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation has granted the orchestra $180,000 for special youth concerts at Symphony Hall.

Banks said the concerts, free of charge for junior high students in the Boston schools, will allow 5100 children to attend three concerts a year for three years.

In addition, the grant provides for the care of 320 of these students for a week at Tanglewood, the orchestra's Summer quarters in the Berkshires.

While at Tanglewood the students will watch performances, rehearsals and workshops and visit neighboring performing festivals.

Harry W. Anderson, treasurer of the Kennedy Memorial Foundation, said the aim of the grant is to "add significantly to those young people it touches and extend the cultural riches of our city to them."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 26 1969 New England

$180,000 Kennedy Grant For City Youth Concerts

By GEORGE GELLES

The Boston Symphony announced yesterday afternoon the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation has given the orchestra $180,000 for special youth concerts at Symphony Hall.

The grant is to be spread over a three-year period, and will provide for two annual series of three free concerts. The audience at each of these concerts will be comprised of approximately 2500 junior high school students from the Boston public schools.

In addition to these 18 concerts, the grant provides the opportunity for 320 of these same students to travel to Tanglwood — summer home of the Boston Symphony in Lenox — and to spend a week participating in a program entitled a "Day in the Arts."

Started two years ago, the "Day in the Arts" immerses the young people in the artistic life of the Berkshires — in Boston Symphony rehearsals and concerts, in Tanglewood workshops, in performances by local theater and dance ensembles.

SPEAKING FOR the City of Boston, Mayor Kevin White commended both the Boston Symphony and the Kennedy Memorial Foundation for the youth concerts, noting that "this project adds significantly to the cultural education of the Boston school children."

Talcott Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in announcing the grant also made known that the popular Friday afternoon 'rush seats,' aimed at students and sold two hours before the concert at $1, will this year be off ered before the Saturday night concert as well.

Banks noted that the orchestra "regards its responsibility and service to the community, regardless of financial situation, as uppermost in importance, and nothing is more important than reaching new audieces of young people."

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

SEP 26 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECEIVES GRANT

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received a grant of $180,000 for a series of free youth concerts enabling 5,100 junior high school students in the Boston public schools to attend three concerts a year for three years.

The grant, from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation also will enable 320 of these young people to spend a week at Tanglewood next summer.

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,480

SEP 18 1969 New England

September 30 Is Deadline to Get Concert Tickets

Mrs. Herbert Kotzen, Local Chairman for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, announced today that subscriptions for the 1969 - 1970 series of concerts must be returned by September 30.

The Youth Concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. A series of three concerts are presented on Saturdays, at Symphony Hall, at 11 a.m. with this years program scheduled for November 15, January 17, and March 21.

The programs are planned to stimulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the tradition - filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall. In addition, the Ancient Instruments Room, with its priceless collection of rare and unusual instruments, is open to the young concert - goers before and after the concerts.

For information or ticket application contact your school P. T. A. Creative Arts Chairman or Mrs. Herbert Kotzen, 332-4706 or Mrs. Morris Goldbert, 244-3579, Bus Transportation Chairman.

Tickets are sold by the series only. Since the series was sold out by October last year, those who wish to subscribe are urged to do so now and avoid disappointment.

Monitor - 9-27-'69

A director and a gift come to Symphony Hall

By Louis Snyder

On the eve of its season's opening, the Boston Symphony revealed two proud new acquisitions Thursday afternoon at Symphony Hall—its new music director, William Steinberg, and the announcement of a $180,000 gift for its youth concerts from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation.

Although Mr. Steinberg is not scheduled to meet the press officially until Oct. 1, he was presented by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, to representatives of news media who had gathered for details of the Kennedy gift.

Mayor Kevin White also arrived to offer his congratulations to the orchestra on signing Mr. Steinberg, and to express Boston's appreciation of the foundation's three-year grant, which will permit 5,100 children from the city's public schools, many of whom have never been to Symphony Hall, to attend three concerts a year. The gift also provides for a week at Tanglewood, the orchestra's country home, during the coming summer for 320 of these children.

Representing Mrs. Audrey Kennedy, who established the fund in memory of her father, Harry W. Anderson, the foundation's treasurer, cited the community aim of the gift, and William Ohrenberger, superintendent of Boston's schools, spoke particularly of the benefits derived from youth concerts by disadvantaged children. Also expressing his gratitude was Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor since 1958 of Youth Concerts at Symphonay Hall, an affiliated organization of the BSO, which now presents four series of three programs each.

900 handclasps

Later in the afternoon, Mr. Steinberg was the guest of honor at a reception given by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony in the lobbies and corridors of Symphony Hall.

Acceptances were sent by more than 800 friends, but more than 900 came to shake hands with the new music director and with Mr. Banks, who were joined on the receiving line at varying times by Mayor White, Mrs. Francis W. Sargent, wife of the Governor, and Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., cochairmen of the council.

There were refreshments before, after, and during the waiting-on-line period to meet Mr. Steinberg, and everyone seemd so glad to see everyone else in these familiar surroundings that time passed very quickly. Members of the orchestra were also among the guests, and were greeted like the old friends they are. Then too, there were those subscribers who felt they couldn't wait for the first concert to sit in their accustomed seats, so the hall was dotted with regulars, just becoming acclimated again.

Further preparation for the season's concerts was assured by the announcement that the symphony's program editor, Andrew Raeburn, would succeed the late Prof. G. Wallace Woodworth as commentator on its radio programs.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,555

OCT 1 1969

Educators To Confer On the Arts

School superintendents, principals and students in western Massachusetts will take part in a state-sponsored conference on education and the performing arts next Friday and Saturday at Smith College.

W. McNeil Lowry, vice president of the Ford Foundation, will give the keynote address.

Among the projects to be presented will be one by the Cambridge Workshop.

Samuel Hirsch, critic for the Boston Herald Traveler, will join a discussion on the arts in education with Louise Tate, executive secretary of the Massachusetts Council on the Arts; Elma Lewis, director of the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts; David Rockefeller, development co-ordinator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Max Bogart, associate commissioner of the state Department of Education.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 28 1969

BSO grant

A grant in the amount of $180,000 has been made by Audrey Kennedy in memory of her father, Frederick J. Kennedy to fund youth concerts at the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The grant, which extends for three years, will allwo over 5000 children to attend three concerts per year, will and additionally provide for 320 children to spend a week at Tanglewood during the summer for a 'day in the arts' which would also include Jacob's Pillow Dance Festivals and other Berkshire attractions.

At the press conference announcing the grant, Supt. William Ohrenberger expressed his gratitude on behalf of the Boston Public Schools for the valuable effect this grant would have on the city's schoolchildren. Brief remarks were also made by Mayor Kevin White, BSO trustee Talcott Banks, and William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the BSO.

Arts in Schools To Be Theme Of Conference

W. McNeil Lowry, vice president of the Ford Foundation, will be keynote speaker at Smith College in Northampton Friday at a state-sponsored conference on education and the performing arts.

The program, starting Friday at 2 and running until Saturday at 3:30, will be sprinkled with speakers familiar to the Berkshires.

The Pittsfield-centered Berkshire Regional Educational Theatre (BRET) will present one of four Friday evening performances.

Berkshire area educators may obtain more information about the conference by contacting BRET or the Department of Education office at 7 North St.

William Gibson, the Stockbridge playwright; Samuel Hirsch, theatre critic for the Boston Herald Traveler, and David Rockefeller, development coordinator for the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be among the panelists discussing "Why Involve Arts in Education?" Saturday from 10:15 to noon.

One of the Friday night features will be a performance by Betty Jones, a noted dancer, who once studied under Ted Shawn, director of Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival in Lee.

Conference site will be the Smith Center for the Performing Arts.

Topics of Friday afternoon seminars include: "Arts for the Non-College-Bound," "The Performing Artist in the Classroom," "Media and the Arts" and "Financing Arts in the Schools."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 29 1969

112.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
SEP 28 1969

Some sour notes, but not a bad town to work in Philharmonicsville (pop. 106)

By DONAL HENAHAN

The New York Philharmonic is a complex city-state that is 88% married, 98% male, 99% white and 100% well-to-do and well-educated

HEAD MAN—Carlos Moseley, the Philharmonic's managing director, is, in the words of one orchestra member, "unusually sensitive to musicians' problems."

"THE civically supported symphony orchestra is the most conservative institution in the Western world. Churches, even banks, are more open to experiment. The universities are daring by comparison." While that assessment is not quite so true as it was 20 years ago when the composer and critic Virgil Thomson made it, change still comes hard to the symphony orchestra, even in a time when change appears to be its only hope of living (not to be confused with existing).

But even glacial change is change, and when the 127-year-old New York Philharmonic comes onstage these days at Philharmonic Hall in the opening weeks of its 1969-70 season, it is not quite the same orchestra that walked off last spring. Most important, it has lost Leonard Bernstein as musical director and it faces a two-year interregnum before Pierre Boulez, the heir-designate, takes office.

The Philharmonic's musicians also are listening to themselves in an extensively rebuilt, acoustically remodeled Philharmonic Hall that may require certain changes in ensemble balances, and in the nuances of voicing and registration that distinguish the thoroughbred orchestra from the also-ran. However, after three years of trying to live with Philharmonic Hall's recurrent renovations, that sort of musical adjustment comes relatively easy to the Philharmonic by now.

More difficult for the organization to handle may be an embarrassing

DONAL HENAHAN is a music critic on the staff of The Times.

FIRST LADY—Orin O'Brien, a 34-year-old double bassist, was the first regular woman member of the Philharmonic. "I frankly feel," she says, "we girls are doing pretty dam well. I don't feel there's any war going on."

PERSONNEL MAN—James Chambers, who played solo horn until his recent promotion to personnel manager, says the Philharmonic's members are paid a minimum of $270 for "20 hard, concentrated, tense hours" a week.

MUSIC MAN—David Nadien, the concertmaster, bristles at the suggestion that the orchestra is dying: " . . . real music can only be made by live people. Saying the orchestra is dying is like saying the human is dying."

BLACK MAN—W. Sanford Allen, a second violinist, calls himself "the Philharmonic's Negro." Though his hiring in 1962 was seen as a breakthrough, two rejected black applicants have filed charges of discrimination.

112.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

SEP 28 1969

The New York Times Magazine

SEPTEMBER 28, 1969

What Spaniards Say When They Think Aloud

About life, death, politics, religion, art and themselves

By RICHARD EDER

THE unraveling reign of General Franco is a crusty, time-darkened bandage on the damage Spain did herself in the Civil War. The Spanish tell themselves that the wound is healed, and they more or less believe it, but they make no move to remove the bandage and they are apprehensive about what they will see when it falls off by itself.

In recent years they have explored more and more extensively the questions they will soon have to face fully. What is useful about the system that has come down to them and what must be replaced? What mixture of freedom and discipline do they require? What form of economic organization should they have? Are they part of Europe or some kind of Third-World bridgehead on the European Continent? How much of the rhetoric about their own peculiarities, complications and intractabilities is valid and how much is a truism, retained because there has been so little opportunity to examine it?

There is no true freedom of speech in Spain today, but there is virtually full freedom to think aloud. The noise is deafening. Little, if anything, is taboo to private discussion in the widest sense: at a dinner table (not necessarily of friends), at a students' meeting, and in those books and journals whose style and scope exclude them from wide circulation.

Yet private discussion is not public discussion. What everyone, from Cabinet ministers to Socialists (sometimes in the same drawing room), tells the other can, if necessary, be held by any of those present not to have been said. This, of course, is of immense significance because as long as the views that circulate in Spain do not become fully public they and their expounders are not tested either in action or reaction.

For this reason, when a wealthy Spanish tanner with a dilettantish vocation for philosophy and journalism visited two dozen prominent Spaniards early this year, got them to talk about the country's problems on his tape recorder, and published the dialogues in a book, racial discrimination case in which it finds itself embroiled. Complaints filed with the city's Commission on Human Rights this summer by two black musicians—each rejected several times in auditions—have opened a full public investigation of the Philharmonic's hiring practices, its administrative make-up and closely guarded salary secrets. Before the hearings were a day old last July it appeared evident that the Philharmonic that emerged from the discrimination case would be shaken, if not moved, by the experience.

(Continued on Page 118)

RICHARD EDER is The Times correspondent in Spain.

BUT change and the threat of change bring out the best and the worst in any political group. And the Philharmonic is a political group, a complex little city-state that one of its keener internal observers characterizes as "a small town." Philharmonicsville, N. Y. (pop. 106; principal industry, classical music) is, in fact, the paradigmatic small town, with its gossips and idealists, its clubs and cliques, its precinct captains and its activists, its joiners and its fence-sitters, its cranks and village wits.

Demographically, it is an odd town, perhaps: 88.68 per cent of its residents are married; 100 per cent have college degrees or the equivalent; the age range is 22 to 65 (average age, 52); 99.1 per cent are white; 98.02 per cent are male. Eighty-three of the members were born in the United States (more than half of those in New York City), and only four are natives of Southern states (two from Texas, one each from Maryland and Tennessee). Eight are

(Continued on Page 133)

MUSIC MAN—David Nadien, the concertmaster, bristles at the suggestion that the orchestra is dying: " . . . real music can only be made by live people. Saying the orchestra is dying is like saying the human is dying."

BLACK MAN—W. Sanford Allen, a second violinist, calls himself "the Philharmonic's Negro." Though his hiring in 1962 was seen as a breakthrough, two rejected black applicants have filed charges of discrimination.

Philharmonicsville

(Continued from Page 27)

from Pennsylvania, five from Poland, six from New Jersey, four from Ohio, three from Austria. Joseph Bernstein, second assistant concertmaster, was born in Bessarabia; Paul Clement, a cellist, in Belgium. Carlos Piantini, a violinist, is from the Dominican Republic, and Carlo Renzulli, also a violinist, is of Italian birth.

However, despite its cosmopolitan cast, Philharmonicsville is more nearly homogeneous than any modern town. Like all great orchestras and small towns, it is inbred and sometimes contemptuous of outside opinion. To consult with a Philharmonic musician about the music of the last 20 years can be like listening to a mandarin's opinion of the barbarians who live beyond the Great Wall.

Without anyone's willing it, an orchestra bends to its common purpose (some would say flattens) all the diverse human types that enter it. There comes to be a recognizable symphony orchestra personality, an orchestra level of talent, an orchestra temperament. Like any walled city, the orchestra demands of its inhabitants submission to authority and unquestioning response to a leader. Not that the demands are invariably met, of course, humans being humans.

Paul Hindemith, the composer who himself did much successful conducting late in life, advanced the seriocomic theory that the modern orchestra with its heroic conductor exists largely to gratify the baser instincts of its audience: to the concert-going public "the display of overt despotism, the demonstration of some refined and stylized form of oppression seems to be imperative." Orchestra men, he observed, live under a system that subjects them to "a man who with the consent of human society exercises a power which we would look upon as cruelty if we saw it applied to dogs or horses."

IT is no wonder then that every orchestra, squirming under the system's inherent tyranny, contains its share of men constantly plotting to escape over the wall. Some want, in fact, to escape into conducting, and do. Among the Philharmonic's baton-wielding hopefuls are Larry Newland, a violist, and Carlos Piantini. The latter, a 12-year veteran of the orchestra, led his Philharmonic colleagues (under another, free-lancing, name) in a highly acclaimed performance of Verdi's Requiem at Philharmonic Hall. Such an experience could make an orchestra man look rather sharply at the efforts of a visiting star of the podium.

Most Philharmonic musicians these days, however, seem reasonably content with the system. And why not? This season, in the third year of a three-year contract, the Philharmonic will pay its lowliest member a minimum of $270 a week plus a $1,000 yearly guarantee against recordings. Since the orchestra now is employed 52 weeks a year, including a six-week vacation this season, that means no man earns less than $15,040, and under a gradation system spelled out in the union contract, many are paid up to $40 a week more than the minimum. Pay scales of first-desk men and section leaders (who often must play solo parts) are closely held secrets, but the cream of orchestral soloists in American orchestras is reputed to earn $40,000 and more.

To meet the players' payroll and manifold other expenses, the Philharmonic annually must raise about $3.7-million, and it must budget a net deficit of about $750,000. Ticket sales, record revenues and television fees cover some 80 per cent of the total cost, an unusually high income-to-cost ratio for an American orchestra. There is no doubt that Leonard Bernstein's presence fattened the ratio considerably, and his successor is certain to be evaluated partly against that 80 per cent figure.

In the next contract round, the Philharmonic musicians' financial picture (if not the management's) is soft-drawling North Carolinian, points out that as many as 80 musicians from all over the nation have been auditioned for a single vacant Philharmonic position. Players are alerted to openings by memos to leading music schools and advertisements placed in union and other professional music publications. Since Moseley took over, he says, the N.A.A.C.P. and CORE have been notified as well.

LOCAL BOY—Frank Gullino, assistant concertmaster, represents a Philharmonic trend: New York natives have largely supplanted European musicians.

Customarily, though not invariably, Moseley says, he sits in on auditions along with the personnel manager and a floating committee of front-desk players and other trusted musicians. He stresses the ad hoc nature of the audition panel and the unstructured quality of the whole audition process.

The Philharmonic does not select its new musicians through screened auditions, which the Boston Symphony not long ago initiated for some preliminary tryouts. Moseley believes that any screening of identity would be useless (the judges could fix the contest by asking the desired winners to tip off who they were by playing prearranged signals while tuning up, for instance). Besides, he says, seeing a candidate on an open stage gives judges the chance to make important visual observations about a man's musicianship and to help analyze his weaknesses. The screen test was tried once briefly before he became manager, "perhaps eight or ten years ago," and abandoned.

This summer, perhaps coincidentally with its new system, the Boston Symphony added a Negro harpist to its roster ("rather hurriedly," comments a Philharmonic cynic). Among the other "Big Five" American orchestras (New York, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Philadelphia) there is only one other Negro regular, a cellist with Cleveland.

SANFORD ALLEN, the Philharmonic's Negro—he refers to himself that way with cool irony—says he is particularly puzzled by the failure of the Philharmonic to engage qualified Negroes as substitutes. "I can remember maybe one or two in the last few years. Elaine Jones, a flutist, was called as a sub, I remember—for a Martin Luther King memorial concert. And maybe one other." He contends the American symphony orchestra is "definitely segregationist by instinct," and he is tired of being pointed out as a "glorious example of the Philharmonic's enlightenment." As to the machinery that may exist for auditioning for better places in the orchestra, Allen ishing selection of Boulez, self-confessed apostle of avant-gardism. Mostly, however, it is Amyas Ames, tall, patrician, easy-mannered and radiating well-heeled gentility, who either makes the decisions these days or takes responsibility for them.

Something of the good-school tone permeates other levels of the administration, too. Albert Knickerbocker Webster, another Harvard man, is an assistant manager remarkable for modesty. Carlos Moseley, even when he is dispensing hard facts or parrying nasty innuendoes in a civil-rights hearing, looks over his reading glasses professorially and speaks with an amiably confused air. The Philharmonic's press director, Frank Milburn, a onetime piano student of Walter Gieseking, works without bluster or aggressiveness, and habitually talks so quietly that one must step close to catch his words.

From top to bottom, the Philharmonic administration gives off an old-family, savings-bank, Bigelow-on-the-floor aura. Occasionally, Bernstein stepped outside the institutional framework for a breath of fresh air during his time within the Walled City, but his mild raffishness could be forgiven. He was, after all, a Harvard man, and a member, if an adopted one, of the Establishment. At any rate, it will be recorded that it was during his regime that the Philharmonic bent to the point of hiring a Negro. And an outsider must take Bernstein's word for it that he never found another worthy of the Philharmonic in spite of much sympathetic searching and auditioning.

ONLY a few skeptical members of the orchestra find serious fault with the current system of selection. Sanford Allen says that in such a vaguely defined situation "nobody is responsible for anything—the buck isn't just passed, it disappears." He calls it a "shell game, essentially."

Most of its members, though, feel not a whole lot is really wrong with the Philharmonic. No job is ideal, of course, and if they had their way the musicians would arrange working conditions, for instance, so they would not have to arrive back in New York from an out-of-town concert after midnight and then have to rehearse or play the next morning, or dress four to a trailer while on tour. The wages and the pensions could be higher. Some militants would like a clear say in selecting guest and permanent conductors. But, even though changes—particularly of the latter, more radical, sort—are not likely to come overnight, changes in the Philharmonic do come. They may crawl, but they come.

Orin O'Brien, who is 34, pretty and single, joined the orchestra in 1966 as its first woman regular (she was recently followed by cellist Evangeline Benedetti). To Miss O'Brien the Philharmonic management seems "unusually sensitive to the musicians' problems — Moseley was a pianist, after all." And she believes that all sorts of discrimination are "fading fast" in the orchestra. "I frankly feel we girls are doing pretty darn well. I don't feel there is any war going on."

Miss O'Brien teaches, and this term has eight students at the Manhattan School of Music, where she recently was appointed to the faculty. Like many Philharmonic regulars, she lives within an easy stroll of Lincoln Center, in a three-room West Side apartment. "That makes it nice for a double-bass player. You just stick a wheel under it and roll it to work."

Miss O'Brien keeps four double basses at the moment, three at home ("There's none in the bathroom, which is nice") and one at Philhar-

Philharmonicsville

(Continued from Page 27)

from Pennsylvania, five from Poland, six from New Jersey, four from Ohio, three from Austria. Joseph Bernstein, second assistant concertmaster, was born in Bessarabia; Paul Clement, a cellist, in Belgium. Carlos Piantini, a violinist, is from the Dominican Republic, and Carlo Renzulli, also a violinist, is of Italian birth.

However, despite its cosmopolitan cast, Philharmonicsville is more nearly homogeneous than any modern town. Like all great orchestras and small towns, it is inbred and sometimes contemptuous of outside opinion. To consult with a Philharmonic musician about the music of the last 20 years can be like listening to a mandarin's opinion of the barbarians who live beyond the Great Wall.

Without anyone's willing it, an orchestra bends to its common purpose (some would say flattens) all the diverse human types that enter it. There comes to be a recognizable symphony orchestra personality, an orchestra level of talent, an orchestra temperament. Like any walled city, the orchestra demands of its inhabitants submission to authority and unquestioning response to a leader. Not that the demands are invariably met, of course, humans being humans.

Paul Hindemith, the composer who himself did much successful conducting late in life, advanced the seriocomic theory that the modern orchestra with its heroic conductor exists largely to gratify the baser instincts of its audience: to the concert-going public "the display of overt despotism, the demonstration of some refined and stylized form of oppression seems to be imperative." Orchestra men, he observed, live under a system that subjects them to "a man who with the consent of human society exercises a power which we would look upon as cruelty if we saw it applied to dogs or horses."

It is no wonder then that every orchestra, squirming under the system's inherent tyranny, contains its share of men constantly plotting to escape over the wall. Some want, in fact, to escape into conducting, and do. Among the Philharmonic's baton-wielding hopefuls are Larry Newland, a violist, and Carlos Piantini. The latter, a 12-year veteran of the orchestra, led his Philharmonic colleagues (under another, free-lancing, name) in a highly acclaimed performance of Verdi's Requiem at Philharmonic Hall. Such an experience could make an orchestra man look rather sharply at the efforts of a visiting star of the podium.

Most Philharmonic musicians these days, however, seem reasonably content with the system. And why not? This season, in the third year of a three-year contract, the Philharmonic will pay its lowliest member a minimum of $270 a week plus a $1,000 yearly guarantee against recordings. Since the orchestra now is employed 52 weeks a year, including a six-week vacation this season, that means no man earns less than $15,040, and under a gradation system spelled out in the union contract, many are paid up to $40 a week more than the minimum. Pay scales of first-desk men and section leaders (who often must play solo parts) are closely held secrets, but the cream of orchestral soloists in American orchestras is reputed to earn $40,000 and more.

To meet the players' payroll and manifold other expenses, the Philharmonic annually must raise about $3.7-million, and it must budget a net deficit of about $750,000. Ticket sales, record revenues and television fees cover some 80 per cent of the total cost, an unusually high income-to-cost ratio for an American orchestra. There is no doubt that Leonard Bernstein's presence fattened the ratio considerably, and his successor is certain to be evaluated partly against that 80 per cent figure.

In the next contract round, the Philharmonic musicians' financial picture (if not the management's) is likely to brighten even more. Recently, the Philadelphia Orchestra went past New York with a contract that guarantees an annual income of $16,040, rising to $17,080 in three years (including a $2,000 annual recording guarantee).

To a day laborer, or a small-town physician, the hours might look good, too: Under their contract (Local 802, American Federation of Musicians) the men play eight "services" a week, "service" being a flexible term meaning either a concert (two to two and a half hours, usually) or a rehearsal (two and a half hours). James Chambers, the orchestra's new personnel manager, who had been the solo horn since joining the Philharmonic in 1946, says "about 80 per cent" of the musicians also find time to do some teaching.

During the season, a Philharmonic

soft-drawling North Carolinian, points out that as many as 80 musicians from all over the nation have been auditioned for a single vacant Philharmonic position. Players are alerted to openings by memos to leading music schools and advertisements placed in union and other professional music publications. Since Moseley took over, he says, the N.A.A.C.P. and CORE have been notified as well.

Customarily, though not invariably, Moseley says, he sits in on auditions along with the personnel manager and a floating committee of front-desk players and other trusted musicians. He stresses the ad hoc nature of the audition panel and the unstructured quality of the whole audition process.

The Philharmonic does not select its new musicians through screened auditions, which the Boston Symphony not long ago initiated for some preliminary tryouts. Moseley believes that any screening of identity would be useless (the judges could fix the contest by asking the desired winners to tip off who they were by playing prearranged signals while tuning up, for instance). Besides, he says, seeing a candidate on an open stage gives judges the chance to make important visual observations about a man's musicianship and to help analyze his weaknesses. The screen test was tried once briefly before he became manager, "perhaps eight or ten years ago," and abandoned.

This summer, perhaps coincidentally with its new system, the Boston Symphony added a Negro harpist to its roster ("rather hurriedly," comments a Philharmonic cynic). Among the other "Big Five" American orchestras (New York, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Philadelphia) there is only one other Negro regular, a cellist with Cleveland.

Sanford Allen, the Philharmonic's Negro—he refers to himself that way with cool irony—says he is particularly puzzled by the failure of the Philharmonic to engage qualified Negroes as substitutes. "I can remember maybe one or two in the last few years. Elaine Jones, a flutist, was called as a sub, I remember—for a Martin Luther King memorial concert. And maybe one other." He contends the American symphony orchestra is "definitely segregationist by instinct," and he is tired of being pointed out as a "glorious example of the Philharmonic's enlightenment." As to the machinery that may exist for auditioning for better places in the orchestra, Allen monic Hall. She came to the Philharmonic after 10 years with the New York City Ballet orchestra and opera experience as a substitute at the Metropolitan. "I enjoyed doing opera, although it's harder than symphony work" (opera hours are far more taxing; for instance, a performance of "Die Götterdämmerung" may stretch over five hours, or twice the average symphony concert length). "I also liked doing free-lance—you meet so many interesting men—and playing in small ensembles."

Miss O'Brien is happy about the Boulez appointment because, among other things, he likes to break up an orchestra into smaller units for chamber-sized works. "Right now the use of the symphony orchestra is not as exciting as it could be. Lennie did a lot, of course, a lot of new things. I enjoyed Lennie so much. Everything he did, he made you like it. Never a dull moment." But Bernstein's stepping down as head of the orchestra, she says, has started the musicians worrying about their financial future: "The first thing the orchestra felt when it heard Lennie was leaving was, there goes the recording work."

David Nadien, who is starting his fourth season with the Philharmonic, is another who can walk to work. Formerly he made an excellent living as a free-lance musician, but now he insists there is no time for anything but orchestra work and "a little private teaching."

His schedule includes 10 to 15 "very advanced" students ("About 18 hours a week, maybe—I don't punch clocks with students"), as well as three or four hours a day of working out on his instrument to stay in shape—"perhaps more if I have a concerto appearance coming up." As concertmaster, he says, his responsibility "is threefold that of anyone else in the orchestra." Nadien, married and 43 years old, is one of the few players hired in recent years who did not go through a Philharmonic audition. "I didn't exactly audition. Bernstein knew of me, and said he wished to hear me, so I played for him privately."

Like an increasing number of Philharmonic musicians, Nadien is a native New Yorker (born in Brooklyn, as were such other first-chair men as Stanley Drucker, the clarinetist, and William Lincer, the violist). The Philharmonic is now, in fact as well as name, a New York institution, with 43 natives on the current roster.

Historically, it had a long period of Germanic influence, when conductors such as Gustav Mahler, Adolf Neuendorff and Anton Seidl were in charge. After the merger of the New York Philharmonic with the New York Symphony in 1928, there came an Italian period, from the appointment of Toscanini to his resignation in 1936. The influence of Toscanini, in par-soft-drawling North Carolinian, points out that as many as 80 musicians from all over the nation have been auditioned for a single vacant Philharmonic position. Players are alerted to openings by memos to leading music schools and advertisements placed in union and other professional music publications. Since Moseley took over, he says, the N.A.A.C.P. and CORE have been notified as well.

Customarily, though not invariably, Moseley says, he sits in on auditions along with the personnel manager and a floating committee of front-desk players and other trusted musicians. He stresses the ad hoc nature of the audition panel and the unstructured quality of the whole audition process.

The Philharmonic does not select its new musicians through screened auditions, which the Boston Symphony not long ago initiated for some preliminary tryouts. Moseley believes that any screening of identity would be useless (the judges could fix the contest by asking the desired winners to tip off who they were by playing prearranged signals while tuning up, for instance). Besides, he says, seeing a candidate on an open stage gives judges the chance to make important visual observations about a man's musicianship and to help analyze his weaknesses. The screen test was tried once briefly before he became manager, "perhaps eight or ten years ago," and abandoned.

This summer, perhaps coincidentally with its new system, the Boston Symphony added a Negro harpist to its roster ("rather hurriedly," comments a Philharmonic cynic). Among the other "Big Five" American orchestras (New York, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Philadelphia) there is only one other Negro regular, a cellist with Cleveland.

SANFORD ALLEN, the Philharmonic's Negro—he refers to himself that way with cool irony—says he is particularly puzzled by the failure of the Philharmonic to engage qualified Negroes as substitutes. "I can remember maybe one or two in the last few years. Elaine Jones, a flutist, was called as a sub, I remember—for a Martin Luther King memorial concert. And maybe one other." He contends the American symphony orchestra is "definitely segregationist by instinct," and he is tired of being pointed out as a "glorious example of the Philharmonic's enlightenment." As to the machinery that may exist for auditioning for better places in the orchestra, Allen man's typical orchestral week looks like this:

MONDAY—Rehearsal, 10 to 12:30; concert at 7:30.

TUESDAY—Day off unless there is a recording session.

WEDNESDAY—Rehearsals, 10 to 12:30 and 1:30 to 4:00.

THURSDAY—Pay day (checks given out at morning rehearsal); rehearsal, 10 to 12:30, with possibility of up to a half hour of overtime if program needs it; concert, 8:30.

FRIDAY—Morning free unless there is a Young People's concert; concert, 2.

SATURDAY—Morning free unless there is children's concert or rehearsal for pop program; concert, 8:30.

SUNDAY—Day off (this is inviolate).

That adds up to 20 hours a week at most, says Chambers, "but they are 20 hard, concentrated, tense hours."

The 48-year-old Chambers is generally regarded in the orchestra as "one of the new school" of personnel managers, and some musicians hope he can help break outdated but ingrained practices. As liaison between men and management, and as the administrator who hires all substitutes, sits on many audition panels, and mediates all union problems, the personnel manager is one of the most powerful figures in an orchestra. Even though he is constantly "between two cymbals," in Chambers's words he could be a potent force for change. "However, he didn't get to be personnel manager by rocking any boats," comments one musician wryly.

IN recent years, too few waves have been created at any level in the organization, in the view of many minority-rights defenders. There is at the moment one black man among the Philharmonic's regular 106 players, a 30-year-old second violinist named W. Sanford Allen, and two women, Orin O'Brien, double bass, and Evangeline Benedetti, cellist. The hiring of Allen in 1962 was greeted at the time as a breakthrough of Jackie Robinsonish significance, but no further black additions have been forthcoming. Allen himself, a Juilliard graduate, has remained cemented to a seat deep in the second violins at minimum pay.

The rejection of subsequent black applicants is the point of controversy in the discrimination complaint against the Philharmonic by Earl Madison, a cellist, and J. Arthur Davis, a double bass player.

Carlos Du Pré Moseley, the Philharmonic's managing director, spent two days in the witness chair outlining auditioning procedures and hiring philosophies (in essence, that the best men win, regardless of color, creed or other extramusical considerations), while the man with the ultimate say in hiring orchestra men, the musical director, never got the chance to tell how he disposes of the cases in dispute. Moseley, He's only 3¼" x 4" and ½" thic ...loaded!

LET OUR SKINNY ELEPHANT TAK THAT LUMP OUT OF YOUR SUIT Our famous soft, supple, luxurio Genuine Elephant leather, superb fashioned into the slimmest wall imaginable! Slipout, flip-thru cardcas organizes your credit cards, photo documents sensibly in 12 window Money clip secures cash compactl Two pockets for business cards. Black only. $14.95 add 75¢ pos

Satisfaction Guaranteed
N.Y. Residents Add Tax
Visit Our SAFARILAND™ Shop or Write For Free 76-PAGE CATALOG

HUNTING WORLD
Dept. TM
247 E. 50 St., New York 10022

LOCAL BOY—Frank Gullino, assistant concertmaster, represents a Philharmonic trend: New York natives have largely supplanted European musicians.

ishing selection of Boulez, self-confessed apostle of avant-gardism. Mostly, however, it is Amyas Ames, tall, patrician, easy-mannered and radiating well-heeled gentility, who either makes the decisions these days or takes responsibility for them.

Something of the good-school tone permeates other levels of the administration, too. Albert Knickerbocker Webster, another Harvard man, is an assistant manager remarkable for modesty. Carlos Moseley, even when he is dispensing hard facts or parrying nasty innuendoes in a civil-rights hearing, looks over his reading glasses professorially and speaks with an amiably confused air. The Philharmonic's press director, Frank Milburn, a onetime piano student of Walter Gieseking, works without bluster or aggressiveness, and habitually talks so quietly that one must step close to catch his words.

From top to bottom, the Philharmonic administration gives off an old-family, savings-bank, Bigelow-on-the-floor aura. Occasionally, Bernstein stepped outside the institutional framework for a breath of fresh air during his time within the Walled City, but his mild raffishness could be forgiven. He was, after all, a Harvard man, and a member, if an adopted one, of the Establishment. At any rate, it will be recorded that it was during his regime that the Philharmonic bent to the point of hiring a Negro. And an outsider must take Bernstein's word for it that he never found another worthy of the Philharmonic in spite of much sympathetic searching and auditioning.

ONLY a few skeptical members of the orchestra find serious fault with the current system of selection. Sanford Allen says that in such a vaguely defined situation "nobody is responsible for anything—the buck isn't just passed, it disappears." He calls it a "shell game, essentially."

Most of its members, though, feel not a whole lot is really wrong with the Philharmonic. No job is ideal, of course, and if they had their way the musicians would arrange working conditions, for instance, so they would not have to arrive back in New York from an out-of-town concert after midnight and then have to rehearse or play the next morning, or dress four to a trailer while on tour. The wages and the pensions could be higher. Some militants would like a clear say in selecting guest and permanent conductors. But, even though changes—particularly of the latter, more radical, sort—are not likely to come overnight, changes in the Philharmonic do come. They may crawl, but they come.

Orin O'Brien, who is 34, pretty and single, joined the orchestra in 1966 as its first woman regular (she was recently followed by cellist Evangeline Benedetti). To Miss O'Brien the Philharmonic management seems "unusually sensitive to the musicians' problems — Moseley was a pianist, after all." And she believes that all sorts of discrimination are "fading fast" in the orchestra. "I frankly feel we girls are doing pretty darn well. I don't feel there is any war going on."

Miss O'Brien teaches, and this term has eight students at the Manhattan School of Music, where she recently was appointed to the faculty. Like many Philharmonic regulars, she lives within an easy stroll of Lincoln Center, in a three-room West Side apartment. "That makes it nice for a double-bass player. You just stick a wheel under it and roll it to work."

Miss O'Brien keeps four double basses at the moment, three at home ("There's none in the bathroom, which is nice") and one at Philhar-

114.

← pull out to read then turn over —

66It is the men and women of the Philharmonic themselves who decide on conductorial abilities, and no glamour or publicity will help the poor soul who does not win their confidence.99

bility brought by his popular success

cious that something was wrong. At last, when the more playful members had succeeded in virtually recomposing the score under rehearsal, there came a great thud on the bass drum. The maestro, pushed too far, put down his baton and asked, "Now, who did that?"

A less obvious method of testing a conductor is to have a soloist play his part, say, a third higher than written, and wait for the baton to rap for a halt. In its time, the Philharmonic has used all the orchestra guerrilla's devices, and invented a few itself. To the present writing, the Philharmonic retains, in fact, its reputation as a "tough" orchestra, although that is disputed by its more sensitive players. Proud, yes, and not easy on musical fakers, they protest, but perfectly willing and able to be welded into a great ensemble by an able, serious conductor.

It is the men and women of the Philharmonic themselves, however, who decide on conductorial abilities, and no glamour or publicity will help the poor soul who does not win their confidence. The most recently publicized incident (not necessarily the most recent) came last season when the outspoken Indian maestro, Zubin Mehta, sounded off about the Philharmonic.

Mehta said, or was quoted as saying in a magazine, that he and many other conductors felt the Philharmonic was a graveyard: "A lot of us think, why not send our worst enemy to the New York Philharmonic and finish him off once and for all?" The Philharmonic's truth squad reacted immediately. The brash Indian was forced to appear before the union and apologize, and soon thereafter the management decided that his scheduled debut with the orchestra could be deferred indefinitely. If you call that "tough," all right; the Philharmonic musicians call it being proud.

Staying proud is easier nowadays than it was in the mass-dismissal era of Rodzinski, not to mention earlier times when a Toscanini or a Mahler ruled his orchestra like a Bismarck. Around 1909, the Philharmonic was, in Mahler's view, "a typical American orchestra—untalented and phlegmatic," and he waved aloft constantly the threat of summary dismissal. Dismissals now are so rare that Frank Milburn is not able to recall offhand an instance during his decade with the orchestra. Under the union contract a musician must pass a two-season probation, but getting rid of him after that is harder than getting a dishonest man out of the United States Senate. There must be a long, complicated process involving election of a Dismissal Review Committee of his colleagues; Byzantine interchanges among committee, management and union, and ultimate placing of the dispute before an outside arbitrator whose decision is binding. Moreover, before a man can be let out he must be notified at least by Feb. 15 of the year in question. The day is past when a conductor could stalk into rehearsal after a fight with his wife, point an imperious finger at the solo piccolo and bawl: "You there, Kunstmörder, you're fired! Out!"

The orchestra man's life is more stable now, and it is from those stormier past times that much of the Philharmonic musician's reputation dates. Still, it is a devilish image that survives, one that even the relatively harmonious Bernstein decade has not quite exorcised.

BACK in 1943, Virgil Thomson wrote that the Philharmonic "has had too many riders. It has been whipped and spurred for 40 years by guest conductors and by famous virtuosos with small sense of responsibility about the orchestra's future or about its relation to our community's culture. It has become erratic, temperamental, undependable, and in every way difficult to handle."

Although Leonard Bernstein functioned more as the "famous virtuoso" than as the orchestral good housekeeper during his 10 years, the sta-

(Continued from Page 143)

be overstated, but there is no question that a frustrated orchestra man serving out his time can have his musical instincts ground out of him by the routine of playing tired old pieces or meaningless new ones.

SOME years ago in a Yale lecture the composer Paul Hindemith drew the following picture of a musician condemned to triviality by the modern orchestral system:

"I concentrated on the triangle player. Here he was, a grown-up man, wife and three children waiting for him at home, a man perhaps owning one of the greatest stamp collections in the country and being Exalted Potentate of his shrine; in short, a man of highest social repute. Now he meekly counted his rests and once in a while elicited some tinkles from his triangular treasure basket, an activity which in this case absorbed about as much mental exertion as the unlacing of a shoe, but was backed by five years of conservatory instruction, a bachelor's degree, auditions and victories over competitors. Of course, we know the difference between good and bad triangulists . . . but one refuses to see in the sporadic triangle tinkling the ultimate purpose of a human being's earthly existence."

What Hindemith complains about here, in a rather heavy-handed bit of satire, is the orchestra's tendency to put music into an institutional trance from which musicians themselves are unable or unwilling to break out. Each man is necessarily a cog, and the interworking enterprise can often amount to the sublimest moments that Western art has imagined, but for the cog itself the suspicion that the machine may be running meaninglessly most of the time could squeeze all real music out of him.

It is therefore the next musical director's loftiest mission to keep the symphony orchestra from lapsing into the mumbling institutionalism of most opera houses and other museums; to keep the orchestra and its repertory from turning into a petrified forest.

It may not be possible, of course — the historical cards are not all his to play—but if any musical director can do it, it will be one who remembers what Leonard Bernstein wanted, as much as what he achieved, and who can encourage the Philharmonic's deep musical instincts. If Pierre Boulez is such a man he can not only keep the orchestra alive but write some of the brightest pages in its history. ■

114.

ticular, is still reflected in the roster, which contains a remarkable number of Italian names.

But, as indicated, European-born musicians have been largely supplanted by native New Yorkers. Among soloists alone, there are six New Yorkers, in addition to Nadien, Lincer and Drucker: Frank Gullino, assistant concertmaster; Leopold Rybb, principal second violin; Saul Goodman, timpani; Bert Bial, contrabassoon; Edward Herman Jr., trombone, and Myor Rosen, harp. Outlanders among the soloists include Lorne Monroe, cello, from Winnipeg; Robert Brennand, bass, from England; Englebert Brenner, English horn, from Vienna. Other front-line men come from Philadelphia (Joseph Singer, horn); Portland, Me. (William Vacchiano, trumpet); Cleveland (Julius Baker, flute); Malden, Mass. (Morris Gomberg, oboe); Paterson, N. J. (Stephen Freeman, bass clarinet), and Rochester, N. Y. (Manuel Zegler, bassoon).

MANY Philharmonic members, no matter what their origins, choose an outlander status. Walter Rosenberger, one of the percussion crew, lives in Tenafly, N. J., and gladly commutes. Now 50 years old, he played in the Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner during the forties, and did a few turns with the original Sauter-Finnegan jazz band. "I played as a Philharmonic sub before going into the Army," he says, "and when I got out in 1946 I joined the orchestra without an audition." The Philharmonic is "a pretty nice life now" to Rosenberger, "better than in the old days—although I liked it then, too. What with the seasonal sort of work, you could be off more."

A cheery, scoutmasterly type who heads the percussion department at Mannes College, Rosenberger kids himself as a lawn-tending suburbanite. He is a member in good standing of the orchestra's hearts-playing group and doesn't mind cross-country jet trips because "you can go coast-to-coast now on one hearts game." There also is a strong poker contingent, some pinochlers and some chess nuts. Others in the hearts club are Bert Bial, William Carboni, Morris Lang and Enrico Di Cecco. Bill Carboni also is an instrument builder and repairman, and takes his kit of tools along on tours, just in case. If a tuning pin on a cello sticks or someone drops a violin, Dr. Carboni is there to operate.

Rosenberger confesses he is a plate-passing deacon of his Presbyterian Church in Tenafly ("I don't know if I should mention that—I'll be kidded about it"). "My wife and I are president of the parent-teacher association. They wanted me to be president of the Pony League, too, but I said I couldn't afford the time."

It probably would be difficult to be an enemy of the amiable Walter Rosenberger, and in his view "the orchestra men get along pretty well together." In the percussion department, he says, you had better get along well because there is so much tightly choreographed rushing from instrument to instrument during a performance. "But there's none of that stuff you get in some orchestras, where you run to the xylophone and find somebody has left sticks strewn all over it."

Long-standing feuds, kept alive by the men's necessity of working so closely together that they can hear one another breathe, are not unknown in orchestras. In one Big Five organization, solo clarinet and solo oboe, forced to sit side by side day in and day out, have not spoken to one another in years.

The Philharmonic phalanx, in fact,

GIRL TWO—The Philharmonic's other female member, cellist Evangeline Benedetti. The orchestra, says the author, "bends to its purpose all the diverse types who enter it," producing one recognizable personality.

has traditionally been drawn up not against its own but against outsiders, among whom have been counted not a few famous conductors. When the fiery controversialist Artur Rodzinsky took command of the Philharmonic in 1943, his first move was to fire 14 musicians whom he thought incompetent. Philharmonic tacticians maneuvered adroitly for four years, and finally won. Rodzinsky resigned in 1947.

The weapons available to the orchestra in a feud with a conductor are many and they are mighty. The classic story is about the orchestra (not the Philharmonic, surely) that decided to haze a new conductor during the rehearsal and find out exactly what he knew. Little by little things went awry—a slightly wrong note in the cellos, a drunken glissando by a tuba, notes switched from one instrument to another. The conductor grew increasingly suspibility brought by his popular success and the financial balm that it rubbed over the orchestra's wounds brought the Philharmonic to a better technical and temperamental state than it had enjoyed since Thomson's evaluation 26 years ago. It was to keep matters from reverting to an elder state, no doubt, that the Philharmonic management chose Cleveland's George Szell as its musical adviser for the next two seasons.

66It is the men and women of the Philharmonic themselves who decide on conductorial abilities, and no glamour or publicity will help the poor soul who does not win their confidence.99

The 72-year-old Szell is unrivaled today in the respect he commands among orchestral musicians. Many dislike him enthusiastically, as they hated Fritz Reiner and others of the taut-ship school of conducting, but no player disputes his mastery of the orchestra or his ability to make it sound great in the chrome-plated, hyper-precise style of his own Cleveland Orchestra.

AT the moment, Szell's Clevelanders are accounted by many critics as the "best" American orchestra (whatever "best" may mean in the musical art). The Philharmonic is regarded as a more erratic group, full of superb musicians who can be worked up to an occasional inspired performance. Critics in some European cities, Vienna among them, prefer this, and are repelled by machine-tooled perfection. The Bernstein style emphasized the occasional "wow" performance, in line with Philharmonic tradition, rather than predictable excellence.

To most critics' ears, the Philharmonic has not in recent years developed a characteristic "sound," such as the chamber-music definition and precision of the Cleveland, or the famously opulent string tone of the Philadelphia. (The latter was so palpable and identifiable to Virgil Thompson that in a review he once narrowed its tone color down to "pinky beige.") Today, like the Chicago Symphony since the time of Fritz Reiner, the Philharmonic is a symphonic chameleon, capable of taking on any color or character its conductor—if he is skilled enough—wants it to adopt.

But if the Philharmonic has not an easily identifiable, commercially marketable tonal character to offer, it inherits from the Bernstein decade other and more interesting traits. Under Bernstein the Philharmonic has done as much as or more than any orchestra to keep the priceless Western symphonic tradition alive while many musical institutions either tacitly or openly are accepting museum status.

(Continued on Page 143)

(Continued from Page 141)

The Philharmonic has developed into a band of quick sight-readers, able to put together and perform extremely difficult pieces on short rehearsal. Sometimes a piece by a Stockhausen or a Babbitt strains its abilities (and perhaps some musicians' patience with the avant-garde) past the breaking point, but the amount of new music played by the Philharmonic in the last 10 years is impressive.

THE musicians, at any rate, reject the commonly expressed notion that the symphony orchestra may be a dying dinosaur. "I guess Bernstein said something like that, but Lennie likes to astound people," says one Philharmonic member. "There'll be a Philharmonic long after people have forgotten he said that."

David Nadien gets upset at the very suggestion: "We've done more than our share for new music. No, the orchestra is not dying. An electronic synthesizer is born dead, but real music can only be made by live people. Why, saying the orchestra is dying is like saying the human being is dying."

Nadien believes program-makers should go back to concentrating on "lovely, warm music that sends people home singing," and for him there isn't much of that to be found after Prokofiev, or possibly Shostakovich. Miss O'Brien voices the consensus: "It's ridiculous. The Metropolitan Museum isn't doomed just because it shows old pictures." Like most of the players, she could accept gracefully the orchestra as a repository for great art rather than as a testing ground for novelties, though she also adds: "There is no more expert group than the Philharmonic at the service of today's composer."

Sanford Allen, in the minority here, too, finds much of what the modern symphony orchestra plays to be beside any point. "I've played a lot of rock in recording sessions," he says, "and much of it is closer to reality than the system we are trying to exist under." A concert manager who knows many Philharmonic men contends that even getting off the orchestral treadmill to the extent of playing chamber music is looked on with mistrust: "There's a hostile attitude toward the chamber-music players," and too much tendency to act like plumbers or firemen rather than serious musicians. "Just drop backstage at Philharmonic Hall sometime and see the poker players in action," he snorts. That case may be overstated, but there is no question that a frustrated orchestra man serving out his time can have his musical instincts ground out of him by the routine of playing tiresome old pieces or meaningless new ones.

(Continued on Page 148)

(Continued from Page 143)

SOME years ago in a Yale lecture the composer Paul Hindemith drew the following picture of a musician condemned to triviality by the modern orchestral system:

"I concentrated on the triangle player. Here he was, a grown-up man, wife and three children waiting for him at home, a man perhaps owning one of the greatest stamp collections in the country and being Exalted Potentate of his Shrine; in short, a man of highest social repute. Now he meekly counted his rests and once in a while elicited some tinkles from his triangular bread basket, an activity which in this case absorbed about as much mental exertion as the unlacing of a shoe, but was backed by five years of conservatory instruction, a bachelor's degree, auditions and victories over competitors. Of course, we know the difference between good and bad triangulists . . . but one refuses to see in the sporadic triangle tinkling the ultimate purpose of a human being's earthly existence."

What Hindemith complains about here, in a rather heavy-handed bit of satire, is the orchestra's tendency to put music into an institutional trance from which musicians themselves are unable or unwilling to break out. Each man is necessarily a cog, and the interworking enterprise can often amount to the sublimest moments that Western art has imagined, but for the cog itself the suspicion that the machine may be running meaninglessly most of the time could squeeze all real music out of him.

It is therefore the next musical director's loftiest mission to keep the symphony orchestra from lapsing into the mumbling institutionalism of most opera houses and other museums; to keep the orchestra and its repertory from turning into a petrified forest. It may not be possible, of course—the historical cards are not all his to play—but if any musical director can do it, it will be one who remembers what Leonard Bernstein wanted, as much as what he achieved, and who can encourage the Philharmonic's deep musical instincts. If Pierre Boulez is such a man he can not only keep the orchestra alive but write some of the brightest pages in its history. ■

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

ORCHESTRAS EN ROUTE

Major U.S. orchestras will spend much time on the road this Beethoven Centennial season. Here is a bird's-eye view of their whereabouts and their program highlights, along with a glance at foreign visitors.

BALTIMORE SYMPHONY, in first season under new music director Sergiu Comissiona, swings through six states in early March: Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island. . . . Back home on March 18, Comissiona conducts premiere of first work ever commissioned by the Symphony, by Roger Sessions. Will repeat new work at concert in New York. . . . Beethoven Two-Hundredth Anniversary marked by one all-Beethoven program and several single Beethoven works including the Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern, Second Symphony under Leopold Stokowski, Egmont Incidental Music under Brian Priestman.

BOSTON SYMPHONY's first season under direction of William Steinberg centers out-of-town activities in Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Washington, D.C. . . . In addition, special concert at University of Virginia on October 20 celebrates University's 150th anniversary, and a concert at Baltimore Lyric Theatre commemorates Theatre's 75th anniversary, which the Boston Symphony opened in 1894. . . . In March, five non-subscription concerts devoted to Beethoven: Rudolf Serkin plays the five piano concertos, Isaac Stern the Violin Concerto, Steinberg conducts several symphonies and the Missa Solemnis.

CHICAGO SYMPHONY's seventy-ninth season opened last month under new music director Georg Solti. . . . Will make short tour in early January under Solti to Toledo, New York City, Bloomington. At home, new guest conductors include Bruno Moderna, Georg Semkow, Charles Mackerras, Eliahu Inbal. . . . Principal guest conductor Carlo Maria Giulini salutes Beethoven with Missa Solemnis, Solti with the Ninth Symphony and concert version of Fidelio.

CINCINNATI SYMPHONY's seventy-fifth anniversary season marked by major renovation and redecoration ($3,800,000-worth) of Music Hall. . . . Last season with Max Rudolf as music director (next in line, Thomas Schippers). . . . Cincinnati May Festival features world premiere of commissioned work by Wilfred Josephs, Mortales. . . . Orchestra's most recent tour took place last June, to major European cities.

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA plans three full-scale tours. . . . In February to major centers on the East Coast—New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Boston, Washington, D.C., all led by George Szell. . . . March dates in New York State, Vermont, Canada will have Pierre Boulez guest-conducting, programs to include Mahler Fifth Symphony. . . . Three-week tour in May covers West Coast, Japan, Korea. Boulez conducts three programs, Szell the remainder.

DALLAS SYMPHONY spends two weeks in April touring the South and Midwest, with engagements in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Kansas, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. Donald Johanos conducts, David Bar-Illan serves as piano soloist.

MUSIC

Concerts and Recitals

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

Thursday evening, Oct. 2, at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in performances of Beethoven, Overture to "The Consecration of the House," Op. 124; Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C; Webern, Six pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6; and Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 3, at 2; Saturday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:30; Tuesday evening, Oct. 7, at 8:30; and Tuesday evening, Oct. 14, at 7:30. Conducted by William Steinberg, the orchestra will play: Haydn, Symphony No. 55 in E flat, "Schoolmaster"; Starer, Concerto for Violin, Cello, and Orchestra; Elgar, Symphony No. 2 in E flat, Op. 63. Solo performers will be Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, at 2; Saturday evening, Oct. 11, at 8:30; and Tuesday evening, Oct. 28, at 8:30. Assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the orchestra in Haydn, Symphony No. 98 in B flat; Ives, Three Places in New England; Stravinsky, Variations (Aldous Huxley, in Memoriam); Tchaikovsky, Overture-Fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Friday afternoon, Oct. 17 at 2; and Saturday evening, Oct. 18, at 8:30. Music director William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Lees, Symphony No. 2; Mozart, Piano Concerto in C minor, K. 491; Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73. Guest pianist will be Robert Casadesus.

Thursday evening, Oct. 30, at 7:30, Open Rehearsal.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 31 at 2; and Saturday evening, Nov. 1, at 8:30. Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct the orchestra in Bonporti, Concerto Grosso in D; Schubert, Symphony No. 4 in C minor, "Tragic"; Pizzetti, Prelude to "Fedra"; and Mussorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Concerts at the Gardner Museum, 2 Palace Rd., 566-1401. Concerts will be presented by guest artists af-

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Music Director

Symphony Hall

October 2, 3, 4, 7, 14
William Steinberg

October 10, 11
Michael Tilson Thomas

October 17, 18
William Steinberg
Robert Casadesus pianist

October 28
Michael Tilson Thomas

October 31 - November 1
Carlo Mario Giulini

A limited number of tickets is available for each concert. Rush seats are available for all Friday and Saturday concerts, two hours before each concert. Rush seats are $1.

For information, 266-1492

Baldwin piano • RCA Records

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,000

OCT 1 1969

175

BSO for Season '69 - '70

by Ralph Locke

This is an adventuresome year for Symphony-goers. Not only will we have a new Music Director - William Steinberg - to fill the post vacated by Erich Leinsdorf, but seven guest conductors will be giving of their talents at various times throughout the season. Even though Steinberg is retaining his position with the Pittsburgh Symphony, he will still be free to conduct twelve of the twenty-four weekend programs here, as well as a similar proportion of the weekday series.

To fill in the gaps in the season, the orchestra has invited five of the most talented young conductors to share the rest of the season with former conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra's new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. Perhaps the best feature of the year's schedule is that the guest conductors - with the exception of Thomas and New England Conservatory President Gunther Schuller, who will each be responsible for only one concert - will conduct all the concerts over a two-week period. This should hopefully give the individual conductors a chance to develop the kind of relationship with the orchestra that is rare in this day of city-hopping guest-conductors.

The great variety of works this season is to a great extent the contribution of these guest conductors. Not content to perform solely standard repertory works, they are presenting scores which are their own favorites and which are not normally heard outside of their native countries. Carlo Maria Giulini, for example, is alternating the usual Haydn, Brahms, and Mussorgsky ("Pictures at an Exhibition") with music of Bonporti, Pizzetti and Casella. Seiji Ozawa will augment Orff ("Carmina Burana") and Stravinsky with Takemitsu's "November Steps No. 1." Claudio Abbado will present a work by Donatoni, and Colin Davis will conduct symphonies of Elgar and Tippett. And Gunther Schuller will present a work (to be announced) by the American Composer Gunther Schuller.

The surprises of the season, however, do not all come from the young guests. Veteran conductor Steinberg has programmed some quite unusual works by modern composers - from Robert Starer, Ernst Toch, and Nicolai Lopatkinoff to native Americans Benjamin Lees and Samuel Barger, Sinigaglia, and Bostonians Gardner Read (B.U.) and Seymour Shifrin (Brandeis).

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 1 1969

A tougher league

As though in a revolving door, one conductor named William Steinberg came to town last week while another, Dick Williams, was leaving. They would have been neighbors in the Back Bay, Steinberg running the outfit at Symphony and Williams the group at Fenway Park.

It's too bad they didn't get to know one another because they could have compared experiences and consoled one another on life in a rough critical town. If Williams were still around, Steinberg would be saying to him: "My God, Dick, they didn't get on you your first opening day, did they? Have you read these papers?"

And Williams would reply, "writers are all cement-heads. Don't read that garbage, Bill. But I do sympathize. Nobody knocked me after my first game as manager. You're in a tough league."

Tougher than a baseball league. Even as Steinberg came to bat Friday—for his initial debut, as they say in boxing—the critics were poised to dessect and analyze his first swing. His baton cut through the air, and already they were cutting up the conductor in their notes.

None of the sporting critics suggested that Dick Williams' ensemble was unharmonic until the second year of his term. But here was Steinberg, caught immediately with his vivace down. Steinberg has to manage 106 artists while a baseball manager is concerned with only 25. Musicians are nearly as high strung as ballplayers, and can be problem children, too. When the Boston Symphony got rid of Steinberg's predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf, several of the players said that Leinsdorf couldn't deal with them as human beings. Numerous Red Sox said the same thing about Dick Williams. Maybe they got their speeches from the symphony guys.

Although standings and statistics aren't kept in the symphonic league, and the B.S.O. sells out every performance, the critics can hit the conductor elsewhere. If a manager runs a bad game but still wins, his peccadillos may be forgotten. But if the orchestra is a beat slower than last year or a violinist blows a cadenza, the conductor is in trouble.

William Steinberg was welcomed to his new job by Mayor White at a civic reception. It was nice to know the mayor was with him, but the new boy kept looking over his shoulder for the man who might not be—the other Steinberg. William Steinberg knew he wouldn't sense the tempo of place until he butted musicological heads with Mike Steinberg, the Globe critic.

Is there room in Boston for two Steinbergs? Del Baker, the old Red Sox coach, used to have a profound answer for such questions: "time will tell—it always has."

Mike Steinberg knows more about music and musicflesh than Jim Fitzsimmons knew about racing and horseflesh. He can sense when a baritone should be put out to stud, when a cellist has lost her grip and a trombonist his lip, and when a conductor's herd has pulled up lame.

After last Friday's opener, he wrote that the B.S.O. was "soggy . . . undistinguished . . . slow . . . heavy." He sounded like a fight writer describing Sonny Liston against Cassius Muhammad Ali Clay. Later he chided the B.S.O. on not getting up to date sufficiently in repertory. He deplored the hauling out of "Till Eulenspiegel" for opening day. Certainly that was like digging up Smokey Joe Wood, who is 80, to pitch the next opener for the Sox.

George Gelles of the Herald was as ecstatic as our man: "rough . . . heavy-handed . . . unpolished" were his remarks. Still, William Steinberg batted .500. The critics from the Record and the Monitor praised his work wholeheartedly.

But, of course, that Michael Steinbergian appraisal "soggy" will splash in the conductor's mind. A man with a soggy orchestra. Will he wear galoshes on the podium? Or will he wisely heed the counsel of the town's conductor of pugilism, Sam Silverman: "Listen, Bill, as long as they spell your name right, every knock is a boost."

boston arts

Contents / Volume 2, Number 9 / October 1969

of the Moiseyev Ballet and stars of the Bolshoi opera will be present, totaling a company of 71. Folklore Productions is sponsoring this event. Another renowned musical organization, from Italy, the Orchestra of L'Accademia di Santa Cecilia of Rome, will give a concert on October 6 in Symphony Hall. Fernando Previtali, permanent conductor and artistic advisor, will lead the orchestra in selections from Rossini, Mendelssohn, Petrassi, Ravel, and Verdi. The National Academy of St. Cecilia is the oldest musical institution in the world, taking its origin from the association that was founded in Rome in 1566. Boston's own orchestra, the B.S.O., has a new musical director this year, William Steinberg. Assisting him is Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's new Assistant Conductor. On October 10 and 11, Mr. Thomas will conduct the orchestra for the first time. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 will open the concert, followed by "Three Places in New England" by Charles Ives, Stravinsky's Variations, and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-fantasy. This is just one of the multitude of concerts that the B.S.O. has planned for October.

Solo instrumentalists have become quite popular. Vladimir Ashkenazy, the Soviet pianist will strike the keyboard on October 19. Then as part of the M.I.T. Humanities Series, Masuko Ushioda, violinist, will give a recital. She will open the series on October 26, joining forces with Pascal Sigrist, pianist. Winner of the 1963 Queen Elizabeht International Competition and the 1966 Tchaikovsky Competition, Miss Ushioda is hailed as one of Japan's foremost young artists.

(Right, top to bottom) Pete Seeger, William Steinberg, and Fernando Previtali

116.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(F) 66,387

OCT 2 1969

Meet Our Maestro

By Julie Hatfield

Patriot Ledger Staff Reporter

Because he senses that Bostonians do not want him to patronize them, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new music director will do no such thing to his Boston audiences.

"I may antagonize them but I won't patronize them," smiled a warm and witty William Steinberg in his first formal meeting with the press yesterday. The meeting was held in Symphony Hall's Ancient Instruments Room newly renamed the Cabot-Cahners Room after two generous donors.

It was almost as if Eric Leinsdorf had returned for a while. The symphony's new maestro looks like Mr. Leinsdorfs' big brother, with the same mein, carriage and the eyes that laugh and pierce simultaneously.

A native of Cologne, Germany, William Steinberg has guest conducted in Boston many times since he first arrived in this country in 1938.

Mr. Steinberg felt that programming Beethoven's "Fidelio" would be patronizing the Boston audience. He commented that, as Leinsdorf performed "Leonore" just two seasons ago at Tanglewood, he doubted whether the "Fidelio" would be on any of this year's programs.

This is the musician who determined to have a Beethoven work sung and spoken in the language of the Bible and this he did, in the first Hebrew performance of "Fidelio", in Israel. The founder of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, Mr. Steinberg was its first conductor from 1936 to 1938.

It has been suggested that the symphony's first concert under his baton on Sept. 26 represented the chronological limitations of his musical repetoire. Mr. Steinberg voiced an emphatic "no" to this presumption, stating that he will try in programming for the symphony, to encompass every period or orchestral music going as far back as baroque, pre-Handel and Bach works and presenting a small number of contemporary works using "certain limits of radicalism."

Reluctant to state a favorite period in music, or a favorite composer, Mr. Steinberg, the diplomat, feels as does Mahler, that "whatever I am conducting at the time, that is my favorite."

He seems to have a certain hesitancy about taking on avant-garde, feeling that "I want to identify myself with all the music I do — emotionally and intellectually", Mr. Steinberg said he can not do this with modern music as much as with that which has proved itself lasting.

He finds a surprisingly large percentage of the newer works actually boring after a fourth or fifth hearing, but he hopes, during the 1970-71 season, to present some that he feels will at least be informative to the audience.

The first American orchestra which Mr. Steinberg heard after coming to this country in 1938 at Toscanini's invitation was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its effect on him was impressive. "I waited for something to happen to make me convinced that what I was hearing was human and not divine," commented Mr. Steinberg.

His goal as the leader of these musicians, is to create this type of sound and "with God and the Boston Symphony Orchestra," he smiled, "I might succeed."

A dynamic septvagenarian, Mr. Steinberg this year begins leading a double life as he is in the unique musician of music director simultaneously of both the Boston and Pittsburgh symphony orchestras. He has a life-time contract with the Pittsburgh symphony which he has directed since 1952 and permanent music director here. He is the only conducter to ever ing to him as it appears. Between 1958 and orchestral history.

This feat may not prove as overwhelming to him as it appears Between 1958 and 1960 Mr. Steinberg traveled regularly between Pittsburgh and London while he served as music director of the London philharmonic orchestra. When he is in Pittsburgh, guest conductors will appear for two-week periods in Boston.

He plans to keep the two orchestras distinctly separate with very few performances of the same works in Boston and Pittsburgh and no repetition of soloists.

One exception will be Haydn's "Missa Solemnis," which he plans to present here, at Rutgers University ,at Carnegie Hall, and with the Pittsburgh symphony. He will use the Rutgers University chorus for all performances, simply because of the proximity of the singers to Pittsburgh where most of the rehearsals will be held.

During their last year of recording with RCA, the Boston Symphony is scheduled to make recordings of "Bruckner's Symphony Number 6, Mahler's Symphony Number 4, The Second Symphony of Ernst Toch, and a group of famous Scherzi, including two by Stravinsky, one which Mendelssohn wrote at the age of 15 which Mr. Steinberg calls a "masterpiece" and Max Reger's variation of a Mozart Scherzo. The orchestra has already recorded the Ninth Symphony of Shubert under Mr. Steinberg's direction.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

OCT 3 1969

Steinberg's plans for Symphony

On Wednesday morning a careening cement mixer had threatened to demolish Symphony Hall's Massachusetts Avenue marquee, but by the time late afternoon rolled around, all was quiet for the first meeting with the press of the Boston Symphony's new music director, William Steinberg. The first "official" meeting, that is, since he was introduced earlier at a symphony Friends' reception, and today begins his second series of subscription concerts.

At the press meeting, where Mr. Steinberg invited questions with a fortissimo "Shoot!" (and reserved the right to leave some questions unanswered), no one was demolished—not even a critic. There were a few demurrers—favorite musical period, favorite composer—which he answered with the often-used reply of Gustav Mahler (and others), "the one currently being performed."

Clarification was made of the music director's long-term ideas on playable orchestral repertory, which he feels covers a compositional span of about 350 years. How far a practical musicmaker goes, choicewise, in either direction, Mr. Steinberg said, depends on the limits set for oneself on the basis of emotional, sentimental, and intellectual experience and prefer[illegible]sic, he believes, is for entertainme[illegible]ighest sense, and cannot be bori[illegible] to play or to hear—and ("please do[illegible]k me to be specific") that includes certain pieces and composers, both ancient and contemporary.

Although contemporary music is not extensively represented on the programs of his first Boston season, Mr. Steinberg does not want it inferred that he will not play modern works — "if I believe the pieces worthy of attention, and if they are not boring." He will encourage guest conductors to explore the contemporary repertory, and he indicated that his new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, would be particularly qualified to tackle the moderns.

Further questioning brought out that Mr. Steinberg will conduct for three weeks at Tanglewood next summer, probably a shortened version of the Beethoven cycle to be performed in Boston this spring; that he and the orchestra have recordings for RCA Victor of Schubert's Ninth, Bruckner's Sixth, Mahler's Fourth and a set of "Famous Scherzi," and that he has no plans for concert versions of opera in Boston because "you have an operatic enterprise here."

Then, as a final postscript on the question of doing contemporary music, Mr. Steinberg reiterated that he felt the platform of public musicmaking should serve the purpose of making known what is being written today —take it or leave it. And it is the public's privilege to express its approval or no. Quizzically he asked, "Do they in Boston?"

Louis Snyder

CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
(M) 8,600 (S) 7,500

OCT 5 1969

What Kind of Celebration For Beethoven's 200th?

By DELOS SMITH

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 4'1.961 SUN. 423.790

OCT 12 1969

Problem: What Do You Give Beethoven For His Birthday

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Beethoven's birthday coming up next year will be no ordinary Beethoven's birthday, of the kind which can be passed over lightly.

It will be his 200th birthday. A round number of that size all but shouts for attention. This is now embarrassing many musicians and leaders of musical affairs.

They, of all people, should be responsive. An extraordinary commemoration seems in order. So far nothing extraordinary has occurred to them. If anyone has any ideas, they'd be welcomed.

Should they perform and listen to more Beethoven music. How is that possible when his music always gets more attention than that of any other composer?

Should they sponsor dancing in the streets, or at least some banquets? Should the more articulate musicians, such as the eloquent Leonard Bernstein, make commemorative speeches before performing a Beethoven symphony or piano sonata? Should there be eulogies and prayers?

All this and more have been considered and largely rejected as either malapropos or downright silly. Unlike the comic strip child musician, Schroeder, musicians and musical people become self-conscious when confronted with the mundane fact that Ludwig van Beethoven was born on a certain day of a certain year just like everyone else.

For them the giant still strides and was not really of mortal stuff. Such as he shouldn't have birthdays even though he was a man who was born in Bonn, now the capital of the West German Republic, on Dec. 16, 1770.

They have long since given up on the puzzle of what made the man an immortal.

As a musical creator the world hadn't known his like before and probably will never know it again. As a man he was an irascible and untidy eccentric given to leaving scraps of sandwiches in his piano and to cheating his publishers.

That cramps the possibilities for eulogies of Beethoven the man. His music continuously commemorates the genius and so far the major American symphony orchestras have resolved to be contented with that.

In January Bernstein will conduct a version of his only opera, "Fidelio," with the New York Philharmonic, and George Szell will conduct an all-Beethoven program in March. Eugene Ormandy plans one for the Philadelphia Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski will close out the season of the American Symphony with the mighty choral symphony.

Only the Boston Symphony has undertaken a Beethoven "festival." It will run for four days in Boston in April. For the big-scale hoopla Schroeder and other determined Beethoven's birthday celebrations will have to go to Bonn and Vienna.

In the town of his birth there will be a festival of 34 concerts and in the city where he spent his adult life there will be, in addition to festive playing of all his major works, a specially made movie reenacting his life. In Bonn and Vienna Beethoven has always been of much help in the tourist trade. Next year, it is hoped, he will be even more so.

Hey Schroeder! 200 Next Year

NEW YORK (UPI) — Beethoven's birthday coming up next year will be no ordinary kind which can be passed over lightly.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M)152,525 (S) 198,160

OCT 5 1969

Beethoven's 200th Shouts For Notice

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI — Beethoven's birthday coming up next year will be no ordinary Beethoven's birthday, of the kind which can be passed over lightly.

It will be his 200th birt[illegible]
A round num[illegible]

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

OCT 5 1969

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

OCT 6 1969

EYE TOO

William Steinberg

NEW FACE: In its 89th season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a new conductor. He's German-born William Steinberg . . . a man with an unique position. Not only is the 70-year-old maestro music director of the BSO, he holds the same position with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Thus Steinberg is the only conductor to hold two such posts simultaneously; and when he says he has time for "nothing but music," everyone agrees. When the Friends of the BSO gave Steinberg a gala reception in Symphony Hall. all the Boston Propers turned out to greet him. "He's a delightful little man with the quickest, dry wit and the twinkling eyes," gushed one Proper. If Boston is delighted with Steinberg, the new maestro is even happier to work with the BSO. He unabashedly calls it "a superb machine . . . unequaled in the world" . . . his reason for coming to the Hub. Steinberg has a few surprises for Bostonian ears . . . avant-garde music "maybe next season. I did some of it successfully in Pittsburgh, I think it can be done here, if it is not boring. I might antagonize my audience, but I won't patronize them," he says, and his eyes begin to twinkle again. "They should remember a whistle is an approval, a boo is a disapproval."

...EYE TOO...EYE TOO...EYE TOO...EYE TOO...EYE TOO...EYE TOO...

Youth Concerts to Resume Nov. 8

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON

Dates and programs for the eleventh season of the popular Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall have been announced by Harry Ellis Dickson, Music Director of Youth Concerts and Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, vice-chairman.

Each Youth Concert series consists of three Saturday morning programs from 11 to noon in Symphony Hall. The first series will be Nov. 8, Jan. 10 and March 14; the second will be Nov. 15, Jan. 17 and March 21. Mr. Dickson conducts an orchestra of 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and talks to the youngsters about the music being played. Programs are designed for students in grades 5-12.

The first program, Nov. 8 and 15, is called 'This is the orchestra' and opens with Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," narrated by Andrew Raeburn.

The second program, Jan. 17 and 25, called 'Same Axe—Different Bag,' illustrates the different styles that composers have used with exactly the same instruments. The music of Stravinsky, Anderson, Ibert, Milhaud, Haydn and Schuller will be played.

'A Festival Program' is the name of the last program, March 14 and 21. Bernstein's "Candide Overture," Saint- Saens' "Carnival of the Animals" and "Ballad for Americans" are among the featured works.

Tickets for the Youth Concerts are sold only by series, at $6 a series and are available through local school departments or by writing Mrs. Manual Kurland, Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Syymphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 2 1969

For added pleasure

Reforming the B.S.O.

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Article referred to on p. 5.

Last week in this space I wrote that there was a lot of music that ought to be, but was not, in fact, appearing on the programs of the Boston Symphony. The problem is by no means local only. With few exceptions, music directors, boards and managers are unimaginative about programs. I mean something larger than specific questions about, for example, why it took the Boston Symphony until 1969 to get around to playing anything by Varese, or why the last performance by the orchestra in Boston of Mozart's great C major Piano Concerto, K.503, took place in 1883.

Having a hundred or so instrumentalists under contract opens possibilities that have not been explored enough. To begin with, most of the music in what has come to be thought of as orchestral repertory from the early 18th century to the present does not need that many players. Tuba and second harp, for instance, have relatively little to do; half the music in a normal season does not need all four players the orchestra has available for each woodwind; a considerable part of the working repertory goes better with fewer than all 60-some strings.

While Varese's "Deserts" was rehearsed last season, more than 80 players had nothing to do. "Deserts" eats up all available percussion and a high proportion of brass; even so, and without even thinking of strings only, there is a large body of available repertory from the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries that might have been rehearsed at the same time.

Rehearsed by whom? By the assistant conductor, who in most orchestras is badly under-used. He is an understudy, an extra pair of ears at rehearsal, a good keyboard man perhaps, and useful in special tasks like the preparation of singers. He gets few opportunities for public performance, though, and some of these young men are very much worth hearing: Henry Lewis and Lawrence Foster, who used to be with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, James Levine in Cleveland, Leonard Slatkin in St. Louis, Michael Tilson Thomas here in Boston, and, of course, everybody knows the story of Artur Rodzinski's assistant at the New York Philharmonic 26 years ago, a chap called Bernstein.

The Boston Symphony's new assistant conductor is specifically, though not exclusively, experienced with and equipped to deal with difficult contemporary music. William Steinberg, the music director, is not thus equipped, and, going by the evidence of what he has put on his programs for Boston and what he has conducted in Pittsburgh and New York, his taste in 20th century music is conservative. It is to be assumed that he would agree that there is music that should appear on programs, though he himself does not feel sympathy for it and is not willing, perhaps not able, to conduct it.

George Szell in Cleveland, for instance, has made a point of inviting guest conductors who are strong in music he feels to be outside his own territory. Pierre Boulez has indicated that he will do the same thing when he takes over the New York Philharmonic. Assistant and associate conductors sometimes have been able to do the same thing: Richard Burgin for years earned the gratitude of the Boston musical public through his performances of repertory that did not engage the interest of Koussevitzky and Munch.

This, I suggest, can be stepped up. The assistant conductor need not be limited to the one program of the year that is all his own (or two, or whatever the number may be), but he could on, say, half a dozen occasions during a season appear with a single piece, or a couple, on a concert most of which is conducted by someone else. Yes, why The idea would be to pick pieces for less than full orchestra, so that two or more works could be rehearsed simultaneously. Yes, why not more than two, maybe a Haydn symphony, the Varese "Octandre," and the 3d Brandenburg Concerto with the concertmaster in charge?

This leads to the idea of having more than one assistant conductor, and that makes sense, too. The combination of music director and principal conductor who is with his own orchestra during the largest part of a season is disappearing. The Boston Symphony board split with Erich Leinsdorf over that very issue, but it went on to engage a music director who is available to Boston for only 12 weeks out of the 24 of the main subscription series. That is a proportion that I would guess will be normal, if not generous, from here on.

Orchestras and audiences need the stimulation of guest conductors, and we neither shall nor should be without them. More, however, of a season's work could be in the hands of assistants and associates, and an orchestra like the Boston Symphony might well have two such people around.

Most of my specific references to repertory today and last week have been to contemporary music because that is the area in which reform of program policy is most urgently needed, but, mutatis mutandis, similar changes are in order in older repertory as well. An enormous amount of loosening up can be done. There could be more exploration in a chamber-musical direction. If a chorus has been engaged to sing the Bruckner Te Deum or the Stravinsky Symphony of Psalms, the program might aptly add some a cappella motets of Lassus or Brahms. A program that already introduces electronic sounds in a "legitimate" orchestral concert — Varese's "Deserts" can serve as an example again — could be extended to include a purely electronic work like Babbitt's Ensembles for Synthesizer.

I hope these examples show that what I suggest is not a hodge-podge, but a broadening of the perspective in which we now view what we think of as orchestral music — more exactly, the music whose appearance on programs by orchestras we regard as normal — by the inclusion of works that will extend our pleasure and our experience as listeners, freshen our perceptions, and even — who knows? — shed new light on the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies and concertos that we are assuredly going to continue to love.

There is more to be said about program-making and about the place of the audience in all this, and I should like to touch on those topics in future Sunday articles.

(See page 121)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 5 1969 E

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 7 1969 New Engl ★

Typical of the "now" approach of New England's Conservatory of Music under the amazing aegis of composer-musicologist Gunther Schuller is a first-time "Changing Language of Music" series in eight rounds, to begin today at the conservatory.

Four composers—Schuller, Alexander Goehr, Easley Blackwood and Donald Martino—will guest star and Paul Zukovsky will illustrate his own performer's-attitude lecture as a violinist.

Also new are the Boston Symphony Stage Door Lectures dreamed up by Women's Council chairmen Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John Grandin Jr.

Members of the B.S.O., such as Michel Sasson (Nov. 21) and Felix Viscuglia, Ralph Pottle and Charles Smith, will be at the stage door and box luncheons with them will follow their 11:30 backstage autobiographies.

Money Crisis In U. S. Arts

Canadian Stars To Sing Here

By CARL APONE, Press Music Editor

Two singers born and trained in Canada will perform with the Pittsburgh Opera this week and therein lies a tale.

They join an ever-growing list of Canadians who have established themselves as international stars of opera.

Time was when Canada seemed to send us only hockey players and cold weather. But the long list of Canadian singers who perform here indicates this is no longer so.

In the opening opera, "Carmen," Canada's Bernard Turgeon, now of Royal Covent Garden Opera in England, will be making his Pittsburgh debut.

Miss Patenaude Returning

Jean Patenaude, New York City Opera, returns after making a very promising local debut last season in "Pagliacci."

Later this season we will have Canadians Pierre Duval, Heather Thomson, Cornelius Opthoff, and Irving Guttman will be stage director for two productions. Lois Marshall, Maureen Forrester, Jon Vickers are frequent performers with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

The great stride Canada has made in music is not its only boast in the arts.

They have three first-rate ballet companies, National Ballet and the Royal Ballet, which come here. And this summer Michael Semanitzky, new director of Pittsburgh Youth Symphony, directed the third company, Les Grands Ballet, in a successful European tour.

Then too, there are magnificent new arts centers, Place des Arts in Montreal, and Ottawa Arts Center in Ottawa. And to be sure, the mushrooming of these cultural activities under the flag of the Maple Leaf is no accident.

Supported By Government

The blunt truth is the Canadian government cares about art and shows its concern by putting up large sums of money.

These efforts on behalf of the arts make the U. S. government's effort seem paltry by comparison.

The Canadian government spends $6.2 million annually for the arts in a land of 20 million people. In contrast our Government spends about $7 million annually for 202 million persons.

This means Canada appropriates about 30 cents per person for the arts, compared to a miserly three cents per person in America, or 10 times more than we do.

And the Canadian appropriation is even more impressive when you consider the $6.2 million figure does not include appropriations given to aid films, art galleries and radio performances.

The Canadian Arts Council, watchdog for the arts, is 12 years old and is an impressive, effective organization. In contrast, this country, the richest nation on earth, has a National Endowment for the Arts which is only four years old and is nowhere as effective as the arts group north of the border.

JEAN PATENAUDE
Canadian star.

BERNARD TURGEON
Pittsburgh debut.

'Death Rattle' Heard

Figures provided by a spokesman for our National Endowment for the Arts show Canada is not the only nation which ranks far ahead of this country where grants to the arts are concerned.

In recent years The Netherlands has appropriated some $44.7 million annually, about $3.69 per person; Greece, $3.5 million, or 41 cents per person; Italy, $8.5 million, 17 cents per person; Australia, $3.2 million, or 27 cents per person.

Then, too, we have cities like West Berlin appropriating $20 million annually for the arts; and Austria, with a population smaller than New York City's, laying out $20 million for its state-owned theaters alone.

MILDRED MILLER
Sings title role in "Carmen."

William Blair Jr., director, John F. Kennedy Center for Performing Arts, was no doubt armed with these figures when he badgered Congress for more funds to complete the center. But now the string seems to have run out everywhere.

The Metropolitan Opera is dark because of a financial squeeze and the death rattle has begun with numerous orchestras.

Crisis At Hand

Obviously, if the national, state and local governments do not soon assume further financial responsibility, America is in danger of losing one of its most precious natural resources, the gifts and works of the artist. The crisis is now.

Getting back to the opera which opens the season Thursday, Mildred Miller, Metropolitan Opera and wife of Pitt Chancellor Wesley Posvar, will be heard in the title role. She sang the same role with the local company in 1956.

Also in the cast, in addition to Miss Miller, Miss Patenaude (Micaela), Turgeon (Escamillo), will be the Metropolitan Opera's Pedro Lavirgen (Don Jose), Betty Packer, Earl Corwin, Robert Falk. Richard Karp will conduct. Anthony Stivanello will be stage director.

* * * *

Boston Leftovers

In taking over the reins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor Dr. William Steinberg will be in charge of one of the most successful orchestral operations in this country.

Symphony Hall is 98.7 per cent sold out through sale of season tickets and the orchestra raises 67 per cent of its operating costs through sale of tickets, recordings and tours.

However, don't let the near-sellout of Symphony Hall through season ticket sales make you think Pittsburgh is behind in this respect.

The Boston hall holds only 2631 persons, so season tickets sales are about 5000. Pittsburgh sells about 5200 adult and 1641 student season tickets for the week-end series in the Mosque, a 3600-seat house.

If you wonder why Boston plays a Friday afternoon concert, it's tradition. In the early days, Friday afternoon was the final rehearsal for the Saturday concert. As Saturday concerts were usually sold out, the management opened rehearsals to the public for a coin, any kind of a coin, penny to a dollar.

The rehearsals then got so popular, Friday afternoon became a regular concert date.

Finally, as he is everywhere, Dr. Steinberg is a musician's musician. After Dr. Steinberg's inaugural concert in Boston, one veteran musician anxiously told a companion backstage: "Steinberg's the finest musician we have had since Karl Muck." Muck last conducted in Boston in 1918.

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 346,090 SUN. 744,732

OCT 5 1969

118.

Harvard Faculty Votes To 'End War, Pull Out'

By BILL McCAFFREY and DONALD FESSENDEN 041
HT Staff Reporters

The Harvard University Faculty of Arts and Sciences in a two-hour special meeting yesterday called for an end to the war in Vietnam and urged "the prompt, rapid and complete withdrawal of United States forces."

The departure from the tradition of neutrality of the faculty as a whole on political matters came after more conservative professors had defeated, by amendment, a resolution which would have pledged faculty support of the Oct. 15 day of protest against the war.

The amendment changed the wording "affirms its support" to "recognizes that Oct. 15 is a day of protest." The resolution left to individual instructors the decision of whether to suspend classes next Wednesday.

The action of more than 400 Harvard faculty members came at the end of a day of announced plans which appeared to indicate that possibly 100,000 people would take part in Greater Boston's Moratorium Day activities.

A spokesman for the sponsoring Student Mobilization Committee told Boston municipal authorities to expect from 50,000 to 100,000 to attend the rally on Boston Common next Wednesday afternoon.

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) will be the principal speaker. At a meeting yesterday in the office of Asst. Corporation Counsel John Fiske, the cooperation of the city's law, traffic and police departments was promised.

Peter Camejo of the Student Mobilization Com-

(Continued on Page Six) 115

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M) 152,525 (S) 198,160

OCT 8 1969

Symphony Joins War Protest

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has cancelled rehearsals scheduled for Oct. 15, the day set aside as a protest against the Vietnam war, the orchestra said Tuesday.

The cancellation came after players passed a resolution asking management to take the action.

The Orchestra, in a statement, said it "takes no formal position in the cause," but said the members were congratulated for "their initiative and concern."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

OCT 8 1969

Boston Symphony Cancels Rehearsal

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, canceled rehearsals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

SUN
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
(E) 14,200

OCT 8 1969

Boston Symphony Backs Moratorium

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, canceled rehearsals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

HERALD
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
(E) 16,596

OCT 8 1969

Music to Stop For Protest

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, cancelled rehersals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

OCT 8 1969

Boston Symphony Cancels Rehearsals In Viet Protest

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, cancelled rehearsals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said yesterday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

Harvard Faculty Urges Prompt Pullout From Viet

(Continued from First Page) 115

mittee announced that five separate parades would converge on the Common. Starting points, a 2 p.m., will be Cambridge Common, Boston University, Fens Stadium. Northeastern University and the University of Massachusetts in Boston.

The city officials promised the use of the northbound lane of Commonwealth avenue for the march. Fiske said a parade permit and formal permission to use the Common at the Parkman Bandstand would be issued later this week.

Gov. Sargent will lead Vietnam Moratorium Day observances on Lexington's historic Battle Green at 4 p.m., Oct. 15, his office announced.

Other participants in the Lexington session will be the Rev. Dana McLean Greeley, former president of the Unitarian-Universalist Association, Arlington Atty. William S. Abbott, former Asian expert in the Johnson administration, and three Lexington clergymen, the Rt. Rev. George W. Casey, Rabbi Haskell M. Bernat and the Rev. John M. Wells.

THE FACULTY of Boston University's College of Liberal Arts, in a letter to President Nixon, has also called for the immediate withdrawal of all United States forces from Vietnam, Dean Calvin B. T. Lee announced yesterday.

Dean Lee said the letter also affirmed the Liberal Arts faculty's support of the Oct. 15 moratorium. In a related move, he said, the faculty voted to suspend classes that day. The College of Liberal Arts is the largest of BU's 16 schools and colleges.

Before the Harvard Arts and Sciences faculty meeting, 150 of the approximately 700 members signed a petition circulated by Government Prof. Arthur A. Maass asserting that action by the faculty as a whole "would undermine the university's freedom by involving it in political battles."

Arts and Sciences is the largest of Harvard's nine faculties and includes all professors except those in the professional schools.

THE ORIGINAL motion before the faculty meeting, introduced by Everett I. Mendelsohn, assistant professor of history of science, resolved that the Arts and Sciences faculty:

"Affirms its support of the Oct. 15 day of protest against the war in Vietnam (while not committing any individual member) and authorizes its members to suspend classes that day."

Opposition by economics Prof. Robert Dorfman resulted, after sharp and what a student observer called "passionate" debate, in an amendment offered by Peter B. Doeringer, assistant professor of economics. It read that the faculty:

"Recognizes that Oct. 15 is a day of protest against the war and, while not committing any individual member, re-affirms the right of its members to suspend classes on that day."

The Doeringer amendment carried 268 to 210. The faculty then passed the amended resolution 391 to 16.

The resolution to bring home the troops was introduced by John T. Edsall, professor of biological chemistry. A motion that it be considered in "convocation"—which would make it an informal opinion rather than binding action—lost by one vote, 215 to 214.

IT READ THAT it is the sense of this faculty that the war in Vietnam must not continue. While our opinions differ in detail, we agree in urging the prompt, rapid and complete withdrawal of United States forces. We support a united and sustained national effort to bring our troops home."

The vote was 255 Yes, 81 No and 150 abstaining.

Following the formal meeting, 112 faculty members remained for a convocation at which the vote was 41 to 3 for the Edsall resolution. A spokesman said that the 41 had voted against the resolution in the formal session because they did not believe it was a proper action by a Harvard faculty on public policy.

AT AMHERST, Dr John W. Lederle, president, announced yesterday that classes would be held on schedule Oct. 15 at the University of Massachusetts but that make-up arrangements would be permitted for those who chose to remain away.

Nobel prize winning chemist Dr. George Wald will make three speeches in connection with the Moratorium Day next Wednesday.

Tuesday night he will share the platform at the University of Rochester with Sen. Charles Goodell (R-N.Y.), who has introduced a bill which would end America's involvement in the war by next year.

He will speak Wednesday noon at a Cambridge Common rally planned as a preliminary to the Boston Common session. Wald will fly in mid-afternoon to St. Louis where he will address an audience at Washington University.

MASSACHUSETTS CHAPTER, Americans for Democratic Action, announced that it had been joined by the Democratic Council of Massachusetts and the Ripon Society in a letter asking every Massachusetts office holder to endorse a statement on the Oca. 15 Moratirium which indicates concern:

"About the continuing death and destruction in Vietnam, about the inadequate resources available for our great . . . state and local needs and about the . . . growing divisions in the American society."

Sumner Kaplan, chairman of the Massachusetts ADA, announced that Joseph Duffey, national ADA chairman, would be one of the Boston Common speakers.

THE AMERICAN Civil Liberties Union will man the Office of Human Rights Rumor Information Center at City Hall in the days preceding the Oct. 15 Moratorium, it was learned last night.

Several Boston law firms will sponsor newspaper adver-

(Continued on Page Seven) 116

War Moratorium & the B.S.O.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 8 1969

Faculty Urges Pullout

(Continued from page 6)

tisements Oct. 14 urging a speedy end to the war.

Hans Loeser, senior partner said last night: "My hunch is that most firms will remain open for business but that an awful lot of lawyers won't be there for work."

Doctors at Harvard Medical teachers will use their lunch and supper breaks Oct. 15 to hand out postcards, carrying pre - addressed names of congressmen, asking an end to the war within six months.

This was announced yesterday by Dr. Mitchell T. Rabkin, School and other medical general director of Beth Israel Hospital and assistant professor of medicine at Harvard Medical.

Speakers at a Brookline High School rally on Cypress Playground next Wednesday will include Rep. Michael Dukakis, Prof. Jerome Lettvin of Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Rabbi Roland Gittlesohn. All are Brookline residents.

THE NEWTON Board of Aldermen will meet in special session tomorrow night to act on a resolution calling for a quick end to the Vietnam war and urging Newton citizens to participate in the Oct. 15 protest.

The National Association of Social Workers, Eastern Massachusetts, announced its support of the Moratorium Day and called on social welfare agencies and workers to interrupt activities and participate in programs and seminars.

The announcement was made by the association president, Hubert Jones.

Another announcement yesterday was that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has canceled rehearsals scheduled for Oct. 15. The concelation came after orchestra members adopted a resolution urging the orchestra's management to take the action, a spokesman said.

KENNEBEC JOURNAL
AUGUSTA, MAINE
(M) 15,774

OCT 8 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Cancels Rehearsal

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has can-

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
(E) 10,233

OCT 8 1969 New England Newsclip

Orchestra Cuts Oct. 15 Practice

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symph-

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
) 9,900 (S)

OCT 8 1969 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,467

OCT 8 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Cancels Rehearsal

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, can-

RECORD
MERIDEN, CONN.
(M) 21,303

OCT 8 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Cancels Rehearsals In War Protest

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, can-

NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
(E) 14,827

OCT 8 1969 New England Newsclip

Symphony Cancels Oct. 15 Rehearsal

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has canceled rehearsals scheduled for Oct. 15, the day set aside as a protest against the Vietnam war, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The cancellation came after players passed a resolution asking management to take the action.

The Orchestra, in a statement, said it "takes no formal position in the cause," but said the members were congratulated for "their initiative and concern."

SYMPHONY REHEARS

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, canceled rehearsals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 42,850 (S) 39,575

OCT 8 1969

No rehearsals October 15

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, canceled rehearsals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

THE VIETNAM MORATORIUM
the idea of Jerome Grossman, man who is also president of PEACE DAY ACTIVITIES are being planned by Jerome Grossman, chairman of Mass. Pax and Newton Committee for Vietnam Peace Action Day; Mrs. Karen Woodruff, publicity chairman of the committee; Mrs. Sue Berkeley, of the Voice of Women; Joseph Fitzpatrick, president of Boston College student government; and Mrs. Lucy McCabe, coordinator for leaflets and petitions.

Mrs. Helen Rees, Brookline, keeping news media informed on developments of peace rally at Mass. PAX Cambridge office.
Record American Photo, Stanley Forman

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Friday, October 10, 1969

Anti-War Moratorium to Be Nationwide

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Next Wednesday's moratorium to protest the Vienam war is growing into a nationwide affair that will involve persons of all ages including politicians, businessmen and professional people, as well as the students who started it.

Plans for the moratorium—meaning suspension of normal activities—include rallies, speeches, marches and religious services from coast to coast, culminating in a 5 p.m. candlelight procession around the White House.

Indications are that some form of activity connected with the moratorium will take place in every state.

Sponsors plan to have 45,000 marchers in the Washington procession. They will be led by the widow of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

Seventeen senators and 47 congressmen have expressed support so long as the moratorium is "peaceful, lawful and nonviolent." Some plan speeches against the war in the Senate and House. Congressional staff members plan a vigil on the Capitol steps.

Plans to keep the House in session all night on Oct 14 as a symbol of protest against the war were disclosed by Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal, D-N.Y., who said enough speakers have been lined up to talk through the night. He said of the moratorium, "I think that is going to be the largest citizen participation of its kind in the history of this country."

Names of war dead will be read at hundreds of ceremonies, including one in New York's Wall Street, where financial workers are scheduled to take part along with Mayor John V. Lindsay and former Deputy Defense Secretary Roswell Gilpatric.

The executive board of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, representing 1,100 Reform rabbis, endorsed the moratorium. Its president Nixon's recent press conference statement that he would not be affected by protests.

Dozens of colleges canceled classes, or announced that absences would not be penalized. But Chancellor Glenn S. Dumke of the 19-campus california State Colleges prohibited disciplinary action against any professors who disobey.

The New York City school board will let teachers and pupils have the day off, but urged those who stay in school to hold discussions about Vietnam.

More than 100,000 people are expected at a rally in Boston, where the City Council instructed the mayor to arrange appropriate observances.

Three New England governors endorsed the idea—Democrats Kenneth Curtis of Maine and Frank Licht of Rhode Island and Republican Francis W. Sargent of Massachusetts.

In Sacramento, Calif., students planned a 24-hour vigil outside the home of Republican Gov. Ronald Reagan. Gov. Dewey Bartlett of Oklahoma declined to appear at college rallies, but Sen. Fred R. Harris, D-Okla., the Democratic national chairman, accepted.

Here are the states where major activities are planned. Sen. George S. McGovern, D-S.D., will address a rally at the University of Maine, Maine—Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, D-Maine, speaks at Bates College.

Massachusetts—McGovern speaks at a rally on Boston Common. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., speaks at World Affairs Council luncheon. Most departments will be closed at Harvard. Wellesley College canceled classes, but Brandeis University left it up to faculty and students. Yale University Chaplain William Sloane Coffin addresses evening vigil at Boston College, where classes will be canceled. The college of liberal arts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra canceled rehearsals. The town of Roxbury set up municipal observances.

Connecticut—Former Interior Secretary Stewart L. Udall, Rep. Allard K. Lowenstein, D-N.Y., and the Rv. Joseph Duffey, president of Americans for Democratic Action, to address rally on New Haven green near Yale University.

Rallies, marches and other observances planned in towns. Yale President Kingman Brewster issued a statement for moratorium.

Park Avenue, in Wall Street, at Pennsylvania Station. A memorial service at Riverside Church. Businessmen and students urged to wear black armbands. Columbia University, New York University and city school board authorizes student and faculty absences.

Washington, D.C.—A "meal of bread and soup at Georgetown University, preceding a candlelight procession through the streets. Dr. Benjamin Spock addresses George Washington University rally before demonstration at draft headquarters.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra cancelled rehearsals for Oct. 15 after its players passed a resolution asking for the action. The BSO management said it was taking no formal position on the cause but urged the symphony members to take part in events.

Lexington housewives have written storeowners and company presidents in the Lexington-Waltham area, asking them to observe the moratorium. They are going to follow the letters up with telephone calls.

In Boston, there is a proliferation of activities. One person has put the number of anti-war protestors planning to attend the assembly on the Boston Common at 100,000.

People wishing to circulate petitions in Newton may pick them up at the McCabe's, 72 Pine Ridge Rd., Waban, on Oct. 13.

Colleges, High Schools Lead Way

Newton, Waltham, Weston Peace Day Activities

...om B. C., Andover and 2 P.M. for 15 minutes in memory of the war dead.

...al and Col-...art will ...oti-

Special services will be conducted at St. Bernard's in West Newton and Our Lady ...utonville.

...—Page 2)

Harvard Sch... Joins Mora...

BOSTON (AP) — Faculty of Arts an... joined the rapidly e... of New England groups who plan to observe the O... anti-Vietnam War morato...

The Harvard group ... two resolutions at its fa... ing calling for individu... sors to decide whether ... classes for the day a... resolution calling t... withdrawal of all ... from the war-torn ...

Gov. Francis W ... his support for ... this week ad... that of Gov. ... of Maine.

Students ... rium ide... rally to ... H. Wh... ward... sem... mo... D... Capitol steps.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-... will address a World Af-...heon in Boston ...Muskie,

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R.I.
(E) 38,693

OCT 8 1969

...municipal ... an interfaith ... service will be established at a church.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra cancelled rehearsals for the day after its players passed a resolution asking for the action. BSO management said it was taking no formal position on the cause, but urged members to take part in events.

Harvard Backs End-War Observance

...y NEIL GIROU
...ated Press Writer

(AP) — Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences ...pidly expanding list ...nd groups Tuesday ...bserve the Oct. 15 ...War moratorium.

...group passed ...t its fall meet... ...ividual professors to cancel ...and a second ...or a speedy ...U.S. troops ...ountry.

...gent gave ...oratorium ...voice to ...Curtis ...orato... ...for a ...

...rally told Boston Mayor Kevin H. White Tuesday to expect upwards of 100,000 persons to assemble Oct. 15 on Boston Common. Sen. George McGovern, D-S.C., is to address the gathering. Marches to the nCommon are to take place from many of the 50 institutions of higher education in greater Boston.

Numerous colleges in the greater Boston area have canceled classes for Oct. 15, and many others said students are free to participate, but classes will be held as usual.

Outdoor rallys to protest the war, day-long teach-ins, interfaith prayer services, vigils, and holidays from work are all planned by various New England groups.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., will address a World Affairs Council luncheon in Boston while Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, D-Maine, will speak at Bates College at Lewiston, Maine.

Boston City Council, legislative body in New England's largest city, passed a resolution calling on Mayor White to set up appropriate observances of the day.

Dr. Neil ... commissi... Massachu... legally cl... discussion ... take plac...

Medical ... area sch... medical teachers, plan to pass out literature on Boston streets protesting the war's continuance.

The Boston office of the American Civil Liberties Union plans to have extra attorneys available to aid those who are arrested during the Boston Commons rally for their "zeal, or whatever."

Senate President Maurice A. Donahue heads the list of Massachusetts lawmakers who support the moratorium day. He has called for a redirection of priorities in the nation.

The town of Duxbury passed a resolution setting up municipal observations, and an interfaith information service will be established at a church.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra cancelled rehearsals for the day after its players passed a resolution asking for the action. BSO management said it was taking no formal position on the cause, but urged members to take part in events.

NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
(E) 14,827

OCT 8 1969

NEWS-TRIBUNE
WALTHAM, MASS.
(E) 16,245

OCT 8 1969

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
(E) 7,904

OCT 8 1969

New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

OCT 9 1969

'Rally Not a Strike But Public Appeal'

The upcoming Oct. 15 Peace Action demonstration is not a strike or a confrontation but rather an effort to get the broadest public support for efforts to end the Vietnam war, a prominent educator said Wednesday.

Prof. Eugent Bell, professor ...ology at MIT, told a press ...ce at the Sheraton-... in Cambridge that ... a new awareness ...gely by students ...end the war."

... speaking for the ... Action Committee, ...t. 15 demonstration, ...pected to draw up to ... Boston Common and ...d exercises in communities ...re and across the nation, ...designed as "a device to ...lize the broadest popular ...port for efforts to end the ...ar."

Michael Paley, a student at Brookline High School, also addressed the press conference and emphasized that the demonstration was in no way a confrontation.

"A lot of people simply were not interested before will be more concerned as a result of this rally, "Paley said.

In Newton, headquarters for the day's activities will be the United Methodist Church in Newton Center.

Students from Boston College, And over-Newton Theological Seminary, and Newton College of the Sacred Heart will conduct a petition drive and hand out leaflets and armbands during the day.

Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra voted to join the protest and as a result the management cancelled the day's scheduled rehearsal.

In a memorandum announcing cancellation of the Oct. 15 rehearsal, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager, said, "In falling in with the players' resolution, this institution takes no formal position in the cause. The management, however, congratulates the members on their initiative and concern and asks that each member of the orchestra and staff feel entirely free to participate in or refrain from participating in the lawful events planned for that day to express opposition to the war."

In Weymouth, local sponsors of the nation... were granted ... board of sele... public assembl... the town hall a...

The assembly ... music, addres... clergy and di... citizens, and h... dents.

NEWS
OTHER MASS.
(E) 047

OCT 8 1969

New England Newsclip

119.

Moratorium Support Increases

BOSTON ... Faculty of ... joined the ra... of New Engl... who plan to ... anti-Vietnam ...

The Harv... two resolutio... ing calling f... sors to decid...

Moratorium

Continued from Page 1

... medical teachers, plan to pass out literature on Boston streets protesting the war's continuance.

The Boston office of the American Civil Liberties Union plans to have extra attorneys available to aid those who are arrested during the Boston Commons rally for their "zeal, or whatever."

Senate President Maurice A. Donahue heads the list of Massachusetts lawmakers who support the moratorium day. He has called for a redirection of priorities in the nation.

The town of Duxbury passed a resolution setting up municipal observations, and an interfaith information service will be established at a church.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra cancelled rehearsals for the day after its players passed a resolution asking for the action. BSO management said it was taking no formal position on the cause, but urged members to take part in events.

TIMES RECORD
BRUNSWICK, MAINE
(E) 7,800

OCT 10 1969

New England Newsclip

REHEARSAL CANCELLED FOR OCT. 15

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting at the request of its players, cancelled rehearsals on Oct. 15, the day marked to protest the Vietnam War, the Orchestra said Tuesday.

The Orchestra said it was taking no formal position in the matter, but said members were congratulated for their initiative and concern.

MANY EVENTS

Oct. 15 In New England

BOSTON (AP) — Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences joined the rapidly expanding list of New England groups Tuesday who plan to observe the Oct. 15 anti-Vietnam War moratorium.

The Harvard group passed two resolutions at its fall meeting calling for individual professors to decide whether to cancel classes for the day and a second resolution calling for a speedy withdrawal of all U.S. troops from the war-torn country.

Gov. Francis W. Sargent gave his support for the moratorium this week adding his voice to that of Gov. Kenneth M. Curtis of Maine.

Students started the moratorium idea and organizers for a rally told Boston Mayor Kevin H. White Tuesday to expect upwards of 100,000 persons to assemble Oct. 15 on Boston Common. Sen. George McGovern, D-S.C., is to address the gathering. Marches to the Common are to take place from many of the 50 institutions of higher education in greater Boston.

Numerous colleges in the greater Boston area have can-

Donahue heads the list of Massachusetts lawmakers who support the moratorium day. He has called for a redirection of priorities in the nation.

The town of Duxbury passed a resolution setting up municipal observations, and an interfaith information service will be established at a church.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra cancelled rehearsals for the day after its players passed a resolution asking for the action. BSO management said it was taking no formal position on the cause, but urged members to take part in events.

120.

Harvard Faculty Votes Vietnam Withdrawal

By CROCKER SNOW and ROBERT B. KENNEY
Globe Staff

The Harvard Faculty of Arts and Sciences took a middle-of-the-road stand on the Oct. 15 Vietnam Peace Day yesterday, but—in an unprecedented move—passed a strong anti-war resolution.

The faculty, largest among the university's nine schools, voted to recognize the Vietnam Moratorium Day, but the staff did not vote to close down the university. Individual faculty members may suspend classes.

Simultaneously, faculty members approved a resolution advocating "prompt, rapid and complete withdrawal of U.S. forces" from Vietnam.

Expectations had been that the faculty would have endorsed the moratorium in a stronger fashion. Instead, it unexpectedly came out with a statement on a political issue.

Capped by the Harvard action, plans for Moratorium Day continued mushrooming in New England.

However, the almost universal embrace of plans for the day of protest troubled organizers lest their initial call for "total and immediate U.S. withdrawal" be obscured by more moderate statements of endorsement.

Student and citizen organizers of the moratorium and the associated Vietnam Peace Action Day, while welcoming the support it has generated, feared their stated goal would be lost in the scramble to mount their bandwagon.

3

MORATORIUM Page 6

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 8 1969 New England

Moratorium To Protest War Grows Nationwide

(Continued From Page One)

those who stay in school to hold discussions ... Democratic Action ...

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE
(M) 55,812

OCT 10 1969 En

...ocratic national chairman, accepted.

Massachusetts—McGovern to address rally on Boston Common. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., speaks at World Affairs Council luncheon. Most departments will be closed at Harvard. Wellesley College canceled classes, but Brandeis University left it up to faculty and students. Yale University Chaplain William Sloan Coffin addresses evening rally at Boston College, where classes will be canceled in the college of liberal arts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra canceled rehearsals. The town of Roxbury set up municipal observances.

Connecticut—Former Interior Secretary Stewart L. Udall, Rep. Allard K. Lowenstein, D-N.Y., and the Rev. Joseph Duffey, president of Americans for ... immediate cease-fi... eral withdrawal.

New York C... Park Avenue, in... Pennsylvania S... rial service ... Church. Busi... dents urged ... bands. Col... New York ... school boa... and facult...

South C... morial s... of South ... of war ... dents ... get s... Nixon ... war.

W... rec... br... U... li...

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520

OCT 9 1969

Brooke pledges tax reform effort

OTTAWAY NEWS SERVICE
By ROBERT A. BERGER
Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The quality and, indeed, the very existence of many educational, medical and cultural services in Massachusetts is endangered unless Congress alters some provisions in the pending tax reform bill, U. S. Sen. Edward W. Brooke was told.

Brooke pledged to work for changes in tax reform provisions which would govern charitable contributions. He made the promise after meeting here with a dozen representatives of the state's major organizations which depend on charitable giving.

Spokesmen for the organizations estimated that $175 to $200 million in annual donations in Massachusetts will be affected by sections of the tax reform bill.

Most seriously threatened are gifts by private individuals to schools and colleges, hospitals, charities, and museums and other institutions for the arts, the spokesmen said.

Three principal aspects of the bill were mentioned as offering the most serious consequences.—

—Provisions which would drastically reduce the tax benefits to an individaul who donate money, property or securities to an institution—

—Provisions which tax and restrict the activities of private foundations—

Retroactive

—And clauses which make the proposed tax reforms retroactive to dates last spring, generally April 22. Spokesmen said this clause has already severely restricted the flow of gifts.

Brooke said he will urge the Senate finance committee to alter the reform bill. If that fails, he will offer amendments on the Senate floor to revive some of the tax preferences for charitable giving.

He told the group, however, that he does not anticipate passage of the bill this year. Meanwhile, he will work for either a congressional or Presidential declaration to eliminate the retroactive clause in the house version of the bill.

The presentation to Brooke was made earlier in the day to a number of Bay State congressmen.

Depend heavily

It is part of a huge onslaught of spokesmen for organizations throughout the country which depend heavily on charitable contributions. Such spokesmen have told the Senate finance committee, senators and congressmen that their continued excellence and existence is at stake in the tax reform bill.

"It is possible that some colleges and museums will cease to operate if this bill isn't amended," Brooke was told by Gerhard D. Bleicken, senior executive vice president of John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. Bleicken is a trustee of Boston University and of the BU Medical Center.

"Both the Congress and the courts have gone on record as recognizing that ... charitable organizations meet human needs which must be met — that they perform services which are beneficial to our society — that they relieve the state and federal governments of obligations which they might otherwise be called upon to provide." The tax bill threatens to revoke that policy, the group told Brooke.

Gifts tabulated

Gifts threatened include $107 million received in one year by 52 colleges — $23 million received by 87 hospitals — $7.4 million received by seven civic and cultural institutions — and $36 million received by voluntary health and welfare agencies, the group said. The figures are incomplete since they only reflect institutions surveyed.

Spokesmen urged that two principles be restored to the bill — the recognition that a donor is paying a self-imposed tax when he makes the gift — and the principle that a donor should not be taxed for unrealized capital gains.

Of particular concern to the group are provisions which would change the rules for gifts of appreciated property, and for charitable remainder trusts.

Organizations represented at the meeting include — Boston University, Children's Hospital Medical Center, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Museum of Science, the permanent charity fund, New England Aquarium.

Later this week spokesmen for the Boston Symphony, Boston College, Tufts University, Amherst College and Assumption College will meet with U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Peace Day Rally Planned for Boston Common

★ MORATORIUM
Continued from Page 1

On Monday Gov. Sargent endorsed the idea as a "day of contemplation," while Senate Pres. Maurice A. Donahue described it as a chance to "bear moral witness" against continuation of the war.

"When we first organized, we were afraid of being co-opted by the left," said state student coordinator Ken Hurwitz of Harvard. "Now it's happening from the other side."

In other Moratorium developments yesterday:

- A member of the Boston Student Mobilization Committee said he expects 100,000 to take part in the peace march and rally on Boston Common.
- The Nobel prize-winning chemist, Dr. George Wald of Harvard, will make three speeches in connection with the Oct. 15 programs, including a noon-time address on Cambridge Common prior to the Boston rally.
- Management of the 106-member Boston Symphony Orchestra, while taking no formal position in the cause, canceled a rehearsal on Oct. 15 to allow members and staff option to participate in planned protest activities.
- UMass officials said a normal academic schedule will be followed Oct. 15 and whether students and faculty boycott classes to observe the moratorium will be "matters of individual conscience."
- Boston University's Faculty of Liberal Arts voted to suspend classes Oct. 15 and, in a letter to president Nixon, called for immediate withdrawal of all U.S. forces from Vietnam.

Harvard faculty members amended a resolution supporting the moratorium to one of "recognition" of the anti-war protest, leaving any classroom boycott by students or professors as a matter of individual conscience.

The special two-hour meeting revolved around the anti-war resolve.

This concerned primarily the propriety of the faculty formally passing judgment on such a political matter, rather than individual judgments about the war.

A key vote to recess the session prior to a vote on the resolution was defeated 215 to 214.

This was followed by approval of the resolution declaring "as the sense of this faculty, that the war in Vietnam must not continue." It was proposed by John T. Edsall, professor of biological chemistry.

The tally was 255 for, 81 against, 150 abstaining.

"While our opinions differ in detail, we agree in urging the prompt, rapid and complete withdrawal of U.S. forces," read the resolution. "We support a united and sustained national effort to bring our troops home."

Dr. Wald, following the faculty meeting, said the "nub of the whole thing was that everyone who spoke unequivocably repudiated the war.

"And, when it came to a vote on whether the faculty should formally take a stand on this, the majority decided to do so," he said.

The resolution was specifically described as "not a precedent-setting action," but few members privately accepted this.

100,000

Several faculty members noted, however, that this status would not be imperiled unless the university vote tried to influence public legislation.

The estimate of 100,000 attendance at the Boston Common rally was made at a meeting among Moratorium, Boston Student Mobilization Committee and city representatives at Boston City Hall.

Peter Camejo, a member of the BSMC, said that while his organization is predicting 100,000, city officials believe no more than 10,000 will participate.

The meeting was held, participants said, in a "spirit of cooperation" to work out specific arrangements and to obtain permits for the afternoon parade and peace rally, tentatively scheduled for Parkman Bandstand.

Camejo, promising a non-violent demonstration, said the protest is to "show that a majority of Americans now oppose the war and we all realize violence has no place in such a demonstration."

He said marchers and demonstrators will have their own monitors, so as to require as little use of police as possible.

Police spokesmen, while conceding they don't anticipate trouble, said a large contingent of police will be assigned — as they would be to any sizeable gathering.

BSO VOTE

Marchers will form at five locations — Cambridge Common, Boston University, Northeastern University, the Fens Stadium and UMass-Boston — for the march to the Common.

The press director for the BSO said the musicians voted Monday night to ask management to cancel Wednesday's rehearsal. Although the vote was not known, such matters need two-thirds plus vote for passage.

Thomas D. Perry, orchestra manager, in a letter to the members, said management "congratulates the musicians on their initiative and concern," while taking no formal position itself.

"We ask that each member of the orchestra and staff feel entirely free to participate in or refrain from participation in the lawful events planned for that day to express opposition to the war," he wrote.

The Massachusetts Council of Churches issued a statement signed by Protestant, Catholic and Jewish Clergymen supporting the moratorium. "The first step is for us to stop the killing," the statement said.

The Massachusetts Chapter, Americans for Democratic Action; the Democratic Council of Massachusetts and the Ripon Society, a liberal Republican group, asked all office holders to endorse a statement supporting the moratorium.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 422,200

OCT 8 1969 N En

State Group Fights Tax Reform Bill

A delegation of prominent Massachusetts business and educational leaders met with the Bay State Congressional delegation in Washington yesterday calling for revision of sections of the tax reform bill now before the Senate Finance Committee.

Gerhard D. Bleicken, senior executive vice president of John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. and a trustee of Boston University, informed the delegation that the people of Massachusetts are threatened with the loss of educational, medical and cultural services totalling more than $200 million a year.

If provisions pertaining to charitable donations are not changed, Bleicken said, "the leadership of Massachusetts in education, medicine and cultural values would be diminished and perhaps ended."

The group which met with Sen. Edward W. Brooke and the State's Congressmen yesterday, plan to present their views to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy tomorrow.

Bleicken said the bill as it now stands is a disaster for institutions supported by gifts.

"It is possible that some colleges, and museums will cease to operate if this bill isn't amended," the insurance executive declared. Hospitals, medical centers and institutions such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sturbridge Village, and Plimouth Plantation could be in serious trouble, he added.

RECORD
MERIDEN, CONN.
(M) 21,303

OCT 10 1969 New England Newsclip

Moratorium Mushrooms

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Next Wednesday's moratorium to protest the ... University Chap... is gro... William Sloan Coffin addresses evening rally at Boston College, where classes will be canceled in the college of liberal arts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra canceled rehearsals. The town of Roxbury set up municipal observances.

Connecticut—Former Interior Secretary Stewart L. Udall Rep. Allard K. Lo... N.Y.

...ld, Chica... students plan downtown demonstration.

Wisconsin—Class boycott, rallies, marches and a fast planned at the University of Wisconsin. The Rev. Fred Kreuziger of St. Paul's Catholic Center said it would be peaceful and urged businessmen, students, workers and teachers to join. An antiwar ...ee plans a pa... n Avenue to the ...enter for a ral...

man Tom Kin... 2,000 to 3,000 will ...niversity of Texas ...ol in Austin. Three ... universities are the mag... demonstrations, but North Texas State University at Denton is the only one giving official, recognition. Memorial peace vigil scheduled near entrance to state fair, where Dallas clergymen and laymen will read names of war dead. A committee in Dallas expects 2,000 to 5,000 people at a rally at a city lake. "We're adult moderates, not hotheads," said ... man Norman ...

121.

Institutions Face 'Disaster' in Charity Credit Repeal

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 14 1969

By ARTHUR STRATTON
HT Staff Reporter

What has kept the world-renowned medical centers, educational institutions, museums and cultural sites, as well as churches and welfare and social agencies, in Massachusetts open has been the private gift.

There would be no Museum of Science, no Museum of Fine Arts, no Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, undoubtedly of more immieiate importance, perhaps no Children's Medical Center nor many of our voluntary hospitals, if it were not for private gifts amounting to about $200 million a year.

Now these institutions, and the public that they have been serving, are faced wih what their guardians flatly call "disaster."

THESE GIFTS, taken for granted in Boston and in Massachusetts for so many years, are destined to be wiped out under terms of the federal tax revision bill as they are written now.

If these current provisions become law, with drastic effects upon the gift support of Massachusetts institutions, many may fail, have their programs curtailed, or will become largely or totally dependent for their survival on tax support from state and federal sources.

In the words of the chairman of the Trustees Council of the Boston University Medical Center, Gerhard D. Bleicken:

"We support intelligent tax reform, but, as written, this bill is a disaster for institutions supported by gifts."

In those of Bradford Washburn, director of the Museum of Science:

"The very vitality of America is at stake here."

EVEN AT THIS MOMENT, charitably supported institutions report encountering major difficulties in current fund raising activities, because of the impact of the proposed changes.

Bleicken reports that the concept of dual public and private support of institutions, recognized by Congress for a half century through the tax incentive system, would be changed under the present provisions.

"It is possible that some colleges and museums will cease to operate if this bill is not amended," said Bleicken.

"The quality of education, medicine and culture in Massachusetts and the rest of the nation will suffer immeasurably. Services to millions of people in all these categories will have to be curtailed unless tuitions and medical fees are greatly increased or there are heavy tax increases to finance the necessary government support."

LAST YEAR, in Massachusetts, individuals, corporations, foundations, and others, contributed $36,100,000 to our United Funds, state chapters of national health organizations, and the programs of the Federated Jewish Philanthropies. These agencies helped to serve a large segment of the 6 million residents of the state. Without them, the impact on the local and state tax structure would be tremendous.

Last year in Massachusetts, 87 voluntary hospitals reported $23 million in gifts from individuals alone.

The 52 member institutions of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities in Massachusetts received $107, million in gifts from private sources during the 1966-67 fiscal year, the latest year for which comprehensive figures are available.

Last year, seven selected civic and cultural institutions in the state, such as the Museum of Science, and Boston Symphony Orchestra, to name two, received $7.4 million in gifts.

PROPOSALS IN THE complex tax revision bill pending could reduce severely the substantial gifts of major donors which play such an important role in the support of institutions of higher education, public and private, it is reported by the American Council on Education.

"Moreover, the complicated computations required would affect taxpayer's income not only in the year of the gift but in later years and make the planning of such gifts difficult, if not impossible," added the Council.

Massachusetts business, church, educational, medical and cultural leaders have been presenting their case to the Massachusetts delegation in Congress. In addition to Bleicken and Washburn they have included the Very Rev. George V. Kerr, representing Cardinal Cushing and the archdiocese of Boston; Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Very Rev. Georges Bissonnette, president of Assumption College, Dr. Burton C. Hallowell, president of Tufts University, the Very Rev. W. Seavey Joyce, president of Boston College, Dr. David Truman, president of Mount Holyoke College.

Also Dr. Leonard W. Cronkhite, Jr., general director of the Children's Hospital Medical Center, Brian Holland, tax counsel for Amherst College, Dr. Arland F. Christ-Janer, president of Boston University, Dr. Jerome Wiesner, provost of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Atty. Donald J. Hurley, president of the Committee on the Permanent Charity Fund, David Stone, president of the trustees of the New England Aquarium, and Atty. Carl J. Marold, MIT tax counsel.

Reforming the B.S.O.—III

More for adventurous

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

A fresh look by the Boston Symphony at its program policy would need to consider that there are adventurous listeners as well as conservative. At the moment, the adventurous ones — and I am by no means thinking only of a specifically "contemporary music public" — are rather neglected.

The seven subscription series the orchestra offers now are distinguished from one another mainly in length, from the 24 concerts on the Friday-Saturday series to the three on the fairly recently established Thursday "B" run. would it not be possible to give some of these series a special character according to their program content?

The Friday-Saturday pairs might contain all the repertory for a given season, as except for two or three pieces they do now, and would be a pool from which the programs for the shorter series are drawn. Some of the shorter series might continue to be what they essentially are now, 10 concerts (or six, or eight) for people who cannot afford or for any reason do not care to commit themselves to 24, but with the programs designed to give a reasonable picture of the full season.

But one also could extract a series mainly of popular and familiar works, programs of roughly the weight of those given at the Esplanade. Such a series also could serve as a platform for young performers who could be given a chance to play a Beethoven or Tchaikovsky concerto that has been done by someone with a big name on the previous Friday and Saturday.

Similarly, one could make up a series of concerta for that part of the public that is not terribly interested in the constant retreading of "the 50 pieces." To take an example from the current season: When Erich Leinsdorf returns as guest conductor in November, he means to temper the effect of Alban Berg's Altenberg songs and the excerpts from "Wozzeck" by playing the Tchaikovsky 6th after intermission. That, by the way, is known in the trade as Bernstein's law: You can do everything you like as long as you give 'em the "Pathetique" afterwards. Anyhow, I am certain there is a considerable part of the public that would prefer a concert in which the Berg pieces were combined, not with the Tchaikovsky, but with the Bruckner 8th, which appears on Leinsdorf's other Friday-Saturday program.

No one, in fact, knows this better than William Steinberg. From the time the Pittsburgh Symphony first began making regular visits to New York in the middle 50's, Steinberg decided that New York would not be best served by still more performances of the Brahms First, and so he went to Carnegie Hall with programs that were the cream — or at least a gathering of the most interesting specialties — of the whole Pittsburgh season, with works of Bruckner or Mahler at a time when that was anything other than a commonplace thing to do, with the New York premiere (48 years after their composition!) of Webern's Six Pieces, Op. 6, with a piece by Luigi Nono, who then had not been played by any other major orchestra, with an all-Schoenberg program in 1965, and so forth.

Steinberg could not at first fill Carnegie with these programs as, for example, George Szell could with his annual performance of the Schumann 4th and Beethoven's G major Piano Concerto, but the Pittsburgh series did draw a public, and that public even grew.

The Concertebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam has begun to offer, along with its "normally" made up concerts, a series of concerts addressed to listeners with special interests and sophisticated tastes, a counterpart to the B.B.C.'s Third Programme or Radiotelevisione Italiana's Terzo Programma. In this country, the Dallas Symphony has offered an extra series of four programs of contemporary music and has found a public for them. That they have done it is admirable, and that they have been able to make a go of it is good news, but I am not convinced that contemporary music is best served by being thus isolated.

The symphony orchestra as an instrument can be more flexibly used than it generally is, as I suggested here last week, and so, I believe, can the symphony orchestra as an institution. The Boston Symphony has expressed concern about the problem of attracting a new audience. It will have to be imaginative and bold. Market research does not work in the arts. It could not have foreseen the enormous popularity of Bach and Mahler, the impact of particular pieces like Penderecki's St. Luke Passion, the interest in electronic music, the vogues for Indian music and for Satie. The public, moreover, turned to most of these things with little encouragement from the big live-music marketing organizations, to say nothing of the critics. It was the phonograph record industry — and FM radio, which extends its impact — that proved to be the big tastemaker of the 60s, and the classical bestseller list that appears weekly in Billboard Magazine never ceases to offer surprises.

SOVIET PIANIST Vladimir Ashkenazy will give a recital at 3 p.m. next Sunday in Symphony Hall.

You can pass out questionnaires at concerts and find out something about the people who attend them, but how do you find out anything about the people who are not going? Many, obviously, are in no way potential concert public but some are. Is it a question of expenses? of insufficiently stimulating programs, especially compared with the riches available on records? of the present system of packaging music and the atmosphere at concerts?

Much of the present concert life needs to be questioned and re-examined, with gain to all, and in a society in which so much else is changing, it may want more than a cosmetic touch-up. Given its potential as a musicial instrument, and given the extraordinary community it serves, the Boston Symphony ought to be a uniquely exciting institution, and nobody, I fear, thinks of it quite like that just now. Its trustees could make it so, if they would.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 12 1969

122

BSO's new harpist loses nervousness

She's struck the right chord

By JEREMIAH V. MURPHY
Globe Staff

Ann Hobson of Philadelphia is 25 and very pretty. She is the new second harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the first rehearsal the other day she was very nervous.

Her car broke down, She had been in Boston only a few days, and she was not familiar with the M.B.T.A. system, so when she finally arrived at historic Symphony Hall her hands were shaking a little.

Then Conductor William Steinberg tapped his baton for attention and introduced Miss Hobson and another new member. The 104-member orchestra, composed of some of the world's best musicians, applauded politely.

One by one the orchestra members came over and were formally introduced to Ann Hobson. She said how do you do and smiled and how do you do, and after a while the rehearsal started.

Miss Hobson sat down at the harp, painted appropriately golden, and she still was nervous. She thought about that rehearsal yesterday in her new Brookline apartment, and she shook her head in mock wonder.

"I knew I wasn't going to play a note in that rehearsal because of the music schduled, I knew that," she said, "and I still was very nervous. It was the excitement of being with the Boston Symphony for the first time, of meeting the other musicians for the first time, of . . ."

A day or so later she played in her first concert here. The Elgar Symphony No. 2 called for a substantial harpist's role. Then Steinberg's baton signaled the start, and Miss Hobson's career with the Boston Symphony began. The mervousness was gone.The nervousness was gone.

Miss Hobson comes from a middle class Philadelphia family. Her mother was a professional pianist years ago. Ann started piano lessons when she was six, but she "wasn't very good and, besides, I didn't like it that much."

At Philadelphia High School of Girls, the orchestra needed a harpist. Ann gave it a try. After a couple of years Mrs. Mary Cataldo, a teacher there, convinced her to seek a musical career.

The next stop was the Philadelphia Musical Academy, then the Cleveland Institute of Music, where she moonlighted and played with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, then conducted by Steinberg.

Miss Hobson later played with the Washinton Symphony and a few months ago received a call to audition with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A panel of Steinberg, Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler and 15 musicians listened carefully to seven harpists and she was picked.

Now she is comfortably settle here and looking forward to combining a future that includes both marriage and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because Ann Hobson isn't nervous anymore.

NEW HARPIST with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Miss Ann Hobson, 25, of Brookline. (Bob Dean Photo)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 13 1969
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
OCT 4 1969

BSO Offers Shed For Dedication Of Du Bois Park

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has offered use of the Shed at Tanglewood for the Du Bois memorial dedication ceremony scheduled Oct. 18, in case of poor weather.

Fred Lord, one of the incorporators of the Du Bois memorial park on Route 23 in Great Barrington, said last night he had received a letter from the office of Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the BSO, confirming the availability of the shed should it be needed.

Among the speakers at the 2 p.m. ceremony will be Julian Bond, black member of the Georgia Legislature, and his father, Dr. Horace Mann Bond, who knew the late W.E.B. Du Bois personally.

CINCINNATI CALL & POST
CINCINNATI, O.
W. (NEGRO) CIRC. 4,500
OCT 18 69

Mr. Young is the author of the Newly published book, BEYOND RACISM.

TO BE EQUAL

By WHITNEY YOUNG

Bias On The Culture Front

Mr. Young

Most People are familiar with the facts about job discrimination against Negro workers, but an indication of just how pervasive such discrimination is can be seen by the unofficial ban on black artists by some cultural institutions.

An instance of this is a current case before the New York City Commission on Human Rights. Two musicians with wide symphony orchestra experience -- one was a cellist with the Pittsburgh Symphony for four years -- are charging that the prestigious New York Philharmonic refused to hire them because they are black.

The Philharmonic says no, color doesn't have anything to do with it, they're just not "qualified." But since the men have such high reputations and since the orchestra has hired only one black man in its hundred-year history, that explanation isn't very convincing.

A look at other major orchestras reveals the same picture: one black musician in Cleveland, another in Boston, other orchestras with no blacks. The numbers of black symphony musicians in major orchestras can be counted on the fingers of one hand.

If there is anything Negroes have been known for in this country, it is musical skill. White Americans sing and dance to music written, played, or inspired by black writers and performers. In fact, one of the stereotypes black people have been subjected to is the myth that we're "born with rhythm."

How strange it is then, to hear the Philharmonic's music director explain to the commission that his 99 percent white orchestra's audition standards take into account the "warmth that emanates" from a player, and his "rhythmic understanding." The stereotype is used against blacks, and then discarded when it comes to evaluating black musicians for jobs that supposedly value the very same qualities.

It is shameful for a major cultural institution one that gives concerts in a beautiful new hall financed by public subscription, to cling to the color bar while other fields are in the process of discarding it.

To claim that there aren't enough qualified black musicians is an ugly untruth, especially when New York also has the Symphony of the New World, an integrated ensemble. About 38 of that orchestra's 90 musicians are blacks, and the group has had excellent notices in its five year history.

While the Philharmonic says it can't find qualified blacks and refuses to hire 2 eminently qualified musicians, the Symphony of the New World found 38. But while the Philharmonic gets fat contrubitons to give summer concerts in the parks, the integrated Symphony of the New World can't raise enough money to give concerts for schoolchildren in the ghetto. Behind the red and gold facade of our major cultural institutions is the rotten stench of racism.

It extends to other fields, too. The movie industry depends on black stars like Sidney Poitier and Jim Brown to fill the movie houses.

Park Dedicated to DuBois Despite Outcry

By Jeremiah V. Murphy
Globe Staff

GREAT BARRINGTON — The late W.E.B. DuBois was a famous black who spent his life working for black equality. Yesterday in this town where he was born a park was dedicated in his memory and few of the white townspeople showed up.

On a rural road in this picture-book Berkshire mountain community in western Massachusetts, the ceremony took place before about 200, including Georgia's state Rep. Julian Bond.

The park has caused a controversy in this prosperous resort town of 7147, near the New York border. DuBois, born here in 1868, became a Communist at age 93, two years before he died in Accra, Ghana. He had supported Communist causes for many previous years.

The VFW and American Legion posts, Daughters of the American Revolution chapter and the John Birch Society here all oppose the memorial park on a four acre site outside of town.

Early last week selectmen voted to ban the dedication ceremony after an abutting owner, Theodore C. Hitchcock, claimed that the site on Rte. 23 violated zoning ordinances.

But town attorney William T. Murtagh ruled that banning the ceremony would be infringement on the right of assembly. He said the zoning question would be decided later.

Harold Beckwith, a former VFW post commander, said yesterday, "any American who believes in his country would not want a monument to a Communist. But a ruling has been made, and we'll abide by the law."

DuBois was born the son of a shopkeeper of French-West Indian ancestry and mother of American Negro and Dutch ancestry. He graduated with honors from Great Barrington High School in 1884 and townspeople created a scholarship to send him to Fish University in Nashville, Tenn.

William Edward Burghardt DuBois was a short, dignified man who wore a goatee. Through his long life he was a fighter for black equality.

He was a college professor, a co-founder of the NAACP in 1908 and for many years editor of its magazine, "The Crisis."

The author of 19 books, DuBois broke with the NAACP in 1948 because he felt the association had become too timid. Before leaving the United States to spend the last few years of his life in Africa, DuBois wrote "I was not an American. I was not a man I was, by long education and daily reminder, a colored man in a white world."

A few years ago Walter Wilson of nearby Chatham, N.Y., a real estate owner, unknowingly purchased the DuBois property, which now contains only the ruins of a chimney.

Wilson, a white Texan who has lived here for 25 years, was the committee chairman for establishing the park. He will turn over the site to the DuBois Foundation, which hopes to have the Federal government accept it as a national shrine.

Wilson said some opposition was prompted by "racial bigotry" but some of it was honest concern. "The spectre of communism is incidental compared to Dr. DuBois' overall contribution to this country," he said.

Committee co-chairman is Dr. Edmund W. Gordon of Columbia University Teachers College.

The plaque on the 10-ton boulder identifies DuBois as a distinguished historian, educator, civil rights leader and NAACP co-founder.

The plaque is in the form of an open book, and on the opposite page the inscription quotes from his book, "Souls of Black Folks." It reads, "The problem of the 20th century is the color line."

In his speech before the crowd, Rep. Bond said Dr. DuBois was correct when he said the problem is the color line. He said Dr. DuBois was correct also in his analysis that the problem is two-pronged: Economic and racial.

"Our difficulty is not solely racism," Bond said. "It is also economic."

He quoted Dr. DuBois as saying "I believe God made one blood for all races that dwell on earth. I believe all men, black and brown and white, are our brothers."

DuBois himself wrote many years ago about his hometown of Great Barrington: "In dusk of dawn, my town was shut in by its mountains and its provincialism, but it was a beautiful town."

JULIAN BOND MAKES HIS POINT
. . . verbally and physically

Candidate Finds He Can't Vote or Run

GLOUCESTER — John Burke voted in the recent Congressional election but is upset now because he can not vote in the Nov. 4 city election.

Burke is even more upset over the action of the Board of Registrars in declaring that he was not an eligible voter. Now he will be automatically disqualified from the city council race, in which he is a canndidate.

As a result the 62-year-old Burke has petitioned the Federal court in Boston to order his name restored to the voting list.

Burke, a former resident of Hampton, N. H., claims he has been living in Gloucester since Oct. 2, 1967. The registrars claim differently, saying he does not qualify under residency rules whichh require a voter to have been a resident for one year.

Conductor's Rapid Rise to Music Fame

BY KAREN MONSON

Time was when a young conductor might have fretted and studied for months before daring to undertake a Brahms symphony for the first time with a major orchestra. With that prospect ahead of him, Michael Tilson Thomas is so afraid of being bored that he is figuring out how to keep two or three things going at the same time.

There has been some confusion regarding Thomas' age. When cornered, he admits to being on the verge of 25, thus contradicting an earlier reference to being "23—rapidly approaching 24." On the subject of age in particular, his public image in general, he says "I think a great deal of ambiguity is good — surrounding you rather like a shadow."

Since the age of 21 (or 19, depending on which reports one believes) he has been building a reputation as one of Los Angeles' most promising conductors and

Please Turn to Page 14, Col. 1

Young Los Angeles conductor Michael Thomas has been named assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the age of 24.
Times photo by Fitzgerald Whitney

Conductor's Rise to Fame

Continued from First Page

pianists. He is probably best known for his work with the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra and as a frequent participant in the Monday Evening concerts.

During the season just past, as one of three maestros leading the Los Angeles Philharmonic in the Young People's Concerts, he took over some of the duties, if not the title, of assistant conductor.

Now, as our orchestra enters its second assistant-conductorless year, Thomas is taking a leave of absence from his graduate studies at USC and moving to Boston, where he has been named assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aura of Polish

Thomas' rapid rise to musical prominence, which has placed him on first-name terms with many of the best-known musicians both here and abroad, has imbued in the young Angeleno an aura of professional polish, determination and extreme self-assurance.

"When Charles Wilson resigned as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, the members of the orchestra turned in a petition asking that I be named to succeed him," Thomas said, expressing no apparent surprise at this turn of events.

He met Erich Leinsdorf, the former music director of the orchestra, last summer at Tanglewood. He did not meet future boss, William Steinberg, until this past March.

"Steinberg is a marvelous gentleman with a large amount of practical knowledge and experience," Thomas says. "The first time he saw me conduct was during a rehersal for a concert I was doing with the Boston Philharmonia — not the Symphony—in the East last month. He sat among the musicians and shook his head as if to say 'No, no, no!' all through the rehersal.

"But it turned out that he was very impressed.

But Thomas leaves Los Angeles without having been able to make a permanent break into the mainstream of the so-called musical establishment. His liaison with the Philharmonic ended abruptly.

"I finished my assigned duties and didn't hear any more from them. Zubin (Mehta) hasn't wanted an assistant conductor to replace Larry (Foster).

"When (Ernest) Fleischmann comes in as the new manager there will probably be a lot of changes in the orchestra's procedure, but no one has any idea exactly what they will be."

Besides taking over one or two pairs of Boston Symphony subscription concerts, Thomas' 1969-70 duties will include being the regular pianist with the orchestra's Chamber Players, serving as the permanent fixture of the conducting staff while Steinberg is away, and being present at all the orchestra's rehearsals.

"Steinberg has asked me to offer any comments and criticism I might have about the performances he's preparing. And he seems to be relying on me to do a good deal of modern music in the concerts I'll be conducting, as well as to take over some of the preparation of the new works scheduled for his concerts.

"If I'm conducting a work like a Brahms symphony, I'll manage to have some more interesting projects going elsewhere—contemporary music with the chamber group, for instance.

"Ideally, I'd like to divide my time between conducting both a symphony orchestra and a chamber orchestra, and playing chamber music. The days of the resident conductor are over. I don't know anyone my age who would accept the type of administrative responsibility — or anyone who wants to spend all his time with one orchestra."

Too Much

But in reference to Andre Previn's recent dismissal from the post of music director of the Houston orchestra, Thomas expressed what may be a contradictory viewpoint on the problem of overextending oneself:

"The difference between conductors in their 20s and those in their 40s is that we have had the chance to see them agree to do too many things and end up doing everything superficially. I have no intention of taking on too much work."

His views of himself seem to have been changing over past months. "I used to have idols—people I not only wanted to emulate, but people I actually wanted to be. Now I find that as much as I may enjoy working with these people (Pierre Boulez, for one), I have to go and do the things I do best on my own."

One of the areas Thomas used to espouse is "cybernetic nucleonics." "I was one of those musician-scientists. You know the type."

We wondered why being a concert pianist had been ruled out along with the cyber-whazzis.

"The solo piano repertory bores me, except for the Mozart concerti and several contemporary works."

And already, at age 23, Thomas has ruled out large parts of the rest of music as well. "I have no desire to conduct opera—I generally don't like it. And I won't conduct anything by Richard Strauss because I have no tolerance for his music."

What does he have yet to do?

"I'd love to do ballet with Balanchine, to do music from before 1650, and, of course, to concentrate on 20th-century works.

"It's time to force contemporary music on the public. People have a 6½ minute attention span—that's the time between TV commercials. The only people who can change that are the conductors and musicians themselves—but some of them need to learn a lot, too."

123.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony: The New Music

by Laura Shapiro

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has always run a heavily traditional concert schedule. This season the Symphony acquired a new assistant conductor, 24-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, who seems destined to give the concert schedule a more modern flavor.

I first met Thomas when he was conductor of a multi-media opera at Tanglewood in the summer of 1968. Elephant Steps, an "occult opera upon perception and upon accomplishment" by Stanley Silverman and Richard Foreman, employed not only films, slides, tapes, orchestra, chorus, soloists and a gypsy violinist, but also elephants, angels, and magicians, not to mention every conceivable style of western music. Thomas, cued and conducted these assembled forces with wit and precision; he also sang rock in a couple of the tapes; and at the end of the summer he received the Koussevitsky prize in conducting.

This is his first position in the East, outside of two summers at Tanglewood; but he's had an amazingly full career in California, his home state, and in Europe. Recently I asked him how all this came about.

"I was always very involved with music, there was always music around the house. I played a tremendous amount by ear, and then began lessons at USC. My primary interest was in science up 'til the time I was sixteen. Mineralogy, chemistry—crystallographic chemistry was my big field. I turned to music as I became more interested in myself, in the things inside me. Once I was in an orchestra and we sat down to read the Brahms Fourth. And the black notes transformed into—" he gestured wordlessly—"it's experiences like that, it's the whole being larger than the parts, in music."

Growing up in Los Angeles Thomas played the piano and conducted with many of today's most noted composers and instrumentalists—among them Igor Stravinsky; Ingolf Dahl and John Crown, his teachers at USC; and Alice Ehlers, who taught him harpsichord—"a remarkable, remarkable woman." Particularly influential were Piatagorsky and Pierre Boulez.

"With Boulez it was his insistance on knowing every aspect of a piece of music, his insistence on a multi-levelled, total conceptual mastery.

"Piatagorsky—you just grab up that whole piece and Vroom, just sock it out at people. It's the whole being greater than the parts again. He does it himself and can comunicate it as a teacher, the grand gesture of being a performer in the best sense. Just sock it over the footlights."

He was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the Bayreuth Festival of 1966, and then again at the 1967 Ojai Festival in California. The next two years he was himself conductor of the Ojai Festival, called the most important festival of new music on the west coast. Its directors have been many of the most significant figures in modern music—among them Lukas Foss, Stravinsky, Copland, and Ingolf Dahl. The west coast has typically enjoyed a freer and more adventurous musical climate than the east in terms of both composer and audience, and there's no doubt that a whiff of Pacific air will do a great deal to clear the must out of Symphony Hall.

Thomas On Moderns: Poor Performances

In a recent interview with Phoenix music critic Laura Shapiro, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new assistant conductor talked about modern music. Some of his reactions:

ON EDUCATING THE PUBLIC:

"Part of the poor acceptance of contemporary music is directly related to poor performances—performers not sympathetic to the music, not willing to spend the amount of time necessary to get into the piece. It shouldn't be administered like a prescription. I've played La Valse for you, and now I'm going to give you a spoonful of Stockhausen. It's good for you, although you may not like it. It should be people who really want to hear that music, and just say, here I am."

ON ELECTRONIC MUSIC:

"Electronics offer the possibilities to deal with certain kinds of musical situations which would be nearly impossible with live musicians. Suppose you want to deal with ratios like, say, 17.3/5.9 — tricky, shifty rhythmic relationships. They're a nightmare for players, they turn into counting machines. Other aspects of the piece, freer rhythms or more expressive figures, people can do better. I don't see it as any threat to live music at all. There are a lot of things that people can do much better. Even, to use a terrible word, much more efficiently."

ON MUSIC AS A PERSONAL SOUND WORLD:

"Composers like Stockhausen and Boulez were both concerned with their personal sound worlds, for their own appreciation and for those deft enough to do and understand the work. Now composers are creating sound worlds that can be appreciated by many more. Stockhausen's music is environmental. People lie on the floor and move around. It's very long, you have the choice to stay or leave. It's more plastic, free, things happening in a lot of different places."

ON LISTENING TO MUSIC:

'I think that how a piece is arrived at is no damn business of the audience. You understand I'm not putting down the audience, but they should come, and listen, and decide what they think. Whether a piece is arrived at by a Fibenacci series or total improvisation, the final judgment is simply, was it a good experience? As a performer or musician, I maybe can make certain predictions about what the resulting situation is likely to be, but that's based on familiarity with the situations. And I still can be pleasantly surprised. I think being surprised is great fun."

124.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
OCT 11 1969
New England

BSO Assistant at 24 a Restless Maestro

Record American Photos, Kevin Cole

ONE OF THE busiest men in music here today is Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's 24-year-old assistant conductor, who made his debut Friday. When Thomas stretches his arms to hold them ready the mood is electric. The air is charged with suspense. A sneeze you wouldn't dare. You inhale deeply, and then . . . "Okay, let's go!" calls Thomas. The show is on. His face is complex, never still as Thomas, seeking perfection, gets it.

Thomas as conductor...

By Ralph Locke

Last year, when the Boston Symphony announced the appointment of William Steinberg as the new Music Director, few of us realized that the orchestra would also be getting a new assistant conductor. Then we heard that Steinberg's choice for the post is 24 years old, with more experience as pianist than conductor. We began to wonder if this man is ready for the responsibility of conducting a major orchestra.

It is a pleasure to report that with his first concert this past weekend, Michael Tilson Thomas has put all our fears to rest. He is admirably prepared for the position, with a professional conducting technique and a sure, sensitive ear. But for all his specialized training, he has not forgotten (as his predecessor, Charles Wilson, apparently had) that technique is merely a necessary tool in the communication of the musical substance of a work.

Thomas's close identification with the music he conducts was clearest in the "Three Places in New England" of Charles Ives and Debussy's "La Mer." The Ives "orchestra set" was written over an 11-year period (1903-1914) and then sat in Ives's drawer for another 15 years until he had a chance, or the inclination, to orchestrate it. Perhaps as a result, the music does not hold together as well as it should. Ives's control of the large-scale form of the work does not approach the transcendental quality of the most intense moments in the individual pieces. Thomas responded to these moemnts with a combination of clear-headedness and fervor which helped clarify their function in the entire work. The result was the most coherent performance of any difficult Ives work this reviewer has ever heard.

Thomas's success in bringing out the formal balances of a work was even more prominent in the Dubussy. Of course, "La Mer" has a built-in musical scenario which the Ives – for all its programmatic content – does not. But there are few conductors who can bring to what may be Debussy's greatest orchestra work the clarity of inner voices and orchestral balance which the scoring demands, and at the same time keep sight of the dramatic arch which structures the emotional content of the work. Thomas managed to capture all of this – especially the heady fresh-air atmosphere of the last movement – in a performance reminiscent of those by his mentor, Pierre Boulez.

The resemblance to Boulez was even more pronounced in the performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 98, which opened the program. But in this case the comparison is less of a compliment. Just as in Boulez's performance last year of the Sinfonia Concertante, Thomas's Haydn was too smooth and elegant for the good of the music. The paradox of Haydn's work is that he was a robust, earthy man writing in a formalized, aristocratic style. It is hard to strike the right balance between these two opposite characteristics, but Thomas's – and Boulez's – overemphasis of tonal beauty at the expense of a kind of gutsy impact is an example of sinning in the worse of two undesirable directions.

The remaining piece on the program was the Variations ("Aldous Huxley in Memoriam") of Igor Stravinsky. One of his recent exercises in 12-tone manipulation, it is as good an example as can be found of the composer's failure to adapt himself successfully to the style of another culture and another era. The language is, of course, essentially a development from Schoenberg, but Stravinsky's use of it is devoid of the peculiar tension and emotional struggle for which 12-tone is, in a sense, the appropriate language. What results is neither good 12-tone music (as in Berg or the best of Schoenberg) or good Stravinsky (as in the early works, the Symphony in Three Movements, or Agon.)

The performance of the Stravinsky was (as were the other works) a model of clarity and intensity. More than anything else, the entire concert was a testament to the talent of Michael Tilson Thomas. It is good to welcome him to Boston, and we hope to be hearing more from him in the near future.

24-year-old conductor:

classical member of the rock generation

... and off the podium

by Ralph Locke

"I grew up in a house of Russian actors and the idea of going into multiple personalities, the theatrical intensity, the expressionism -that was all around me from the very beginning, part of me." Multiple personalities are the most striking thing about Michael Tilson Thomas. Twenty-five years old, he looks and acts like a charter member of the don't-trust-anyone-over-30 generation. Talking during dinner at Joyce Chen's, dressed in a brown leather jacket, wide silk tie, and boots, he was a model of veracity.

But Michael also has one foot firmly planted in the classical music establishment. A pianist, composer, and conductor by training, this year he assumed the challenging post of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Michael combines his interest in "serious music" with a youthful exuberance (and occasional nuttiness) that, especially in the self-serious music world is as rare as it is engaging. Of course, part of it is just that he is so young. His tastes, like his clothes, hit you straight off. "Of course I'm very busy, but I keep things in balance by visiting museums,listening to records. Not the usual stuff. James Brown, Country Joe and the Fish's first album, Gagaku music, Bessie Smith-I haven't made up my mind yet about "Tommy"-Javanese, Balinese music."

But the "usual stuff"-classical music-is never far from his mind. Sometimes his attitude is serious and very straight. "You know Stravinsky must be one of the greatest composers of all time. Just look at the care with which every measure is written, the control over inner voices. It's the minor works that show his mastery most clearly."

Often his enthusiasm over composers expresses itself more in the vocabulary of the rock generation. "There was a time I had to conduct Schoenberg's Five Pieces, and I really studied the thing and listened to it and played it at the piano. I mean I was really into those pieces. You know, as if normally the object is out there, but suddenly it's in here and you possess it-or it possesses you...Transfiguration."

Everyone calls him Michael, and admittedly anything more formal catches in the throat. But his ideas about music and its appeal are far in advance of his age, and they deserve attention. "People should be exposed to the total thing of music. They shouldn't know just Western music of the last few centuries. Of course it may be hard at the beginning with something really different.But familiarity is everything. As I was growing up, I heard Schoenbergand Stravinsky played on the phonograph all the time. I mean,when you grow up listening to the Schoenberg String Quartets and Pierrot Lunaire, they'll never sound dissonant to you.

"I conducted Youth Concerts the past two years with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and I learned a lot about the way kids hear music. For example I don't think that 10 year old kids are able to appreciate, I don't know, say Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. They haven't experienced the rhetoric yet in their own lives. I really think the ontogeny business holds: every person has to go through the 'ages of man' in which the state of their mind parallels a stage in history. music history too. The teenager,in high-school, well he's Lockean, rationalistic, Haydn will be fine for him. But when you hit sophomoritis in college, it's the same old romanticism. self-pity, who am I. Time for the Pathetique and the Ring cycle.

But there's something more. It's standard to try to give kids music from the classical period-Eine Kleine Nachtumusik or whatever. I tried it, explaining sonata form and so on, and sometimes it works. But if they're not used to listening to that kind of music, if they're really used to James Brown, then a Haydn symphony is really going to sound pretty dull to them. So I gave them some all-out percussion music by Varese and they loved it!"

Despite his experience in conducting, both alone and assisting Pierre Boulez at the Bayreuth Wagner Festival, he only settled on conducting as a career last year. It was after his first summer as a conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Center. "Tanglewood really did something very important for me. When I came there, if people asked me what I did, I would say, well, I play piano, I conduct, I compose...When I got out of there, I knew I was a conductor."

Supporting his decision was the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize which he won that summer. As a result, he was invited by the Boston Philharmonic to conduct this past winter, and William Steinberg-the new Symphony conductor-came to hear him both in rehearsal and in the final concert. Impressed by what he saw and heard, Steinberg decided that this was the man to be his assistant.

Michael Tilson Thomas has a busy year ahead of him. He must be familiar with every work to be performed by the orchestra, prepared to step in if any conductors (guest conductors as well as Steinberg) should not be able to perform. In addition, he will act as pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and will conduct one concert of his own-including the local premiere of Stravinsky's recent Huxley Variations. In his spare time, he will be making a second two-piano recording with Ralph Grierson, following up their recording of "The Rite of Spring" in Stravinsky's original version. "And besides," he adds, "people keep telling me I'm now Symphony Hall's most eligible bachelor."

After the meal at Joyce Chen's, the waiter brought us some fortune cookies. Before we opened them, a friend suggested to Michael that he should read "New Opportunities Beckon". Michael smiled wanly. Even if nothing else comes up in the near future, he knows he's got his hands full. But he also knows the thrill it will be to conduct the orchestra for the first time. "The incomprehensibly marvelous idea of the King of instruments and the Boston Symphony Orchestra." He shakes his head slowly. "Awesome."

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,600
OCT 15 1969

125

PERFORMING ARTS

Money 'n' Muse

Symphony Opera

By Mary Wiegers

Negotiations between the National Symphony Association and the striking musicians, members of the American Federation of Musicians, Local 161-710, were still stalled after a three and a half hour session yesterday in the office of federal mediator Harold Mills.

The symphony managing director, M. Robert Rogers, said he would make an announcement today on whether concerts scheduled for next Tuesday and Wednesday would be canceled or postponed. "If we can have a rehearsal by Sunday, we can put on next week's concerts."

The opening concerts of the season, scheduled for Oct. 14 and 15 were postponed because of the strike.

The symphony business manager, Robert Stull, said no definite time and date has been set to continue the talks. "We are subject to call."

"Several minor points were discussed," in yesterday's session, Stull said, but no agreement was reached.

"We tried to isolate one major point on which we disagreed, but were unable to do so," he said.

Rogers said, "I think that when the symphony musicians in this country began to ask for year-round employment, they didn't re-

See SYMPHONY, B4, Col. 1

United Press International

NEW YORK—Rudolf Bing, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, is prepared to refund subscriptions for the current season that has so far failed to open because of labor problems.

In a letter which will go out to subscribers shortly, Bing said the impasse in reaching contract agreement with 11 unions was "even more grave" than before. The Met was to have opened Sept. 15 and the few top vocal stars still under contract will be released Nov. 15.

"We have not canceled the season, but the season is gradually canceling itself," Bing said.

Bing cited the high cost of maintaining even a darkened opera house with its requirements of office staff, maintenance and security. It is believed the weekly cost of keeping its stars under contract has cost the Met almost $200,000 a week.

The general manager said many subscribers have offered to forego a refund and make their subscription a donation, adding that he hoped this would be a general pattern. The opera company now operates with a $3.5 million annual deficit which has to be made up by contributions from the public.

The main stumbling blocks to a settlement have been the refusal of unions representing the orchestra, chorus and ballet to accept the Met's wage offer, which Bing claims would make the musicians, singers and dancers the highest paid in their field in the nation.

The offer would bring musicians, now earning $16,468 a year, up to $20,000 by the 1971-72 season; chorisetrs, now earning $10,669, up to $14,500, and dancers, now earning $6,700, up to $10,000. The Met estimates that the annual deficit by 1971-72 will be $5.8 million.

All of the unions have offered to work without a contract so the season could open, but the Met refused even to go into rehearsals. Bing said the offer to work was only a "half truth" because the unions reserved the right to strike at any time of their choosing.

Bing admits that bitter memories of a strike threat on the night of the company's 1966 opening at its new Lincln Center house have made him wary of letting the unions have a club to hold over management's head. Union officials say they are bitter, too, because management refused to give musicians their vacation pay this summer and appealed a state ruling granting all employees unemployment benefits. The appeal continues to block these payments.

The singers also were bitter. Tenor James McCracken said that if the nation's aluminum companies were on strike and "we suddenly had no pop-top cans in this country, there'd be round the clock negotiations and an uninterrupted flow of beer while the talks went on.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

OCT 12 1969

Symphony Contract Negotiations Still Stalled

SYMPHONY, From B1

alize the strain it would put on them."

"The community can't absorb all the extra services required to provide a full year's employment, so we must take the orchestra on tour.

"We thoroughly understand that musicians would rather not go on long tours. It's even harder on management than it is on the musicians. We have to plan them, then apologize for everything that happens later. But it's our obligation to produce revenue as the spread between expenses and what comes in grows even more enormous."

Rogers disputed the contention of the musicians that on a tour last year with Arthur Fiedler the buses consistently arrived in a town at 7 o'clock, forcing musicians to play without rest or dinner.

"I wasn't along, but I think that only happened about once. I would have known about it because I would have paid overtime, and I paid overtime on only one day."

On the musicians' per diem allowance, he said the $10 did not include hotel room. "We pay their hotel accomodations. Other symphonies give musicians about $20, but they have to pay for their hotel out of that."

On the issue of splitting up the symphony—sending half on tour and keeping half at home, Rogers said, "We learned that from the Boston Symphony. They send half of their orchestra to Tanglewood each year to play Mozart and the remainder stays in Boston to play the Esplanade Concerts. And it hasn't hurt their reputation at all."

He said the management was offering the musicians a fixed day off in the second and third year of their contract, and it would cost the Symphony $15,000.

He added that having an orchestra audition committee to screen applicants is already in the contracts.

With the advent of a new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra a new era appears to have begun for Friday afternoon Symphony-goers. Suddenly the "in" thing is to know something about the music that the ladies trot dutifully to hear each week, and two of the city's leading organizations are doing something about it.

The New England Conservatory of Music is offering their "Friends" Friday morning courses at the Conservatory followed by luncheon in the students' dining room. The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is inviting all its "Friends" to attend a new Stage Door Lecture Series and a Box Luncheon.

There will be four of these lectures at which members of the orchestra will speak. They will be held in Symphony Hall at 11:30 promptly, and will be followed by a Box Luncheon before the start of the concert at 2 p.m. Chairmen of the series are Mrs. George E. Bates of Boston and Mrs. David Bird of Cambridge.

The first speaker will be Michel Sasson, Strings on Nov. 21; Jan. 23 will see Felix Viscuglia, Winds; the third will be Ralph Pottle, Brass on March 13, and Charles Smith, Percussion will end the series on April 17.

There will be four of the popular Pre-Symphony Luncheons also during the winter, to be held once again at Horticultural Hall. The dates for these are Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 13 and April 24. They are so popular that they are an almost instant sell-out so it is advisable to make reservations as soon as possible.

Mrs. George A. Parson of Beacon Hill and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich of Marblehead are cochairmen of the luncheon series, with each individual event under the auspices of a different area group of the Council of Friends.

Cochairmen of the Council of Friends are Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr. of Chestnut Hill.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

OCT 10 1969

---

previous address was St. Lawrence University, a hockey rival of Brown's.

* * *

GOOD NEIGHBORLINESS department (brass section): The Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra undoubtedly would have given its kingdom for four Wagner tubas, needed in Saturday's performance of music from the composer's Die Goetterdaemmerung. It did not have to. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was kind enough to lend the instruments, and to permit the Philharmonic to keep them also for its Nov. 22 concert, when the Bruckner 7th Symphony is programmed.

In today's Rhode Islander you may read of Saturday's soloist Eileen Far-

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

OCT 19 1969 New Englar

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

OCT 17 1969

ARTS BODY NAMES A NEW PRESIDENT

Associated Council Elects John McFadyen, Architect

By GRACE GLUECK

John H. McFadyen, an architect here, has been elected president for the second time of the Associated Councils of the Arts, a national, nonprofit membership organization that supports the arts in the United States and Canada.

Replacing Nancy Hanks, who last month was named chairman of the National Council on the Arts by President Nixon, Mr. McFadyen resumes a post he held from 1966 to 1968.

The Associated Councils, whose membership includes well over 600 state and community arts councils and arts centers, attempts to formulate "broad national policy" in the arts, and to implement it with action programs. It gives consultative service to local groups, organizes conferences and publishes books an da quarterly magazine, Cultural Affairs.

Proposals on the Arts

Mr. McFadyen said yesterday that he would travel a great deal "to communicate ideas and theories generated at Associated Councils conferences."

Explaining his view that major arts institutions should be treated as "national resources," he said: "I'd like to see the various levels of government, in partnership with business, take over their support. Then individuals and foundations would have more freedom to become creative patrons, to devote their attention to exploring and stimualting new art forms, and collect in a private way."

Mr. McFadyen, who received B.A. and M.A. degrees from Princeton University, participated in the design of the Saratoga (N. Y.) Performing Arts Center, among other facilities.

Five new members have also been elected to the Associated Councils' board of directors.

They are Roger L. Stevens, board chairman of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, and past chirman of the National Council on the Arts; Lane Kirkland, secretary-treasurer of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.; David Rockefeller Jr., development coordinator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; William Ruder, board chairman of Ruder & Finn, Inc., a New York public relations firm, and Durward Varner, chancellor of Oakland University, Rochester, Mich.

Symphony Opens Rehearsals

The best way to discover, or decide, or revel in what music is all about is to get yourself inside it while it's happening. When it stops being a performance and starts coming from you, then the sequence of each note upon each note makes supreme and amazing sense. Fortunately, you can arrive at a similar state of aesthetic bliss without making a fool of yourself onstage, through the good intervention of the Boston Symphony. Under the inspiration of conducter Charles Munch, the symphony began in 1950 to devote occasional Thursday evenings to open rehearsals of the weekend's program.

The philosophy behind this experiment was to open up music to those who wanted to see where a performance came from and how it had been constructed—an intellectual domain obviously reserved for the sensitive but penniless, with the happy result that rehearsal tickets are, by BSO standards, cheap—$17.50 for a series of seven, or three dollars apiece at the door. Unlike other series there is usually a healthy supply of tickets available the night of each rehearsal.

If you get there an hour or so before it starts you will have a glorious choice of seats: they are all unreserved and you'll see people sprinting from balcony to balcony trying to decide if it's worth giving up a row of basses in order to see the pianist's hands. Allow me to put in a plug for first balcony, stage left; although there is a large contingent that swears by the extreme rear of the hall.

One of the nicest parts of an open rehearsal is that hour you spend in Symphony Hall because you got there so early. It's an easy place to commune with if you go in for that sort of thing, all dim and quiet, and statues hovering over. What I like is watching people trickle on stage in sweaters and shirtsleeves, carrying flutes and violas and trumpets, and they tune together in beautiful cacaphony and suddenly it's an orchestra.

During the rehearsal they will often stop to work on a particular few bars, revealing all the little mechanisms that make it sound the way it does on the record. It can be a tremendously illuminating experience if you've felt the lack of any solid grip on the music you like. Concerts that set you awash in oblivious delight are great, but may not offer an especially concrete or lasting relation to what you've heard. Sometimes rehearsals are so concrete they're immoveable—Leinsdorf once turned around after an interminable number of stops and indicated that the audience might leave if it wanted, but the orchestra was staying on. I must admit the exodus was hasty.

—LAURA SHAPIRO

Free BSO Seats

This year the Boston Symphony Orchestra is offering 150 one dollar seats on a first-come first-served basis for its previously impenetrable Saturday night concerts. Unlike the regular Friday afternoon "rush" tickets for the second balcony, these seats were drawn at random from unsold subscriptions and may be located anywhere from tenth row center to obscurity row baloncy. Both Friday and Saturday rush seats go on sale two hours before the concert, but the lines start spiralling several hours before that. Come early and bring a book.

SCHEDULE

Theatre

THE ICEMAN COMETH: The Charles Playhouse, 76 Warrenton Street, through October. (DE 8-9393)

ADAPTATION and NEXT: The Theatre Company of Boston, 136 Mass. Ave., Boston, has extended the production through October and maybe later. (HA 6-6609)

HOW TO MAKE A WOMAN: The Caravan Theatre, 1555 Mass. Ave. Performances Friday and Saturday at 9 pm. through November. (491-9579)

CAT ON A HOT TIN ROOF: The Loeb Drama Center, 64 Brattle Street, Cambridge. Oct. 23-Nov. 1. (UN 4-2630)

THE PROPOSITION: Satrical revue. 241 Hampshire Street, Inman Square, Cambridge. (868-0088)

TRIO: Three one-act plays—Tour, Sweet Eros, and Metaphors: The Craft Experimental Theatre, 98 Brookline Avenue. No one under 18 admitted. (262-7777 after noon)

CARNIVAL: Fridays and Saturdays only — Oct. 17 through Nov. 1. The Rose Coffee House, 130-131 Lincoln St., Boston (338-7081)

Musical Events

GARDNER MUSEUM CONCERTS 280 The Fenway, Boston (566-1401) Oct. 16: Pianist Barbara Blegen Brown plays Scarlatti and Schumann. Oct. 18: John Sessions and Patricia Monk at cello and piano, playing Mendelssohn and Dallapiccola. Oct. 19: Bach and Rameau, via harpsichordist William Read and violinist David Abel. These concerts begin at 3:00 p.m. and are free.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Symphony Hall, Boston (266-1492) Oct. 16: William Steinberg leads an open rehearsal of Lees, Symphony no. 2; Mozart, Piano Concerto in C minor, K. 491, with soloist Robert Casadesus; and Brahms, Symphony no. 2. 7:30 pm. The program will be repeated on Oct 17 at 2:00 pm and Oct. 18 at 8:30 pm.

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY of Music 290 Huntington Avenue, Boston (262-1120) Oct. 17: Flute music, lots of it, from the eighteenth and twentieth centuries. John Heiss. Oct. 22: Leon Barzin will conduct the NEC Symphony Orchestra in a program as yet unannounced. Boston concerts are at 8:30 pm in Jordan Hall (262-2412) and both are free.

KING'S CHAPEL CONCERT SERIES Tremont Street, Boston (KE 6-2950) Oct. 19: A Handel Festival, with the Forest Music (score reconstructed by Daniel Pinkham—an American premiere); and Dixit Dominus, with soloists Jane Bryden, Barbara Wallace, D'Anna Fortunato, Frank Hoffmeister and William Darrow. Daniel Pinkham conducting members of the Cambridge Festival Chamber Orchestra. At 5:00 pm and free.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL Memorial Auditorium, Worchester (754-3231) Oct 20: Six Ehrling will conduct Birgit Nelsson and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra in Bizet's Symphony no. 1; two Puccini arias; and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel, followed by the finale from his Salome. 8:15 pm. Oct. 21: The program features a specially commissioned work by Ulysses Kay: Once There Was a Man, A Convenant for Our Time. Also the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert; Brittens' Voices of Today; and Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta. The Worchester Chorus joins Sixten Ehrling and the Detroit Symphony, and William Warfield will narrate Mr. Kay's piece 8:15 pm.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE Wellesley (235-0320) Oct. 19: A joint choral concert with the Wellesley College Choir and the Williams College Choral Society, in Houghton Memorial Chapel at 8:00 pm. Free.

SYMPHONY HALL, Boston (266-1492) Oct. 19: Vladimar Ashkenazy. The Soviet pianist plays Two Novellettes and Humoresque, by Schumann, and Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibit 126.

SMART SET
18 By ROSE WALSH

New Trustees Credit to Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, TUESDAY, OCT. 21, 1969

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra has elected two distinguished music devotees to its Board of Trustees — Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, and Richard P. Chapman, chairman of New England Merchants National Bank, Boston. Both have been members of the Orchestra's Board of Overseers since its organization last year. Talcott, Banks, president of the Board, made the announcement.

Chicago-born, Vassar alumna Mrs. Fahnestock, a dedicated worker for several fine causes since coming to Boston after her marriage to Harris Fahnestock (assistant to the Director, Lincoln Laboratory, M. I. T.), immediately became active in Boston Symphony affairs. As co-chairman of the Orchestra's 85th Anniversary Ball, she was instrumental in raising $162,000 through that one event.

She planned the "Symphonic Extravaganza" which launched the Orchestra's successful Ford Foundation fund drive and most recently supervised the reception at which 900 Friends of the Boston Symphony greeted the Orchestra's new Music Director, William Steinberg.

* * *

BSO Elects Two Trustees

TWO NEW MEMBERS of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been elected. They are Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord and Richard P. Chapman of Brookline, chairman of the New England Merchants National Bank. Both Mrs. Fahnestock and Mr. Chapman have been members of the orchestra's Board of Overseers since its organization last year.

Mrs. Fahnestock, born in Chicago, was a member of the first women's committee of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra when still a student. Following graduation from Vassar College, where she majored in music, she was married to Harris Fahnestock, now assistant to the director of the Lincoln Laboratory, M.I.T., moved to Boston, and became active in Boston Symphony affairs.

As co-chairman of the orchestra's 85th anniversary dinner and Golden Trumpet Ball, she was instrumental in raising $162,000 through that one event. In 1967, Mrs. Fahnestock was the first delegate from Boston to the New York meeting of the National Association of Women's Committees for Symphony Orchestras.

Richard Chapman was born in Iowa and was graduated from Carleton College, Northfield, Minn. After receiving his degree from the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration, he joined the Merchants National Bank, of which he became president in 1952 and chairman in 1964. He is co-chairman of the Corporate Division of the orchestra's 90th Anniversary Fund, which has a goal of 6 million dollars.

* * *

"Fran" Fahnestock is also president of the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America in Mass.; a board member of Project HOPE; the Pan American Society of New England and Ellis Memorial Settlement House (top worker for its forthcoming 10th annual Ellis Memorial Antiques Show).

Mr. Chapman was born in Iowa and educated in Minnesota, where he was graduated from Carleton College in 1925. After receiving his degree from the Harvard Business School in 1927, he joined the Merchants National Bank, now N. E. Merchants National Bank, of which he became president in 1952 and chairman in 1964. During the Boston Symphony's Ford Foundation fund drive, Mr. Chapman served in the key post of campaign treasurer. He is currently co-chairman with Trustee Phillip K. Allen of the Corporate Division of the Orchestra's 90th Anniversary Fund, which has an overall goal of $6 million. He has been active in numerous charitable and civic organizations.

* * *

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

OCT 21 1969 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 18 1969

ing patiently about sealed bids and absentee bids.

A flutter of congratulations came as Mrs. Harris Fahnestock came across from Symphony Hall — she's been made a trustee for the BSO, and well she might (even if there have only been two women in the whole 89-year history of the orchestra).

If you read your Globe, you know the wonders Fran Fahnestock has whipped up, from the Golden Trumpet Ball in Symphony Hall through a dozen star turns to the reception a fortnight ago for new conductor, William Steinburg. They're lucky to have her.

Donors for the Museum auction run to six double-columned entries in the

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 17 1969 Ne Engl

for the first American tour in 1963.

Our toughest critics, in New York, Boston, Washington, Chicago ar[illegible] ise for an ensemble th[illegible] phony orchestras go.

Well, [illegible] day may be approachi[illegible] eat reputation may just [illegible]

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
[illegible] 103,181

OCT 19 1969 New England

FOR EXAMPLE: When the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Portland several years ago, it was hired by Bowdoin College for a special music celebration honoring Carl Ruggles. The cost was prohibitive, over $10,000. And although City Hall Auditorium was nearly sold out, the college lost money on the event, the first appearance of the great Boston orchestra in Portland in more than 30 years.

The Boston Symphony may not perform in this state for another 30 years, unless it is invited by the Portland Symphony.

There is a healthy trend developing in this country now for smaller orchestras to sponsor appearances by major ensembles. The reason is that the more modest organization adds lustre to its name by such a move, and it additionally benefits by large ticket sales. Indeed, the small orchestra can sell out a season on the strength of one guest orchestra booking.

But until the time arrives when it is both practical and logical for the Portland Symphony to make this move, we shall hear chiefly foreign orchestras of repute only if the Portland Concert Association hires them.

It is one of the incongruities of the concert booking system that one soloist can cost more than an orchestra of 104 musicians.

Hans Wallat turns out to be a substitute of a substitute. Originally it was expected that Hans-Isserstedt would direct, and if he was not available, that Wilhelm Schuchter would be on the podium.

Wallat has aroused much excitement on the continent, appearing as a guest with the Berlin Philharmonic and the Orchestre Philharmonique de Paris. Like many young European conductors, he came through the ranks of opera. His first major engagement was as chief conductor of the Leipsig Opera in 1958 when he was 29 years old. Since then he has directed an entire Ring Cycle, quite an accomplishment for a young director, especially at the Wagnerian shrine of Bayreuth.

Presently he is general music director and conductor of the State Philharmonic Orchestra of Bremen and director of the Mannheim Academy of Music.

What you'll hear at youth concerts

Dates and programs for the eleventh season of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall have been announced by Harry Ellis Dickson, Music Director of Youth Concerts, and Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, vice-chairman.

As before, each Youth Concert series consists of three Saturday morning programs from 11 to 12 o'clock in Symphony Hall. The first series will be November 8, January 10 and March 14; the second will be November 15, January 17 and March 21. Harry Ellis Dickson conducts an orchestra of 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and talks to the youngsters about the music being played. The programs are designed for students in grades 5-12.

The first program, November 8 and 15, is called 'This is the orchestra' and opens with Britten's Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, narrated by Andrew Raeburn. The program isolates each section of the Orchestra, detailing its functions.

The second program, January 17 and 25, called 'Same Axe—Different Bag', illustrates the different styles that composers have used with exactly the same instruments. The music of Stravinsky, Anderson, Ibert, Milhaud, Haydn and Schuller will be played.

'A Festival Program' is the name of the last program, March 14 and 21. Berstein's Candide. Overture, Saint-Saens' Carnival of the Animals and the Ballad for Americans are among the American works.

Tickets for the Youth Concerts are sold only by series, at $6 a series, and are available through local school departments or by writing Mrs. Manual Kurland, Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts. 02115.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 19 1969 New England Newsclip

Students to attend concert in Boston

MARLBORO - To continue offering the best possible educational and recreational opportunities to the children of Marlboro, a series of three Youth Concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, will be attended by several local students. 047

The first concert will take place Saturday, November 8, at Symphony Hall, Boston. A bus will leave the parking area at the rear of City Hall at 9:30 a.m. and will return to the same area at 1:45 p.m. The Marlboro Recreation Department and the Marlboro Fine Arts Group are co-sponsoring the program.

STAR
NORTHBORO, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,600

OCT 29 1969

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 126,176

OCT 19 1969 New England

A Bassist With An Agent

By GORDON EMERSON
Register Music Reviewer

William Rhein, BSO bassist.

After exchanging only a few brief remarks with New Haven native William Rhein, it becomes obvious that he is a very sharp guy. He possesses, for example, that rare combination of seeming paradoxes which augur well for the future of a junior executive or budding salesman. He's composed, sure and assertive, but at the same time relaxed, outgoing and an excellent listener. He is serious about whatever it is that he talks about, but he reserves a broad smile and frequent spurts of animation to counterpoint the flow of words at just the right moments.

He could, in fact, very well be a junior executive. But instead he is—at 29 — one of the most successful and sought after double-bassists in America. As his many local friends know, he joined the bass section of the New York Philharmonic while still a student at Juilliard in 1961, and six years later left to become assistant principal bassist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and principal bassist of the Boston Pops. Also, he is one of the few bassists extant who frequently appears as a solo recitalist, and recently he acquired an agent to represent him in this capacity, which, for a bassist, is almost unheard of.

Even today, bass recitals remain a rarity since so few bassists have attained virtuoso status. Also — and to some extent because of this — only a scant solo repertoire exists for the instrument, and composers have shown very little interest in turning their best efforts toward the behemoth of the string family. Ever since he was 12 Bill has wanted to change this state of affairs, and he is now beginning to attain national prominence as a performer who can unleash the expressive potentialities of an instrument usually relegated to playing the "bottom part" and an occasional thematic fragment.

Unique Qualities

While fingering a small plastic-tipped cigar which he hopes will help him break the cigarette habit, Bill recently explained that "people have to be shown that the bass has its own unique solo qualities and that it need not be only a sluggish version of a cello. In the past the problem has been that bass players were usually converts from other string instruments and were inferior players—at least in terms of the great violinists and cellists. Due to this, most composers were never made aware of what was really possible with the instrument. Even as recently as the 1920s for example, an older bass player at his prime generally couldn't compete with the 'new breed' of player who started his musical life as a bassist and really took the instrument seriously."

As exceptions, the Hillhouse High School graduate listed Dragonetti (1743-1846) as the first bass virtuoso, followed by Bottesini (1822-1889) and, of course, former Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky who began his career as a double bassist. He continued: "And speaking again of composers not being aware of the possibilities of the instrument due to inferior players—Beethoven had the good fortune to have known and worked with Dragonetti, and the Scherzo of the 'Fifth Symphony' (in

See NEW HAVEN Page 6

PLAN TEMPLE ISRAEL SISTERHOOD EVENT—Highlight of the Dec. 3 annual luncheon of Temple Israel Sisterhood of Boston will be a talk on "Inside the B.S.O." by Boston Symphony violinist and assistant "Pops" conductor Harry Ellis Dickson. Among those planning the event are (left to right) Mmes. William Weisberg, program book co-chairman; Abraham Levensohn, In Memoriams; Philip Brown, Hobby Shop and Harry P. Cole, general chairman.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 23 1969

New Haven Bassist Makes It With The BSO

(Continued from Page 1)

which the bass is treated by the composer with a heretofore unknown prominence) probably resulted from his association with Dragonetti."

Due to his deep interest in the history of the instrument as well as its performance, Bill has been involved in a project with Yale scholar George Lam for the past eight months concerning Dragonetti, and several of the 18th century virtuoso's pieces unearthed by Lam at the British Museum. Lam, in addition to his work as Research Associate and Assistant Editor of the Horace Walpole Correspondence at the University Library, is a practicing bassist himself, and has been a mainstay of the New Haven Symphony bass section since 1969. As a result of their research, Bill will offer what may well be the American premiere of Dragonetti's "Concerto for Bass in G major, Op. 1" with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January of next year. Bill pointed out that Dragonetti — who was bassist at Saint Mark's Cathedral in Venice — transported many fine basses to England and that England is still "a great place to buy an instrument."

Toscanini Disciple

Bill's own instrument was the one used and owned by Samuel Levitan when the latter was assistant principal with the NBC Symphony under Toscanini, and he credits his years of study with Levitan as "a real turning point in my life. More than any other bassist I have ever heard, I would like to identify my own playing with Mr. Levitan's." Bill now owns two instruments, and reserves the 1834 Joseph Rocca instrument — purchased from his former teacher — for solo engagements.

Debut At Woolsey

The young bassist's first featured solo role took place on the stage of Woolsey Hall with the New Haven Symphony. He recalled — now reaching for a cigarette — that he had been a regular bassist with the Symphony since his sophomore year at Hillhouse, and he returned during his first year at Juilliard to perform Mozart's thorny "Perquesta bella mano, K. 612" with the orchestra. This vintage Mozart is generally performed by a cellist since it lies so high on the bass, and even highly competent players find it extremely difficult to bring off in performance. He also noted that he feels "fortunate to have survived those years at Hillhouse since there was nothing there for a string player at the time. I finally resorted to learning to play the tuba so that I could go to Boston with the Hillhouse band."

His teacher for his cram course in tuba playing was also his first string bass teacher: namely his father Sid Rhein. The elder Rhein had been on the road as both a tuba player and bassist with the bands of Eddie Duchin and Sammy Kaye before deciding to leave the insecurities of the band business and settle in New Haven. He has continued to be active as a player, however, and in addition to dance work and sojourns in the pit of the Shubert Theatre, Sid has been a member of the New Haven Symphony bass section for 24 years. Bill noted that "When dad felt I needed a better teacher he arranged for me to audition with Mr. Levitan in New York, and after I was accepted drove me in once a week for a lesson. Fortunately, Mr. Levitan gave me a personal scholarship so that I could study with him on a regular basis." Bill's mother, also a musician, attended the Yale Music School as a pianist and organist.

Though it was primarily due to his father's encouragement that Bill entered the musical world as bassist, he had the rare opportunity to at least partially repay the favor during the past Labor Day Weekend at Tanglewood — the Boston Symphony's summer home. Sid had driven to the Berkshire mecca to hear Arthur Fiedler conduct the Pops version of the BSO in the season closer. During the dress rehearsal one of the bassists (there are nine in all) became ill, and Bill told the orchestra's manager that his father was in town and could fill in. After checking the musician's union regulations it was decided that it would be okay, and Sid was whisked in for the remainder of the dress rehearsal, and performed in the program on Labor Day eve. In the past Sid had played under Fiedler during the latter's guest conducting stints with the New Haven Symphony, but this was, in a sense, his "big league" symphonic debut. Though he was a few chairs down the bass row from his former student, one easily guesses that he took double pride on the occasion.

Finally lighting the cigarette, Bill noted — as if to make up for his momentary weakening — that he knows he will eventually become victorious as he did with the "battle of the bulge": "After a few years of relative deprivation as a student at Juilliard, my acceptance by the New York Philharmonic went to my stomach rather than my head. I ended up a 210-pound weakling, but after a lot of will power, I'm now back at 165. It really helps my playing, too — at least I can get closer to the instrument."

Conductor's Role

One is bound to gain impressions about conductors and conducting after stints with two of America's top symphonic ensembles, and Bill was candid about his. In general he feels that a conductor must "do more than simply call signals to the players — he must inspire both the players and the audience. In short, he must have charisma. The perfect marriage of talent in a conductor is one of showmanship and musicianship, and that's why the major orchestras are having so much trouble finding new young blood that can fill the bill in both respects."

In specific, he spoke of the two "regulars" under whom he has worked: "Lennie (Bernstein) — who is a very warm guy — was only with us 13 to 14 weeks a season, so we had a constant parade of guest conductors. As a player it meant a perpetual readjustment, which in a way was very good. It kept us on our toes and necessitated a constant resharpening and malleability. When Lennie returned from guest conducting stints he would often say, 'what's happened to my orchestra?' What had happened was that we had fallen into other grooves. But it never took long before we were his orchestra again.

"I admire Mr. Leinsdorf tremendously. He is a very sensitive musician, and with contemporary music and the opera repertoire in particular he is a real giant. In the case of opera, he taught me to enjoy it for the first time in my life."

Recording Tricks

Clearly the recent refinements in recording and splicing techniques have changed everyone's image of what constitutes an ideal performance, and in this context Bill recalled one session with the New York Philharmonic and a famous guest soloist that garnered the Saturday Review "Record of the Year" award about nine years ago: "We were collaborating with a famous violinist in the Beethoven 'Violin Concerto' which, as you know, is perhaps a three quarters of an hour piece. Though this man was — and still is — unquestionably a great artist, this was not one of his best days and we spent about 12 hours in the recording studio before we had enough good takes to make a 'perfect' performance. This necessitated an enormous amount of splicing. In one sense, then, advanced splicing techniques have enabled us to come closer to perfection than ever before, but I feel that in a way this spoils things for a live audience. It's great for what it is, but as a result people expect a degree of perfection in live performance that is impossible to attain."

We closed our conversation with some talk about contemporary music. Due to his prominence in the string bass movement, combined with his virtuosity as a performer, at least two contemporary composers have written works dedicated to him, including a six-minute piece for unaccompanied bass by Robert Seeley of the New England Conservatory. He described both works as "immensely gratifying," but in general is troubled by many of the current trends in contemporary music: "Naturally as a musician, I'm all for experimentation. And, of course, 'serious' music. We all expect that. But I wish that there were more composers who were also interested in just writing music—in returning to some kind of recognizable structure. Audiences would unquestionably be happier, too. I mean, if a musician like myself has to hear a piece three times before he gets anything at all from it, then something's wrong."

* * *

If some might disagree with this point of view — though one finds it difficult to imagine how — few would not agree that Bill Rhein is playing a crucial role in transporting the orchestra's deepest voice to the front of the bus.

VARIETY SPICES MUSICAL LIFE

By CHAPELL WHITE
Atlanta Journal Music Critic

The Atlanta Journal
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
ARTS and Music
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1969 3-F

One summer evening several years ago five people were sharing a dinner table at an inn across the road from Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds its annual Berkshire Festival.

The concert that night was to include two major numbers, a brand new Concerto for Orchestra by Goffredo Petrassi and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Although all five of these people had presumably come to Tanglewood to hear music, only one of the five planned to attend that concert. Two were staying away because they feared a new work; the other two professed to be bored with overly-familiar Tchaikovsky.

The musical moral of this sad little incident (it's true, incidentally; I was the one going to the concert) is that he who tries to please everybody may end up pleasing nobody.

And yet that is by no means the whole story. A specialized program or a one-composer program, such as Atlanta has heard on several occasions recently, can be valuable, but the fault on that evening at Tanglewood was with the reluctant listeners, not with the conductor who made up the program. The Petrassi concerto turned out to be strong and accessible, rugged in its sound and reserved in its expressive content. After its dissonance, Tchaikovsky's rich harmony and lush, emotional melodies never sounded better. Both compositions benefitted from the juxtaposition.

THE TRUTH IS that most audiences on most occasions want variety. In the late 18th century, when public concerts were just beginning to be an important force in the musical life of Europe, virtually all music was contemporary, and the style of the time was remarkably unified.

Concert programs were therefore arranged for a maximum of variety in medium — a symphony, a few operatic arias, a concerto or maybe two concertos for different instruments, another symphony, and perhaps a piece for chorus and orchestra to close. Nobody dreamed of a whole evening devoted to one instrument or even devoted exclusively to symphonic music.

In our day, the vast accessible repertory of the past and the sharp divisions of style in contemporary music have created an embarrassment of riches. Those who select concert programs are faced with unprecedented problems and responsibilities. Survival demands that they cater to all shades of public taste; responsibility demands that the heritage of the past be kept alive while encouraging the creations of our time. And of course there is the artist's own taste and personal commitment to be considered.

It is obvious that more thought and imagination must go into the building of programs than ever before. Although the old principle of variety will probably, of necessity, continue to be basic, to this must be added the principle of balance over a long span of time. This is exactly the point at which a local performing organization such as a resident symphony is superior to a mixed series of visiting artists. Variety with balance can only be achieved where there is control: it will not happen haphazardly.

THERE IS A paradox in the quest for a well-balanced musical diet, and I think it is one especially worth noting in Atlanta. The specialized program, which in itself seeks depth rather than balance, is an essential element in the balance of our entire concert life. I have pointed out several times in the past this community's need for a concentrated chamber music series. To this can be added the need for a series given to avant garde music.

The recent success of specialized programs and integrated series does not, of course, signal the decline and death of mixed, varied programs. It should, however, suggest the possibility of developing hitherto untouched specialized audiences. Atlanta should now be big enough, lively enough, and rich enough to have some of everything and something for everyone.

The way is open for experimentation. The only things we can be sure will not work are the old, timeworn formulas.

The Atlanta Journal
AND
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
SUN. 536,497
OCT 26 1969

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,000
SEP 26 1969

ART SHOW

An exhibition of paintings and drawings, featuring an unusual technique with plastics, pigments and semi-precious stones, will be open to the public on four successive Saturdays beginning Nov. 1 at The Gallery, Boston Symphony Hall. The collection, on view for Boston Symphony goers from Oct. 23 to Nov. 22, is open to the public on Nov. 1, 8, 15 and 22, from 2 to 5 p.m. Paintings are the work of Virginia Precourt, a local artist.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
NOV 6 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 23 1969

NEWTON SYMPHONY

Soloists appearing this season with the Newton Symphony include Boston Symphony virtuosi Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Burton Fine, solo viola; Jules Eskin, solo cello; Ralph Gomberg, solo oboe; Max Hobart, third concertmaster. Conductor Michel Sasson has begun rehearsals and Sunday, Nov. 9, is the date of the opening concert. Contact Mrs. Leo Stolbach regarding tickets and season subscriptions.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 23 1969

PITTSBURGH, PA.
JEWISH CHRONICLE
W. 14,725
OCT 30 1969

★

Contralto Maureen Forrester and Tenor Jean Cox will perform the Mahler "Das Lied von der Erde" with William Steinberg conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, Oct. 31 and Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2 at Syria Mosque. Also featured on the program will be the American Premiere of Vladimir Vogel's Ostinato Perpetuo and Ritmica Ostinata.

This concert pair marks music director William Steinberg's return to Pittsburgh following his highly successful opening of the Boston Symphony season where he also serves as Music Director of that famous orchestra. Dr. Steinberg will conduct the next three pairs of concerts in Pittsburgh as well as conducting the orchestra on a New York and mid-west tour during November.

Cardillo Has Been With BSO 30 Years

NORTH ADAMS — Pasquale "Patsy" A. Cardillo is making his 30th year as clarinetist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cardillo has played second clarinet in the symphony under directors Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux, and Erich Leinsdorf. He has also played first clarinet in the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler.

Cardillo's father, Anthony, a foreman for the North Adams Department of Public Works, used to play clarinet at all city outings.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
SEP 16 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 21 1969 E

Einstein Also Was Violinist

Boston Symphony's Laning Humphrey asks whether there is mental affinity between the musician and the scientist? The veteran publicist notes that Albert Einstein enjoyed playing the violin and did so in a quartet during a scientific conference at Harvard. And a group of Harvard astronomers once formed a little orchestra to play music written by Sir William Herschel, the telescope designer, astronomer, church organist and composer . . . Other examples: Swiss-born electronics expert Adrian Stapfer, now on the staff of Wang Laboratories in Tewksbury, who's an Arthur Fiedler fan and plays the flute; Burton Fine, principal viola of Boston Symphony Orchestra, an ex-chemist with NASA; and another chemist-musician, Russian operatic composer, Alexander Borodin who wrote "Prince Igor."

EINSTEIN

meet frank hatch

"On Saturday morning as soon as the Times is delivered the Front Page, the editorial, the war, the scandal, the mariages, the funnies, etc. etc. all are forgotten until I open North Shore '69 to see what Professor Hatch is 'opening up' today," writes a reader to our author of "Where but New England," Francis W. Hatch

Frank Hatch has enriched the pages of North Shore Magazine since its inception with his versatile, witty, poignant and poetic columns. His facile pen produces everything from comic lyrics about pollution or the dump to piano music to accoumpany it plus family plays, and prose comentary.

For those of you who are newer readers, here are some vital statistics about this Yankee writer: he is a graduate of Harvard College, has two recordings of old songs published on the Bertand Llabel, is retired from his position of New England manager

127

New Haven Bassist Makes It With The BSO

(Continued from Page 1)

which the bass is treated by the composer with a heretofore unknown prominence) probably resulted from his association with Dragonetti."

Due to his deep interest in the history of the instrument as well as its performance, Bill has been involved in a project with Yale scholar George Lam for the past eight months concerning Dragonetti, and several of the 18th century virtuoso's pieces unearthed by Lam at the British Museum. Lam, in addition to his work as Research Associate and Assistant Editor of the Horace Walpole Correspondence at the University Library, is a practicing bassist himself, and has been a mainstay of the New Haven Symphony bass section since 1969. As a result of their research, Bill will offer what may well be the American premiere of Dragonetti's "Concerto for Bass in G major, Op. 1" with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January of next year. Bill pointed out that Dragonetti — who was bassist at Saint Mark's Cathedral in Venice — transported many fine basses to England and that England is still "a great place to buy an instrument."

Toscanini Disciple

Bill's own instrument was the one used and owned by Samuel Levitan when the latter was assistant principal with the NBC Symphony under Toscanini, and he credits his years of study with Levitan as "a real turning point in my life. More than any other bassist I have ever heard, I would like to identify my own playing with Mr. Levitan's." Bill now owns two instruments, and reserves the 1834 Joseph Rocca instrument — purchased from his former teacher — for solo engagements.

Debut At Woolsey

The young bassist's first featured solo role took place on the stage of Woolsey Hall with the New Haven Symphony. He recalled — now reaching for a cigarette — that he had been a regular bassist with the Symphony since his sophomore year at Hillhouse, and he returned during his first year at Juilliard to perform Mozart's thorny "Perquesta bella mano, K. 612" with the orchestra. This vintage Mozart is generally performed by a cellist since it lies so high on the bass, and even highly competent players find it extremely difficult to bring off in performance. He also noted that he feels "fortunate to have survived those years at Hillhouse since there was nothing there for a string player at the time. I finally resorted to learning to play the tuba so that I could go to Boston with the Hillhouse band."

His teacher for his cram course in tuba playing was also his first string bass teacher: namely his father Sid Rhein. The elder Rhein had been on the road as both a tuba player and bassist with the bands of Eddie Duchin and Sammy Kaye before deciding to leave the insecurities of the band business and settle in New Haven. He has continued to be active as a player, however, and in addition to dance work and sojourns in the pit of the Shubert Theatre, Sid has been a member of the New Haven Symphony bass section for 24 years. Bill noted that "When dad felt I needed a better teacher he arranged for me to audition with Mr. Levitan in New York, and after I was accepted drove me in once a week for a lesson. Fortunately, Mr. Levitan gave me a personal scholarship so that I could study with him on a regular basis." Bill's mother, also a musician, attended the Yale Music School as a pianist and organist.

Though it was primarily due to his father's encouragement that Bill entered the musical world as bassist, he had the rare opportunity to at least partially repay the favor during the past Labor Day Weekend at Tanglewood — the Boston Symphony's summer home. Sid had driven to the Berkshire mecca to hear Arthur Fiedler conduct the Pops version of the BSO in the season closer. During the dress rehearsal one of the bassists (there are nine in all) became ill, and Bill told the orchestra's manager that his father was in town and could fill in. After checking the musician's union regulations it was decided that it would be okay, and Sid was whisked in for the remainder of the dress rehearsal, and performed in the program on Labor Day eve. In the past Sid had played under Fiedler during the latter's guest conducting stints with the New Haven Symphony, but this was, in a sense, his "big league" symphonic debut. Though he was a few chairs down the bass row from his former student, one easily guesses that he took double pride on the occasion.

Finally lighting the cigarette, Bill noted — as if to make up for his momentary weakening — that he knows he will eventually become victorious as he did with the "battle of the bulge": "After a few years of relative deprivation as a student at Juilliard, my acceptance by the New York Philharmonic went to my stomach rather than my head. I ended up a 210-pound weakling, but after a lot of will power, I'm now back at 165. It really helps my playing, too — at least I can get closer to the instrument."

Conductor's Role

One is bound to gain impressions about conductors and conducting after stints with two of America's top symphonic ensembles, and Bill was candid about his. In general he feels that a conductor must "do more than simply call signals to the players — he must inspire both the players and the audience. In short, he must have charisma. The perfect marriage of talent in a conductor is one of showmanship and musicianship, and that's why the major orchestras are having so much trouble finding new young blood that can fill the bill in both respects."

In specific, he spoke of the two "regulars" under whom he has worked: "Lennie (Bernstein) — who is a very warm guy — was only with us 13 to 14 weeks a season, so we had a constant parade of guest conductors. As a player it meant a perpetual readjustment, which in a way was very good. It kept us on our toes and necessitated a constant resharpening and malleability. When Lennie returned from guest conducting stints he would often say, 'what's happened to my orchestra?' What had happened was that we had fallen into other grooves. But it never took long before we were his orchestra again.

"I admire Mr. Leinsdorf tremendously. He is a very sensitive musician, and with contemporary music and the opera repertoire in particular he is a real giant. In the case of opera, he taught me to enjoy it for the first time in my life."

Recording Tricks

Clearly the recent refinements in recording and splicing techniques have changed everyone's image of what constitutes an ideal performance, and in this context Bill recalled one session with the New York Philharmonic and a famous guest soloist that garnered the Saturday Review "Record of the Year" award about nine years ago: "We were collaborating with a famous violinist in the Beethoven 'Violin Concerto' which, as you know, is perhaps a three quarters of an hour piece. Though this man was — and still is — unquestionably a great artist, this was not one of his best days and we spent about 12 hours in the recording studio before we had enough good takes to make a 'perfect' performance. This necessitated an enormous amount of splicing. In one sense, then, advanced splicing techniques have enabled us to come closer to perfection than ever before, but I feel that in a way this spoils things for a live audience. It's great for what it is, but as a result people expect a degree of perfection in live performance that is impossible to attain."

We closed our conversation with some talk about contemporary music. Due to his prominence in the string bass movement, combined with his virtuosity as a performer, at least two contemporary composers have written works dedicated to him, including a six-minute piece for unaccompanied bass by Robert Seeley of the New England Conservatory. He described both works as "immensely gratifying," but in general is troubled by many of the current trends in contemporary music: "Naturally as a musician, I'm all for experimentation. And, of course, 'serious' music. We all expect that. But I wish that there were more composers who were also interested in just writing music—in returning to some kind of recognizable structure. Audiences would unquestionably be happier, too. I mean, if a musician like myself has to hear a piece three times before he gets anything at all from it, then something's wrong."

* * *

If some might disagree with this point of view — though one finds it difficult to imagine how — few would not agree that Bill Rhein is playing a crucial role in transporting the orchestra's deepest voice to the front of the bus.

VARIETY SPICES MUSICAL LIFE

By CHAPELL WHITE
Atlanta Journal Music Critic

The Atlanta Journal
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
ARTS and Music
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1969 3-F

One summer evening several years ago five people were sharing a dinner table at an inn across the road from Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds its annual Berkshire Festival.

The concert that night was to include two major numbers, a brand new Concerto for Orchestra by Goffredo Petrassi and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Although all five of these people had presumably come to Tanglewood to hear music, only one of the five planned to attend that concert. Two were staying away because they feared a new work; the other two professed to be bored with overly-familiar Tchaikovsky.

The musical moral of this sad little incident (it's true, incidentally; I was the one going to the concert) is that he who tries to please everybody may end up pleasing nobody.

And yet that is by no means the whole story. A specialized program or a one-composer program, such as Atlanta has heard on several occasions recently, can be valuable, but the fault on that evening at Tanglewood was with the reluctant listeners, not with the conductor who made up the program. The Petrassi concerto turned out to be strong and accessible, rugged in its sound and reserved in its expressive content. After its dissonance, Tchaikovsky's rich harmony and lush, emotional melodies never sounded better. Both compositions benefitted from the juxtaposition.

THE TRUTH IS that most audiences on most occasions want variety. In the late 18th century, when public concerts were just beginning to be an important force in the musical life of Europe, virtually all music was contemporary, and the style of the time was remarkably unified.

Concert programs were therefore arranged for a maximum of variety in medium — a symphony, a few operatic arias, a concerto or maybe two concertos for different instruments, another symphony, and perhaps a piece for chorus and orchestra to close. Nobody dreamed of a whole evening devoted to one instrument or even devoted exclusively to symphonic music.

In our day, the vast accessible repertory of the past and the sharp divisions of style in contemporary music have created an embarrassment of riches. Those who select concert programs are faced with unprecedented problems and responsibilities. Survival demands that they cater to all shades of public taste; responsibility demands that the heritage of the past be kept alive while encouraging the creations of our time. And of course there is the artist's own taste and personal commitment to be considered.

It is obvious that more thought and imagination must go into the building of programs than ever before. Although the old principle of variety will probably, of necessity, continue to be basic, to this must be added the principle of balance over a long span of time. This is exactly the point at which a local performing organization such as a resident symphony is superior to a mixed series of visiting artists. Variety with balance can only be achieved where there is control: it will not happen haphazardly.

THERE IS A paradox in the quest for a well-balanced musical diet, and I think it is one especially worth noting in Atlanta. The specialized program, which in itself seeks depth rather than balance, is an essential element in the balance of our entire concert life. I have pointed out several times in the past this community's need for a concentrated chamber music series. To this can be added the need for a series given to avant garde music.

The recent success of specialized programs and integrated series does not, of course, signal the decline and death of mixed, varied programs. It should, however, suggest the possibility of developing hitherto untouched specialized audiences. Atlanta should now be big enough, lively enough, and rich enough to have some of everything and something for everyone.

The way is open for experimentation. The only things we can be sure will not work are the old, timeworn formulas.

The Atlanta Journal
AND
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
SUN. 536,497
OCT 26 1969

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,000
SEP 26 1969

and Fiedler, is retired from his position as New England manager of Batton, Barton, Durstine and Osborne, advertising firm, resides with his wife, Marjory, in Castine, Maine, but occasionally returns to Boston to visit at Beacon Hill, where they also lived, is the father of one son, Representative Francis W. Hatch, Jr. of Beverly and grandfather of five children who summer with them and about whom he frequently writes charming stories, is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (that was his photo in the society columns a few years ago when he escorted Jackie Kennedy to the BSO ball), a trustee of Massachusetts General Hospital, was vice president of the Boy Scouts of America, and has written for New Yorker, Saturday Review, Saturday Evening Post, This Week, Yankee, Down East; the Boston Globe Magazine, and the Christian Science Monitor.

Frank Hatch's writings often combine humor and contemporary problems. For instance, here is one of his poems about pollution:

All rivers in our forebears' time
New York to Kennebunk were drinkable unthinkable
today they're filled with gunk.

Our lakes and ponds were crystal clear when Thoreau passed this way a single gill has power to kill the man who drinks today.

We take pride in having him as a regular contributor to North Shore '69.

The editor

ART SHOW

An exhibition of paintings and drawings, featuring an unusual technique with plastics, pigments and semi-precious stones, will be open to the public on four successive Saturdays beginning Nov. 1 at The Gallery, Boston Symphony Hall. The collection, on view for Boston Symphony goers from Oct. 23 to Nov. 22, is open to the public on Nov. 1, 8, 15 and 22, from 2 to 5 p.m. Paintings are the work of Virginia Precourt, a local artist.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
NOV 6 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 23 1969

NEWTON SYMPHONY

Soloists appearing this season with the Newton Symphony include Boston Symphony virtuosi Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Burton Fine, solo viola; Jules Eskin, solo cello; Ralph Gomberg, solo oboe; Max Hobart, third concertmaster. Conductor Michel Sasson has begun rehearsals and Sunday, Nov. 9, is the date of the opening concert. Contact Mrs. Leo Stolbach regarding tickets and season subscriptions.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 23 1969

PITTSBURGH, PA.
JEWISH CHRONICLE
W. 14,725
OCT 30 1969

★

Contralto Maureen Forrester and Tenor Jean Cox will perform the Mahler "Das Lied von der Erde" with William Steinberg conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, Oct. 31 and Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2 at Syria Mosque. Also featured on the program will be the American Premiere of Vladimir Vogel's Ostinato Perpetuo and Ritmica Ostinata.

This concert pair marks music director William Steinberg's return to Pittsburgh following his highly successful opening of the Boston Symphony season where he also serves as Music Director of that famous orchestra. Dr. Steinberg will conduct the next three pairs of concerts in Pittsburgh as well as conducting the orchestra on a New York and mid-west tour during November.

Cardillo Has Been With BSO 30 Years

NORTH ADAMS — Pasquale "Patsy" A. Cardillo is marking his 30th year as clarinetist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cardillo has played second clarinet in the symphony under directors Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux, and Erich Leinsdorf. He has also played first clarinet in the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler.

Cardillo's father, Anthony, a foreman for the North Adams Department of Public Works, used to play clarinet at all city outings.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
SEP 16 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 21 1969

Einstein Also Was Violinist

Boston Symphony's Laning Humphrey asks whether there is mental affinity between the musician and the scientist? The veteran publicist notes that Albert Einstein enjoyed playing the violin and did so in a quartet during a scientific conference at Harvard. And a group of Harvard astronomers once formed a little orchestra to play music written by Sir William Herschel, the telescope designer, astronomer, church organist and composer . . . Other examples: Swiss-born electronics expert Adrian Stapfer, now on the staff of Wang Laboratories in Tewksbury, who's an Arthur Fiedler fan and plays the flute; Burton Fine, principal viola of Boston Symphony Orchestra, an ex-chemist with NASA, and another chemist-musician, Russian operatic composer, Alexander Borodin who wrote "Prince Igor."

EINSTEIN

128.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It is exciting indeed to be present when a new star bursts upon the world of music, art or the theater. It is a privilege that New Yorkers take somewhat for granted, but one that Bostonians have only rarely. As a result this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are even more exciting than usual for not only does the orchestra have a new director in the person of William Steinberg, but it also has a young genius of 24 as assistant conductor whose talents in the musical world are going to make his name a household word before long.

He is charming, gentle and so incredibly young to have the gifts and experience to sway the 102 members of one of the world's foremost orchestras to his bidding. He does it, though, this young Michael Tilson Thomas, and lifts the orchestra to new heights as he gestures and sways with the grace of a ballet dancer on the podium.

Fresh from his dramatic success in Philharmonic Hall in New York where he substituted for an ailing William Steinberg, Mr. Thomas conducted a concert at Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening consisting of Hayden, Stravinsky and Debussy. Then, with the acclaim still ringing in his ears, he donned his navy blue fireman's jacket that he found in San Francisco, with its rows of gold stars the former owner had earned for years of service, and joined his friends at a party given in his honor at the Dartmouth Place apartment of old friend Marvin Schofer. Mr. Schofer and co-host David Levenson are part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra family and they had provided sustenance and huge trays of cold cuts and potato salad very welcome to a hungry young conductor fresh from a triumph.

Conversation was of music and about music for this is the life of most of the guests at the party. Mr. Thomas, who has a delightful sense of humor and is typical of any young man of 24, was being congratulated on his recent recording of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" on Angel Records that is being acclaimed as one of the truly great records of 1969. He comes from the extremely talented Thomashefsky family well-known in the Yiddish theater for generations. His father changed the name to Thomas, and he was amusing the guests at the party with tales of the problems this presents when he is conducting in Wales for everyone is convinced he is Welsh. He confuses them by saying he belongs to the Kiev branch of Thomases.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was there, still in his white tie and tails; Earl Wilde, the noted pianist; Harry Kraut, another member of the symphony family; Thomas Perry Jr., the orchestra's manager, and his delightful wife; the host's mother, Mrs. Paul Schofer, from New York for the party; Andrew Raeburn, program chairman of the orchestra, and many more there to congratulate this talented young man.

Boston can be proud indeed to have him to lead their orchestra — the world is going to be very envious that he is here with us.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,287

OCT 30 1969

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by Harry Trask)

DISCUSSING THE SYMPHONY are Mrs. James H. Perkins of Westwood, a trustee, and Michael Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas will be guest of honor this evening at a reception to be given by Marvin Y. Schofer and David S. Levenson, at Mr. Schofer's South End apartment after the concert at Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 28 1969

Understudy hits jack pot

BSO's Thomas gets a classic break

About a month ago, just before he conducted a Boston Symphony concert for the first time, Michael Tilson Thomas was thinking that when his initial Friday-Saturday program — Haydn's 98th Symphony, "Three Places in New England" by Ives, Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer" — was due to come back later in the season on some of the other subscription series, he might drop a couple of the pieces and throw in something else, something the orchestra already would have done under another conductor earlier on.

Thomas was thinking of the practical problems — would something as difficult as the Stravinsky be in performable shape after a long interval? — but it was obvious that it was really the adventure in the situation that appealed. Think of getting up to do the Brahms 4th with the BSO without rehearsal, he said, "it's exciting, it's exciting."

Sooner than he had bargained for, Thomas, 24, and the orchestra's assistant conductor for just a few weeks, got his chance. It was the classic break every understudy waits for, the sudden illness or disability of the star, and the unknown young performer's rush to the rescue. Toscanini got started that way, Bernstein did, and so have many others.

For Thomas it happened when William Steinberg felt unwell at a Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall, New York, his first there as the BSO's music director. Steinberg had opened with the Brahms 2nd, but between bows told Thomas to put on his suit — "I think you're going to conduct." Steinberg went to Roosevelt Hospital, and Thomas went on stage to take charge of Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." He did well, was liked, and the next morning he was in the headlines.

THOMAS Continued on Page 79

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 555,377

NOV 2 1969

NIAGARA FALLS GAZETTE
Thursday, October 23, 1969

Boston Symphony Director Is Ill

NEW YORK (AP) — William Steinberg, 70, new music director of the Boston Symphony, was taken ill at the podium at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night, forcing a 24-year-old assistant conductor to complete the concert.

Steinberg, who underwent an operation last summer, was taken to Roosevelt Hospital. A symphony official said later the conductor had been released, was resting comfortably and that there was no cause for concern.

Joins Staff At Honeywell

Mr. Robert Armstrong of West Concord has recently joined the staff of the Quality Assurance Department at Honeywell Research Center in Lexington.

In his new position, Mr. Armstrong is the Senior Quality Engineer in the detection physics group at the Research Center. Before coming to Honeywell, Mr. Armstrong was associated with

Robert Armstrong

Univac, Sperry Corporation, in St. Paul Minnesota, as the Manager of Produce Quality for the Aerospace Computer Division.

Prior to this, Mr. Armstrong was with Honeywell in Minneapolis, Minnesota in various functions in the Quality Assurance organization. He was associated with the environmental control systems for the Minuteman missile systems.

He received his Bachelors degree in physics from Boston University in 1949. He is a member of the American Society for Quality Control, the American Association for the Advancement of Science and has been a contributing member to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 20 years.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

NOV 8 1969

NH Philharmonic Now Rehearsing For 11th Season

The N. H. Philharmonic Orchestra has begun its 11th season of rehearsals and concerts with Rolland Tapley again as conductor and William Waterhouse as concertmaster. Both are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The membership is composed of adults from all walks of life, including students with talent from schools and colleges around this area.

Rehearsals are held every

Mrs. Francis Devlin of Wayland is area chairman for the "Know Your Orchestra" lectures to be held on the following Fridays: Nov. 12, Jan. 23, Mar. 13, Apr. 17 at 11:30 a.m. followed by a luncheon. Sponsored by the council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, players for the Boston Symphony will give behind-the scene insights into the Orchestra.

TOWN CRIER
WAYLAND, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,595

NOV 6 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

NOV 6 1969

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,960

NOV 2 1969

Party in Honor Of Conductor

Brilliant Hollywood-born 24-year old Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received a cheering ovation following the concert at Symphony Hall Tuesday evening. He had a chance to relax after his performance at a party given in his honor by Marvin J. Schofer, public relations director of the orchestra, and Davis S. Levenson, his assistant, at the Schofer apartment.

Among the guests were the Thomas D. Perry, Jr's., Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra; Harry J. Kraut; Prof. Frank Colcord of Tufts University; Bill Moyer, Andrew Raeburn, Jordan Whitelaw, Mrs. Marvin Schofer, Mrs. Adelaide Duffy, Greg Wierznski, Dan Gustin, Richard White and others.

Symphony Opens Season Nov. 16

Works by Beethoven, Vivaldi, Smetana and Von Weber's Second Clarinet Concerto, with Boston Symphony clarinetist Peter Hadcock as soloist, will open the Framingham Symphony's season Nov. 16.

The concert made possible by a grant from the music performance trust fund of the American Federation of Musicians in cooperation with Framingham Local 393 will be held at 3 p.m. in Framingham's South High School.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

NOV 5 1969

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA has taken its cue from the Boston Symphony and engaged the services of a young man to serve as assistant conductor.

The new 23-year-old "maestro" at Cleveland is Francois Huybrechts of Belgium, who has begun a residency as conducting fellow.

He has already conducted the Royal Flemish Opera, Nederlandse Kameroper, New York Philharmonic, and Los Angeles Philharmonic.

Boston's new assistant conductor is Michael Tilson Thomas, 24.

There's been some dispute about his age but he was born in Hollywood, Calif., Dec. 21, 1944.

And typically modern

★THOMAS

Continued from Page 77

"Just don't ask. I still don't know what's happened to me," he said after three more concerts with the orchestra and his return to Boston. He admitted, though, that it had been exciting, that he was pleased particularly with the way the Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday had gone, especially that the Stravinsky had been so well received.

Bernstein was at the concert, and delighted Thomas by what he told him about his experiences, not as a substitutor, but as one substituted for. Shortly after his sudden stepping in for Bruno Walter at the New York Philharmonic in 1943, Bernstein had an engagement to conduct his own "Jeremiah" Symphony in Pittsburgh. He was still the assistant at the Philharmonic, and just after his arrival in Pittsburgh, Arthur Rodzinski, ill or thinking he might become ill, summoned him home. Bernstein was obliged to cancel in Pittsburgh, and to take his place they brought in the conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic, William Steinberg. Moreover, added Bernstein, the only time he had ever had to miss a concert for illness was in London that same year, and his replacement then was Erich Leinsdorf.

The name Thomas is a one-generation old contraction of Thomashevsky, a name under which several of the young conductor's forebears were famous in Yiddish theater. Thomas is from Southern California — his father is a film script writer — and he was educated there, attending classes at the University of Southern California while he was still in high school.

He is an impressive pianist — his only recording so far is as a pianist in, of all things, Stravinsky's own piano duet version of "The Rite of Spring" — and Boston will have a chance to find out at first hand about that because he is now pianist with the BSO Chamber Players. No one in the Los Angeles musical world will be surprised at what has happened in the last couple of weeks. As conductor of the superb youth orchestra of the Young Musicians Foundation, Thomas became an important and highly regarded conductor on the Los Angeles scene at least four years ago.

He is endowed with a histrionic streak of his own, is a gifted linguist, knows a lot about a lot of things. In fact, he is clearly someone quite properly described as brilliant, and he does not hide his light under a bushel. There are those who have found this oppressive: For example, many of the students in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, which he conducted the last two Summers, were a little resentful of what they call his "coming on," and when he won the coveted Koussevitsky prize at Tanglewood in 1968, he was conspicuously less applauded by the BMC Orchestra than another conductor who won another, less prestigious, prize.

On the other hand, the case-hardened professionals of the Boston Symphony, who have no patience at all with pretentiousness and arrogance in conductors, have no complaints about Thomas. They hold him in high regard, appreciate his unassailable competence and professionalism, and they have been generous with the highest gift that is their to give: They play beautifully for him. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein said of the Carnegie Hall concert on the 25th that it had been the occasion for some of the finest playing the Boston Symphony had done in some time.

With his shrewdly critical powers of observation, articulateness, and penchant for wicked mimicry, Thomas is often enough on (or over) the edge of the indiscreet. Sometimes, especially in "official" situations, he compensates by sounding too good to be true.

But his modesty is genuine, and it manifests itself most attractively through his professionalism. He works hard, knows a large repertory well, and is informed on matters of scholarship as they pertain to problems of performance practice far more than most of his colleagues. He is quick, too, to acknowledge the influence of those teachers that helped form his values and his tastes, particularly the composer Ingolf Dahl and the harpsichordist Alice Ehlers.

He is perhaps a typically modern performer in that the musical universe he inhabits does not have its center in the 19th century. Not that he disdains the Romantics — there was that talk about the Brahms 4th, and he said recently that his current candidate for the "all-time great" piece was the Mahler 9th, but he has said that he would hate to do a concert with no Haydn or Mozart on it, and he is equally at home with the music of his own generation or with Monteverdi's. He composes, but only for himself.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

NOV 2 1969

One Fan Reacts to Youth Concert: Wow! Music Was Just Terrific

Above + right
From:
Sunday Advertiser 11-9-69

129

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 23 1969

T.O.S. Men Cite Dickson

Brotherhood Temple Ohabei Shalom will present a citation to Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra on Monday, Oct. 27, at a dinner-meeting in the temple hall.

George Oshry, president of the Brotherhood and A. Fred Prager, dinner chairman, announce that Cantor Alex Zimmer will make the presentation.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform, accompanied by pianist Virginia Eskin.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 432,300

OCT 30 1969

Note for note: Boston Symphony first violinist Harry Ellis Dickson was right. "I'm sure somebody will tell Arthur Fiedler what I said," Dickson said. What he said, after Michael Thomas took over as conductor of the orchestra for ailing William Steinberg, was, "I have to be stuck with a healthy Fiedler." It was a good-humored remark and "Pops" Fiedler took it as such. But he gave it back to Dickson at the Temple Ohabei Shalom affair at which the violinist was honored "for superb artistry and devoted service in inspiring our youth in the development of musical talent." Last summer, Fiedler said, he telephoned Dickson, after the latter had undergone surgery, and asked how he was feeling. "Great," Dickson said. "Too bad," Fiedler responded. "Why?" Dickson asked. "Because I always wanted to conduct the Youth Concerts," said Fiedler. Too bad that anecdote is too late for inclusion in Dickson's forthcoming Beacon Press book, "Gentlemen, More Dolce, Please: An Irreverent Memoir of 30 Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 10 1969

Boston and Cambridge music circles will join forces on Wednesday, the 12th, to hear James Paul, tenor, and Ronald Feldman, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Lydia and Gordon Thayer will host the musicale at their Cambridge home. Mr. Paul's many talents also include conducting.. (He was winner of the Serge Koussevitsky Memorial conducting Award at the Berkshire Music Festival where he was Leonard Bernstein conducting fellow). He is now Director of the Cambridge Opera Workship.) Also tonight, thinking of music, will be the first of the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall. The BSO's Harry Ellis Dickson, who Saturday opened the 11th season of his remarkable Youth Concept series, will conduct. The Foundation has just awarded its $130,000 grant to the Boston Symphony for special youth concerts. This will mean that over 5000 children will be invited to hear a series of concerts.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 23 1969

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON

Brotherhood Ohabei Shalom of Brookline will present its citation award "for superb artistry and the developing of musicol talent in our children" to Harry Ellis Dickson at a dinner meeting in the Temple Ohabei Shalom Social Hall this Monday evening, October 27.

Mr. Dickson, a native of Cambridge, is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music, and continued his education as a scholarship student at the Berlin Hoch Schule Fur Musik. There, he studied violin with Carl Flesch and Max Rostal. He later became a pupil of Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor.

It may well be said that Harry Dickson leads a triple life as a violinst, an orchestra conductor and as an educator. A member of the first violin choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he is also assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and the Esplanade Concerts, conductor of the Brookline Youth Concerts and the highly successful Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall.

The Symphony Hall Youth Concerts—six a year—were launched in 1959 and are in so much demand that the series is sold out in advance of the season. Dr. Charles Munch, the late former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was so impressed by the concerts that he called the project one of the most important musical developments in Boston. The success of these concerts is largely due to the programming and the affable manner of presentation, although Mr. Dickson will modestly insist that the backbone of the concerts has been a group of devoted committee women, who handle a tremendous amount of detail. "Good music is something alive and vital, and can be understood by everyone," Mr. Dickson explains. "There is no special music for young people, they have no prejudices and you can't play down to them. A concert may be educational, but it is also a spiritual and emotional event."

Intensely interested in young people and in developing and encouraging themb, he holds annual auditions in search of talented young soloists and composers, and the winners are given the opportunity to perform at a concert. Each year 100 members of the All-State High School Orchestra or the Greater Boston Youth Symphony join with Symphony men at one concert.

Mr. Dickson's other activities include the conducting of three amateur orchestras—The Brookline Symphony Orchestra, the Archdiocese Youth Orchestra and the Archdiocese Sisters Orchestra. He is also the commentator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsals and has become a familiar figure to the thousands who attend these unusual concerts for his witty and informative pre-concert talks. His lectures entitled "Inside the Boston Symphony Orchestra," given at the Friday afternoon Pre-Symphony Luncheons, have received wide acclaim. As a hobby, he keeps a journal of the activities of the Boston Symphony, a human-interest history which he has been compiling for over twenty years.

The years rest so lightly on Mr. Dickson and his lovely wife, Jane, that it comes as a surprise to many that they are the parents of two married daughters and the grandparents of three boys and a girl.

Three years ago, Mr. Dickson was created a Chevalier in the "Ordre des Art et des Lettres" by the French Government.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 30 1969

CITED FOR MUSICAL ACHIEVEMENTS — Brotherhood Temple Ohabei Shalom, Brookline presents citation to Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, for his contribution to Boston's musical life. Left to right are: George Oshry, president, Brotherhood Temple Ohabei Shalom; A. Fred Prager, meeting chairman, and Harry Ellis Dickson.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

NOV 6 1969

BSO Youth Concert

Single tickets for this Saturday's Boston Symphony Orchestra Youth Concert are available.

Harry Ellis Dickson will open the eleventh season with a program entitled "This Is The Orchestra".

For further information, call Mrs. Sylvia Bromberg, 148 North rd.

JEWISH TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

NOV 6 1969

BROTHERHOOD TEMPLE OHABEI SHALOM Brookline, presents Citation to Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor, Boston Pops Orchestra for his contribution to Boston musical life. (Left to right) George Oshry, president, Brotherhood Temple Ohabei Shalom; A. Fred Prager, meeting chairman, and Harry Ellis Dickson.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1969

FOR CHILDREN

Saturday afternoon at the movies used to mean hours and hours of cartoons, but this fall Jordan Marsh will present weekend matinee programs at New England movie theaters, including Boston's Paramount Theater and the Cambridge Cinema at Fresh Pond Shopping Center. The schedule for the juvenile oldies-but-goodies includes, on November 15-16, The Blue Bird, starring Shirley Temple and Spring Byington; December 13-14, The Nutcracker, featuring Edward Villella, Melissa Hayden, and Patricia McBride. There will be three performances a weekend: Saturday, 1:00 p.m. and 3:00 p.m. and Sunday, 1:00 p.m. Tickets and additional information can be obtained at the Children's Department of all Jordan Marsh stores.

Boston Children's Theatre opens its 1969-1970 season with Pinocchio on November 1. Other performances this season will include Racketty-Packetty House opening December 13; Jack and the Beanstalk opening February 7; The Reluctant Dragon and Dick Whittington and His Cat opening March 7; The Dancing Princess opening April 18. Season tickets now on sale at 20 percent discount. Special group rates available. For further information write the Boston Children's Theatre, 263 Commonwealth Avenue, or call 536-3324.

Making music is child's play for the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it presents two series of Youth Concerts during the 1969-70 season: Series I—November 8, January 10, March 14; Series II—November 15, January 17, March 21. The three programs, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson at 11:00 a.m., are "This Is the Orchestra"; "Same Axe, Different Bag," featuring the Carl Atkins Group; and a Festival Program with a high school chorus. Tickets for the series: $6.00. For tickets or further information write to Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Avenue. 266-1492.

Youth Concerts Set Monday And Friday

Music education in Boston public schools was given a tremendous boost recently with a $180,000 grant by the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for musical appreciation of Boston pupils of Grades 5 through 7. The first results will be Youth Concerts on Monday and Friday at Boston Symphony Hall for 5,200 pupils.

The grant will finance a series of three one-hour Youth Concerts for each of the next three years. In addition the grant will provide free, five-day, all-expense trips next summer to Tanglewood in the Berkshires for 320 of those 5,200 concert goers.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 9 1969

THE PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY

NOV 8 1969

$180,000 grant for music enrichment

Music education in the Boston Public Schools was given a tremendous boost recently with announcement of a $180,000 grant by the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for betterment of the musical interests of Boston pupils of Grades 5 through 7. The first results will be Youth Concerts on Nov. 10 and 14 at Boston Symphony Hall for 5,200 pupils.

The grant will finance a series of three one-hour Youth Concerts for each of the next three years. In addition the grant will provide free, five-day, all-expense trips next summer to Tanglewood in the Berkshires for 320 of those 5,200 concert goers.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and there the pupils, in weekly groups of 40, will be exposed to the full range of the performing arts through a program called "Day in the Arts." They will observe the symphony's performances, rehearsals and workshops, and visit neighboring festivals, such as the Berkshire Theatre and the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival.

Each Youth Concert will be specially tailored for the age groups involved and will be presented by 60 members of the Boston Symphony. A similar program was presented free to Boston pupils last year for the first time, sponsored by Symphony's individual donors.

This year's series will open on Monday, Nov. 10, at 10 a.m., with a program called "This is the Orchestra." It opens with Britten's Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, narrated by Andrew Raeburn and the program isolates each orchestra section, detailing its functions.

That first program will be attended by 2,600 pupils of Grades 5 and 6 from the following schools: Bigelow, Brooks, Dearborn, Dudley, Dwight (Hurley), Emerson, Gibson, Hemenway, Howe, Jefferson, Lyman, Mackey, McCormack, Norcross, Russell and Winthrop.

The same program will be repeated at 10:00 a.m. on the following Friday, Nov. 14, for 2,600 Grade 7 pupils of the following eleven junior high schools: Barnes, Curley, Dearborn, Edwards, Gavin, Holmes, Kirg, Lewis, Michelangelo, Thompson and Timilty.

Each of the 2,600-pupil units will be treated to similar concerts on Jan. 16 and 23, and on March 13 and 20. Selection of the schools to attend was influenced by the stated goals of the Kennedy grant which say: "Our aim is to reach children of Boston families who would rarely, if ever, have the opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performance."

LEADER
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

NOV 9 1969

SOUTH BOSTON TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,250

NOV 13 1969

Mr. Benjamin Britten
London, England

Dear Mr. Britten:

Wow! Your music is terrific! My name is Brian Harris and

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

I'm 9 years old and in the fourth grade. A bunch of us kids heard your "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" yesterday and I'm writing to tell you I've decided to be a professional trumpet player when I grow up.

It was a youth concert of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it had all these terrific, real dignified musicians playing all kinds of instruments. I knew some of them (like the trumpets, trombones and violins), but a lot were new to me.

★

Anyway, they played your music and there were solos, too. Also, this nice friendly director, Mr. Harry Ellis Dickson, talked to us awhile and had some of the musicians stand up so we could see them better. Then there was a man, Andrew Raeborn, who talked all through your music about the different instruments. He was from England and they said he was a friend of yours.

We really loved the concert. Before I went my dad said he thought I couldn't sit still that long, but he was wrong. I really was quiet — except for a couple of times when I got a little restless.

★

Actually, it wasn't me. It was this other kid. I didn't know him but he punched me once for no reason at all — so I hit him back! But when the music stopped both of us really clapped and I even whistled once. He liked the drums and I liked all those horns. It was great.

Of course, we had our teachers with us. Do you know Miss Ruth Dudley or Mr. Ralph Goodson? They told us they'd studied all about you in college. Anyway, Miss Dudley smiled a lot and looked very happy and told us later she thought the drummers were handsome.

★

The music was fine. The symphony once played like it was a music box and another time the string players played their instruments like they were guitars in a piece called "Jazz Pizzicatto."

Then there was this pretty blonde girl sitting next to me (I generally don't like girls though) and she said she liked the violins and clarinets. I told her I was going to be a trumpet player and I think she was impressed.

She also said she was going to some more youth concerts Jan. 10 and March 14 next year. I'm going too— I bet a lot of kids will. Yesterday the whole place was jammed with kids.

★

When I got home, I told my dad about the concert and how I'm going to be a trumpeter. He writes about music in the papers and he asked a lot of questions and told me how he could play a lot of those instruments and how some were harder than others. He got real technical.

Finally, I just asked him, "If you know how to play them all and so well—why aren't you playing in a big orchestra like that?"

He looked real embarrassed and muttered something about changing his typewriter's ribbon.

Anyway, I sure liked your music and that concert. I'm looking forward to the next one.

Your Friend, Brian Harris

PS—Mom says a trumpet is too loud. She wants me to be a violinist.

130

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY

Lenox

NOV 1969

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY: END OF THE LEINSDORF ERA

BY GEORGE MOVSHON

THE ORCHESTRA thumped into the circus-march coda of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and moments later the reign of Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony came to an end. August 24 was a hot and listless Sunday afternoon around the Music Shed, but 14,120 listeners came explosively to life at the closing chord to give the departing leader a vigorous and sustained salute, calling him repeatedly back to the podium. So ended seven Boston years, in which (according to the house statistician) Leinsdorf conducted 709 concerts, embracing 429 works by 96 different composers.

The valedictory Ninth (and also the Berlioz excerpts from Les Troyens which opened the program) showed all the familiar Leinsdorf qualities: a rich, full-blooded sonority, a just range of tempos, a logical plan of climaxes, a firm, well-groomed shape with clear outlines. Not perhaps an immense or an apocalyptically revealing Ninth; but at any rate a Beethoven without idiosyncrasy or disfiguring mannerism: a roundly satisfying afternoon. The soloists (Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz) were more than competent, and the Tanglewood Choir joined with the Berkshire Chorus and the Chorus Pro Musica to yield a sufficient amplitude of vocal sound.

It is agreeable to report that the orchestra gave every evidence of robust good health. The horns are perhaps a small notch below world class, but elsewhere things sounded just fine: a ripe, full sound to the strings, a lean but clear, elegant quality in the woodwinds. These attributes had been displayed even more prominently at the preceding concert, for on Saturday night Leinsdorf gave us a most exciting orchestral splash in Stravinsky's Firebird Suite, as well as a dip into the recent avant garde with a revival of Déserts by Varèse. This work explores the sonorities of loneliness and matches a wind and percussion ensemble against three extended slabs of musique concrète provided from electronic sources by means of a pre-recorded tape. The brass and the temple blocks were handled with confidence, while a battery of six A-R loudspeakers performed creditably enough to lodge a claim to membership in the AF of M.

The rumbles

Confirmation that the orchestra is sound in wind and limb is important at this time, for there have been rumbles of discontent from Boston lately. It is no secret that management and conductor have shown a degree of mutual disenchantment for several seasons past. All concerned have of course behaved with New England reserve and Back Bay courtesy; but it has become increasingly clear that Leinsdorf does not thrill the trustees; and also that they have overworked him cruelly—perhaps to the point of forcing his resignation. Leinsdorf derives no joy from that previously quoted statistic of 709 concerts conducted: he points out that George Szell in Cleveland has four deputies (with half the Boston workload) and that Leonard Bernstein has had the help of three assistant conductors in bearing the New York strain; while he, in Boston, was given no assistant at all for his first four seasons. Indeed, the Leinsdorf resignation dates from the spring of 1967, when he realized that his appeals for relief were being met by the management with no response more constructive than a helpless shrug. And now, he says, the trustees have been unable to find a successor willing to take on the whole job single-handedly; they must henceforth divide the work among three incoming conductors. The new man will have plenty of guest conductors to help him through the winter season, while Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller handle the Tanglewood Festival.

Motives

The deeper motives of the trustees in letting Leinsdorf go are hard to discern. Perhaps they really intended to buy for Boston one of the new glamour boys, a lightning-rod to charge up some enthusiasm among the ladies of the subscription. If so, that plan didn't work out. The Boston Symphony was briskly outbid at the recent conductorial bloodstock sales, and the promising yearlings are now all elsewhere. So the trustees looked around again and chose William Steinberg, a mature and excellent professional musician of high competence—but indifferent glamour; moreover, a conductor of much the same caliber, much the same musical character, much the same speed . . . as Erich Leinsdorf.

It is perhaps true that neither orchestra nor audience have found the Leinsdorf personality irresistibly magnetic, and certainly the sales of his Boston recordings have not been big enough to keep RCA Victor tied to an exclusive (and very expensive) recording contract with the orchestra. (The BSO has recently concluded a new contract with Deutsche Grammophon; no conductor has yet been announced.) Nevertheless, Boston may well come to regret the day they lost Leinsdorf, for to look back over the list of works he chose to direct in his seven years is to realize at once that here is a man of searching and venturesome spirit. He could have played it safe, trotting out the Brahms and Beethoven and Tchaikovsky standards to please the multitudes and lull the subscription. Instead he chose to explore Varèse and late Stravinsky, to premiere Britten's War Requiem and the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto, to espouse Schoenberg and Janácek, making such room for American composers as a subscription system flexibility and (within limits) a more giving attitude toward working time; or else they must be plumbers, watching the clock and charging for every minute. At present, he thinks, they are trying to be both.

He is convinced that the shrinkage of rehearsal time is a damaging trend, one likely to force conductors into a "safe" and familiar repertory. And very disturbing to him is a series of new developments in Boston that seem to questions.

"It is very nice," says Leinsdorf, "for any music director to have able and concerned musicians that he can consult. But when you put such a thing in a contract, you have a dilution of artistic responsibility. Every great orchestra—like every successful commercial business—is run by one man. Responsibility can never be divided. When you try to divide artistic responsibilities, you get a ritual—not an

with this kind of issue, and that management should do some positive thinking about the implications and then move forward (as he feels Boston is doing) into the new realities. He does feel that in music, unlike business, there are still a few moguls left. How about trying to convince Otto Klemperer or George Szell about the utility of "an orchestra committee on artistic matters"? "No," he concedes, "that wouldn't work." △

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 18,719
NOV 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF ended his seven-year tenure as Music Director of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA with the final concert of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in late August. The concert, with Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 as the principal work, was taped live by WGBH-TV (Boston) for national telecasting. The total attendance for all events at the Festival this year was 236,937. WILLIAM STEINBERG, who succeeds Mr. Leinsdorf as Director of the Boston Symphony, conducted the opening concert of the 1969-1970 season on Sept. 26 in Symphony Hall, Boston . . .

Erich Leinsdorf, who resigned as musical director of the Boston Symphony, said, "My concept that musical organizations should be run by musicians is no longer valid. Musical policy must be made by men with a financial stature.". . . . The New York State Music Camp in its twenty-third season enjoyed a brilliant summer of

SCHOOL MUSIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 15,000
NOV 1969

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752

NOV 2 1969

Leinsdorf Symphony Guest Conductor This Week

Erich Leinsdorf

● ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1962 until last summer will conduct the Chicago Symphony in regular subscription concerts at 8:15 p. m. Thursday, 2 p. m. Friday, and 8:30 p. m. Saturday in Orchestra hall.

Leinsdorf has conducted the orchestra on many previous occasions. He most recently appeared here in 1968 with the Boston Symphony. His program holds Weber's "Der Freischutz" Overture, last heard in March of this year, and excerpts from Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The two suites from the ballet have been performed here often, but Leinsdorf will conduct from the 1961 Russian edition of the score.

The soloist will be the 28-year-old Argentinian pianist Bruno Leonardo Gelber, who will make his downtown debut with the orchestra in the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

Born in Buenos Aires, Gelber began studies at the age of 3, and gave his recital debut at the age of 8. He has concertized extensively thru Europe, studied with Marguerite Long, and has made many recordings.

• • •

Chicago today American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418

NOV 7 1969

Music
Roger Dettmer

Leinsdorf at Symphony

CONDUCTOR Erich Leinsdorf, late of Boston, arrived here yesterday at 1 a. m., after a 21-hour journey from Buenos Aires, where he had proceeded directly from an opera performance to the airport. At 8:15 p. m., he stepped onto the Orchestra hall podium for a Chicago Symphony prepared in part by Robert Zeller. [May one presume to ask where was Irwin Hoffman, whose continuing tenure here as resident conductor presupposes back stopping?]

One of the official reasons given last year for Leinsdorf's departure from the Boston Symphony, after 7 seasons as music director, was an excessive work load.

CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Erich Leinsdorf, guest conductor. Bruno Leonardo Gelber, pianist. Presented by the Orchestra Association in Orchestra hall, to be repeated today at 2 p. m. and tomorrow at 8:30 p. m.

Program

"Der Freischuetz" Overture . . . Weber
Piano Concerto No. 5, in E-flat, Op. 73 ["Emperor"] . . . . . Beethoven
Suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" . . . . . Prokofiev

So what does he call this week's dizzying schedule?

Leinsdorf is a professional conductor of long and varied experience, with obviously a constitution of tempered steel, and frequently the musical temperament to match. At least then a business like performance can be expected from him. But do not ticket-buyers have a right to expect more for their investment than the incidental drama of Leinsdorf's itinerary and basic proficiency?

THUS, THE NEWS was not musical jet-setting, but the local debut of Bruno Leonardo Gelber, a 28-year old Argentinian pianist heralded abroad. If only for his first movement introducion in last night's "Emperor" Concerto, his name can be added to Nelson Freire's and Aleksander Slobodyanik's who played momentously here in the last 12 days.

Gelber is a pianist in the Grand virtuoso tradition who feels deeply what he is playing, and has a tone of stunning sonority when he does not push it into coarse-sounding sforzando accents. His legato can be as beautiful as a rubato, so subtle that you are not conscious of its application, yet he has power and velocity to spare.

Actually, too much power and velocity last night — perhaps a consequence of cursory rehearsal with peripatetic Mr. Leinsdorf—but Gelber is still young.

Age will surely subdue the occasional excesses that derive almost entirely from technical superabundance. This was, even with its prevaling sense of hurry, a commanding "Emperor," and the declaration that another pre-30 giant has come forward in what well may be, when assessed in historical perspective, a new golden age of the keyboard.

NOTE: In addition to Ethel Waters, age 73, who will play her original Broadway and film role in Ivanhoe theater's "Member of the Wedding," Producer-Director George Keathley has signed Murray Matheson and Alan Mixon for "King of Hearts," opening Nov. 26. The lady lead will be announced imminently [if not sooner].

One high school was directed more toward the traditional approach—a solid, forthright band program, straight-forward Christmas and spring choral concerts, and a standard-repertoire musical. The other high school took a slightly different approach. Both of its musicians were jazz-oriented; one of them bent the bulk of his efforts toward a slick, professional-level jazz show complete with chorus, dancers, lights, and big-band effects, while the other trained his orchestra in the close-in style of the pit-orks. If they did a musical, it was of the lineage of Funny Girl.

That was the situation as I saw it in September 1965—a decisive, business-like administrator, conservative in his musical tastes but forward in his thinking; and a staff made up for the most part of solidly grounded professionals—not teachers who knew music, but musicians who taught! Beyond that, the Contemporary Music Project had went to work.

Bill Lauer's choral schedule was such that I could have written almost anything and they would have had time to learn it. But I decided not to press my limits, especially since they were going to memorize it. It would be better for them to have tonal structures that were contemporary without throwing them for a loss each time one was approached; and I certainly wasn't going to baby the choir with any I-IV-V-I banalities! The counterpoint would be worthy of the name, but not complex—two-part at the most. At no time do I like to set books full of text; I prefer setting a very few words in such a way as to clarify their literary value and enhance their musical flow. The words must be equal partners with the music; they cannot be if they're always running off at the mouth! Considering the season, I settled upon, "Glory to God in the highest and on earth, peace to said I would. I began to attend the rehearsals regularly. I found out that tonal structures not involving triads were affecting the intonation of the strings; they had to adjust to groups of seconds, sevenths, and the open intervals, and to the difficulty of tuning a spread-eagle pile of E's reaching from the open string bass to the upper reaches of the first violins. I helped the winds make the most of a complex emotional build during which they were having trouble staying on top of their entrances. I worked with an aphonal brass sextet while they located the best position for playing in the rear of the auditorium. After the first run-through with everyone, I felt like a Pygmy who had pulled an elephant through a sea of cold molasses, but we all grew together into an ensemble that worked. When I put down the baton after that initial performance I began to get the first feelings of the permits. He also gave us concert opera —memorable performances of the original Fidelio and the first form of Strauss's Ariadne. In the present Tanglewood season he directed an excellent Entführung and a complete Verdi Otello, which so impressed the members of the orchestra that they were still talking about it at the summer's end. These are the achievements of a man who will be missed.

The Maestro takes his final bow.

Trends

Leinsdorf is not happy at recent developments in the running of American orchestras and he disapproves specifically of certain trends in Boston. He feels that orchestral musicians must now choose one of two courses: either they must be professionals, with assured incomes and tenure—but with greater flexibility and (within limits) a more giving attitude toward working time; or else they must be plumbers, watching the clock and charging for every minute. At present, he thinks, they are trying to be both.

He is convinced that the shrinkage of rehearsal time is a damaging trend, one likely to force conductors into a "safe" and familiar repertory. And very disturbing to him is a series of new developments in Boston that seem to amount to erosion of the authority of the music director.

In its recent negotiations with the orchestra committee, the Boston administrators conceded two principles to the musicians' negotiators. They agreed that players in the tutti sections of the Symphony are henceforth to be seated according to a fixed plan of seniority, not to be altered by the music director; and that if, say, a vacancy opens up at the fourth desk of the first violin section, it will normally be filled by the next junior player—the fifth desk man. Any outside candidate will have to audition for the job competitively, before a jury upon which other players are represented. The second Boston concession establishes a "consultative committee," elected by the orchestra members, to give advice on artistic questions.

"It is very nice," says Leinsdorf, "for any music director to have able and concerned musicians that he can consult. But when you put such a thing in a contract, you have a dilution of artistic responsibility. Every great orchestra—like every successful commercial business—is run by one man. Responsibility can never be divided. When you try to divide artistic responsibilities, you get a ritual—not an artistic experience. The destiny of an orchestra must be in the hands of one man. And that man must be the music director."

Marvin Schofer, the Boston Symphony's press director, takes a different view of recent trends—though he also reaches for an analogy from the world of commerce. "The age of the moguls has passed. There are no longer any Mellons and Carnegies and Henry Fords. We live in an age of corporations and consensus—and orchestras are heading that way too." The idea of a consultative committee is also defended by Boston's manager, Thomas Perry: "It is not possible to ignore the positive desire of orchestra members to play their part in defining the character and scope of the work." He believes that all orchestras are soon going to be faced with this kind of issue, and that managements should do some positive thinking about the implications and then move forward (as he feels Boston is doing) into the new realities. He does feel that in music, unlike business, there are still a few moguls left. How about trying to convince Otto Klemperer or George Szell about the utility of "an orchestra committee on artistic matters"? "No," he concedes, "that wouldn't work." △

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
NOV 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF ended his seven-year tenure as Music Director of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA with the final concert of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in late August. The concert, with Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 as the principal work, was taped live by WGBH-TV (Boston) for national telecasting. The total attendance for all events at the Festival this year was 236,937. WILLIAM STEINBERG, who succeeds Mr. Leinsdorf as Director of the Boston Symphony, conducted the opening concert of the 1969-1970 season on Sept. 26 in Symphony Hall, Boston . . .

. . . Erich Leinsdorf, who resigned as musical director of the Boston Symphony, said, "My concept that musical organizations should be run by musicians is no longer valid. Musical policy must be made by men with a financial stature." . . . The New York State Music Camp in its twenty-third season enjoyed a brilliant summer of

SCHOOL MUSIC NEWS
ONEONTA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,000
NOV 1969

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752
NOV 2 1969

Leinsdorf Symphony Guest Conductor This Week

Erich Leinsdorf

● ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1962 until last summer will conduct the Chicago Symphony in regular subscription concerts at 8:15 p. m. Thursday, 2 p. m. Friday, and 8:30 p. m. Saturday in Orchestra hall.

Leinsdorf has conducted the orchestra on many previous occasions. He most recently appeared here in 1968 with the Boston Symphony. His program holds Weber's "Der Freischutz" Overture, last heard in March of this year, and excerpts from Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The two suites from the ballet have been performed here often, but Leinsdorf will conduct from the 1961 Russian edition of the score.

The soloist will be the 28-year-old Argentinian pianist Bruno Leonardo Gelber, who will make his downtown debut with the orchestra in the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

Born in Buenos Aires, Gelber began studies at the age of 3, and gave his recital debut at the age of 8. He has concertized extensively thru Europe, studied with Marguerite Long, and has made many recordings.

• • •

Chicago today American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418
NOV 7 1969

Music
Roger Dettmer

Leinsdorf at Symphony

CONDUCTOR Erich Leinsdorf, late of Boston, arrived here yesterday at 1 a. m., after a 21-hour journey from Buenos Aires, where he had proceeded directly from an opera performance to the airport. At 8:15 p. m., he stepped onto the Orchestra hall podium for a Chicago Symphony prepared in part by Robert Zeller. [May one presume to ask where was Irwin Hoffman, whose continuing tenure here as resident conductor presupposes back stopping?]

One of the official reasons given last year for Leinsdorf's departure from the Boston Symphony, after 7 seasons as music director, was an excessive work load.

CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Erich Leinsdorf, guest conductor. Bruno Leonardo Gelber, pianist. Presented by the Orchestra Association in Orchestra hall, to be repeated today at 2 p. m. and tomorrow at 8:30 p. m.

Program

"Der Freischuetz" Overture ..... Weber
Piano Concerto No. 5, in E-flat, Op. 73 ["Emperor"] ..... Beethoven
Suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Prokofiev

So what does he call this week's dizzying schedule?

Leinsdorf is a professional conductor of long and varied experience, with obviously a constitution of tempered steel, and frequently the musical temperament to match. At least then a business like performance can be expected from him. But do not ticket-buyers have a right to expect more for their investment than the incidental drama of Leinsdorf's itinerary and basic proficiency?

THUS, THE NEWS was not musical jet-setting, but the local debut of Bruno Leonardo Gelber, a 28-year old Argentinian pianist heralded abroad. If only for his first movement introducion in last night's "Emperor" Concerto, his name can be added to Nelson Freire's and Aleksander Slobodyanik's who played momentously here in the last 12 days.

Gelber is a pianist in the Grand virtuoso tradition who feels deeply what he is playing, and has a tone of stunning sonority when he does not push it into coarse-sounding sforzando accents. His legato can be as beautiful as a rubato, so subtle that you are not conscious of its application, yet he has power and velocity to spare.

Actually, too much power and velocity last night — perhaps a consequence of cursory rehearsal with peripatetic Mr. Leinsdorf—but Gelber is still young.

Age will surely subdue the occasional excesses that derive almost entirely from technical superabundance. This was, even with its prevaling sense of hurry, a commanding "Emperor," and the declaration that another pre-30 giant has come forward in what well may be, when assessed in historical perspective, a new golden age of the keyboard.

NOTE: In addition to Ethel Waters, age 73, who will play her original Broadway and film role in Ivanhoe theater's "Member of the Wedding," Producer-Director George Keathley has signed Murray Matheson and Alan Mixon for "King of Hearts," opening Nov. 26. The lady lead will be announced imminently [if not sooner].

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752
NOV 7 1969

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752
NOV 8 1969

MUSIC

Superb symphonics!

Subscription concert by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Bruno Leonardo Gelber, pianist. Presented in Orchestra hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 6, 1969, to be repeated Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

THE PROGRAM
Overture to "Der Freischuetz" Weber
Piano Concerto No. 5 in E-flat Major, Opus 73 . . . . . Beethoven
Excerpts from the ballet "Romeo and Juliet" . . . . . Prokofieff

● IF THE Chicago Symphony Orchestra fund-raisers could lure prospects to one of the week-end concerts this afternoon or tomorrow, I'll bet that 10 million dollars wouldn't seem out of sight at all.

Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" music and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, played as they were last night, are what symphonic music is all about. Back to back on the same program, they lifted the audience's spirits high enough to loosen anyone's purse strings.

The conductor was Erich Leinsdorf, filling in one of the weeks originally meant for Istvan Kertesz. A scheduling mixup—presumably by Mr. Leinsdorf's manager—had him conducting opera in Buenos Aires Tuesday night. A 13-hour plane trip had him in Chicago at one o'clock yesterday morning, leaving time for only one rehearsal, some of which had to be allotted to Bruno Leonardo Gelber, the 28-year-old Argentine pianist who was making his local debut as the "Emperor's" soloist.

None of this was apparent in the performance. Mr. Leinsdorf's "Romeo and Juliet" was drawn from the 1961 Russian ballet score, not the earlier suites selected by Prokofieff. His selection was similar in intent to Carlo Maria Giulini's excerpts from the Berlioz "Romeo" at the season's opening. The ballet scenario was followed. Musical lines were developed instead of indexed. And the dramatic romanticism of one of the century's most powerful scores simply took over the audience, erasing completely the memory of last week's Stuttgart Ballet pit orchestra. There are numerous delights in "Romeo's" orchestration, and Mr. Leinsdorf had found many of the best.

Mr. Gelber's "Emperor" was not quite a match, altho Mr. Leinsdorf drove the tempos along so briskly that one scarcely had time to realize it. The pianist presented a distinctive, faintly haunting appearance. Possibly as a result of the polio bout mentioned in his biography, he walks very slowly. He wears his hair cut full and sits slimly erect and motionless at the keyboard.

It could have been my imagination, but the performance projected a feeling of leashed pain. The power was there, and the control for the trills and most of the bravura turns. Musically, he was top drawer all the way, and Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave him a superb—albeit somewhat speedy—accompaniment. The concert began with the suitably dramatic "Der Freischuetz" Overture, earning the horn quartet justly deserved bows.

Thomas Willis

Erich Leinsdorf

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 451,357 SAT. 453,757
NOV 7 1969

Leinsdorf offers a crisp touch

By Bernard Jacobson

Thursday night's Chicago Symphony concert at Orchestra Hall proved that Erich Leinsdorf is more impressive as a conductor than as an orchestral trainer.

Under his directorship, which ended last year, the Boston Symphony suffered a sad decline, from which it may take a long time to emerge. But coming to an orchestra not his own, and one that has lately been in excellent form, he showed himself capable of securing crisp and colorful, though rarely incandescent, playing.

The evening opened with Weber's "Der Freischuetz'" Overture and closed with a suite of movements from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet."

The Weber was given a congenial, relaxed reading. The horns played their opening tune suavely, and later on Leinsdorf skillfully softened the more banal touches of scoring by keeping the heavy brass firmly under control.

IF THE Prokofieff was less enjoyable, the fault was more Prokofieff's than Leinsdorf's. Ravel once described his own "Bolero" as a "piece for orchestra without music," and long stretches of Prokofieff's ballet qualify for a like description.

The sprawling melodic lines and square-toed periods are wearisome when prolonged beyond a few minutes, and it is only a vivid realization of the often unconventionally effective orchestral writing that can maintain at least this listener's interest.

Leinsdorf brought off the feat with some success. The many climaxes were allowed to be rather too raucous for comfort, and some of the clarinet solos exposed our own orchestra's principal weakness, but most of the playing was strong, exhilarating, and musical, and only occasionally did the precision of the ensemble falter.

THE REAL substance of the evening came in the central work on the program, Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto, in which the Argentinian-born Bruno Leonardo Gelber made a distinguished Chicago Symphony debut.

He is a superbly equipped pianist with a good range of tone and a discreet pedal technique. More than that, he offered an interpretation of a lucidity, a directness, a care for detail, and an over-all artistic poise far beyond what could reasonably be expected from his 28 years.

He presented the vast first movement as a powerfully unified whole, integrating the subsidiary theme into the general flow without sacrificing its fragile poetry. I particularly liked his clean, purposeful treatment of accents, and the same virtue came to the fore again in the theme of the finale, which was articulated with unusual vigor and clarity.

THE SLOW movement made, perhaps, less of an impression than it can do, and it may be said that Gelber's conception of it is a little lacking in mystery and tenderness. But these qualities are sure to come as he matures further, for his musicianship is firmly based, and not of the youthful flash-in-the-pan variety.

The orchestral contribution suffered here and there from Leinsdorf's tendency to let tempos run away with themselves, and also from his less than meticulous attention to the sustaining of tone.

Apart from that, it was fine, supportive playing, punctual in accompaniment, and well matched to the soloist's conception.

CHICAGO SUN-TIMES
D. 545,570 SUN. 712,125
NOV 8 1969

An on-beat concert from Leinsdorf

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.

By Robert C. Marsh

If you enjoy playing games of classification, the current Chicago Symphony Orchestra season has offered one of the old favorites, selecting conductors who have a good beat from those who have not.

The latter, unfortunately, have been in the majority, but Thursday night (and the seventh week of subscription concerts) brought Erich Leinsdorf — and it made a difference.

As far as I am concerned, this was unquestionably the finest program of the series to date, and one very substantial reason for its success is that Leinsdorf's hands and baton always provide a forceful delineation of the performance he wants.

THUS HE won the warmest reception from the audience and the finest response from the orchestra. You would never have guessed from the quality of the performance that earlier in the week, instead of directing preliminary rehearsals, he had been flying to the United States after an engagement conducting opera in Buenos Aires.

That leads us to another old principle: If a conductor is a strong and secure leader and the orchestra is a first-class group, extensive rehearsal is not essential.

The evening offered romantic music of three types, the mysterious evocation of nature and the supernatural in Weber's "'Freischuetz" Overture, the heroics of the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, and the sweet-sour strains of excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet.'"

AS HE IS a theater conductor of uncommon gifts, it was to be expected that Leinsdorf would play the Weber well, and (with the help of our superlative first-chair artists) he fulfilled that prophecy.

The Prokofiev is a Leinsdorf specialty, and it is always a satisfaction to hear it from him. I could not help but recall one summer afternoon when I was caught in one of those total traffic jams that can take place on the New Jersey side of the George Washington Bridge and his recording of this music, on an eight-track tape, was a balm for raw nerves.

Thursday in Orchestra Hall the performance invited concentration on the music; one could not but be impressed by the manner in which Prokofiev, instead of applying orchestration on established thematic patterns, obviously considered his thematic development and instrumentation as two sides of a single process.

BRUNO Leonardo Gelber, solist in the Beethoven, is a 28-year-old Argentine pianist who tends to overkill through virtuosity. His technique is extraordinary. But the fact that you can play a scalewise passage very fast, for instance, does not always mean that it should, for the best musical effect, be played in that manner.

What he can provide at this stage of his career is a performance filled with fireworks, and Leinsdorf, who knows what it is to be a 20-year-old whiz kid, matched him with an accompaniment in the same spirit.

Rock Rolls Into School

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

Beatle Paul McCartney is alive and well and on his way into the public school curriculum.

While music may never seriously threaten sex as the major controversy in public education it seems to be ready to join the ranks of disputed subject matter on a par with sex and ethnic history in the classroom.

The student doing homework to the accompaniment or rock and roll, long a puzzle and often an irritation to his parents, may now be able to claim that the rock is his homework.

SUCH COULD BE THE RESULT of the fact that the Music Educators National Conference (MENC) this week endorsed the use of rock and roll in music education in the schools. In a special supplement to the November issue of MENC's Music Educator's Journal youth music is discussed and accepted as educationally valuable.

MENC has been pioneering the break from traditional, and admittedly stuffy, music education methods for several years now, spearheading the movement in the Tanglewood Conference, an extensive investigation aimed at revamping its educational format.

Music educators from all over the United States, representing the organization's 58,000 members, met at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., two summers ago to research the problems and many failures of music educa-

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, November 2, 1969

Rock Rolls In

Continued from Page 1

tion in depth and formulate new definitions of purpose and professional guidelines.

Terms like "music appreciation" and hopefully the kind of teaching which they represented were banished from the MENC vocabulary in recognition of the fact that music courses had to be fun and intriguing in order to stimulate rather than stifle the child's interest in music.

AMONG THE POINTS MADE in the Tanglewood report, a turning point in educational thinking if not actual teaching, was that something had to be done about the dichotomy between what was meant by music inside and outside of the classroom. Music in the first case was work and in the second entertainment and the students were not making any connections for themelves.

Although there are many of the pre-rock generation, including many music educators, who maintain that there is no legitimate relationship between the Beatles and Beethoven or even "Switched on Bach" and chamber-orchestra-Bach, the works of the Beatles, Jimi Hendrix and their leading are now being supported by MENC as proper classroom material.

The distance from MENC support to actual incorporation on a broad basis in the school, however, is apt to be a long and tangled path. To begin with, while the new generation of music teachers was reared on rock there are still many music teachers who simply don't know what it is all about. They were alienated by the first crude examples of early Elvis Presley and are completely unaware of all the developments and refinements which have produced the relatively sophisticated rock of current popular groups and even of late Elvis Presley.

WHILE THE POWER OF ROCK as a social force has been undeniable for years, now the likes of the Woodstock Festival last August has been accepted as a declaration of a new status quo in music and therefore music education which MENC thinks music educators cannot afford to ignore.

Music teachers who continue to promote the three B's (Bach, Beethoven and Brahms) without expanding to incorporate the fourth B (Beatles) is like the language teacher trying to teach French to an American when the teacher doesn't understand English. It can be done but it requires a concentration and dedication on the part of both teacher and student that is seldom found in the average pupil's approach to the classics.

One radio commentator, in musing on the possibility of the death of Paul McCartney, pointed out that if the Beatles were failing that quickly as a money maker that all of these rumors were the creation of a not too imaginatively desperate press agent, it was simply too late to save the Beatles.

Will John, George and Ringo also expire as the result of legitimate standing with establishment education?

SCHOOL MUSIC NEWS
NOV 1969

Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory and the Berkshire Music Center, attached to Tanglewood, said he wished that the Boston Symphony would "take more cognizance of what's going on in the world of music today." Schuller, in order to take more cognizance of the outside world, organized a series of Tanglewood Trend concerts featuring, among others, the rock singer Janis Joplin and the gospel singer Mahalia Jackson. These trends have already caused considerable resistance in some Tanglewood quarters. Schuller says, "We need the money."...

122.

Ann Hobson

Harpist with Boston Symphony

Boston seems to care more about its orchestra than other cities says Ann Hobson, new harpist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "They're very receptive."

Miss Hobson, who, at twenty five is one of the youngest members of the BSO, is also its only black member, and is one of three black musicians in the "big five" orchestras (Boston, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and Cleveland).

Miss Hobson attributes the dearth of black musicians in symphonic orchestras to a lack of preparation on the part of black musicians.

"Symphonic orchestras have never been geared toward black people," she explained, "so black people have not prepared themselves, because there were no jobs."

"And classical music is not exactly the music of the black people. But the question of discrimination does come up," she added, noting a lawsuit being filed by two black musicians against the New York Philharmonic.

"In Boston they audition you behind a screen, for the first selection, so there is no problem there," she said. "Every job I've tried to get I've gotten."

Miss Hobson is also one of four women in the orchestra, which totals more than one hundred members. Noting that the old orchestras were against women, she said that she had taken lessons from the woman who was first to ever play in a symphony orchestra.

Born in Philadelphia, Miss Hobson started the harp in Philadelphia Girls High School, having taken piano lessons since the age of six. Her mother was also a musician.

She then attended Philadelphia Music Academy, studying under Marilyn Costello, who is first harpist for the Philadelphia Orchestra. After two years she transferred to Cleveland Institute of Music, from which she graduated in 1966.

For three years she was principal harpist for the Washington National Symphony Orchestra. Looking back, she says, "for some reason the first year I was there Washington played a lot of harp pieces - - all the hardest pieces for the harp.

"That's an awful feeling, when the orchestra stops, and there you are, on the spot. But I learned a lot that year. I'm much more relaxed here."

Miss Hobson is second harpist for the BSO and first harpist for the Boston Pops. The Pops season hasn't started yet, but, "they play a lot of things with harp cadenzas."

She likes the harp very much. "It's different, not everyone plays the harp. I like the tone. It's a much more mellow instrument than the piano." The harp is considered oneof the more difficult instruments to master, she said.

Although her favorite music is classical, Miss Hobson also enjoys jazz, and "some pop." Her favorite composer, right now, ("I keep changing my mind,") is Mahler.

"He writes really beautiful harp pieces. You can hear every note."

Ann Hobson

BAY STATE BANNER
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 16,000

NOV 6 1969

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

NOV 18 1969

THE PHILADELPHIA GETS FIRST BLACK

Violist Is the Only Negro in Orchestra's History

By DONAL HENAHAN

The Philadelphia Orchestra has engaged the first black musician in its 69-year-old history. Among the Big Five symphony orchestras—New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Boston and Chicago—that leaves only Chicago without a Negro on its regular roster.

Renard Edwards, a 25-year-old violist who is a member of the Symphony of the New World in New York, auditioned Sunday for the Philadelphia post and was hired, starting with the 1970-71 season.

Benjamin Steinberg, musical director of the Symphony of the New World, an integrated orchestra whose make-up is one-third to one-half Negro, expressed delight yesterday at the Philadelphia action in hiring one of his players. "I predict the New York Philharmonic will engage at least one more Negro by next season, too," he said.

The Philharmonic, recently involved in hearings by the City Commission on Human Rights as a result of charges of racial discrimination brought by two black musicians, has one Negro on its roster, Sanford Allen, a violinist who was hired in 1962. The Boston Symphony recently hired a Negro harpist, and the Cleveland Orchestra has for some years had a cellist on the roster.

Boris Sokoloff, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra, said he had first heard Mr. Edwards as a principal violist of the Lake George Opera Company, and was impressed.

"But I'm only the manager, and my recommendation probably carried no more weight than it should." Eugene Ormandy, musical director of the orchestra, made the decision to engage Mr. Edwards, Mr. Sokoloff said.

Mr. Steinberg called the Philadelphia move a heartening sign pointing toward increasing integration of the nation's leading orchestras.

"I noticed that recently, for a children's concert, the New York Philharmonic engaged two Negroes as substitutes, Elayne Jones, the timpanist, and Richard Davis, on double bass."

Miss Jones, he said, had played as a substitute with the Philharmonic about 10 years ago, but not since.

LA TIMES
Friday, November 21, 1969

Orchestra Gets Black Musician

New York Times News Service

The Philadelphia Orchestra has engaged the first black musician in its 69-year-old history. Among the Big Five symphony orchestras—New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Boston and Chicago—that leaves only Chicago without a Negro on its regular roster.

• • •

RENARD EDWARDS, a 25-year-old violist who is a member of the Symphony of the New World in New York, auditioned Sunday for the Philadelphia post and was hired, starting with the 1970-71 season.

Benjamin Steinberg, musical director of the Symphony of the New World, an integrated orchestra whose make-up is one-third to one-half Negro, expressed delight yesterday at the Philadelphia action in hiring one of his players. "I predict the New York Philharmonic will engage at least one more Negro by next season, too," he said.

• • •

THE PHILHARMONIC, recently involved in hearings by the City Commission on Human Rights as a result of charges of racial discrimination brought by two black musicians, has one Negro on its roster, Sanford Allen, a violinist who was hired in 1962. The Boston Symphony recently hired a Negro harpist, and the Cleveland Orchestra has for some years had a cellist on the roster.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849

NOV 9 1969

An even tempo'd man

THE SOUND of two orchestras is music to the ears of William Steinberg who serves simultaneously as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first time in history that one man has "doubled in baton" at the head of two major U.S. orchestras.

The renowned, 69-year-old maestro, who enjoys an international reputation as a "symphonic trouble-shooter" and "builder of orchestras," divides his time between Pittsburgh and Boston from what he calls a midway point—a house he had built in East Hampton, on the edge of the Atlantic Ocean.

There, Steinberg, a recent widower, relaxes with his daughter and son-in-law and their three young sons, walking, and above all, studying musical scores and complete operas by heart.

Can do, is motto of conductor William Steinberg, shown shopping with his daughter Sylvia at East Hampton, L.I.

Maestro spend evenings in study tackling worldwide correspondence related to concerts from Haifa to Hollywood.

PHOTOS BY BEN SPIEGEL

The Cologne-born conductor, who commands the respect of knowledgeable critics for his solid baton technique, cracks up with laughter at musical antics of grandsons, Raphael, 11, on clarinet and David, 13, on trumpet.

133.

Music 5454 Boston Symphony Orchestra

Revolution in White Tie and Tails

At this writing, three major American symphony orchestras are on strike: the San Francisco Symphony, the National Symphony of Washington, D.C., and the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera Company. This situation was predictable and it is inexcusable. The three orchestras had contracts that were up for renewal, and naturally the locals of the American Federation of Musicians asked for adjustments in salaries and changes in working conditions. This could not have come as a surprise to anybody. But the rule with these symphony strikes is that you plant them two or three years in advance and they come up in the fall. Every year, you have to wait till October to find out which orchestras are playing and which are not.

In appealing to the public for support, symphony managements attempt to give the impression that, by refusing to play, the musicians are delivering a body blow to Art and Culture. This is the weakest possible point. The works that have not been performed because of the strikes are, in the main, repertory standbys which are available in stereophonic recordings to anybody with the price of a symphony ticket in his pocket. And for standard works, the recordings – taped, retaped, edited out of all recognition – are the superior product.

Concerts are social occasions. At their best, with a warmly responsive audience and a great performance, they have an incandescence that mechanical reproduction can't touch. But usually,

NEW REPUBLIC
WASHINGTON, D. C.
W. 120 000

NOV 1 1969

the magic is missing. The ticket-holder attends for reasons that may not be clear to himself. Celebrity watching is one, and not necessarily the worst. But whether the celebrity is Joan Sutherland or Joan Baez, the motive is the same, and it has nothing to do with high art. Another is bead-wearing. This is pure Maggie and Jiggs. You get dressed up in your finery, you go to the best seats in the house to listen to God-knows-what, and then you get drunk with a famous violinist at one of those parties where they keep the caviar in a statue of a llama made out of ice. Then there is the thrill of hearing masterpieces in live performances. If you are a Cinderella Hasenpfeffer and can't afford tickets, you go without lunch and sit behind a pillar to hear, say, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in the Brahms First, and you feel better for it until you read in the paper the next day (in a review which is accurate) that the strings were sloppy and the entrances ragged and this black day for the orchestra should be forgotten.

A listener who goes to concerts for reasons like these does not suffer greatly from symphony strikes. The people who get hurt are some, and only some, of the players, the hardest hit being string players in the rear desks. And the big-name soloists, some of whom charge as much for a single engagement as an orchestra fiddler makes in a year.

The union likes to suggest that the players in the local orchestra are starving to death. Many of them are not. Symphony wage scales are based on minimums set in their contracts, and frequently these are low. However, a fact hardly ever advertised is that many players receive more than base pay, and sometimes more than double base pay. Anyone who plays a solo instrument – a flute, a bass clarinet or whatever – is entitled to expect more than the minimum and usually gets it. And principals in sections are always paid more. Just how much more nobody knows. Dear friends who have worked side by side for twenty years and otherwise have no secrets from each other will not tell anybody what they make, and management won't tell either because the secret salary arrangements have the effect of keeping the orchestra divided, an advantage to management during contract negotiations. Anyone who wants to know which side to be on in one of these conflicts is put off from the beginning by the fact that the most necessary information, which is what the salaries are, is suppressed at the source.

This much is sure: The heart of a symphony orchestra is its string section, and it is string players who most often have to live on the minimum. Furthermore, the musician's union, even in the better locals, frequently creates conditions which make it impossible for the symphony man to appear in public in jobs that might bring him some extra cash. The result is that a segment of the educated class – a small one, to be sure – is sentenced, permanently, to living at a standard somewhat below the middle-class average.

Too much can be made of this point. The big five (Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia) pay minimums between $10,000 and $15,000. Living costs in New York are terribly high; even so, players in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra can afford a lot of the creature comforts they like. They can buy a house and a car, get married and raise a family like everybody else. This may not be luxury, but it's not bad.

However, in the other twenty-odd so-called "major" orchestras, the minimum is not enough. The figures don't much matter, because the cost of living varies so much from one city to the next. But in Denver or Detroit or San Francisco, the man who takes a job in the symphony had better have a wife who can, and will, work.

If the salary scale is to be improved, somebody has to kick in the money. Who will this be? A going candidate is the federal government, and if the orchestras can hold out long enough, this will probably be the answer. As it is, the load falls on the shoulders of a handful of rich citizens. This is true even when there is foundation money available.

The rich people who support orchestras are not, as a rule, bleeding-heart liberals. Frequently, they are unmoved by the problems of the poor, including the poor people in white tie and tails who work in the orchestra; and some of them are bitterly opposed to conceding anything to the musicians. At the same time these people are genuinely generous, and the sums they give are substantial. Last year the Cleveland Symphony ended the season a quarter of a million dollars in the red, even after lucrative tours and a huge sale of phonograph records. The deficit was made up by people who had some money and were willing to pour it into this cause. But there is a limit to this kind of money.

The Cleveland case is special because management treats the players – or tries to – as if they were the crown jewels of Catherine the Great. Which they are. The problem, and this is common with the great orchestras, is that in some jurisdictions the union, the American Federation of Musicians, is the enemy. The union was founded to protect a dying race of performers – pit players, and the members of pop combos – who now get very little work and make up the rank and file. A few years ago, in Cleveland, Local 4 of the American Federation of Musicians attacked the orchestra in a war of extermination which nearly succeeded. The Local would surely have made it if it were not for a few cool heads on the bench of the Ohio State Supreme Court who, dealing with some staggering number of cases – 14, I think – found in favor of members of the Cleveland Symphony who had got themselves into grave trouble with the local on matters of intra-union discipline and were very nearly expelled from the A F of M.

Symphony players as a group are unusually vulnerable. While not all of them are highly educated, they are, without exception, highly trained, and they are conditioned to a degree of regimentation that is either unknown or unacceptable to most Americans. Thirty years ago, when most symphony men were foreign-born and genuinely glad to be in the US, they were singularly docile. Now the balance has changed. Most of the players are American-born and American-trained, and it follows that they would like to have a regular supply of the bourgeois amenities – regular hours, regular pay for a 52-week year, days off, vacations, pensions and the rest.

Not all of these attractive conditions can be met easily. Money aside, the actual working conditions of an orchestra are always those of the professional performing artist who, if he travels, has to settle for living out of a suitcase, eating bad food, and working on an unpredictable schedule which is sometimes ludicrously heavy.

And other unpleasant conditions under which the players work are frequently not subject to negotiation. A conductor who is a bully, a manager who runs the orchestra as if he were a Mafia chieftain, or a management that is overtly scornful of the players and their demands – the only way to get away from these is to leave the orchestra, a course which large numbers of players have taken because it was the only one open to them.

Some years ago, Jacques Barzun wrote: ". . . The willingness to incorporate art into the economy is a recognition of its dignity and worth. Every other attitude toward the finances of the subject is sentimentality or sour grapes."

For many years now, we have been getting the sentimentality and the sour grapes in almost equal quantities. The point is that symphony musicians should, as a matter of course, enjoy comfort and security proportional to that enjoyed by people of comparable training and experience in other fields. If they cannot be accommodated within the existing symphonic apparatus, some alternative will have to be found.

Robert Evett

Increased Wages and Benefits for Symphony Musicians

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

NOV 1969

(The present article on the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the nineteenth in a series of articles dealing with the development of major symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada and increased wage scales and benefits for their members that have been negotiated between A. F. of M. locals and orchestra managements.)

While studying in Vienna in 1857 a young Bostonian, Henry Lee Higginson, wrote to his father: "As everyone has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world: without it, I miss much, and with it I am happier and better."

For twenty-four years Mr. Higginson cherished a plan which he was finally able to realize: to establish a permanent orchestra in Boston. This same man guided it personally and paid all its debts from his own pocket for nearly forty years. Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra enjoyed the great advantage of growing to full maturity with a freedom from serious financial struggle. When the time came, however, the citizens of Boston were ready to accept and support the orchestra.

The first concert took place in the Boston Music Hall on October 22, 1881. Twenty programs were presented the first season under the direction of George Henschel with a recorded total of 83,359 persons in attendance.

Wilhelm Gericke succeeded Mr. Henschel as conductor; Artur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler and Henri Rabaud were the orchestra's music directors prior to the appointment of Pierre Monteux in 1919. The latter conductor gave the symphony concerts life in a new direction by greatly widening the range of the programs.

A new era began with the the advent of Serge Koussevitzky in 1924. For twenty-five years the names of the orchestra and its conductor seemed inseparable. During his reign the orchestra's recordings, begun in 1917, appeared with more and more frequency, as did regular radio broadcasts of its live concerts. In 1930 the free Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River enbankment were initiated under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, who, that same year, became conductor of the Boston Pops concerts. In 1936 Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played their first summer concerts in the Berkshire Hills, and in 1938 they began their annual summer residence at the now famous estate of Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts. All these avenues quickly increased the orchestra's audiences by the tens of thousands. Then in 1940 Dr. Koussevitzky realized his dream of many years when the orchestra founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. This summer academy of music for young advanced musicians further increased the Boston Symphony Orchestra's influence throughout the world.

William Steinberg

The broader audience, the added activities, and the over

Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Musical Director.

extra financial responsibilities, which naturally resulted, all played a part in the development in the method of support of the orchestra. From the beginning, of course, there had always been the basic funds provided by the sale of tickets, but a yearly deficit resulted which, as previously stated, was paid by Mr. Higginson from his personal funds until 1918. In the next sixteen years a handful of Boston citizens helped the Trustees to erase the annual deficits. By 1934 however, private fortunes had dwindled to a marked degree and the Trustees conceived the idea of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereby a contribution of any amount automatically made the donor a Friend of the orchestra. This placed the support of the orchestra directly in the hands of its audiences and admirers in Boston and elsewhere, making it completely a public trust. There have been the additions of a strong endowment fund and income from recordings, but the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra still constitute a major source of support, contributing as much as $350,000 annually in recent years.

Dr. Koussevitzky retired as music director of the orchestra in 1949, but continued as director of the Berkshire Music Center until his death in 1951.

Forthwith Charles Munch began his thirteen year tenure as music director of the orchestra in the autumn of 1949. He extended the policy of giving strong support to the music of contemporary composers and introduced much music from the French repertoire to this country. During Mr. Munch's term the orchestra made its first tours abroad, under the auspices of the United States Government. In 1951 he restored to the public the privilege of hearing the orchestra in open rehearsals, a practice which Mr. Higginson had inaugurated during the early days. The proceeds from these open rehearsals, offered at a lower subscription rate, benefit the orchestra's Pension Fund.

(Continued on page twenty-four)

INCREASED WAGES AND BENEFITS

(Continued from page nine)

When Mr. Munch made known his intentions of retiring at the close of the 1961-62 season, Erich Leinsdorf was engaged to take over the conductorial duties. His seven seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also marked with great accomplishment. The orchestra continued its full schedule of Boston and Tanglewood performances, broadened the scope of its educational activities and pursued an intensive recording schedule. This past summer, at the end of the Tanglewood season, Mr. Leinsdorf relinquished his post to William Steinberg in order to concentrate on freelance concert and opera work.

When Mr. Steinberg assumed his place at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the opening of the eighty-ninth season on September 26, the complete response of the orchestra was at once apparent. The audience at Symphony Hall, the orchestra's permanent home since 1900, rose with unmistakable enthusiasm at the close of the concert for the engrossing performance rendered by the 106-member ensemble under its new music director. It is indeed evident that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is entering upon a new and even greater plateau.

Mr. Steinberg, who has been music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra since 1952, will continue guiding that organization as well. He first conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January, 1960, and has returned regularly since then. This season he will conduct about half of the Boston winter concerts and lead the orchestra in a number of its Tanglewood summer programs.

As before, the Boston season consists of twenty-four Friday/Saturday pairs and five shorter series on Tuesday and Thursday evenings. There will be the customary seven open rehearsals, which this year will have a different conductor for each. The guest conductors include Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini, Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. Michael Tilson Thomas, newly appointed assistant conductor, will also conduct. Erich Leinsdorf will return as a guest conductor. On December 17, Arthur Fiedler, celebrating his seventy-fifth birthday, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special non-subscription concert given in his honor. Among the featured soloists scheduled to appear this season are pianists Rudolf Serkin, Robert Casadesus. Rudolf Firkusny, Alexis Weissenberg, Ingrid Haebler and Theodore Lettvin; violinists Isaac Stern, Edith Peinemann and Joseph Silverstein (the orchestra's concertmaster); cellists Zara Nelsova and Jules Eskin (the orchestra's principal cellist); singers Evelyn Lear, Evelyn Mandac, Stanley Kolk, Sherrill Milnes, Maureen Forrester, Jon Vickers, Arnold Voketaitis, Vern Shinnall, Philip Cho, Martina Arroya, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis and Thomas Paul.

All the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are generally sold out. Nevertheless, to maintain an orchestra of this size and calibre is an enormous undertaking. Last season the total cost for salaries, administration, music, transportation, maintenance, etc. was over $5,000,000.

The major factor in the increased expenses of the orchestra was the three-year contract signed with Local 9 on August 21, 1968. According to Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, "The agreement was generous, but also fair and justifiable." He pointed out that until recently compensation for symphonic musicians had been "appallingly low." Through the years the local and the symphony management exerted every effort to improve the wage scales and conditions of the orchestra and much has been accomplished in this regard periodically.

In the first year covered by the new pact the total minimum base salary per player was $13,000; this year it will be $14,000 and next year, $14,500. In addition each musician is guaranteed $1,000 per year from recordings. The annual average salary is perhaps even more meaningful, however, since a large percentage of the members receive compensation above the annual minimum.

The symphony season consists of thirty-one weeks (of which one is a paid vacation week); the pops season is nine weeks (of which one is a paid vacation week); and the summer season runs eight weeks (four paid vacation weeks between seasons).

In addition to year-round employment, the musicians are covered by Blue Cross/Blue Shield, Major Medical, $5,000 life insurance per member and $15,000 accident insurance (all occurances). Yearly physical examinations are voluntary for present members, compulsory for new ones. Sick pay continues for the remainder of the player's contract or fifty-two weeks, whichever is shorter. There is also a severance pay clause in the contract which entitles any member whose duties are terminated to be paid the sum of $100 for each year of service.

Improvements have also been made in per diem allowances, rehearsal payments and overtime rates.

Noteworthy of mention is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund which dates back to 1901. Each member of the orchestra is required to pay an initiation fee and contribute approximately $175 a year in dues to this fund. The Trustees match the monies collected as well as make supplementary contributions. Additional revenue comes from special admissions charged at open rehearsals and from annual pension fund concerts. The fund has now reached a point where it can disburse minimum payments of 50 per cent of the basic minimum annual salary to retired musicians and to beneficiaries.

Indeed the Boston Symphony Orchestra of today, with its superb performances, its remarkable personnel and the vast public it addresses might seem at first glance very different from the sixty players whom Henry Lee Higginson assembled under the same name in 1881. However, if he were alive today, he would recognize the orchestra as still fundamentally his own, as the consistent outgrowth of his early imaginings and his long endeavors to make it one of the leading musical organizations of the world.

—A. F. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

William Steinberg, Music Director

FIRST VIOLINS
Joseph Silverstein
Concertmaster
Alfred Krips
Max Hobart
Rolland Tapley
Roger Shermont
Max Winder
Harry Dickson
Gottfried Wilfinger
Fredy Ostrovsky
Leo Panasevich
Noah Bielski
Herman Silberman
Stanley Benson
Sheldon Rotenberg
Alfred Schneider
Julius Schulman
Gerald Gelbloom
Raymond Sird

SECOND VIOLINS
Clarence Knudson
William Marshall
Michel Sasson
Leonard Moss
William Waterhouse
Ayrton Pinto
Amnon Levy
Laszlo Nagy
Michael Vitale
Victor Manusevitch
Ronald Knudsen
John Korman
Christopher Kimber
Spencer Larrison
Ikuko Mizuno

VIOLAS
Burton Fine
Reuben Green
Eugen Lehner
George Humphrey
Jerome Lipson
Robert Karol
Bernard Kadinoff
Vincent Mauricci
Earl Hedberg
Joseph Pietropaolo
Robert Barnes
Yizhak Schotten

CELLOS
Jules Eskin
Martin Hoherman
Mischa Nieland
Karl Zeise
Robert Ripley
Luis Leguia
Stephen Geber
Carol Procter
Jerome Patterson
Ronald Feldman
William Stokking

BASSES
Henry Portnoi
William Rhein
Joseph Hearne
Bela Wurtzler
Leslie Martin
John Salkowski
John Barwicki
Buell Neidlinger
Robert Olson

FLUTES
Doriot Anthony Dwyer
James Pappoutsakis
Phillip Kaplan

PICCOLO
Lois Schaefer

OBOES
Ralph Gomberg
John Holmes
Hugh Matheny

ENGL. H HORN
Laurence Thorstenberg

CLARINETS
Gino Cioffi
Pasquale Cardillo
Peter Hadcock
Eb clarinet

BASS CLARINET
Felix Viscuglia

BASSOONS
Sherman Walt
Ernst Panenka
Matthew Ruggiero

CONTRA BASSOON
Richard Plaster

HORNS
James Stagliano
Charles Yancich
Harry Shapiro
Thomas Newell
Paul Keaney
Ralph Pottle

TRUMPETS
Armando Ghitalla
Roger Voisin
Andre Come
Gerard Goguen

TROMBONES
William Gibson
Josef Orosz
Kauko Kahila

TUBA
Chester Schmitz

TIMPANI
Everett Firth

PERCUSSION
Charles Smith
Arthur Press, Ass't Timpanist
Thomas Gauger
Frank Epstein

HARPS
Bernard Zighera
Olivia Luetcke

LIBRARIANS
Victor Alpert
William Shisler

STAGE MANAGER
Alfred Robison

PERSONNEL MANAGER
William Moyer

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
NOV 1969

047

ACCOUNTING FOR THE ARTS

Facing budgets that won't budge, major arts organizations in Boston are desperately seeking new avenues for funds. But the traffic is virtually bumper to bumper.

by BERNARD TAPER

DICKENS' Micawber inimitably made the point that to have a few coppers more than one spends means happiness, a few coppers less, misery. By that standard, it is obvious that most of the arts organizations of Boston live a life of exquisite misery—those, that is, which manage to survive at all.

In the course of a study of the economics of Boston's arts conducted under the auspices of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of M.I.T.-Harvard, I made an analysis of the operating budgets of the major local arts organizations. Table I, derived from this data, gives a bird's-eye view of the nature of this civic misery.

It is, unfortunately, readily discernible that none of the arts organizations earns its own way at the box office or at the turnstiles. This is the nature of the arts. Economists William J. Baumol and William G. Bowen have thoroughly documented this situation on a national scale in their 1966 book

A staff writer for The New Yorker, Mr. Taper has also for the past two years functioned as a research associate at the Joint Center for Urban Studies of M.I.T.-Harvard. His book, The Arts in Boston, from which this article is drawn, will be published next spring by Harvard University Press.

entire expenses, and that falling short of doing so was some sort of surprise or miscalculation. I prefer to describe the various subsidies received as "unearned income," and to reserve the

Expenditures	46%

*Organization ended year with surplus as a result of contributions or endowment income.
NOTE: Because of rounding or unearned income surplus, percentages of total expenditures may not equal 100%.
SOURCE: Information provided by the arts organizations.

with some donors. Who knows, the time may even come when a corporation, wishing to donate a few dollars to poor old Harvard University, may have to tuck the gift away under the

the verge of collapse, and then begin to emit hysterical cries for help. They rely too much on the mails and not enough on their shoe leather. Their board members don't spend enough

13 organizations whose budgets are analyzed here constituted the preponderance of the amounts expended on the arts (not including the sums expended through university and college departments) in 1968. Their total expenditures that year amounted to $10,319,000. I would guess that if one adds the budgets for all the other small arts groups in the metropolitan region to this, plus the $264,000 spent on Summerthing (the Boston Summer Neighborhood Festival of the Arts) that year, one would come to a total expenditure on the visual and performing arts of about $11.4 million (not including universities and colleges.)

Table II examines the sources of unearned income for the 13 organizations, showing how they attempt to cope with the income gap. It can be seen that all rely strongly on contributions from private individuals. Leaving out endowment income, the breakdown for the rest of the unearned income is as follows: individual contributions, 58 per cent; foundations, 22 per cent; government, 16 per cent; and corporations, 4 per cent.

"The most frequent category under which a corporation, reluctant to come right out and admit that it has taken to sponsoring beauty, will disguise an arts grant is that of "Education."

The main local foundation assisting the arts has been the Permanent Charity Fund. The Fund's 1967-68 annual report noted that support for the arts continued to increase. Twenty-one grant payments totalling some $250,000 and 10 per cent of income were made in this category, a dramatic increase from the $13,000 (.7 per cent of income) invested in cultural programs and institutions during the 1962-63 year. More than half the total payments in this category went to helping some of the institutions meet their capital needs, through such grants as $50,000 to the Fund for the Boston Symphony, $50,000 to the Centennial Development Fund of the Museum of Fine Arts, $25,000 to the Centennial Fund of the New England Conservatory of Music, $7,500 to the Theatre Company of Boston to help in the preparation of new quarters at the Fenway Theatre and $1,000 to the Boston Children's Theatre for a Volkswagen bus.

The Fund has also been increasingly receptive to efforts intended to reach new audiences, especially those in the inner city neighborhoods. With that aim, the Fund has assisted such groups and projects as Summerthing; Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts, as well as the free performances Miss Lewis has staged for several summers in Franklin Park; the Library Creative Drama Program; the Community Music Center of Boston; the Institute of Contemporary Art, for its innovative program to reach into the neighborhoods; and the Boston Philharmonia, a new cooperative chamber orchestra established in 1967.

The bulk of the subsidies for operating expenses contributed to Boston arts institutions by foundations came, however, from large national foundations, like Ford and Rockefeller. A Ford Foundation grant amounting to $100,000 accounted for 88 per cent of the Boston Ballet's unearned income in its 1967-68 budget. Grants from national foundations also made possible the first year's operation of Elma Lewis' National Center of Afro-American Artists.

Similarly, the bulk of the government money came not from the state or city but from the federal government—either from the National Endowment for the Arts or from Title I and Title III grants. The 7 per cent shown in the government column for the Museum of Fine Arts, however, principally represents a special appropriation of $100,000 from the Commonwealth legislature for the museum's education program.

These grants, from the large foundations and from the federal government, have, needless to say, been gratefully

continued on page 97

TABLE II. SOURCES OF UNEARNED INCOME IN 1968
per cent of gifts or income from:

ORGANIZATION	Individuals	Corporations	Foundations	Government	Endowment
Museum of Fine Arts	8%	1%	0%	7%	85%
Boston Symphony Orchestra	65	6	12	0	17
Opera Company of Boston (1967)	57	1	31	11	0
Gardner Museum	0	0	0	0	100
Children's Museum (1968-69)	7	0	18	56	19
Boston Ballet Company	12	0	88	0	0
Charles Playhouse	60	1	0	39	0
DeCordova Museum	14	0	0	0	86
Theater Company of Boston	36	1	37	26	0
Institute of Contemporary Art	62	1	9	28	0
National Center of Afro-American Artists	53	15	30	2	0
Boston Philharmonia (1968-69)	66	4	30	0	0
Handel and Haydn Society	3	0	0	0	97
Totals, in thousands of dollars	$1,244	$88	$466	$357	$2,470

NOTE: Because of rounding, percentages of total expenditures may not equal 100%.
SOURCE: Information provided by the arts organizations.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
NOV 1969

Above left: demolition of the Museum of Fine Arts (pictured below), 1911. Right: development of Commonwealth Avenue, c. 1872. Below: Commonwealth Avenue showing Clarendon, Berkeley, and Arlington streets, c. 1890.

Performing Arts: the Economic Dilemma. What they reveal about the performing arts is even more true of museums, for most of these can earn comparatively far less by way of admission fees; it has been the tradition of many American museums, in fact, to make no entrance charge at all, on the theory that they should be as readily accessible to the people as are public libraries. That was the long-standing policy of Boston's Museum of Fine Arts. It was not until 1966, under the pressure of what the Trustees described as "a serious and persistent operational deficit," that the Museum of Fine Arts instituted admission fees—$1.00 for adults at present (with Tuesday evenings free), and no charge for children up to the age of sixteen. In 1968, the revenue from admission fees amounted to $142,000—unquestionably a substantial sum, yet only about 4 per cent of the total needed to operate the museum that year. Clearly, museums cannot rely for their continued existence solely on what they can take in at the gate. In most places the municipality or the county picks up the tab for the local museum's expenses. Boston has never enjoyed that tradition, so the major local museum without endowment—namely, the Institute of Contemporary Art—has always had to operate under precarious conditions.

As can be seen from Table I, the major arts organizations in Boston earned, on an overall average, almost half of their expenses—slightly over 49 per cent, to be exact. They managed to obtain an additional 45 per cent in unearned income from a variety of sources—contributions, foundations, government, endowment. This left them with a deficit of 8 per cent which they could not obtain anywhere. What they did to keep going was to borrow or put off creditors as long as they were able or dip into capital—if they had any. It is this 8 per cent in the budget which sooner or later can break the back of an arts institution and force it out of existence, even though in dollar amounts the requisite sums may indeed often be modest. (In discussions of costs of the arts one often finds the term "deficits" used to describe all costs not met by earned income. "Income gap" is the term Baumol and Bowen find more suitable, as do I. To call this gap a "deficit" seems to me loose and misleading. Such usage suggests that the arts institutions had reckoned on earning their entire expenses, and that falling short of doing so was some sort of surprise or miscalculation. I prefer to describe the various subsidies received as "unearned income," and to reserve the term "deficits" for those expenses that still remain to be paid after all income, earned and unearned, has been received.)

"Museums cannot rely for their continued existence solely on what they take in at the gate. In most places the municipality picks up the tab for the local museum's expenses. Boston has never enjoyed that tradition. . . ."

From these figures, one may note how dominant are just two organizations—the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Museum of Fine Arts—in the cultural life of Boston. The expenditures of these two organizations alone amounted to over $7 million, accounting for some 70 per cent of the total arts expenditures of the major arts organizations. Their deficits—$374,000

TABLE I. OPERATING BUDGETS OF 13 MAJOR ARTS ORGANIZATIONS IN GREATER BOSTON FOR 1968

(except as indicated, budgets are for either the 1968 calendar year or the 1967-68 fiscal year; dollar figures are in thousands)

ORGANIZATION	Earned Income		Unearned Income		Deficit		Expenditures
	Dollars	% of Expend.	Dollars	% of Expend.	Dollars	% of Expend.	Dollars
Museum of Fine Arts	$1,267	35%	$1,969	55%	$374	10%	$ 3,610
Boston Symphony Orchestra	2,420	68	857	24	293	8	3,570
Opera Company of Boston (1967)	339	45	472	62	0*	0	757
Gardner Museum	12	3	470	114	0*	0	411
Children's Museum (1968-69)	110	30	195	53	60	16	365
Boston Ballet Company	151	43	114	32	89	25	354
Charles Playhouse	260	75	54	16	31	9	345
DeCordova Museum	218	63	118	34	8	2	344
Theater Company of Boston	99	64	57	37	0*	0	155
Institute of Contemporary Art	33	23	108	77	0	0	141
National Center of Afro-American Artists	2	2	106	93	6	5	114
Boston Philharmonia (1968-69)	24	27	67	76	0*	0	88
Handel and Haydn Society	26	40	37	57	2	3	65
Totals	$4,961		$4,624		$863		$10,319
Percentages of Expenditures		48%		45%		8%

*Organization ended year with surplus as a result of contributions or endowment income.
NOTE: Because of rounding or unearned income surplus, percentages of total expenditures may not equal 100%.
SOURCE: Information provided by the arts organizations.

13 organizations whose budgets are analyzed here constituted the preponderance of the amounts expended on the arts (not including the sums expended through university and college departments) in 1968. Their total expenditures that year amounted to $10,319,000. I would guess that if one adds the budgets for all the other small arts groups in the metropolitan region to this, plus the $264,000 spent on Summerthing (the Boston Summer Neighborhood Festival of the Arts) that year, one would come to a total expenditure on the visual and performing arts of about $11.4 million (not including universities and colleges.)

Table II examines the sources of unearned income for the 13 organizations, showing how they attempt to cope with the income gap. It can be seen that all rely strongly on contributions from private individuals. Leaving out endowment income, the breakdown for the rest of the unearned income is as

"T
cor adm will tion follows:

per cent: f
ernment, l
4 per cent
The ma
the arts
Charity Fu
nual repor arts conti
one grant $250,000 were made increase fr of income grams and

TABLE II. SOURCES OF UNEARNED per cent of gifts or income f

ORGANIZATION	Individuals	Corporations	Foun
Museum of Fine Arts	8%	1%
Boston Symphony Orchestra	65	6	1
Opera Company of Boston (1967)	57	1	3
Gardner Museum	0	0
Children's Museum (1968-69)	7	0	1
Boston Ballet Company	12	0	8
Charles Playhouse	60	1	0
DeCordova Museum	14	0	0
Theater Company of Boston	36	1	37
Institute of Contemporary Art	62	1	9
National Center of Afro-American Artists	53	15	30
Boston Philharmonia (1968-69)	66	4	30
Handel and Haydn Society	3	0	0
Totals, in thousands of dollars	$1,244	$88	$46

NOTE: Because of rounding, percentages of total expendit
SOURCE: Information provided by the arts organizations.

with some donors. Who knows, the time may even come when a corporation, wishing to donate a few dollars to poor old Harvard University, may have to tuck the gift away under the

the verge of collapse, and then begin to emit hysterical cries for help. They rely too much on the mails and not enough on their shoe leather. Their board members don't spend enough

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
NOV 1969

TAPER continued from page 71

received, but they also carry hazards. The donors think of them as seed money, which will enable an arts institution to get on its feet—after which the grant will no longer be needed. But the facts of life are that, like the poor, the income gap will always be with us and is inherent in the nature of the presentation of art today. Quoting Baumol and Bowen again: "We believe we shall be able to demonstrate that the basic difficulty arises . . . from the economic structure of live performance. This conclusion has implications that are rather sobering. It suggests that the economic problems which beset the arts are not temporary—they are chronic. It suggests that if things are left to themselves deficits are likely to grow. Above all, this view implies that any group which undertakes to support the arts can expect no respite." The national foundations have yet to come to grips with the full implications of this.

One further note should be made concerning the categories in Table II, and that is that it probably contains some distortion because of variations in the way the responding organizations defined each of the categories. The BSO, for instance, classifies gifts from local family foundations as coming from private individuals. Gifts from corporation-sponsored foundations may appear under the "foundations" or under the "corporations" columns, depending on how the respondent viewed them. My impression is that most company foundations simply act as a conduit for the parent company's philanthropy; thus their gifts properly belong under the "corporations" heading.

One also encounters some discrepancy, and even minor subterfuge, in definition of the nature of the gifts. In examining the records of a number of corporations and foundations, I have often noted gifts to the arts listed under some other, apparently more respectable category—such as "Civic Contributions" or "Social Welfare." The most frequent category under which a corporation, reluctant to come right out and admit that it has taken to sponsoring beauty, will disguise an arts grant is that of "Education." This has been so, at least, in recent years. However, if the present disorders on the campuses continue much longer, "Education" may lose its respectability—it already has, I am told—as a category with some donors. Who knows, the time may even come when a corporation, wishing to donate a few dollars to poor old Harvard University, may have to tuck the gift away under the heading of "Arts" and hope that no angry stockholder will notice it is really for education.

As I have estimated, the total arts expenditure for Greater Boston in 1968 was about $11.4 million. It can be further estimated that about $5.4 million of that sum was earned income; about $5 million was unearned income; and that there remained a total deficit of around $1 million.

For these organizations merely to continue to survive in their present uncertain way requires thus that an additional $1 million must be obtained annually for Boston arts institutions which they are not now receiving. I would guess that probably an additional million on top of that would be needed to enable them to expand and improve—as well as stabilize—their operations, and also to help finance new ventures in the arts.

In short, if the arts are to thrive, additional revenues amounting to a total of around $2 million are required. The bulk of this amount will have to be provided as unearned income—that is, subsidies and contributions.

Possibly this amount could be reduced if arts organizations managed their operations more efficiently. There exists a rather widespread belief to this effect. Undoubtedly some arts institutions are being operated in a non-too-businesslike fashion (as are also some businesses), but Baumol and Bowen have concluded that this is not the heart of the problem. "One can . . . produce examples of waste and mismanagement which have clearly aggravated the financial problems of the arts, but they too are not the main culprits—there are too many well-managed organizations that incur substantial deficits for us to credit incompetence as the central cause of the economic problems of the arts," they wrote.

Nearly all the arts organizations conduct fund drives of one sort or another, to help meet the income gap. For the most part, these have not been organized as systematically or thoughtfully as they might be. In the opinion of one professional fund-raiser with whom I spoke—a man who knows the Boston scene well—the local arts groups have been "sloppy, lazy and hysterical" in their approach to fund-raising. He said, "They don't work out a long-term careful study of their needs and possibilities but rather wait until the last minute, when they find themselves on the verge of collapse, and then begin to emit hysterical cries for help. They rely too much on the mails and not enough on their shoe leather. Their board members don't spend enough for the Museum and $293,000 for the Symphony—add up to an even higher percentage of the total.

over

Fortunately both organizations have endowments into which they could dip in order to bail themselves out, but this is obviously not satisfactory as a long-term solution. The BSO, possessing the smaller endowment of the two, reacted last year with the most alarm—especially since this was the second year in a row in which the endowment fund had to be tapped to help meet operating deficits. To have to dip into capital anywhere is regarded as unfortunate, but in Boston it is a sin. The crisis that hit the BSO was related to the signing of the new 52-week musicians' contracts and a number of other factors affecting symphony orchestras today. The financial ailments of the symphony orchestra are on the scale of a nationwide epidemic. Between 1964 and the spring of 1968, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, for instance, used up over $5 million of its $6 million endowment. It remains to be seen whether the Ford Foundation's $80 million transfusion to 61 orchestras throughout the country will suffice to help restore them to health. Costs are increasing so rapidly that this aid is likely to prove only a temporary salve. The 1968-69 expenditures for the Boston Symphony Orchestra were expected to grow to approximately $5 million—an increase of $1.4 million over the previous year; and the deficit was expected to amount to as much as $560,000—almost double that of the year before.

"Last year was the second in a row in which the endowment fund [of the BSO] had to be tapped to help meet operating deficits. In Boston, to have to dip into capital is regarded as a sin."

"For some of the region's non-equity theater groups, contributions of only a thousand dollars could mean the difference between survival and extinction."

For many years of its existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was principally sustained by a single benefactor—first by Henry Lee Higginson, who established the orchestra in 1881 and each year until 1918 picked up the tab for the expenses, and after Higginson by Ernest B. Dane during the 1920s. One of the difficulties compounding the BSO's problems today, according to Talcott M. Banks, current president of the orchestra's board of trustees, is the myth that some munificent individual is always ready in the wings, waiting to bail the orchestra out. But that is no longer the case. In the days when Henry Lee Higginson was supporting the orchestra, the income gap seldom went above $30,000 in any year. In 1914 he reported that the total he had expended on the orchestra during the preceding thirty-three years amounted to about $900,000. It had been his estimate, when he was first dreaming of starting an orchestra in Boston that would be as fine as any he had heard in Europe, that he could pay for it on the interest on a capital fund he would amass of $1 million; that calculation proved just about right.

But conditions then bore little similarity to those that pertain nowadays. The season was shorter, the orchestra had fewer members (72 in the first season compared to 106 at present), and the musicians were paid—in comparative, as well as absolute terms—much less than today. In a real sense, throughout all the years it has been the musicians, as well as Mr. Higginson and Mr. Dane, who subsidized the orchestra. In the early years, Mr. Higginson figured, a musician could be hired for about $1,500 a year. As recently as 1938, the average salary for a BSO member was $4,000 a year—which was just about half of the salary of a full professor at Harvard at the time. Under the present contract the average salary is about $20,000—roughly that of a Harvard full professor. The minimum salary under the new contract is $14,000. Even though that may seem fair compensation, the BSO, as well as other American orchestras, is finding it increasingly difficult to recruit first-rate talent—particularly for the string sections. Apparently, the rewards of being an orchestra member no longer seem adequate compensation for the extraordinary skills and the years of arduous training required. This is yet another aspect of the crisis confronting the symphony orchestra today.

Examining the figures in Table I, one cannot help being struck by two thoughts. One is that, despite the soaring costs of recent years and the consequent economic crisis, arts institutions remain relatively small in scale compared to that of other major enterprises in present-day America. Eli Goldston, president of Eastern Gas and Fuel Associates, commented on this in a review of the Baumol and Bowen book for Boston magazine. "Most businessmen fail to realize the relatively small scale budgets of the performing arts," he wrote. "A cultural conglomerate holding company which ran the Metropolitan Opera, the New York Philharmonic, along with the Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, and Philadelphia Symphonies, the largest American dance group (New York City Ballet), a hit musical comedy, and hit play on Broadway, the largest off-Broadway theatre, and finally, a successful regional theatre would have gross revenues less than one fourth of the $110 million in operating revenues which qualified Island Creek Coal Company as the smallest company to make the Fortune magazine directory of 500 largest industrial corporations in 1965."

A second, and corollary, thought to be noted is how extremely small are the sums required to keep in existence some companies who have a constant struggle to stay alive. For instance, the deficit reported for the Charles Playhouse was $31,000; failure to obtain that comparatively modest sum could be crucial for that repertory company, especially when the company is still struggling to pay off money borrowed to meet deficits in previous years.

The ranges in magnitude of the budgets for arts activities are extremely disparate, but the sums required to maintain these activities become even smaller as one considers the whole potpourri of semi-professional and amateur endeavors which help to make Boston as culturally vital a place as it is. The annual income gap for the Civic Symphony of Boston, for example, is only $5,000. For some of the region's non-equity theater groups, contributions of only a thousand dollars could mean the difference between survival and extinction.

There are probably well over a hundred performing and visual arts organizations in Greater Boston. The under across

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
NOV 1969

135

Performing Arts: the Economic Dilemma. What they reveal about the performing arts is even more true of museums, for most of these can earn comparatively far less by way of admission fees; it has been the tradition of many American museums, in fact, to make no entrance charge at all, on the theory that they should be as readily accessible to the people as are public libraries. That was the long-standing policy of Boston's Museum of Fine Arts. It was not until 1966, under the pressure of what the Trustees described as "a serious and persistent operational deficit," that the Museum of Fine Arts instituted admission fees—$1.00 for adults at present (with Tuesday evenings free), and no charge for children up to the age of sixteen. In 1968, the revenue from admission fees amounted to $142,000—unquestionably a substantial sum, yet only about 4 per cent of the total needed to operate the museum that year. Clearly, museums cannot rely for their continued existence solely on what they can take in at the gate. In most places the municipality or the county picks up the tab for the local museum's expenses. Boston has never enjoyed that tradition, so the major local museum without endowment—namely, the Institute of Contemporary Art—has always had to operate under precarious conditions.

As can be seen from Table I, the major arts organizations in Boston earned, on an overall average, almost half of their expenses—slightly over 49 per cent, to be exact. They managed to obtain an additional 45 per cent in unearned income from a variety of sources—contributions, foundations, government, endowment. This left them with a deficit of 8 per cent which they could not obtain anywhere. What they did to keep going was to borrow or put off creditors as long as they were able or dip into capital—if they had any. It is this 8 per cent in the budget which sooner or later can break the back of an arts institution and force it out of existence, even though in dollar amounts the requisite sums may indeed often be modest. (In discussions of costs of the arts one often finds the term "deficits" used to describe all costs not met by earned income. "Income gap" is the term Baumol and Bowen find more suitable, as do I. To call this gap a "deficit" seems to me loose and misleading. Such usage suggests that the arts institutions had reckoned on earning their entire expenses, and that falling short of doing so was some sort of surprise or miscalculation. I prefer to describe the various subsidies received as "unearned income," and to reserve the term "deficits" for those expenses that still remain to be paid after all income, earned and unearned, has been received.)

"Museums cannot rely for their continued existence solely on what they take in at the gate. In most places the municipality picks up the tab for the local museum's expenses. Boston has never enjoyed that tradition. . . ."

From these figures, one may note how dominant are just two organizations—the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Museum of Fine Arts—in the cultural life of Boston. The expenditures of these two organizations alone amounted to over $7 million, accounting for some 70 per cent of the total arts expenditures of the major arts organizations. Their deficits—$374,000

over

TABLE I. OPERATING BUDGETS OF 13 MAJOR ARTS ORGANIZATIONS IN GREATER BOSTON FOR 1968

(except as indicated, budgets are for either the 1968 calendar year or the 1967-68 fiscal year; dollar figures are in thousands)

ORGANIZATION	Earned Income		Unearned Income		Deficit		Expenditures
	Dollars	% of Expend.	Dollars	% of Expend.	Dollars	% of Expend.	Dollars
Museum of Fine Arts	$1,267	35%	$1,969	55%	$374	10%	$ 3,610
Boston Symphony Orchestra	2,420	68	857	24	293	8	3,570
Opera Company of Boston (1967)	339	45	472	62	0*	0	757
Gardner Museum	12	3	470	114	0*	0	411
Children's Museum (1968-69)	110	30	195	53	60	16	365
Boston Ballet Company	151	43	114	32	89	25	354
Charles Playhouse	260	75	54	16	31	9	345
DeCordova Museum	218	63	118	34	8	2	344
Theater Company of Boston	99	64	57	37	0*	0	155
Institute of Contemporary Art	33	23	108	77	0	0	141
National Center of Afro-American Artists	2	2	106	93	6	5	114
Boston Philharmonia (1968-69)	24	27	67	76	0*	0	88
Handel and Haydn Society	26	40	37	57	2	3	65
Totals	$4,961		$4,624		$863		$10,319
Percentages of Expenditures		48%		45%		8%

*Organization ended year with surplus as a result of contributions or endowment income.
NOTE: Because of rounding or unearned income surplus, percentages of total expenditures may not equal 100%.
SOURCE: Information provided by the arts organizations.

13 organizations whose budgets are analyzed here constituted the preponderance of the amounts expended on the arts (not including the sums expended through university and college departments) in 1968. Their total expenditures that year amounted to $10,319,000. I would guess that if one adds the budgets for all the other small arts groups in the metropolitan region to this, plus the $264,000 spent on Summerthing (the Boston Summer Neighborhood Festival of the Arts) that year, one would come to a total expenditure on the visual and performing arts of about $11.4 million (not including universities and colleges.)

Table II examines the sources of unearned income for the 13 organizations, showing how they attempt to cope with the income gap. It can be seen that all rely strongly on contributions from private individuals. Leaving out endowment income, the breakdown for the rest of the unearned income is as follows: individual contributions, 58 per cent; foundations, 22 per cent; government, 16 per cent; and corporations, 4 per cent.

"The most frequent category under which a corporation, reluctant to come right out and admit that it has taken to sponsoring beauty, will disguise an arts grant is that of "Education."

The main local foundation assisting the arts has been the Permanent Charity Fund. The Fund's 1967-68 annual report noted that support for the arts continued to increase. Twenty-one grant payments totalling some $250,000 and 10 per cent of income were made in this category, a dramatic increase from the $13,000 (.7 per cent of income) invested in cultural programs and institutions during the 1962-63 year. More than half the total payments in this category went to helping some of the institutions meet their capital needs, through such grants as $50,000 to the Fund for the Boston Symphony, $50,000 to the Centennial Development Fund of the Museum of Fine Arts, $25,000 to the Centennial Fund of the New England Conservatory of Music, $7,500 to the Theatre Company of Boston to help in the preparation of new quarters at the Fenway Theatre and $1,000 to the Boston Children's Theatre for a Volkswagen bus.

The Fund has also been increasingly receptive to efforts intended to reach new audiences, especially those in the inner city neighborhoods. With that aim, the Fund has assisted such groups and projects as Summerthing; Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts, as well as the free performances Miss Lewis has staged for several summers in Franklin Park; the Library Creative Drama Program; the Community Music Center of Boston; the Institute of Contemporary Art, for its innovative program to reach into the neighborhoods; and the Boston Philharmonia, a new cooperative chamber orchestra established in 1967.

The bulk of the subsidies for operating expenses contributed to Boston arts institutions by foundations came, however, from large national foundations, like Ford and Rockefeller. A Ford Foundation grant amounting to $100,000 accounted for 88 per cent of the Boston Ballet's unearned income in its 1967-68 budget. Grants from national foundations also made possible the first year's operation of Elma Lewis' National Center of Afro-American Artists.

Similarly, the bulk of the government money came not from the state or city but from the federal government—either from the National Endowment for the Arts or from Title I and Title III grants. The 7 per cent shown in the government column for the Museum of Fine Arts, however, principally represents a special appropriation of $100,000 from the Commonwealth legislature for the museum's education program.

These grants, from the large foundations and from the federal government, have, needless to say, been gratefully

continued on page 97

across

TABLE II. SOURCES OF UNEARNED INCOME IN 1968

per cent of gifts or income from:

ORGANIZATION	Individuals	Corporations	Foundations	Government	Endowment
Museum of Fine Arts	8%	1%	0%	7%	85%
Boston Symphony Orchestra	65	6	12	0	17
Opera Company of Boston (1967)	57	1	31	11	0
Gardner Museum	0	0	0	0	100
Children's Museum (1968-69)	7	0	18	56	19
Boston Ballet Company	12	0	88	0	0
Charles Playhouse	60	1	0	39	0
DeCordova Museum	14	0	0	0	86
Theater Company of Boston	36	1	37	26	0
Institute of Contemporary Art	62	1	9	28	0
National Center of Afro-American Artists	53	15	30	2	0
Boston Philharmonia (1968-69)	66	4	30	0	0
Handel and Haydn Society	3	0	0	0	97
Totals, in thousands of dollars	$1,244	$88	$466	$357	$2,470

NOTE: Because of rounding, percentages of total expenditures may not equal 100%.
SOURCE: Information provided by the arts organizations.

with some donors. Who knows, the time may even come when a corporation, wishing to donate a few dollars to poor old Harvard University, may have to tuck the gift away under the

the verge of collapse, and then begin to emit hysterical cries for help. They rely too much on the mails and not enough on their shoe leather. Their board members don't spend enough

over

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
NOV 1969

135

3 TAPER continued from page 71

received, but they also carry hazards. The donors think of them as seed money, which will enable an arts institution to get on its feet—after which the grant will no longer be needed. But the facts of life are that, like the poor, the income gap will always be with us and is inherent in the nature of the presentation of art today. Quoting Baumol and Bowen again: "We believe we shall be able to demonstrate that the basic difficulty arises . . . from the economic structure of live performance. This conclusion has implications that are rather sobering. It suggests that the economic problems which beset the arts are not temporary—they are chronic. It suggests that if things are left to themselves deficits are likely to grow. Above all, this view implies that any group which undertakes to support the arts can expect no respite." The national foundations have yet to come to grips with the full implications of this.

One further note should be made concerning the categories in Table II, and that is that it probably contains some distortion because of variations in the way the responding organizations defined each of the categories. The BSO, for instance, classifies gifts from local family foundations as coming from private individuals. Gifts from corporation-sponsored foundations may appear under the "foundations" or under the "corporations" columns, depending on how the respondent viewed them. My impression is that most company foundations simply act as a conduit for the parent company's philanthropy; thus their gifts properly belong under the "corporations" heading.

One also encounters some discrepancy, and even minor subterfuge, in definition of the nature of the gifts. In examining the records of a number of corporations and foundations, I have often noted gifts to the arts listed under some other, apparently more respectable category—such as "Civic Contributions" or "Social Welfare." The most frequent category under which a corporation, reluctant to come right out and admit that it has taken to sponsoring beauty, will disguise an arts grant is that of "Education." This has been so, at least, in recent years. However, if the present disorders on the campuses continue much longer, "Education" may lose its respectability—it already has, I am told—as a category with some donors. Who knows, the time may even come when a corporation, wishing to donate a few dollars to poor old Harvard University, may have to tuck the gift away under the heading of "Arts" and hope that no angry stockholder will notice it is really for education.

As I have estimated, the total arts expenditure for Greater Boston in 1968 was about $11.4 million. It can be further estimated that about $5.4 million of that sum was earned income; about $5 million was unearned income; and that there remained a total deficit of around $1 million.

For these organizations merely to continue to survive in their present uncertain way requires thus that an additional $1 million must be obtained annually for Boston arts institutions which they are not now receiving. I would guess that probably an additional million on top of that would be needed to enable them to expand and improve—as well as stabilize—their operations, and also to help finance new ventures in the arts.

In short, if the arts are to thrive, additional revenues amounting to a total of around $2 million are required. The bulk of this amount will have to be provided as unearned income—that is, subsidies and contributions.

Possibly this amount could be reduced if arts organizations managed their operations more efficiently. There exists a rather widespread belief to this effect. Undoubtedly some arts institutions are being operated in a non-too-businesslike fashion (as are also some businesses), but Baumol and Bowen have concluded that this is not the heart of the problem. "One can . . . produce examples of waste and mismanagement which have clearly aggravated the financial problems of the arts, but they too are not the main culprits—there are too many well-managed organizations that incur substantial deficits for us to credit incompetence as the central cause of the economic problems of the arts," they wrote.

Nearly all the arts organizations conduct fund drives of one sort or another, to help meet the income gap. For the most part, these have not been organized as systematically or thoughtfully as they might be. In the opinion of one professional fund-raiser with whom I spoke—a man who knows the Boston scene well—the local arts groups have been "sloppy, lazy and hysterical" in their approach to fund-raising. He said, "They don't work out a long-term careful study of their needs and possibilities but rather wait until the last minute, when they find themselves on the verge of collapse, and then begin to emit hysterical cries for help. They rely too much on the mails and not enough on their shoe leather. Their board members don't spend enough for the Museum and $293,000 for the Symphony—add up to an even higher percentage of the total.

over

3

"Last year was the second in a row in which the endowment fund [of the BSO] had to be tapped to help meet operating deficits. In Boston, to have to dip into capital is regarded as a sin."

Fortunately both organizations have endowments into which they could dip in order to bail themselves out, but this is obviously not satisfactory as a long-term solution. The BSO, possessing the smaller endowment of the two, reacted last year with the most alarm—especially since this was the second year in a row in which the endowment fund had to be tapped to help meet operating deficits. To have to dip into capital anywhere is regarded as unfortunate, but in Boston it is a sin. The crisis that hit the BSO was related to the signing of the new 52-week musicians' contracts and a number of other factors affecting symphony orchestras today. The financial ailments of the symphony orchestra are on the scale of a nationwide epidemic. Between 1964 and the spring of 1968, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, for instance, used up over $5 million of its $6 million endowment. It remains to be seen whether the Ford Foundation's $80 million transfusion to 61 orchestras throughout the country will suffice to help restore them to health. Costs are increasing so rapidly that this aid is likely to prove only a temporary salve. The 1968-69 expenditures for the Boston Symphony Orchestra were expected to grow to approximately $5 million—an increase of $1.4 million over the previous year; and the deficit was expected to amount to as much as $560,000—almost double that of the year before.

"For some of the region's non-equity theater groups, contributions of only a thousand dollars could mean the difference between survival and extinction."

For many years of its existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was principally sustained by a single benefactor—first by Henry Lee Higginson, who established the orchestra in 1881 and each year until 1918 picked up the tab for the expenses, and after Higginson by Ernest B. Dane during the 1920s. One of the difficulties compounding the BSO's problems today, according to Talcott M. Banks, current president of the orchestra's board of trustees, is the myth that some munificent individual is always ready in the wings, waiting to bail the orchestra out. But that is no longer the case. In the days when Henry Lee Higginson was supporting the orchestra, the income gap seldom went above $30,000 in any year. In 1914 he reported that the total he had expended on the orchestra during the preceding thirty-three years amounted to about $900,000. It had been his estimate, when he was first dreaming of starting an orchestra in Boston that would be as fine as any he had heard in Europe, that he could pay for it on the interest on a capital fund he would amass of $1 million; that calculation proved just about right.

But conditions then bore little similarity to those that pertain nowadays. The season was shorter, the orchestra had fewer members (72 in the first season compared to 106 at present), and the musicians were paid—in comparative, as well as absolute terms—much less than today. In a real sense, throughout all the years it has been the musicians, as well as Mr. Higginson and Mr. Dane, who subsidized the orchestra. In the early years, Mr. Higginson figured, a musician could be hired for about $1,500 a year. As recently as 1938, the average salary for a BSO member was $4,000 a year—which was just about half of the salary of a full professor at Harvard at the time. Under the present contract the average salary is about $20,000—roughly that of a Harvard full professor. The minimum salary under the new contract is $14,000. Even though that may seem fair compensation, the BSO, as well as other American orchestras, is finding it increasingly difficult to recruit first-rate talent—particularly for the string sections. Apparently, the rewards of being an orchestra member no longer seem adequate compensation for the extraordinary skills and the years of arduous training required. This is yet another aspect of the crisis confronting the symphony orchestra today.

Examining the figures in Table I, one cannot help being struck by two thoughts. One is that, despite the soaring costs of recent years and the consequent economic crisis, arts institutions remain relatively small in scale compared to that of other major enterprises in present-day America. Eli Goldston, president of Eastern Gas and Fuel Associates, commented on this in a review of the Baumol and Bowen book for Boston magazine. "Most businessmen fail to realize the relatively small scale budgets of the performing arts," he wrote. "A cultural conglomerate holding company which ran the Metropolitan Opera, the New York Philharmonic, along with the Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, and Philadelphia Symphonies, the largest American dance group (New York City Ballet), a hit musical comedy, and hit play on Broadway, the largest off-Broadway theatre, and finally, a successful regional theatre would have gross revenues less than one fourth of the $110 million in operating revenues which qualified Island Creek Coal Company as the smallest company to make the Fortune magazine directory of 500 largest industrial corporations in 1965."

A second, and corollary, thought to be noted is how extremely small are the sums required to keep in existence some companies who have a constant struggle to stay alive. For instance, the deficit reported for the Charles Playhouse was $31,000; failure to obtain that comparatively modest sum could be crucial for that repertory company, especially when the company is still struggling to pay off money borrowed to meet deficits in previous years.

The ranges in magnitude of the budgets for arts activities are extremely disparate, but the sums required to maintain these activities become even smaller as one considers the whole potpourri of semi-professional and amateur endeavors which help to make Boston as culturally vital a place as it is. The annual income gap for the Civic Symphony of Boston, for example, is only $5,000. For some of the region's non-equity theater groups, contributions of only a thousand dollars could mean the difference between survival and extinction.

There are probably well over a hundred performing and visual arts organizations in Greater Boston. The

under across 71

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
NOV 1969

for the Museum and $293,000 for the Symphony—add up to an even higher percentage of the total.

Fortunately both organizations have endowments into which they could dip in order to bail themselves out, but this is obviously not satisfactory as a longtime actually going out and calling on prospects. They prefer to sit around and genteelly wring their hands. And they haven't sufficiently involved the broader community. It's always the same few people who get solicited over and over."

"Last year was the second in a row in which the endowment fund [of the BSO] had to be tapped to help meet operating deficits. In Boston, to have to dip into capital is regarded as a sin."

And then along with this, as part of the fund-raising scene, there are the black-tie benefit performances, the champagne suppers for board members and benefactors, the cute and cozy auctions, the galas, the after-performance gatherings or first-night dinners and all the other hoopla on behalf of the arts one reads about in the society pages—and which probably offend as many untapped and potential sources of funds and allegiance to the arts as they attract.

There must be better ways than this to obtain the financing the arts require. One method often advocated is that of a united fund for the arts. Sixteen cities were reported to have conducted such federated compaigns in 1967. They ranged from Columbia, South Carolina, where $31,000 was raised, to be shared by four arts groups, to St. Louis, Missouri, where the Arts and Education Council of Greater St. Louis raised $778,000, in which ten groups shared. This federated approach can be considered to have worked quite successfully in some cities—most notably St. Louis, Cincinnati, St. Paul and Milwaukee. In Dallas, and New Orleans it has proved a fiasco.

Advantages most often cited are that this concerted approach eliminates needless competition and redundancy of fund-raising efforts by the arts organizations; that it enables a more professional, efficient fund-raising operation to be conducted than individual organizations—especially the smaller ones—are able to carry on, and that it has often managed to reach out and obtain new sources of funds for the arts.

Among disadvantages that have been encountered is the fact that such united fund efforts tend to favor the established arts groups of a city, to the neglect of newer, experimental groups. Internecine warfare may arise among the member organizations over the distribution of the funds obtained, and it has often been the case that individual arts organizations are acutely reluctant to submerge their individual identities in such a common effort.

Two of the country's most experienced professional fund raisers—George A. Brakely, Jr. and James V. Lavin—expressed a rather skeptical view of what they called "the united game" in the course of a joint presentation they made to a nation conference of their colleagues in 1968. "On the evidence," they commented, "it's pretty much our conclusion that united-giving campaigns for culture have yet to prove themselves and, lacking a strong track record, should be approached with some caution."

As far as Boston is concerned, I would say there is little likelihood of there being established as comprehensive an arts council as that in St. Louis. Neither the Symphony nor the Museum of Fine Arts would be inclined to participate. Each has its own carefully-cultivated body of patrons, whom it would not wish to share. Nor would these traditional cultural bastions of Boston be willing to have their individual prestige dissipated in some common appeal. Furthermore, from the point of view of the smaller organizations, it might not be an unalloyed blessing to be federated in fund raising with these two giants, because of the great difference in the scale of financial needs.

However, there is under way at present an effort on the part of a number of what might be called the middle-sized arts and cultural institutions to organize some working arrangement which might prove of mutual benefit. A council has recently been incorporated called The Metropolitan Cultural Alliance (MeCA). Its founding member organizations consist of the Charles Playhouse, the Theater Company of Boston, the Community Music Center, the Children's Museum, the DeCordova Museum, the National Center for Afro-American Artists, the Boston Center for Adult Education, the Cambridge Center for Adult Education, the Chorus Pro Musica, the Boston Children's Theatre and the Institute of Contemporary Art. An early statement made by the group as to what it might do went as follows:

> The Alliance will engage in projects which all or some of its members can best carry out by acting in concert. The following suggests the variety of its potential: (1) Fund-raising—supplementing, not replacing present efforts. (2) Cooperative administrative action—for example, mailing lists, schedules, printing and insurance. (3) Development of programs—such as neighborhood centers, film or arts festivals, etc. (4) Planning for joint facilities.

As its modest and practical first step, the Alliance sent out a mailing to test the receptivity of the public to such an organization. The response was not encouraging.

How successful the Alliance will be is difficult to predict. If it accomplishes nothing else, it will have done something unusual in Boston—where artists and arts institutions have tended to operate in isolation—in bringing some of them together to talk about common aims and needs.

It is clear from the foregoing that a substantial increase in contributions or subsidy for the arts is required if they are to flourish in Boston. Where will this money come from? I doubt that it can be obtained to the extent required from private sources. Boston has relied over-much on its old, noble tradition of private philanthropy in the past. Some new subsidy or patronage mix is required to meet present and future needs. The two potential sources which have been most neglected in this region are corporations and local and state government. □ soaring costs of recent years and the consequent economic crisis, arts institutions remain relatively small in scale compared to that of other major enterprises in present-day America. Eli Goldston, president of Eastern Gas and Fuel Associates, commented on this in a review of the Baumol and Bowen book for BOSTON magazine. "Most businessmen fail to realize the relatively small scale budgets of the performing arts," he wrote. "A cultural conglomerate holding company which ran the Metropolitan Opera, the New York Philharmonic, along with the Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, and Philadelphia Symphonies, the largest American dance group (New York City Ballet), a hit musical comedy, and hit play on Broadway, the largest off-Broadway theatre, and finally, a successful regional theatre would have gross revenues less than one fourth of the $110 million in operating revenues which qualified Island Creek Coal Company as the smallest company to make the Fortune magazine directory of 500 largest industrial corporations in 1965."

Copyright © 1969 by Bernard Taper

A second, and corollary, thought to be noted is how extremely small are the sums required to keep in existence some companies who have a constant struggle to stay alive. For instance, the deficit reported for the Charles Playhouse was $31,000; failure to obtain that comparatively modest sum could be crucial for that repertory company, especially when the company is still struggling to pay off money borrowed to meet deficits in previous years.

The ranges in magnitude of the budgets for arts activities are extremely disparate, but the sums required to maintain these activities become even smaller as one considers the whole potpourri of semi-professional and amateur endeavors which help to make Boston as culturally vital a place as it is. The annual income gap for the Civic Symphony of Boston, for example, is only $5,000. For some of the region's non-equity theater groups, contributions of only a thousand dollars could mean the difference between survival and extinction.

THERE ARE PROBABLY well over a hundred performing and visual arts organizations in Greater Boston. The Handsome modern Colonial combines the ageless charm of old brick fireplaces, huge country kitchen, cedar shake siding, with delightful, imaginative decorating. Master bedroom suite with dressing room and study; 4 other large bedrooms. Lovely landscaped acre lot with flagstone patio. Quiet street, yet convenient to Rt. 128. Exclusive broker.

L. DAVENPORT BOYD Since 1934
INC., REALTOR Weston
426 Boston Post Road • TW 3-4500

126.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

NOV 9 1969

The World Of Music

Performers Find Themselves Standing At Crossroads

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Writer

The calendar of events for November and December at New York's Lincoln Center is an impressive catalog of the performing arts. Performances and activities are scheduled in Philharmonic Hall, the recently opened Alice Tully Hall, New York State Theater, Vivian Beaumont Theater, the Library, and Museum.

But under Metropolitan Opera listings there is this ominous little notice: "At press time the Metropolitan Opera, due to a labor dispute, has no current schedule available." It might well be the understatment of the year, for it has been joined by similar notices for the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, D.C., the Kansas City Orchestra, where one colleague recently wrote a short non-review on a non-concert, and the Rochester Philharmonic.

What is even more frightening are the concerned opinions of those who are involved directly that all orchestras are in trouble, including the Boston, New York, Cleveland, and Chicago orchestras, since "every time they perform, even before packed houses, we lose money."

The economics of these situations may vary in details, but basically they share the common insoluble — the income from ticket sales does not cover the cost. There is no need to place blame on management or unions, on musicians or stars, on audiences or programs. All share in the debacle to some degree, and measuring that share and being acrimonious about it will not solve the problem.

As I pessimistically predicted last summer, the danger of losing some of our finest orchestras is more real and imminent than a good many people suspect, even in cities where orchestras are now performing before full houses. There are those who are already speaking of the demise of the Metropolitan Opera, and despairingly spread their hands. And there are always those who think that only the sudden disappearance of such major organizations might arouse enough people to do something about it.

Of course, some new ideas are being tried. Amalgamation talks have failed, as could have been guessed. Conglomerates in the performing arts are not yet the proven answer, but attempts at diversification have brought in some notable results.

For example, small ensembles from the Detroit, Cleveland, and Boston orchestras have gone out with the blessing and help of management to perform music, which, of course, is not in the large symphony orchestra's repertoire.

The need for fewer performers, the use of different music, the easier mobility, and lesser costs make such concerts attractive. Then, too, these groups are more frequently being given an opportunity to record.

One precious result of such endeavor is the re-opening of an inexhaustible treasury of rarely heard music. I recall one particular recording of Gabrieli's brass music, in which the brass players of the Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Chicago orchestras collaborated.

As the Christmas season approaches, more and more of the special recordings will be issued as come-ons for businesses — such as "Join the 1970 Christmas Club and take this recording home." A recent New York ad listed such a recording with the rare combination of soprano Leontyne Price, Steve and Eydie Gorme, and Arthur Fiedler.

Last year, a name string quartet played at the exclusive Hotel Pierre in late afternoon tea concerts, which proved — for whatever reason, musical or not — very successful. And why not? This modern version salon of the nobility once offered the only opportunity, outside of the church, for "public" performance.

During the Big Band era, hotel dining rooms and roof gardens were the location for some of the most successful jazz concerts. Very recently, "Jazz Interactions" began its fifth year of Sunday afternoon concerts at Danny's, a small room with warm, subdued, and gracious atmosphere on West 46th Street in New York City and the Erick Hawkins Dance Company was still packing them in after a week's run at Riverside Church's small theater.

In the meantime, the Portland Symphony Orchestra will be touring the Maritime Canadian Provinces for the first time next year. The same orchestra will also invade Maine's potato empire, Aroostook County, for the first time.

During wartime, music on a large scale became quite the thing at lunch time at factories and big plants. At one time, both the Boston and the mighty Philadelphia Orchestras were sponsored commercially on local television. Innovations of all sorts were the order of the day but recently the more venturesome seems to have been abandoned — except for the summer festivals, whose audience can be squarely credited to adventurous programming and trying the untried.

Even on the international level, new arrangements are beginning to break the surface. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has signed an exclusive new recording contract with the Deutsche Grammophone Company, based in Hamburg, Germany, effective when its present contract with RCA Victor expires next year. Of major importance is the opening up of a large foreign market for the recordings of one of our own major orchestras.

But all these changes of venue and extending opportunities are at best evasive of the major issue. Now that the performers are getting a piece of the pie, long overdue, none of the major organizations ever have a chance of being self-supporting.

As I have suggested before, the question now is: Do we want these organizations to continue to perform? If so, then there must be some organized form of regular support beyond the one-time gifts, the annual drives, the Damoclean sword of perennial deficits.

There are those who fear federal support of the arts, forgetting that federal funds are citizen-produced tax funds, and the prorated tax contribution per citizen would be infintesimal for this facet of our civilized life. No one in his right mind wants Washington to go into the performing arts business, nor be the only Midas.

But some form of rebuilding the foundations of these organizations has to be found and found quickly, before the whole edifice of the musical culture of which this nation is capable collapses. Basically then, it is not a question of money, per se, but rather if the nation wants its symphonic organizations to continue.

'Music Lies Unheard'

We really have never heard anyone challenge the premise that he who dances must pay the piper, but things are getting to the state where not even those who only want to sit and listen can raise the necessary cash. Music, like everything else, is costing more these days, and Marshfield area patrons of the Metropolitan Opera are beginning to wonder whether there will be any point in the annual pilgrimage to Minneapolis next spring. Unless "something gives," there won't be.

The current word from Fun City is that all salary payments to stars of the Met, which has been shut down for the past eight weeks by a labor dispute, will cease by this Saturday. Involved in the complicated controversy are 11 unions representing musicians, dancers, choristers and singers. In all likelihood, say our informants, there will be no Met season this year.

Nor is New York City the only site of muted cymbals and so on. Striking members of Washington's National Symphony will give a concert on Thursday — but only to build up their war chest. The first 11 weeks of the Kansas City Philharmonic's season have been canceled, and while Rochester musicians have signed a new contract, their 1969-70 season was five weeks late in getting started.

Similar trouble may be in the offing elsewhere. San Francisco musicians have not yet signed a contract for the season that begins shortly after Thanksgiving. Existing wage agreements of three of the nation's Big Five — the Chicago Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic — expire at the end of the current season. The Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, however, settled on three-year contracts in the past 12 months.

Restive musicians claim that rising living costs justify hefty wage increases, but their employers can argue just as persuasively that the money is not available. Over the past five years alone, the operating deficit of major American orchestras has climbed by more than 100 per cent.

The primary reason for worsening deficits, a spokesman for the American Symphony Orchestra League told our Washington source, is the "dramatic increase in the number of weeks of employment." A few years ago, symphony seasons generally were of 25 to 30 weeks' duration. Today, 52-week seasons are not uncommon.

A longer season means higher labor costs, and earned income — from ticket sales, tour dates, and so on — has not been able to keep pace. In some cases, orchestras have been dipping into the capital of their endowment funds to make ends meet.

The pending federal tax - reform bill poses an additional threat. Symphony associations around the country are apprehensive lest restrictions on the activities of foundations curtail one of their prime sources of outside income.

The present looks bleak for American symphony orchestras, but the future may be brighter. Recent labor agreements have tended to give management more flexibility in use of the symphonic ensemble.

Union negotiators used to insist that the symphony always play as a unit. Now however, management often has the right to divide the musicians into smaller groups for school concerts and other purposes. Part of the National Symphony, for instance, presented a Mozart series at Constitution Hall in Washington last season while the remainder of the ensemble performed pop concerts on tour.

Another cause for encouragement is local government support. The Buffalo Philharmonic and the Louisville Orchestra, to cite only two examples, receive assistance from both city and county governments. Such aid almost always is tendered in the form of a contract for services rendered. The word subsidy is still frowned on when it comes to the arts.

Those whose tastes turn to music must, indeed, be envious of that less esthetic - minded portion of the populace whose leisure - time appetite runs to a more robust form of rapture — the pigskin pursuit that fills stadium seats throughout the nation by the hundreds of thousands on fall and winter weekends. If there is a shortage of cash in that field of recreational endeavor it is not noticeable.

MARSHFIELD, WIS.
NEWS-HERALD
D. 13,000

NOV 11 1969

MUSIC

How should you run a symphony orchestra?

By GEORGE GELLES
H T Music Critic

Thanks to the Boston University Celebrity Series we'll be hearing four major orchestras this season other than our own Boston Symphony, and incidentally getting as many differing views on how such an institution should be run. The first of these visiting ensembles — the Philadelphia Orchestra — played here a fortnight ago, and with its appearance raised some crucial issues.

The symphony orchestra, I take it, is a public trust. Although managed and financed in large part by private parties, the men who run it must have an awareness of the singular role the symphony plays in society, contributing more than any other artistic venture to the cultural tone of the community.

To take the Boston Symphony, I think we're extremely fortunate in having a Board of Trustees that appreciates, however modestly, the attractiveness of chance. Headed by Boston lawyer Talcott M. Banks, the Board realizes its responsibility to modern composers in general and Americans in particular (think of the many works of Schoenberg we've heard, and the premiere performances of Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto), and it is aware as well of the need to cultivate young conductors (such as the present Assistant, 24 year old Michael Tilson Thomas) who in a real sense will keep the symphony alive and well.

If there is never quite enough new music by the composers we would really like to hear, there is at least discernable progress from year to year, however slowly it comes.

TURNING TO Philadelphia, then. Like many other American orchestras, it was spawned by ever-increasing amateur musical activity and born with the turn of the century. Fritz Scheel, who learned his art in Bremerhaven and Hamburg, led the orchestra first, and when he died in 1907, Karl Pohlig, a pianist and pupil of Liszt, succeeded him.

After these two men, now all but forgotten by history, came Leopold Stokes out of London, who arrived at the St. Bartholomew Church in New York as organist and then was hired to conduct the Cincinnati Symphony.

In 1912, Stokowski — having readapted the paternal Polish name — went to Philadelphia, and over the years he made the orchestra thoroughly first-rate. He was a gifted organizer, a super show-man and adventurous musician. If mention of his name today brings most quickly to mind "Fantasia" and his technicolor transcriptions of Bach, this is unfortunate, for it was Stokowski who first brought Mahler's monumental Eighth Symphony to the States and who gave us our initial hearing of Berg's "Wozzeck" and who worked extensively with the League of Composers and the International Composers Guild in getting the scores of the newest composers heard.

In 1936 Stokowski engaged Eugene Ormandy as assistant conductor, and two years later the latter took the helm. Or- the movement to the light, so to speak. Well, at this point Ormandy's performance was dynamically pale and flaccid in its muscle tone. Again, there was no sense of the suspense of the moment, no realization of its unique musical import.

(And this is the reason, I think, that people cough and squirm through the body of any work Ormandy conducts, but not at the ending, when the orchestral juices are flowing.)

AS FOR ORMANDY'S home-town programming, this season's schedule is unadventurous and grey. Philadelphia's impression of contemporary American composition, for instance, will be left by works of Piston, Ives, Schuman and Dello Joio (his "Hommage to Haydn" will be heard, and the title alone makes me shiver).

mandy started his career not as a conductor but as a string player, moving from the second violin section at the Capitol Theater in Manhattan to the firsts to the podium. Using the theater orchestra as home-base, he made a name for himself with numerous guest appearances, and then went to Minneapolis before Philadelphia.

IT'S THESE EARLY days as a violinist that help explain why, I think, Ormandy's conducting is considered deficient. The best conductors, it seems, are composers at heart. On the podium these men penetrate most deeply into the music, they make the most sense of the structural aspects of a piece and relate most lucidly small-scale detail to the larger scheme. This is the sort of intelligence I admire in the work of Bernstein and Boulez and Britten and Klemperer, and is what, I imagine, must have made Mahler's performances so special.

As a violinist, Ormandy's concern was with a single line, and his conducting can be said to share this same concern. He can shape a phrase and make it melodious, and he is able to whip up orchestral climaxes that seem always to end his readings with a bang, but despite this there has always been a concentration with the surface, a satisfaction with seeing to only the most superficial aspects of a piece.

Ormandy's great contribution has been in building an orchestra of awesome potential. The Philadelphians are justly famous for their 'sound', but the quality of the ensemble and the virtuosity of the players reaches far deeper. I'm reminded of the time when Klemperer conducted the orchestra in New York several seasons back, and set the town talking for weeks, so unique was the matching of musical mind and distinguished orchestra. Yet although Ormandy has formed a group that can do virtually anything he wishes it to, his performances take no advantage of this marvelous ensemble and show how poorly Ormandy plays on the orchestra itself.

I CAN ILLUSTRATE WHAT I mean with a few examples from his recent Symphony Hall performance of Mahler's First Symphony. Take the opening measures: the note A is spread among the strings over five octaves and marked pianissimo. The effect should be shimmering and nebulous, and as the harmony gets filled in by the winds, these measures should visually suggest an awakening of sorts, be it the Creation or a sunrise or anything you choose.

Ormandy started the Symphony as if he were turning on tap water. All of a sudden there was the 'Philadelphia sound' and a lot of A's. What was missing was any feel for the poetic imagery of the passage, any mystery or drama.

And in the finale, where about two-thirds through the music reaches its most ambiguous point: harmony is cloudy and the rhythmic pulse is momentarily stilled and the volume is held to a triple 'piano.' Suddenly the violas tear through this fog with a three-note motive marked triple 'forte' that is elaborated upon and leads Only these four men, none considered among the most progressive or interesting of native musicians, and all together giving a totally inadequate idea of the present state of music, let alone the shape of things to come.

Another example: while the BSO this season has already given us Stravinsky's 1964 "Huxley" Variations, the Philadelphians under Ormandy will go no further than Stravinsky's 1910 "Firebird." How conservative can you get?

All this, I submit, suggests that under Ormandy the Philadelphia is performing far less well than it might and with its head-in-the-sand programming is light years away from fulfilling its responsibility to educate its audience and improve public taste.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

NOV 5 1969

Dear Sir:

Please let me clarify my position with respect to an article ("Steinberg and the BSO") by Ralph Locke in your most recent issue.

In the article, Mr. Locke made some excellent statements in support of Conductor William Steinberg – and he made them in a generous and kind manner. I thought it was a well-written, worthwhile piece. However, I think he missed a point or two when he referred to Boston music critics, some of whom have been fairly critical of Steinberg during his first weeks here.

Mr. Locke noted during Steinberg's first concert the critics were on the "edge of their seats listening for things to complain about" and their subsequent reviews gave the impression Steinberg was "dull, stodgy, faceless and incompetent..."

Being new to the area, I won't even attempt to reply for other critics (I don't even know them), but I can reply for myself in that I reviewed all of the Friday afternoon concerts to which Mr. Locke referred.

I praised Mr. Steinberg's first concert–I don't recall making any really negative comments. I was more critical of the second concert. The most recent concert of Mozart and Brahms found me critical in some places, but attempting to give Steinberg due credit in others. Steinberg "incompetent?" Never. My reviews haven't even implied such a thing – at least, I hope not.

I have had some experience as a symphonic musician, a good deal of experience as a listener and student of symphonic and other forms of music. The sum of this is that my admiration for Steinberg has grown over the years and I fully respect him. Back in Pennsylvania (where I lived prior to coming here), it was always a treat and privilege to hear music under his direction. It continues to be both a treat and privilege here in Boston–perhaps even more so. Yes, my recent reviews have criticized him, but the compliments have been present also.

Now about that "edge of the seat" business:

I admit to studying scores, critiques, program notes before concerts. A reviewer should be prepared. But if I'm observed on the edge of my seat during a concert, it will not be because I'm looking for things about which to complain.

Indeed, the great temptation is to do the opposite and sit back, drifting off into another world of music and beauty. At some point a compromise is reached in which I try to be alertly critical, but also relaxed, attempting to "take it in...take it all in" as the current commercial goes. And that "all" includes some marvelous music as directed by Conductor Steinberg. Further, if one must be on the "edge of the seat" to catch the errors, he is either an inept critic or a nit-picker.

But I do go "edge of the seat" sometimes but never looking for complaints. Merle Evans and the RRBB Circus band playing "Entrance of the Gladiators" invariably moves me excitably forward (it helps, too, if elephants are present); Diana Ross did it several weeks ago at Boston College with "Let a Little Sunshine In" -- indeed, I wanted to dance in the aisles. Pete Seeger also did it at Symphony Hall. There were moments when his music and message were so exhilarating I didn't know whether to shout for joy or pray for peace--so I compromised and sang along with everyone else.

Finally, let me add I'm a fan of your publication. I read it from cover to cover. I particularly appreciate the work of your music writers--from classical through jazz, folk, rock, etc. I find them informative, helpful and really aware of what is musically going on in the arts.

Sincere best wishes,
L. David Harris
Music Critic-Writer
Record American-
Sunday Advertiser

Sir:

Without much strain I recognize myself as one of the Boston music critics described in your 22 October issue by Ralph Locke as having spent the concert "on the edge of their seats, listening for things to complain about to their readers," and then reporting to their readers that William Steinberg was "dull, stodgy, faceless, and incompetent."

Now, Locke obviously is within his rights in disagreeing with a critic, though I must add that I recall no allegations of incompetence in my review nor in any other that I read. He is out of bounds, though, in imputing motivations to critics and in indulging in the sort of slanderous speculation about their approach to their work, stating, not even implying, that we--presumably Gelles of the Herald-Traveler and I--had gone to the concert with our negative findings all set before the event and needing only to look for evidence.

It is interesting that in order not to disturb his picture of the "worthless" critics who do not attain those "highest musical and professional standards" that Mr. Locke refers to and which he presumably embodies, he fails to comment on the positive, even enthusiastic, appraisals of Steinberg's performances of the Webern, Strauss, and Elgar works on the first two weeks' programs.

Very truly yours,
Michael Steinberg
Boston Globe Music Critic

Critic Ralph Locke responds:

I would first like to extend my apologies to the critics of Boston's daily newspapers. I realize that I exaggerated -- and perhaps unfairly -- in describing their method of reviewing concerts. The problem as I see it -- and I speak not as a critic but as a college student and music lover -- is not really that the critics look for negative things to say. On the contrary, they often make a conscious attempt to be "objective" by presenting compliments to balance the criticism. But if the main thrust of an article is still that the concert as a whole was "soggy and undistinguished" or "lacking a vital pulse and drive" (to quote critics Steinberg's and Gelles's reviews of the first concert), then readers are invariably going to receive a strongly negative impression of the performers, an impression which may not have been intended by the reviewer.

Supposedly "objective" criticism can be as discouraging and unconstructive in its own way as the blatantly negative kind, and the state of music in Boston demands -- now more than ever -- a revitalization of its audience through affirmative journalism. It is exactly this topic -- the responsibility of the reviewer today -- that I will discuss next week in B.A.D., and as always--we welcome response from our readers to our ideas.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125

NOV 13 1969

Robert C. Marsh

Critic at-large

A man on the move

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf is a man who enjoys his freedom.

Former music directors of the Boston Symphony don't fade away; they become guest conductors and go on forever. Or nearly so.

Erich Leinsdorf, who stepped down from the Boston podium after Tanglewood 1969, has started two well-filled years of international activity, and the report, as of this moment, is that he loves it.

But the pace is demanding.

Early September found him in Buenos Aires at the famed Teatro Colon where, in nine weeks, he directed five performances each of "Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal." Within 48 hours of the final curtain of the last "Parsifal," he was on the stage of Orchestra Hall, where he led three Chicago Symphony programs last week.

NEXT ON THE BOOKS are a dozen concerts with the Boston Symphony, after which Leinsdorf permits himself a short vacation. Early 1970 finds him in Amsterdam with the Concertgebouw Orchestra. (His programs will feature the Carter piano concerto, Schoenberg's "Ode to Napoleon" and unfamiliar works by Stravinsky and Webern.)

The nexth move is to London where he has dates with the Royal Philharmonic and programs for the BBC, the latter including the Carter score once more and the Beethoven Ninth. He will present Bethoven's "Fidelio" in the original version (as "Leonore") in Lisbon. Then to Berlin for a TV show exploring the manner in which operatic composers have used young women to play the roles of young men — the Octavian-Cherubino-Siebel syndrome.

Returning to London, Leinsdorf has concerts with the New Philharmonia, after which he crosses the North Sea to direct a series of programs for the 1970 Holland Festival. Theme of the series for this year is Haydn, and he hopes to present one of the late masses, preferably the Mass in Time of War.

Although invited to be a guest at Tanglewood 1970, Lesinsdorf's present inclinations are to keep the summer free. That's not difficult to understand. Home for Leinsdorf and his bride of 15 months is a place in Connecticut which, as you might gather, he won't be seeing very often this season, and 1971 will be just as bad. (It includes a return to Chicago and dates at the Metropolitan, if there is a Metropolitan, to direct a new production of "Tristan.")

WHAT ARE THE FIRST REACTIONS of a former music director of the Boston Symphony in his initial months after leaving that job? The main response, for Leinsdorf, is a sense of liberation from administrative burdens. It is a pleasure, for him, to be a musician again, to fill engagements which others have planned, and to concentrate on his conducting rather than the complex problems of keeping an American symphony orchestra afloat at this stage in our cultural history.

And he can now ask some philosophical questions about the international musical scene.

Why, for example, do orchestras retain the esthetic image imposed by a dominant conductor, even after most of the men who played under the great founder-figure have retired? Thus, in the American scene, Leinsdorf still sees the Philadelphia Orchestra as Stokowski's creation, the Boston Symphony as Koussevitzky's orchestra and the Chicago Symphony as retaining the strengths it acquired under Frederick Stock. ("Its skill in reading new music is phenomenal," he adds.)

And, internationally speaking, how does one preserve the huge institutional structure of the major serious music groups, "when four young men with electric guitars can make more sound than I can with 106 players and draw 21,000 to a summer concert, when the Boston Symphony, chorus, soloists, perhaps 250-300 performers are fortunate to attract 14,000 with the Beethoven Ninth Symphony?"

"THE OLD LADIES of Friday afternoon," he muses, "both support us and kill us. We need their money, but their presence, and all it means, keeps away the young people we need for long-term survival."

How do you cast opera these days, when the number of outstanding voices is growing smaller with each new generation and the apprenticeship system, which made European opera great before World War II, is all but gone?

The strong middle-register voice, essential to Wagnerian opera, is rarely developed before the age of 40, Leinsdorf observes. "And at 40, these days, many singers are finishing their careers, not going on to their true potential."

But he sees ground for hope, too. "The future of American orchestras and opera companies," he concludes, "must be linked to bona-fide social service. Artistic excellence is something only a few oddballs understand. Civic pride will always be a more important motivation. But education, especially in America today, is a powerful social force. Once the orchestras and opera companies see their destiny as educational institutions, their economic security is probably assured."

Schenectady Gazette
Wednesday, November 12, 1969

Orchestra Plays Mahler Symphony

By MICHAEL WIENER

The audience at Proctors Theater in Schenectady last night expected William Steinberg but was instead greeted by the unfamiliar figure of Henry Maser who proceeded to lead the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in place of its indisposed music director.

Mr. Steinberg's anticipated appearance had generated a great deal of interest since he is also the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, one of the area's summer orchestras.

Because his dual directorships are making his winter a busy one, Mr. Steinberg is not scheduled to appear at Tanglewood this summer. Thus, last night's concert promised to give area listeners an idea of what they will be missing.

MR. STEINBERG underwent an operation this past summer, and his heavy schedule may be interfering with his recuperation. He became ill during a Boston Symphony concert a few weeks ago and was unable to continue.

Mr. Maser, the Pittsburgh Symphony's assistant conductor, had his work cut out for him.

Since it is not known whether Mr. Steinberg became indisposed immediately prior to last night's concert or whether it was decided beforehand that he should conserve his strength for tonight's Carnegie Hall concert, Mr. Maser may not have had the benefit of rehearsal.

At the Concert

He succeeded admirably. The acoustics sabotaged Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," which depends on its rich orchestration for its effectiveness.

THE "RHAPSOLDIE" suggested an interesting contrast. In comparing the impressionistic Spanish-inspired works of France's Ravel and Debussy with the homegrown product of Spain's Turina and DeFalla, one finds that country of origin is no substitute for compositional expertise.

The rise in Gustav Mahler's popularity has been phenomenal. As recently as a half-dozen years ago, concert managers were discouraging conductors from putting the Mahler symphonies on tour programs. Yet, last night's major work was the Symphony No. 1 in D Major.

The First Symphony is typical of Mahler in its alternation of the sardonic with the pastoral, of the intensely dramatic with the quietly lyrical. It is shorter than many of his other symphonies, though, and confines its bombast solely to parts of the last movement.

Although the playing of the entire orchestra was of a high order, the first chair double bass should be singled out for his performance of the difficult third movement solo.

In short, the concert served as a demonstration of the professionalism of the Pittsburgh Symphony and its assistant conductor.

The next presentation in the Schenectady Community Concerts series will be the Whit-Lo Singers on Jan. 27.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

A Different Opinion Of Symphony Concert

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

As a long time admirer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am writing a few words to present an opinion contrary to that of Mr. Gelles in a recent review.

It seems to me that Mr. Gelles is so overly concerned with the mechanics of the performance that he misses the true beauty, pleasure and joy which this great orchestra and its various conductors (some better than others, especially Michael Thomas, about whom the New Yorker critic, Mr. Sargent, wrote "It could be that another Leonard Bernstein is in the making), bring us every week.

At a concert, Mr. Carlo Giulini conducted Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." At the conclusion of the performance the audience expressed its pleasure and appreciation with spontaneous and prolonged applause—even a standing ovation. In his review the next day, Mr. Gelles acknowledged the audience's pleasure and appreciation but said, in effect, that he could not understand the reason for it.

One can only conclude that the business of being a music critic has deprived Mr. Gelles of the pleasure of being a music lover.

ANNA B. MILLAR

Dedham

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 8 1969

138

The High Cost of Music

Like everything else, music costs more these days. And the wage demands of musicians who play for the nation's symphony orchestras probably will push the cost still higher in coming months.

A complicated labor dispute involving 11 of the 14 unions repres choristers and singe tan Opera dark for e
there will be no Met
ton's National Symp
first 11 weeks of the season have been ca
have signed a new c
son was five weeks
Similar troubles
Francisco musicians tract for the season
Thanksgiving. Exis three of the nation'
Symphony, the Cle
York Philharmonic
current season. The Philadelphia Orche
three-year contracts
Restive musicia costs justify hefty employers can argu
the money is not a
years alone, the oper
ican orchestras has
per cent.
The primary re
a spokesman for th
chestra League told is the "dramatic i weeks of employme
phony seasons gen duration. Today, 52
common.
A longer season
and earned income dates, and so on — pace. In some case ping into the capita to make ends meet
The pending fe
an additional thre around the country
strictions on the ac tail one of their p come.
The present looks bleak for American symphony orchestras, but the future may be brighter. Recent labor agreements have tended to give management more flexibility in use of the symphonic ensemble. Union negotiators used to insist that the symphony always play as a unit. Now, however, management often has the right to divide the musicians into smaller groups for school concerts and other purposes. Part of the National Symphony, for instance, presented a Mozart series at Constitution Hall in Washington last season while the remainder of the ensemble performed pop concerts on tour.

Another cause for encouragement is local government support. The Buffalo Philharmonic and the Louisville Orchestra, to cite only two examples, receive assistance from both city and county governments. Such aid almost always is tendered in the form of a contract for services rendered. The word subsidy still is frowned on when it comes to the arts.

WILKES-BARRE, PA.
RECORD
D. 25,000

NOV 13 1969

UNIONTOWN, PA.
HERALD
D. 8,000

NOV 14 1969

SAYRE, PA.
TIMES
D. 8,500

NOV 12 1969

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350

NOV 12 1969

Across The Country

The High Cost Of Music

WASHINGTON—All salary payments to stars of the Metropolitan opera, shut down for eight weeks by a labor dispute, will cease on Saturday. Two days earlier striking members of Washington's National symphony will give a concert to build their strike fund.

Like everything else, music costs more these days. And the wage demands of musicians who play for the nation's symphony orchestras probably will push the cost still higher in coming months.

A complicated labor dispute involving 11 of the 14 unions representing musicians, dancers, choristers and singers has kept the Metropolitan Opera dark for tight weeks. In all likelihood there will be no Met season this year. Washington's National Symphony is on strike, and the first 11 weeks of the Kansas City Philharmonic's season have been canceled. Rochester musicians have signed a new contract, but the 1969-70 season was five weeks late in getting started.

Similar troubles may be in the offing. San Francisco musicians have not yet signed a contract for the season that begins shortly after Thanksgiving. Existing wage agreements of three of the nation's Big Five—the Chicago Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic—expire at the end of the current season. The Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, however, settled on three-year contracts in the past 12 months.

Restive musicians claim that rising living costs justify hefty wage increases. But their employers can argue just as persuasively that the money is not available. Over the past five years alone, the operating deficit of major American orchestras has climbed by more than 100 per cent.

The primary reason for worsening deficits, a spokesman for the American Sympnony Orchestra League told Editorial Research Reports, is the "dramatic increase in the number of weeks of employment." A few years ago, symphony seasons generally were of 25-30 weeks' duration. Today, 52-week seasons are not uncommon.

A longer season means higher labor costs, and earned income —from ticket sales, tour datts, and so on—has not been able to keep pace. In some cases, orchestras have been dipping into the capital of their endowment funds to make ends meet.

The pending federal tax-reform bill poses an additional threat. Symphony associations around the country are apprehensive lest restrictions on the activities of foundations curtail one of their prime sources of outside income.

The present looks bleak for American symphony orchestras, but the future may be brighter. Recent labor agreements have tended to give management more flexibility in use of the symphonic ensemble.

Another cause for encouragement is local government support. The Buffalo Philharmonic and the Louisville Orchestra, to cite only two examples, receive assistance from both city and county governments.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 12 1969

52 Rose Walsh – Symphony Has 'A Good Thing Going'

RECORD AMERICAN, BOSTON, WED., NOV. 12, 1969

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a real "good ~~thing going~~ for it" through the workings of the Council of Friends of the BSO, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin.

One of its several ways of attracting more subscribers in the support of the world-renowned orchestra is the newly-originated Stage-Door Lectures by members of the orchestra, followed by a box-luncheon.

Starting off the series, "Know Your Orchestra," Michael Sasson (Strings) will be the speaker at 11:30 Nov. 21 at Symphony Hall. Committee workers on this new venture are Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge, Jr., Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall and Mrs. Roger Voisin.

The popular, friendly pre-Symphony Luncheons are continued this season—first one Dec. 5 at Horticultural Hall—under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich. South Shore, Weston, Wayland, Wellesley and Milton area members are in charge of arrangements for the opening luncheon.

Pre-Symphony dinners before the evening concerts are being discussed and organized. Another source of Orchestra revenue is the Council's sale of BSO recordings by mail, directed by Mrs. Howard W. Davis.

Exciting plans are well underway for the great event of the year, the "90th Anniversary Ball" on April 27 under the dynamic chairmanship of Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot.

Beautiful people attended a beautiful benefit Saturday night that will help to make life cheerier for those handicapped with speech and hearing defects.

Under the auspices of the Speech and Hearing Foundation of Massachusetts (founded by Mrs. Cecil S. Rose), a capacity audience thoroughly enjoyed the charming new film production of captivating "Goodby, Mr. Chips at the Gary Theater.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 12 1969

Off-the-bandstand talks feature BSO

Four versions of what happens behind the perfect musical symmetry of Symphony Hall's good men and true — the BSO — will get into circulation via a brand-new circuit, those tireless Council of Friends gals.

The Stage Door off-the-bandstand talks will begin Nov. 21 with Michel Sasson speaking for the strings section. The woodwinds will have their turn Jan. 25 with spokesman Felix Viscuglia, and Ralph Pottle takes over for the brass on Mar. 13. It'll be percussion's turn, with Charles Smith, on Apr. 17.

It's the stage door entrance, girls, 11:30 sharp, followed by a box luncheon with sherry and such. And thinking it all up, Mrs. George Bates and Mrs. David Bird, along with Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Donald Harding, Mrs. Charles Lyman, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, and Mrs. Roger Voisin.

Already sold out are the luncheon dates of Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 13, and Apr. 24.

Portland Symphony Orchestra Set for Performance At ASC

The Lecture and Fine Arts Council of Aroostook State College will present the Portland Symphony Orchestra in live performance Friday, Nov. 21.

Curtain time will be 8 p.m. in the Wieden Hall on campus, according to Clifton Boudman, Council chairman.

He said reservations can be made through the ASC business office.

On Tour

The musicians will tour northern Maine and two Canadian provinces under the auspices of the National Endowment for the Arts and the Maine State Commission on the Arts and Humanities.

Portland records trace the symphony's records back to 1898, although formal organization began in 1921 and was completed in 1923.

Non-Profit

Nine years later the orchestra was incorporated as a non-profit institution and Cyrus H.K. Curtis presented the musicians with the world's first municipal pipe organ. A series of free organ concerts regularly filled the City Hall auditorium, but public support was lacking. Players often engaged in door to door solicitation of $1 contributions.

In 1942 a student Symphony Orchestra was formed and has continued under the symphony association auspices. During the war years an influx of military personnel helped to swell the ranks of concertgoers. By the conclusion of the war, a regular program of four to five concerts per season was being operated on a $10,000 budget, but patronage declined as defense establishments dwindled.

Full-Time

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concertmaster was engaged in 1952 as a permanent guest conductor. Then in 1956 four guest conductors were hired and finally replaced by a full-time conductor in 1958.

During the following year a revitalized Board of Trustees brought the Orchestra to professional status including contractual retention of and compensation for all players, the hiring of a full-time manager and secretary and the inception of a regular program of fund raising to support the expanded activities.

Lipkin Engaged

By 1962 the need for a full-time resident conductor became apparent and Arthur Bennett Lipkin was engaged, following his successful 10-year development of the Birmingham, Ala. Symphony.

STAR HERALD
PRESQUE ISLE, ME.
WEEKLY 3,177

NOV 12 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 9 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 10 1969

Newton Symphony to open season

The Newton Symphony has announced details of its coming season. Guests soloists will include Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Burton Fine, BSO solo viola; Jules Eskin, BSO solo cello; Ralph Gomberg, BSO solo oboe; and Max Hobart, BSO third concertmaster.

Conductor Michel Sasson has begun rehearsals on Mozart's "Sinfonia Concertante, K. 320 E, and his Oboe Concerto, K. 295. Both were left unfinished by Mozart, and have been completed by Robert Levin, a Harvard graduate and student at the Curtis Institute.

The opening concert of this season's Newton Symphony schedule is this evening.

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Leisure Made Big Business By the Tired Business Wife

SOCIAL LEISURE has now become big business. It's apparent that women must work. If they can't work at work, they work at leisure. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord—those who know her and those who don't know her call her Fran—has a secretary to help her organize her many projects. She raised $162,000 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Golden Trumpet Ball four years ago and she's now a trustee of the orchestra.

Mrs. Howard Davis, also of Concord, who thought up the idea of selling records made by the orchestra, is also chairman of the Snow Ball that will benefit the Florence Crittenton League's unmarried mothers, Dec. 12, at the Sheraton Plaza. Like her Big Business husband, Mrs. Davis has to recuperate frequently at her year 'round retreat at Franconia Notch.

Like many busy women, Mrs. James T. Godino of Waban has three telephones, one of them her own unlisted phone. She is chairman of the Valentine Ball to benefit the Newton-Wellesley Hospital, Feb. 6, at the Sheraton Plaza. One day she had 67 phone calls.

Mrs. Carlos Tosi of Bay State Road had so many community involvements that her husband turned off the telephones at night. Mrs. Tosi brought in 157 new members to the Museum of Fine Arts in its Centennial Drive and afterwards her husband took her to Italy for a rest.

MRS. ALFRED WILLMANN OF BELMONT, who brought the Morning Musicales to life when they were on their death bed a year ago, is also a leader in the Opera Group. She has the firm backing of her husband and her two daughters and her son-in-law, who often accompany her on her many appearances about town.

Mrs. Cecil Rose of Newton also has a crowded calendar. She is the founder of the Speech and Hearing Foundation and her zeal is unlimited. Last week she gave a dance for about 90 deaf at the Women's City Club. It was the first of its kind and Mrs. Rose called it a "pilot test."

Since the deaf "hear" music by vibrations, the musicians, who donated their services, had to sit on the floor of the auditorium instead of on the stage. But the club wouldn't allow the piano to be moved to the floor because its legs were too wobbly.

Nothing daunted, Mrs. Rose paid $65 to have a piano brought in and placed on the floor, where she said the vibra-

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

90th Anniversary Ball in April By the BSO Council of Friends

THE 90TH ANNIVERSARY BALL, April 27, will be the highlight of the year for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will rival the famous Golden Trumpet Ball at Symphony Hall five years ago, which made $162,000 for the orchestra. Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld are co-chairmen. 047

The Council of Friends, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., has many other plans for the 1969-70 season. Incidentally, it's not too late to renew your membership in the Friends now or become a new member so you can attend these events.

The Friends are "ecstatic" over the response of their members in replying to the invitations for the new Stage-Door Lectures by members of the orchestra, and the Pre-Symphony Luncheons. Make sure your ticket reservation is in now—before it is too late!

Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird are co-chairmen of the Stage Door Lectures, "Know Your Orchestra." The first will be given by Michael Sasson, strings, and will be held Friday, Nov. 21, promptly at 11:30, followed by a box luncheon. The committee responsible for this new venture includes Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall and Mrs. Roger Voisin.

Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich are co-chairmen of the delightful and friendly Pre-Symphony Luncheons. Their committee includes Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell and Mrs. Robert Kistner.

Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. is chairman for all the areas as represented in the Council of Friends. Each lecture and luncheon will be under the auspices of different areas. The first lecture will include the Concord, Lincoln, Andover and Boston areas.

The first luncheon will have South Shore, Weston, Wayland, Wellesley and Milton areas to help plan the pleasant get-together before Symphony, Friday, Dec. 5, in Horticultural Hall, at 12:15.

Ticket resale plan in practice for Symphony tickets also applies to the Luncheon and Lecture series. Subscribers who wish to release tickets for resale should call Mrs. Whitty in the Friends office at Symphony Hall.

The Council of Friends is constantly devising new ways in which to attract more subscribers in support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pre-Symphony Dinners before the evening concerts are being discussed and organized for Friends, and again, the Council of Friends offers the orchestra's recordings by mail. Mrs. Howard W. Davis is in charge of the sale of these records, which benefits the orchestra.

Mrs. James H. Grew, Andover Area chairman, tells us that Mrs. Samuel Rogers will hold an Open House all day Wednesday, Nov. 19, when the Friends may order B.S.O records from Mrs. Hart Leavitt, record chairman, and her committee. Coffee and sherry will be served and students from Phillips Academy and Abbot Academy will be invited.

★ ★ ★

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 12 1969

TOWNSMAN
ANDOVER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,350

NOV 13 1969

PLAN SALE – BSO Friends planning sale of records and tapes for Christmas giving are, left to right, Mrs. Samuel Rogers, Miss Ruth Hayes, Mrs. James Grew and Mrs. Hart Leavitt.

Record Sale To Benefit Symphony Orchestra

A day-long Christmas shopping sale of Boston Symphony Orchestra records and tapes will be held on Wednesday, Nov. 19, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Rogers, 49 Salem St.

Records and tapes ordered at the sale will be mailed free of charge to "any city or country in the world", according to Mrs. Hart Leavitt, record chairman of the Andover Committee of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. James Grew, who heads the Andover Committee, said the sale would benefit the orchestra and provide a unique Christmas shopping opportunity for music lovers.

The public is invited to Christmas shop in a relaxed atmosphere--Mrs. Rogers plans to serve coffee, sherry and background music at the 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. sale; they can choose from a long list of tapes and records the orchestra has made under various conductors - such as Koussevitsky, Leinsdorf, Monteux and Copland. Van Cliburn, Heifetz, Rubinstein are among the many outstanding soloists represented.

The record and tape sale provides unusual financial support to the Boston Symphony. Not only does a substantial percentage of the proceeds accrue to the BSO, because of buying direct from the orchestra, but the Ford Foundation matches every three dollars raised for the orchestra with a dollar of its own.

Mrs. Philip K. Allen, Mrs. James H. Grew, Miss Ruth Hayes, Mrs. Frederic O'Brien and record chairman Mrs. Hart Leavitt will be at Mrs. Rogers' home to help with next Wednesday's sale.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

NOV 14 1969

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

There are 10 dates between now and next May that loom large on the calendars of those interested in music. Dates that are connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that include all types of activities arranged by the Council of Friends of that organization.

The climax of the six month season will be the "90th Anniversary Ball" to be held April 27, 1970 at Symphony Hall. To be planned on similar lines to the now legendary Golden Trumpet Ball held four years ago, the benefit will have Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra to play for dancing. Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot are cochairmen of the event.

The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. ~~John L. Grandin Jr.~~ are cochairmen, are delighted with the response to the new series of events called "Know Your Orchestra." These consist of four Friday morning lectures by individual members of the orchestra, followed by a box luncheon, all to be conducted in plenty of time for the Friday afternoon symphony concert. Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird are cochairmen of the series, the first of which will take place Nov. 21 and will feature Michel Sassoon, strings.

Among those on this committee are Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall and Mrs. Roger Voisin.

Four of the upcoming dates are the popular Pre-Symphony Luncheons at Horticultural Hall, now in their third year. The first will be held Dec. 5, and will be the responsibility of the Council of Friends from the South Shore, Weston, Wayland, Wellesley and Milton areas. Chairmen of the series of luncheons are Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich. Assisting them are Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Charles H. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell and Mrs. Robert Kistner.

The Council of Friends asks that all those holding tickets for the lecture or the luncheon series and who are unable to use any of them please call Mrs. Whitty at the Friends Office at Symphony Hall and release them for resale as there is always a long waiting list by the day of the event.

* * * *

Close-up

Mrs. John Knowles

"They're young such a short time—I'm going to enjoy every minute of it." The mother of six speaking is Mrs. John H. Knowles, wife of the general director of Massachusetts General Hospital.

And Edith "Teedy" Knowles lives up to her philosophy by squiring them to their soccer, hockey, football, basketball games—to tennis matches and swim meets—to horse shows—to any and all sports, spectator or participant, whatever the season.

For, in her own words: "The family is the beginning and the end—and everything in between."

Cambridge-born, the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Morris F. LaCroix graduated from Winsor School, class of '48 and from Smith College, class of '52, as did her mother, aunt and three sisters—in the family tradition.

While working her first year out of college at MGH's Vincent Memorial Laboratory, she met Doctor Knowles in the emergency ward where she was attending one of his patients. It was in the Fall, their first date was at a football game, shortly after they became engaged, and in June of 1953 they were married.

She recalls that they moved seven times in their first eight years of married life; the first two while the doctor was in the U.S. Navy. He returned to MGH as resident in medicine in '55; went to Rochester in '56, as a fellow studying physiology at University Medical School; then back to Boston's MGH in '58. He became chief resident in medicine, and in '62, general director.

"Teedy" Knowles is a volunteer worker in the MGH coffee shop on Mondays and is on the Christmas committee. She's a member of the board and on the scholarship committee of the New England Farm & Garden Association; treasurer and a member of the steering committee of the Boston Symphony Council of Friends; and is on the standing committee of the First Church in Chestnut Hill, working on the Nov. 25 Thanksgiving food and flower sale. She's also active in the Smith College Alumnae Association, the Winsor School and the Chestnut Hill Garden Club.

She has three sisters: Mrs. Nelson L. Darling Jr.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,277

NOV 16 1969

Pension Concert

The Boston Symphony's annual Pension Fund concert will feature Russian violinist David Oistrakh, universally acknowledged as one of the world's great artists. He joins William Steinberg, Music Director, and the orchestra in a performance of the Brahms violin concerto in D major, one of the masterpieces of the violin repertory. The Pension Fund concert is Sunday evening, Jan. 11, at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

NOV 13 1969

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000

NOV 13 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

NOV 13 1969

Charles Schmitz of the Boston Symphony will be soloist ~~in the~~ Richard Strauss Horn Concerto No. 1. A virtuoso on the tube, he will also play the Carnival of Venice of Arban on the sousaphone, an instrument invented by the famous band leader, Sousa. The soloist has been with the United States Army Band and from 1963 to 1966 was with the White House orchestra playing bass viol and with the White House band.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,000

NOV 14 1969

Philharmonic Slates Opening

MANCHESTER — The N.H. Philharmonic Orchestra opens its eleventh season of concerts Jan. 4 in Manchester, Walter B. Scheirer, publicity director, announced today.

A schedule of rehersals for the six concerts planned for this season is in progress, with orchestra members rehearsing at 7:30 p.m. each Sunday evening at the Memorial Junior High School in Manchester, he said.

Rolland Tapley and William Waterhouse, both members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will serve as conductor and concert master.

HERALD
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
(S) 16,596

NOV 15 1969

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Maxim's to Provide Background In Symphony Hall for April Fete

ALL THE FAVORITE WORDS—exciting, memorable, fabulous, magnificent, fantastic and elegant are being used to describe the Symphony's 90th Anniversary Ball. And believe it or not, Maxim's, one of the world's most famous restaurants, synonymous in France with tradition and quality, will provide the background for this happy happening in Symphony Hall—$300 per couple, and $500 per couple for sponsors.

Although the date is Monday, April 27—the end of the Symphony season and the night before the opening of the Pops—the committee had its first meeting yesterday. The head of Maxim's, Louis Vaudable, and the world renowned host and decorator, Maurice Carrere, flew to Boston to attend the meeting.

Plans were made with Louis Vaudable for a gourmet dinner complete with vintage wines. The dinner will be partly prepared in Paris and partly prepared here with the help of a local caterer.

Maurice Carrere, with the assistance of a Boston designer, will bring the elegance of Maxim's to Symphony Hall. Maxim's chefs, food and decorations will be brought to Boston through the generous co-operation of Pan American World Airways.

To add to the pomp and ceremony of the evening, guests will dance to the music of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, as well as to the music of Ruby Newman and his orchestra. The ball is being held to raise a substantial amount of money for the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is suffering from the blight of rising costs, of which we are all too familiar.

Co-chairmen of the ball are Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome M. Rosenfeld, and David Rockefeller Jr. and Richard F. Treadway head a large and distinguished men's committee.

Among those who have been working on details for many months are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Howard Davis, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. John M. Ferry and Mrs. James M. Gavin.

Also, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Francis Hatch Jr., Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. James E. Perkins, Mrs. Karl Riemer and Mrs. Ducey Ryerson.

* * *

Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, explains his functions to Boston junior high school students following youth concert at Symphony Hall.
—Record American Photo, Teresa Zabala

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 15 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 19 1969

Boston Evening Globe Wednesday, November 19, 1969

Maxim's coming to town

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

Two generations of beautiful women have made it their ambition to be seen there, and movies (like "Gigi") have been practically created on the premises.

Two handsome men who are the heart of Maxim's in Paris came to the heart of Beacon Hill for dinner with one of Boston's great beauties, and to light the first spark for what could be the greatest ball Boston may see in our time.

Tall, graying Louis Vaudable, president of Maxim's and France's most fabled host Maurice Carrere shared an epicurean meal with the Lewis Cabots at 14 Louisburg sq., along with some of Boston's most interesting people, Elaine Rosenfeld and her husband Jerome, the Richard Treadways, the David Rockefeller Jr.'s for instance.

Elaine and Olga Cabot will pool their ideas for The Symphony Ball (Apr. 27, 1970) with Dick Treadway and David Rockefeller and Louis Vaudable and his wife Maggie (who holds a law degree from the University of Lyon).

Practically everything movable at Maxim's, except perhaps for the Cheret and Cappiello murals, will be flown over to Symphony Hall for an evening no one is likely to forget.

Chefs who do weekly luncheons for the Gourmet and Escoffier Societes, will jet over, whisks in hand, and so will waiters, maitres, and the most Parisian of specialities, from truffles to terrines of foie gras.

Only interruption to the master plan for this all-time topper in parties was a frantic call or two from Paris to make sure M. Carrere would be back in Paris by next week—"otherwise they will not have the party."

Host Carrere manages to divide his talents between Maxim's, the Auberge de Moutiere just out of Paris, and a club at Biarritz which is the golden oasis for the internationals.

Founded by Maxim Gailardo in 1892, Maxim's is still at 3, Rue Royale, still the epitome of expensive elegance, its vintage cellars the despair of other restaurateurs.

These, too, will be tapped for Apr. 27, when Bertrand Goldberg, who designed the Harvard Medical complex, will work with designer Paul Vogler (who did Lord and Taylor's here) to turn Henry Lee Higginson's Boston Symphony dream into a paying reality as well as the finest orchestra in the world. The orchestra, as well as Ruby Newman will play that night.

Also adding ideas will be some of Boston's cleverest and most chic teams, like the Albert Goodhues, the Charles Coolidge Jrs., the Francis Hatches, the Charles Hoveys, Dr. and Mrs. Karl Riemer, the Charles Devenses, the Richard Elys, the Richard Ehrlichs, the Edwin Greens, the John Grandins and the Howard Davises.

How about a chance for people to see this magnificence—it seems a shame to have a one-night-stand for such a once-upon-a-time glory. If not a preview because of the Paris timing, then how about an after-view, with nominal admission, for hundreds of Friends of Symphony.

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520

NOV 13 1969

6 children attend Boston concert

FALMOUTH — Six children from the Chesterbrook School and day camp attended the Youth Concert Saturday, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. and Mrs. Chester T. Holbrook, directors of the school, accompanied them.

After the morning concert, the group had lunch at the Prudential Center and then visited the Boston Museum of Science for the afternoon.

Attending from Falmouth were Nancy Johnson, Deborah Whitting, Alan Stokes, Harold Jensen, Parker Smith and Carol David. This same group is planning to attend the next two concerts, scheduled for Jan. 10 and March 14.

BEST SELLERS
SCRANTON, PA.
SEMI-MONTHLY 3,000

NOV 15 1969

Dickson, Harry Ellis
Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!
Beacon. Nov. 3, 1969. 162p. $7.50. (IIa)

This is a delightful treatment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by a man who has been a member of it for more than thirty years, who has conducted it and who is at present assistant conductor of the Boston Pops. It is not a history of the orchestra, but, as the subtitle of the book indicates, "an irreverent memoir."

Irreverent at times it is — but never unaffectionately so. For this reader, the insight afforded into the personalities and techniques of the various conductors, permanent or visiting, of the orchestra was one of the most valuable aspects of the book. Most readers will no doubt find it surprising that Danny Kaye is singled out as a great conductor, even though he cannot read a note of music! It is, however, the personality of Serge Koussevitzky that seems to exert the greatest influence upon Mr. Dickson. Personalities, indeed, be they those of players or conductors or great soloists, are the principal preoccupation of the book.

Needless to say, the Boston Pops Orchestra's colorful career is also given due attention. There are many pertinent photographs and twelve delightful drawings by Olga Koussevitzky. (70-84793)

Robert F. Young, S.J.

140.

BAY STATE BANNER
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 16,000

NOV 20 1969

Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of Boston Symphony, talks with youngsters at Friday concert sponsored by School Volunteers.

Jefferson School

Students from the fifth and sixth grades of the Jefferson District recently attended a concert performed by sixty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program, the first in a series of three one-hour concerts, was entitled, "This Is The Orchestra."

The program opened with Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" narrated by Andrew Raeburn. It isolated each orchestra section: strings, woodwinds, brass, and percussion, and detailed the functions of each. The groups played selections by Mozart, Anderson, Liadov, Dukas, and Kraft. As a finale, the full orchestra played Ravel's "Bolero."

This program was made possible by a grant from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the betterment of the musical interests of Boston pupils of grades five through seven.

Two busloads of first-graders from the Jefferson School, with their teachers and several parents, took a trip to the Children's Museum last week. Upon arriving, they were divided into two groups.

One group visited a replica of a Japanese Tea House with its wooden ceiling, paper walls, and bamboo curtains, and participated in a Japanese tea ceremony.

The other group visited a Colonial home. Donning Pilgrim clothes, the children ground corn and used a spinning wheel. After this, the children were free to explore the many exhibits in the museum.

The Children's Museum is unique among museums, as the children are encouraged to touch the exhibits and even use them where possible.

Selected classes from the Jefferson School performed recently in a Veterans' Day Assembly Program. The program, under the direction of John Bane, principal, included performances by classes from the kindergarten through the sixth grades. The selections ranged from marches, poems, and songs, to a play by the sixth graders.

Among the performances was a salute to the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps, by the fifth grade; "Let There Be Peace", a song by the second grade; and "Your Land and My Land", by the third grade. Also included in the tribute to the veterans was "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" "God Bless America", "This is My Country" marching by the Kindergarten children, and several poems such as "The World Has Need of You".

Mr. Shapiro, music specialist for the school, was the accompanist.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 20 1969

'And it isn't even Spring'

Flower Show & Balls on Calendar

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

NOV 22 1969

FLOWER SHOW

BOSTON — The Thanksgiving and Christmas holidays have not yet been celebrated, but word is out that the annual Spring Flower Show will be held March 14 to 22 at Suffolk Downs.

New England's traditional salute to spring that brings thousands of winter-weary New Englanders to Boston, is announced before the weariness of winter has even set in.

This colorful preview of spring with its brilliant array of flowers, shrubs and trees in beautiful garden settings is still inspiring to contemplate. So, Oliver Ames of Boston, president of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, and Carlton B. Lees of Hamilton executive director, have announced the dates and the planning is underway.

Sponsored for almost a full century by the Mass. Horticultural Society, this show is a delight for both gardeners and the non-horticulturist, with free gardening information and instruction and demonstrations.

The entrance-way to 1970's fete to spring will feature contemporary sculpture, built into a four seasons garden, done by Allen Haskell of New Bedford, in association with the Institute of Contemporary Art.

The beautiful and famous Stone acacia collection will be seen again, along with a spectacular woodland garden with waterfalls and streams by Alexander Heimlick of Woburn.

Every kind of plant, from roses to herbs, will be shown, by every kind of gardener, from some of the country's most professional to amateurs in the Amateur Horticultural Flower Arranging Classes.

This annual spring spectacle is the largest and oldest continuing horticultural extravaganza of its kind in the country. A non-profit, membership organization, the Massachusetts Horticultural Society incorporated in 1829 for the purpose of encouraging the art of horticulture in the United States.

Carlton B. Lees, executive director of the society, is in charge of this annual colorful pageant.

SOCIAL FETES

As if this were not enough, other announcements are pushing into spring.

On Tuesday, November 18, the committee planning the Boston Symphony's 90th Anniversary Ball met and announced that the magnificent party will be held on Monday, April 27.

Still another spring date announced this week is the International Institute Ball at the Statler Hilton on Saturday, April 4.

These galas take so much planning that dates must be set Pops orchestra as well as Ruby Newman and his orchestra will play music for dancing. The ball is being held to raise a substantial amount of money for and committees put in motion early.

MAXIM'S

The Symphony Ball will have as background a re-creation of the world famous restaurants synonymous with tradition and quality in France -- Maxim's. The ticket price of $300 per couple and $500 per couple for sponsors blends with the magnificence of the atmosphere.

The date chosen is the end of the Symphony season and the night before the opening of the Pops, so it's the only night Symphony Hall is free for such a gala.

The head of Maxim's, Louis Vaudable, and the world renowned host and decorator, Maurice Carrere, were in Boston for the planning session this week.

A gourmet dinner with vintage wines, partly prepared in Paris and partly here with the help of a hub caterer is planned. Carrere will have the assistance of a Boston designer in bringing the elegance of Maxim's to Symphony Hall. Chefs, food and decorations will come from Paris to Boston via Pan American World Airways.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is suffering from the blight of rising costs.

North Shore women already working on committees for this exciting event on the spring social calendar are, Mrs. John M. Bradley of Manchester, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Francis Hatch Jr. of Beverly Farms.

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Wednesday, November 19, 1969

ORCHESTRA OFFICIALS CONVENE

Three key Syracuse Symphony administrators will be in New York City tomorrow and Friday for a meeting of managers, board presidents and board chairman of U.S. professional orchestras.

The trio is James Howland, manager; Mrs. John R. Ralph, president, and Theodore M. Hancock, board chairman. The meeting is being hosted by the New York Philharmonic, Cleveland Orchestra, Chicago Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

The meeting was called to discuss the "serious financial plight of U.S. orchestras and possible solutions to the problem."

YOUR WORLD OF OPERA

By WILLIAM D. MIRANDA

DICKSON RECEIVES MOZARTEAN TRIBUTE

Few operatic characters project the sense of dignity and humanity with which Mozart endowed Sarastro in the Magic Flute. It was thoroughly fitting, therefore, that Cantor Alex Zimmer chose music of Sarastro with words especially written for the occasion to honor Pops Conductor Harry Ellis Dickson at a dinner tendered the latter at Temple Ohabei Shalom on October 27. It was the sincerest emotional tribute of a truly pleasant evening dedicated to a man whose selfless service to music has gone largely unnoticed in a crass commercial world.

Joseph Silverstein played masterfully in honor of the fellow violinist. Arthur Fiedler spoke comradely praise. Selectman George Brown brought the appreciation and a tangible gift from the Town of Brookline and Representative Martin Linsky added the approbation of the Commonwealth as emissary of Governor Francis Sargent. Here was a time when no one present was heard to murmur "He doesn't deserve it" or "He has had enough honors already."

A. Fred Prager who chaired the beautifully organized dinner sponsored by the Brotherhood of the Temple reminded his well wishers that Maestro Dickson joined an elite company of musical people so honored—Marian Anderson, Erich Leinsdorf and Mr. Fiedler. But the most memorable moment was the operatic one mentioned above given in unabashed admiration of one artist and gentleman for another.

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Private Lives of BSO Members Subject of Stage Door Lecture

EVEN AS YOU AND I, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are human and have many extra-curricular activities. Their tastes in living vary from a one-room apartment to a 12-room house, and their cars range from 15-year-old jalopies to the latest sleek streamlined models from Detroit. All this and more was revealed to members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday morning, at the first of a series of four Stage Door Lectures in the basement of Symphony Hall.

Entering through the stage door, the Friends sat at small tables on the cement floor with exposed pipes overhead. There were ping-pong tables here and there, and occasionally the orchestra could be heard rehearsing upstairs. It was a thrill for the Friends, who felt they were on the inside of things.

Michel Sasson, violinist, was the speaker yesterday and he kept his audience in gales of laughter with amusing anecdotes about the Symphony players. It's always satisfying to feel you know about the private lives of public persons.

The Friends found out that Jules Eskin, cellist, loves foreign cars and that Mischa Nieland is a stock market expert. Joseph Silverstein is a "murderous" squash player and Reuben Green is a gourmet cook. William Waterhouse designed his 12-room house in Westwood and built most of it himself. William Stokking flies his own plane, and Karl Zeise paints. In addition, most of them do conducting.

Michel Sasson, himself, is an avid Boston Celtics basketball fan and his hobbies are table-tennis, surf-casting and sports cars. Born in Egypt in 1935 of French parents, he studied at the Paris Conservatoire Nationale and received a full scholarship from the New England Conservatory of Music.

He became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1959 and lives in Newton with his violinist wife and three young sons. He is founder and conductor of the Newton Symphony, music director of the Brockton Symphony, and also conductor of the Civic Symphony of Boston.

Mr. Sasson summed up his talk by saying that he feels there is hope for humanity in the fact that so many nationalities with such radically different tastes and backgrounds can play together with such harmony in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After his talk, the audience was asked to ask questions and there were several. Mrs. Robert Saltonstall wanted to know how members of the orchestra feel about having a guest conductor. Mr. Sasson's quick answer was:

"Oh, you just relax. He's not going to be around long!"

But his reply was not as rapid when he was asked his opinion of the Herald Traveler and Globe music critics. In fact, he hedged that one.

An a la carte bar was very popular and the box luncheons were elegant picnic style with salad eggs, a chicken and cream cheese sandwich that resembled a fancy cake, and a brownie and shortbread cookie for dessert. On each table there were matches with Stage Door Luncheons, B. S. O., printed on the cover.

Mrs. George E. Bates, co-chairman of the lectures with Mrs. David Bird, greeted the audience. She wore shiny black knee-high boots with her beige wool dress, sparkling diamond pin and pearl choker. Others on the committee are Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall and Mrs. Roger Voisin.

Among those at the lecture and luncheon were Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., and Mrs. Albert Goodhue, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Guido Perera, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. Henry S. Hall Jr., Mrs. Victor Jones, Mrs. Robert Ross, Mrs. Harold Blanchard, Mrs. Sherman Thayer, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. J. Clark Boas and Miss Constance Learned.

The next lecture will be by Felix Viscuglia, Jan. 23. The first of the Pre-Symphony Luncheons at Horticultural Hall will take place Friday, Dec. 5. These will be repeated this year by popular request.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 20 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 22 1969

Rose Walsh

Symphony Ball To Be Gala Event

With all the elaborate advance planning going on by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 90th Anniversary Ball — to benefit the orchestra — the brilliant event may well surpass the glittering 85th Anniversary Golden Trumpet Ball.

Monday, April 27, is the date — the end of the Symphony season and the night before the opening of Pops — and Symphony Hall will have a dream world setting.

Guests will dance to the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by the great maestro, Arthur Fiedler, and to Ruby Newman and his popular orchestra. Famed Maxim's of Paris is doing the super gourmet dinner with vintage wines.

Maxim's host and decorator, Maurice Carrere, flew to Boston Wednesday to attend the first meeting of the Anniversary Ball Committee. The planning is the meal will be partly prepared in Paris and completed here with the help of a local caterer.

With the assistance of well known designer Paul Vogler, the Maxim background will be effected. Its chefs, food and decorations will be brought to Boston by Carrere via Pan American World Airways.

Co-chairmen Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, have the added fortune of having David Rockefeller, Jr., and Richard F. Treadway, head up a large distinguished men's committee.

Such dynamos as Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge, Jr., Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Karl Riemer and Mrs. Ducey Ryerson have been working on details for many months.

141.

SYMPHONY STAGE DOOR LECTURES

047

(Photos by Calvin Campbell)

A series of four Stage Door Lectures will give members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an intimate behind-the-scenes view of the orchestra. The first was given Friday by Michel Sasson, who told amusing anecdotes about members of the string section. The lectures take place at 11.30 Friday mornings, in the basement of Symphony Hall. The next one will be on Jan. 23 and the others are March 13 and April 17. Box luncheons and coffee and bouillon are served afterwards. Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird are co-chairmen.

ALISON ARNOLD

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
November 23, 1969
section 3
SOCIETY—NEWS FOR WOMEN
HOBBIES—HOUSE AND GARDENS

(Left) In front of Symphony Hall on a recent mild sunny day this group discusses the Stage Door Lectures. (Left to right) Mrs. James H. Perkins of Westwood, a trustee of the orchestra; Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. of Duxbury and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill, co-chairman of the Council of Friends.

Centennial Exhibit Opens At Museum of Fine Arts

The Museum of Fine Arts, born in the Back Bay one hundred years ago, opens its Centennial celebration with "Back Bay Boston: The City as a Work of Art," an exhibition which will continue through January 11 in galleries AA and BB.

Full-circle photo projections, architects' renderings and large models, costumes, a victorian room interior and original works of art provide an intriguing sequence of visual experiences.

When Bostonians created the Back Bay from a polluted tidal marsh, they opened a whole new chapter in the cultural history of the city and the nation. Saluting this unique urban area, the exhibition illustrates the history of the Back Bay, the world renowned institutions founded there and the contributions of artists, architects and Back Bay patrons. It looks as well at the current projects of architects and planners in the Back Bay and at the Back Bay Development Plan of 1967.

Ultimately, because the museum presents this exhibition both as a tribute and a timely warning, it poses urgent questions about the fate of Back Bay Boston — preservation, development or destruction — in the face of the enormous urban pressures generated by traffic, populatiton and commerce. "The museum is concerned with the conservation of the great treasures of the city just as much as it is concerned with the conservation of the great treasures within its galleries," Director Perry T. Rathbone said. "A museum should be the aesthetic and artistic conscience of the community."

The programmed exhibition begins with narrated photo sequences which trace the Back Bay's history and physical development. Projections on an arc screen and accompanying narration describe the Back Bay plan — one of the greatest land reclamation projects in America before the 20th century. Beginning in 1856, the 450-acre Back Bay was drained and filled to a depth of 20 feet; 35 railroad cars hauled gravel from Needham day and night for almost 40 years.

The Back Bay was one of the outstanding achievements of 19th century American urban planning. The powerful Back Bay Commissioners prohibited manufacturing and limited commercial activities in the area, insisted on deep setbacks, uniform cornice heights and wide streets. Through grants of land, they fostered a remarkable influx of cultural, scientific and religious institutions.

Art Square

Copley Square, originally known as Art Square, epitomized the Back Bay founders' concern with the spirit (Trinity Church), the mind (Boston Public Library) and the senses (Museum of Fine Arts). In these buildings was concentrated the work of the finest creative talents of the time: H. H. Richardson's Trinity Church and Charles McKim's Library, with the murals and stained glass windows of Sargent and LaFarge, are two of the most important works in the history of American architecture. Today, architects Philip Johnson, I. M. Pei and Hideo Sasaki create a new and controversial image for Copley Square.

The houses of the Back Bay its streets, parks, churches and public buildings from earliest days to the present are dramatically displayed by a seamless, full-circle projection system employed for the first time in this exhibition.

The system and a special 360 degree camera were developed by Dr. Eugene Trachtma, an optometrist from Red Bank, New Jersey.

The photograph is taken by sweeping the camera aperture in a full circle and exposing a moving strip of film.

Ten projectors are used and overlapping portions of the circular image are thrown on the screen simultaneously to achieve the seamless effect. In the darkened gallery, the visitor looks around at the screen as though standing on a street corner, in a park or on a rooftop in the Back Bay, enjoying the same sense of space and scale. Three-dimensional satellite exhibitions — a Back Bay parlor, LaFarge stained glass windows, a "walking group" of figures in period costume, rubble from a destroyed Back Bay building — are lit up in sequence as the Back Bay story unfolds.

In 1871, E. L. Godkin, Irish-born editor of "The Nation," observed, "Boston is the one place in America where wealth and the knowledge of how to use it are apt to coincide." As the Back Bay grew, Bostonians of energy, idealism, wide-ranging interests and a dedicated sense of civic responsibility came to live there. Bankers, lawyers, manufacturers and businessmen, they built handsome new houses and filled them with treasures, dedicated themselves to all aspects of civic life and, with tenacity and intelligence, brought unity, purpose and beauty to the Back Bay.

Gifts From Patrons

One section of the exhibition is devoted to the houses, portraits and gifts of 15 early Back Bay residents whose generous and discriminating patronage played a vital role in the growth of the museum. Among them are Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who gave the museum the first great Flemish painting to come to America; William Lindsey, a cotton yarn salesman who gave the collection of early musical instruments in memory of his daughter drowned in the sinking of the Lusitania; hotelman Harvey Drury Parker who bequeathed $100,000, and made possible the purchase of a collection of 23,000 prints which bears his name; the lawyer Francis Bartlett, gratefully remembered for his gifts of a $1.5 million building in Chicago and and the beautiful 4th century Greek head of Aphrodite; and Isabella Stewart Gardner, who founded a museum of her own but, with her husband, established one of the earliest funds to be used for Museum of Fine Arts operating expenses.

Back Bay Artists

Ten Back Bay artists and architects of past and present are honored in complementary individual exhibitions which illustrate their work in the Back Bay and elsewhere with models, renderings, photographs and original works of art.

With Richardson, McKim, LaFarge and Sargent are included Frederick Law Olmsted who created the first metropolitan park system in America, Boston's "Emerald Necklace" which extends from the Common to Franklin Park in Dorchester, and the sculptor Augustus Saint-Gaudens, author of the Shaw Memorial in the Common and many other fine examples of relief sculpture and park statuary. The importance of Saint-Gaudens is pointed up by an exhibition of his work opening November 13 at the National Portrait Gallery in Washington.

The contemporary Back Bay architects included are Philip Johnson, whose addition to the Library is now under construction; Paul Rudolph, rebuilding the First Church of Boston destroyed by fire in 1968; Sasaki, Dawson, DeMay Associates whose Copley Square plaza will be completed this year; and I. M. Pei and Partners, presently at work on two large projects: the John Hancock Tower in Copley Square and the Christian Science Church Center.

"Back Bay Boston: The City as a Work of Art" was organized by William Alex of New York. The gallery installations were created by museum designer Duncan Smith, assisted by Julie Green and Donald Irwin.

Admission to the exhibition is 50c; children under 16, 25c; members free.

The exhibition catalogue includes eight pages of color plates and over 200 black and white illustrations. The foreword is by museum director Perry T. Rathbone, introduction by Lewis Mumford, and essay on Back Bay patrons by Walter Muir Whitehill. The catalogue was designed by Carl F. Zahn of the Museum of Fine Arts.

"Back Bay Boston: The City as a Work of Art" is the first of seven special exhibitions planned for the museum's 17-month Centennial observance. The subsequent exhibitions are: "Art Treasures for Tomorrow" (Feb. 4—April 12, 1970); "The Royal Image" (April 23-July 12); "Andrew Wyeth" (July 16-Sept. 6); "Masterpieces from the Metropolitan" (Sept. 16 - Nov. 1); "The Art of Zen" (Fall of 1970); and "Toward 2070" (Feb. 4 - April 1, 1971).

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
NOV 23 1969

PARKWAY TRANSCRIPT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6400
NOV 19 1969

(Left) In this group are (left to right) Mrs. Charles Lyman of Canton, Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist with the orchestra, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, a trustee.

(Below) Mrs. George E. Bates of Boston (left) and Mrs. David Bird, also of Boston, learn about percussion instruments from Charles Smith, who will give the final lecture, April 17.

142

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741
NOV 27 1969

ANN HOBSON, Boston Symphony Orchestra harpist, joins family in Germantown.

Negro Woman From Phila. Is Boston Orchestra Harpist

By ORRIN EVANS
Of The Bulletin Staff

Thanksgiving Day has special significance in a cozy home at 26 W. Upsal st.

That's because it will be homecoming for Ann Hobson, who in September became the first Negro harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The turkey dinner, presided over by her mother, Mrs. Grace Hobson, and joined by a sister, Mrs. Harriett Foster, of 250 E. Johnson st., also will be a birthday celebration.

Miss Hobson, the youngest member of the symphony orchestra, turned 26 yesterday.

Teaches Music

"I have so much to be thankful for on this holiday," said Mrs. Hobson, a former concert pianist who now teaches music at the Francis D. Pastorius School, Chelten av. and Sprague st.

Mrs. Foster is two years older than her harpist sister. When both were under six years old, their mother began giving them piano lessons.

Father an Army Man

"Harriet, however, seemed to lose interest in continuing the study of the piano during the four years we lived in Europe," said Mrs. Hobson.

The family was abroad with the husband and father, Lt. Col. Harrison Hobson, who was stationed with the Army. He died in December 1967.

Musical talent runs in the family. A cousin of Miss Hobson and Mrs. Foster, Patricia Prattis, is pianist with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Switched to Harp

Miss Hobson was born in a house in the 5200 block Race st. but grew up in Germantown. For two years before going to Boston, she was first harpist with the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, D.C.

Miss Hobson switched from piano to harp when she entered Girls High School in 1957. There was an abundance of top-flight pianists at the high school, and it was suggested that she study the harp.

Miss Hobson is happy about her choice of a second instrument.

"I prefer the harp to the piano, because it has a much more mellow tone," she says.

Miss Hobson was auditioned — behind a screen — for the chair in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Wins Praise

"It was her first audition," said her mother, "because she was accepted for the National Symphony Orchestra on the basis of high recommendations."

Among those who lauded Miss Hobson's ability was Edna Phillips, former harpist with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

"I first knew her as a very gifted girl showing great, great promises," said Miss Phillips.

And here's the evaluation of William Moyer, Boston Symphony Orchestra personnel manager: "We were looking for the best harpist we could find. And it happened that Miss Hobson was the best. She plays with great authority."

Not Limited

Two years ago Miss Hobson enjoyed a nostalgic return to Europe when she toured nine countries as a member of the National Symphony Orchestra.

Her musical career, however, hasn't been limited to symphony orchestras. She taught harp for three years at the Philadelphia Musical Academy and for two summers she was a participant in the Temple University Music Festival, where she was harp soloist. She spent four summers at the Salzedo Harp Colony in Camden, Me.

"Yes, this is going to be a very joyous Thanksgiving Day for all of us," said Mrs. Hobson yesterday.

April in Boston to outshine Paris

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

If you know your Boston, you'll save that dream dress for April, girls.

April 4th and the International Ball, the 33d for Boston's International Institute. This is the old-world-of-Europe night to remember, nostalgia, decorations, and the whole consular corps.

April 11 is saved for the City Hospital Ball. Among the wives who've signed up for this first-of-its-kind in many a long year, include Peter Fuller's Joan, Kevin White's Kathryn, and lots more.

April 27 and the Symphony Ball. The guests and the goodies will be as Parisian as Maxim's itself for the essence of this elegant survivor of the '90's will be flown to Boston. That's everything from cuisine to china. The "cause" is, of course, the 90th anniversary of the Boston Symphony. To see and be seen at this one will be the season's true coup.

And, most fascinating of all, the rumors are really rife that the Museum of Fine Arts will at long last lend its beautiful bailiwick for a ball—in honor of its Centennial in '70. So superb is the notion of waltzing past those treasures of the ages that queries are in from the Louvre to Latin America. Talk about the turn of a century—a Centennial Ball in those marble halls would be living in history itself.

It's going to be a year for parties in fun places. The rise in the tab—$100 for a less-than-gourmet dinner and buy-your-own-drinks in the same old places, even for charity—is getting to be too much.

The first covey of Bostonians have already signed on for the party that will wing a lot of Londoners to Long Beach, Cal., next year to Clive David's international swinger aboard the "Queen Mary."

And there's a liner due here for a pre-sailing party that'll be a red, white, and blue flag-raiser.

Carol Rabb (Mrs. Avram) Goldberg is looking toward a Stop and Shop Ball, a store first, and Fenton Hollander and his cohorts are other star turns when it comes to new places and faces.

Faneuil Hall, anybody?

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
NOV 26 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
NOV 24 1969

Record American
Monday, Nov. 24, 1969

Not a "Stage Door Johnny" audience but a chic, alert group of Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra listened and enjoyed Michael Sasson (Strings) in the Council's first of a series of Stage Door Lectures, Friday morning, at Symphony Hall.

He revealed some amusing experiences of his fellow musicians as well as the conductors and the guest conductors of the BSO.

Much chatter went on after the lecture when the 250 ladies with box luncheons (topped with autumn corsages) gathered at tables for four.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., chairmen of the Council, did the welcoming honors.

Hostesses were Mrs. Edwin Cole, Mrs. George Draper, Mrs. Albert England, Jr., Mrs. Anatole Haemmerle, Mrs. William B. Moses, Mrs. Samuel Rogers, Mrs. Sherman R. Thayer, Mrs. Walter Watson II, Mrs. Howard Whiteside and Mrs. Frederic Worthen.

Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, members of the committee responsible for the Stage Door Lectures, were in the gathering as were Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. William Hogan, Mrs. C. Chauncey Grey, Mrs. Harold Blanchard and scores more.

The music scene

Two new members, Mrs. Harris Fahnstock of Concord, and Richard P. Chapman, chairman of New England Merchants National Bank, Boston, have been elected to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
NOV 25 1969

is not just history that is past, but a very real builder-upper for Irish mores today.

Happily uncontested was the Boston Symphony Council's utterly delightful first Stage Door party Friday. These marvelous idea girls have been giving fun to Boston and funds to the BSO right round the year, and this new venture is another "best."

A luscious lunchbox chicken croustardes, mind you, no tired sandwiches) in the midst of the sacrosanct BSO cello cases and wardrobe trunks was only part of the fun which centered round Michel Sasson, a "premier Prix" violinist with the Boston Symphony and new conductor of the Civic Symphony.

The San Diego Union
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
D. 139,739 SUN. 246,007
NOV 23 1969

How Goes On?: The Boston Symphony, it seems, flies in two airplanes when it goes on tour, with the conductor in one and his assistant in the other, each with skeleton scores for the coming concerts. Does this mean, then, that half the orchestra would actually show up for a program if the other half had been wiped out? Tradition is tradition, but . . .

SUNDAY TIMES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 1,527,000
NOV 23 1969

Party to Aid Orchestra

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the orchestra's Council of Tanglewood Friends have arranged a cocktail party for 6 P.M. tomorrow at the Harvard Club here. Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees' group, and Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will speak. The party will open a drive in New York to widen local support for the orchestra's Tanglewood (Mass.) activities.

A Witty, Perceptive Study of Boston Symphony Orchestra

By EARL J. DIAS

"GENTLEMEN, MORE DOLCE PLEASE"
Harry Ellis Dickson
Beacon Press

For 30 years Harry Ellis Dickson has played in the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, served as assistant conductor of the Pops, and directed the orchestra's children's concerts (since 1959). In addition, Dickson, an articulate and witty man, for many years was the principal speaker at the pre-Symphony luncheons on Friday afternoons.

Now, in "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please" (the title is one of the late and colorful Serge Koussevitsky's favorite expressions), Dickson give us a re- has a sharp eye for the ludicrous scenes activities of the orchestra, of the talented personnel, of its conductors, of the rigors of rehearsal, of problems with guest soloists, of the logistics of making a long tour.

What emerges is one of the most comical and absorbing books of the season. Dickson has sharp eye for the ludicrous — but he also has an obvious love for his profession as musician and considerable affection for his colleagues. In addition, he is proud of the orchestra — happy to be a part of one of the three or four finest symphonic ensembles in the world.

The book reminds me of a line from Marlowe, "Infinite riches in a little room." There is a splendid tribute to Koussevitsky, whom Dickson considers the greatest conductor of all time — a tribute compounded of equal parts of satire and warm personal regard. There is much about the beloved and erratic Charles Munch, the charming Pierre Monteux, the flamboyant Leopold Stokowski.

Best of all are the comments concerning the men of the orchestra and their relationships to each other. Did you know that cellists are regarded as instinctive trouble makers, that flutists are dandies, that horn players are rebels, that trombonists are conservatives, that tuba players are taciturn?

Or do you know why the former violist of the orchestra, Joseph de Pasquale, was known to his admiring colleagues as Mr. Malaprop? Or that violist Burton Fine is the epitome of absent-mindedness? Or that cellist Martin Hoherman can play almost any instrument — and also repair watches? Or that among the members of the Boston Symphony are three licensed pilots, an expert tennis player, a former nuclear physicist, a remarkable chef, a builder of organs?

All these and more facts Dickson reveals in a style as lively as his subject matter. There is an informative chapter on how the orchestra is run, another on Tanglewood, another on the methods of making recordings, and much about the Pops and Esplanade Concerts.

In short, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please" is a delight, not only for music-lovers but for all readers who enjoy the company of a knowledgeable, witty, and basically humane writer.

Sprightly Assessment Of Philadelphia Orchestra

THOSE FABULOUS PHILADELPHIANS
Herbert Kupferberg
Scribners

For several decades, the Philadelphia orchestra, one of the world's greatest music ensembles, has been noted for the richness and purity of its sound, for the dedication of its members, and for the fact that since its founding in 1900, it has had only four permanent conductors.

Moreover, the orchestra has a number of "firsts" in its glittering record — the first to broadcast on radio, the first to make orthophonic recordings, the first to participate in a Hollywood film (notably Walt Disney's ("Fantasia") and the first to appear on TV.

Now, on the occasion of the 70th anniversary season of the orchestra, Herbert Kupferberg has, in "Those Fabulous Philadelphians," written a spritely, colorful, and commendably documented account of the history of the group that has brought so much prestige to the city which it serves.

The briefest section of the book describes the founding of the orchestra, with the German, Fritz Scheel, as its first conductor (he died in 1907) and the short regime of another German, Karl Pohlig as the second conductor.

By far the liveliest and most amusing portion of the book deals with the fortunes of Leopold Stokowski, who became music director of the group in 1912 when he was a golden-maned young man of 30.

Stokowski held the post for 20 action-filled years, putting the stamp of his flamboyant personality on the musical life of Philadelphia. He pioneered in presenting new works. The ladies at the Friday afternoon concerts fell in love with him. He had disputes with the orchestra's board of directors — but under him, the orchestra developed the sound and the skill for which they are famous.

Typical of Stokowski's imaginative approach to music making is the children's concerts he made so popular. When the orchestra played Saint-Saens "Carnival of Animals," Stokowski insisted on having a menagerie, including three live elephants , on the stage. For Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," Stokowski "undertook to have an actual wolf present, and when none was available settled instead for a large dog."

By Member

Kupferberg assesses Stokowski's conducting style in this manner: "He was the greatest exponent of the sound spectacular who had ever conducted a symphony orchestra up to then .. . the public was ready and waiting for his thunderous Tschaikovsky, his rolling Rachmaninoff, the vivid Stravinsky, his ecstatic Wagner" even though "his Haydn and Mozart were no models of 18th-Century authenticity."

Stokowski was succeeded by the present conductor, Eugene Ormandy, a Bulgarian-trained violinist who once played in the orchestra of New York's Capitol Theater. Not so flamboyant as his predecessor but a thorough and intelligent musician, Ormandy has maintained the remarkable Philadelphia sound, has developed the Robin Hood Dell Concerts, and was instrumental in negotiating for the orchestra's summer home in Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

mandy, "He has made a Kupferberg notes about Or- specialty of being a non-specialist. He's not a Baroque man, a Beethoven man, a Berlio man, or a modernist. He's an orchestra man; if a piece has been written for orchestra, and he thinks it worth playing, he will play it with a minimum of fuss and fanfare."

In the book Kupferberg also recounts interviews with various orchestra members and their wives, with Stokowski, and with Ormandy. And to make this valuable book still more valuable, he supplies a Philadelphia Orchestra discography, a list of all members of the orchestra since 1900, and a list of those compositions premiered by the ensemble.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
NOV 30 1969

NEW STATESMAN 14 NOVEMBER 1969

MUSIC

Self-Critic

DAVID CAIRNS

Readers of the NS sometimes send reproachful letters asking why I do not write more often about contemporary music. One recent correspondent even complains that I contrive to give the impression that music has 'survived merely as an interpretative art, and at that operatic', whereas 'surely the most . . . important task of a music critic at any one time is to deal explicitly and as comprehensively as possible with all aspects of music, great or not, of the present day'. This seems a little unjust, when I think of what I have conscientiously if feebly striven to write in the last year or two about such composers as Stockhausen, Gerhard, Musgrave, Tippett, Xenakis, Crosse, Henze, Britten and Berio, and not solely from a point of view of baffled incomprehension. But I am, I do not deny it, contritely aware of present-day music as a problem that I generally try to avoid as decently as possible. As I see it, the reasons for not writing – and not simply not writing about contemporary music – must appear more numerous and compelling the longer one goes on being a critic.

This is something more specific to criticism than the common disillusionment which comes from discovering that by the time one knows how to do something, one no longer has the energy to do it. It is not only that the music critic loses his freshness through listening passively to too much music, and that even when a familiar work still stimulates a fresh response and so gives him something to say, he has no impulse to say it, because he has said it already. Equally eroding to his belief in the usefulness of what he does is the realisation of how little he knows of what has gone to make the performance he is criticising. Not that it is part of his business to pay attention to green-room gossip; he should never feel obliged to make allowances for what he hears and sees. But he should, and so rarely does, have some idea what is responsible for its shortcomings, and be circumspect in ascribing blame. Those confident and detailed pronouncements as to what was wrong with a performance can look infinitely absurd from the other camp.

Then, how little he is apt to be aware of the subjectivity of what he writes; how long it is since the recognition of the need to make some attempt at objectivity, or merely to admit his lack of it, was alive in his mind! How much hostile criticism of a composer is simply an unconscious confession that one doesn't like his music, dressed up as informed and considered judgment. But this alarming discovery can only narrow still further the field of activity; for after that, all one can reasonably do is to leave it alone.

This dilemma is of course particularly acute when it comes to modern music. Silence, or more or less pretentious guff – which is more culpable? Yet another piece of humorous apology for his inability to comprehend, or a serious assessment which, because it does not come from perception, must be largely valueless? His colleagues' flummeries and evasions reveal to him the hollowness of the tricks he himself has so often resorted to. If it can take months really to grasp a score written in an idiom that is meat and drink to him – as it can – how can he begin to talk about the 'form', or indeed the content, of an avant-garde work that he has heard a couple of times? When he confesses that the favourable impression the work made on him at the rehearsal unaccountably but unmistakably faded at second hearing, of what possible validity or interest can such reactions be? How can he say that through the complexity of its close-knit argument he dimly sensed a purposeful mind at work, or alternatively that the music's ingenious and striking new sonorities could not disguise a certain lack of coherence, without choking with laughter at his grotesque presumption?

With these cautions in mind, I shall even refrain from detailed comment on the much-praised Covent Garden revival of Die Frau ohne Schatten, a work I have heard only twice, by a composer my suspicions of whom I am duly suspicious of. To write directly out of his personal experience, to describe what he feels about a piece of music that he has come to understand through sympathy, must be the main object of every critic. The rest is journalism; and even that, to be readable, can't be concerned with attitudes.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

NOV 15 1969

MUSIC: Seminar sets a new tone for critics and may lead to a self-help society

MARY NIC SHENK
Music Writer, St. Petersburg Times

Music critics have been called "creatures who come out at night and are up to no good." (P.G. Wodehouse).

SNPA wasn't able to prove whether or not this is true, but it did get some music critics and music makers together to compare notes on the idea during the Florida International Music Festival in Daytona Beach this past summer.

Not only did the five-day seminar expose 20 Southeastern music writers to a wealth of varied music by the resident London Symphony Orchestra, but it had on hand a major critic, Michael Steinberg of the Boston Globe, an international conductor - composer - pianist (Andre Previn), a young composer who was having works premiered during the festival (Oliver Knussen) and leaders of the self-governing LSO, including Stuart Knussen, president as well as father of Oliver. These people were present at forums, round-table discussions and social gatherings, permitting the critics to freely question them on matters, both musical and journalistic.

A music critic on a newspaper can be a one-in-an-area, or state, position, depending on the progressiveness of the newspaper and cultural interests of its editors.

This is particularly true in places other than the major centers of New York, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, Washington. The small town critic, or reviewer, may have little opportunity to discuss musical-journalistic problems at his newspaper if he doesn't have an understanding ear. (Fortunately not true in my case.) Even at national conventions of critics his own special and particular questions can seem unimportant in the face of major national issues, like the closing of the Metropolitan Opera or the dying of major symphony orchestras. So he just does the best he can, wondering if what he is doing is really satisfactory.

Newspaper music critics, reviewers, writers and/or editors wear many hats, in effect usually serving as cultural promoters, advance men, reporters, consultants, interviewers and feature writers—before putting the kiss of death or life on the final performance with a review.

Although Steinberg is in somewhat a different position, concentrating on criticism and weekly think-pieces, he was able to give some constructive ideas to the distraught small-town writers who often find themselves in the awkward position of both promoter and critic. And the small-town critics found this to be a serious topic of conversation among themselves at the seminar.

But most valuable of all was the constructive criticism given the writers by Steinberg, Previn, Knussen and Knussen.

Each of us reviewed the same concert and submitted our reviews to Reed Sarratt before Steinberg's review was published. Panel members were given copies of all reviews (almost burning up the Daytona Beach Journal copying machine) and had an opportunity to read them before the session.

Those of us attending the seminar were probably more nervous at this session than when we have to read our own copy in our daily papers! But it worked. Both general and specific comments were made about aspects of the reviews which either satisfied or bothered panel members.

It is this type of direct confrontation and comment which critics seldom have an opportunity to share, since performers normally avoid critics and critics often avoid other critics. It was this session which made the seminar outstanding.

In other music critics' meetings and conventions I have attended or heard of, this has never before happened, with the possible exception of the Tanglewood Symposium of Contemporary Music which is in its second year through the co-sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fromm Foundation.

Unless people attended the Daytona seminar with closed ears and minds, it was impossible to come away without new insights, ideas and challenges, plus some solutions.

Mary Nic Shenk

From the SNPA seminar developed an opportunity for me which excited both me and my editor-president, Donald K. Baldwin. As a direct result of the seminar and my contact with Michael Steinberg, whom I spotted as a born teacher, I went to Boston October 23-31 with my newspaper's blessings and studied, listened and wrote for Steinberg, spending concentrated hours with him having my ear, background and writing individually evaluated and criticized. Not only did this person-to-person master lessons in criticism confirm strengths and weaknesses for me, but it opened channels of musical communication and assistance which I would have been unable to obtain in any other way.

It not only provided instruction and assistance for me to apply directly to my situation, but also revealed some similar problems which exist even in the large cities. Not only the provinces have trouble with space and time for reviews. And not only the small-town critics get nasty letters! It also opened up a type of study which I hope to continue periodically in the future.

One unsolved question about reviews which should interest responsible editors and publishers concerns time in which to write reviews.

Major New York critics refuse to write them in less than an hour. But many of us have a maximum of 30 minutes in which to write between the end of the concert and press deadline. Certainly no serious music critic will agree to leave a concert early.

BOSTON AFTER DARK, NOVEMBER 19

Toward an objective criticism

by Ralph Locke

"Why can't critics be constructive? Who do they think they are anyway? They never agree on a thing."

The complaints about critics are familiar. The critics keep writing their articles, and their readers—the critics' critics—keep sending in their letters. But nothing seems to change. Nothing changes because the people who write the letters of complaint are usually as befuddled about a way out of the criticism rut as they are sure that the problem exists. If we examine the state of music criticism in America today (and it is just as true in the other arts), the solution will become apparent through a clear statement of the problem.

At the risk of being arbitrary, let us say that there are three essential schools of criticism today—which we might call Subjective, Pseudo-Objective, and Objective. Writers whose critical reviews belong to the first type are generally stating little more than their individual subjective reactions to a work or performance, but with little awareness that their reaction does not necessarily have an objective validity. This is the level of reaction of the concert-goer (or even the performers themselves) and it can range from the undifferentiated "It was great" to the more specific "This was rushed" or "The last movement dragged."

But how valuable is this attitude in a man who writes reviews for publication? Aside from telling us that one individual liked (or didn't like) a work, isn't it nothing more than a glorification of this individual's personality and tastes? And doesn't this lead to a regrettable tendency among reviewers—and the phenomenon is neither new nor local— to search for the cutest turns of phrase and the snidest put-downs? Is that what we want from a reviewer?

No, we don't. Or at least we don't think we do. When a reviewer comes out with the statement that a new twelve-tone piece is a "failure" or "pointless and boring" he gets complaints from many self-righteous people that he is being dogmatic and stating his own views as if they were facts. The charge of dogmatism is usually unfair—note that it almost never comes in response to a favorable review—but it does set the reviewer thinking about his responsibilities.

"They are right," he thinks. "By presenting my opinions as if they were facts, I am betraying my readers' trust. I shall adhere to the standards of journalistic honesty which prevail in news reporting and henceforth differentiate scrupulously between fact and opinion." And so he finds a new way to write his reviews: the Pseudo-Objective approach.

This second kind of journalism is also often encountered in reviews. The writer very clearly labels his own reactions, lest they be misunderstood. His articles abound with such phrases as "In my view," "For my taste," and "I might prefer. . ." But except for a difference in style, there is no difference at all between Pseudo-Objective criticism and the Subjective kind. The judgments are no more valid or dependable, though they might be a bit more palatable.

Of course there is an advantage to this approach. The reviewer is now protected. He can say anything he feels because he is not claiming any validity for his views—aside from the fact that he himself reacts that way. Sometimes the resulting articles are more daringly worded to produce an effect of cunning nastiness. But usually they are hardly different from reviews of the Subjective critic. Instead of writing "This work was not worth reviving," our Pseudo-Objective critic writes "I think that this work was not worth reviving." The meaning hasn't changed any. (He obviously thought it wasn't worth reviving in the first example or he would not have written it!) The style has been changed to regain an appearnace of objectivity. But have the readers gained anything?

The answer is not a simple "No." There is a value to journalistic honesty, but there is far more value when it is combined with a concern for truly objective criticism. Even when reviews make the important distinction between factual material and the reviewer's own feelings, these feelings very often tell us less about the work or performance under consideration than they do about the reviewer's personality.

Our third kind of journalism must seek to illuminate its subjects instead of being an outlet for the writer's frustrations. The difference between this and the Subjective and Pseudo-Objective types is not one of style but of content. It demands a new attitude on the part of the reviewer. He must shift the emphasis in his reviews from himself to the artist. He must replace his need for self-glorification with a more constructive concern for the integrity of the artist. The questions he deals with can no longer be "How did I like it," but "What was the composer or performer trying to say, how well did he accomplish it, and what is the value of his message?"

Of course it is not possible to eliminate the personality of the critic from his articles. It is not even desirable. The Objective critic can be as deeply involved in his material as the others, but his personality will show through in the depth and clairty of his understanding, not in the facility of his wit.

The aim of an objective analysis may best be seen in a specific example. In the long list of supposedly "legendary" recordings, there is one (deleted many years ago) by Dimitri Mitropoulos in which he conducts Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto from the keyboard. From the recording alone it is obvious that Mitropoulos was no virtuoso pianist—but also that he was a highly spirited and even inspired musician. As a result, his performance sacrifices a lot of detail for an effect of maximum sardonic bite. If a reviewer were to describe this performance as "sloppy and embarassingly hectic," he would be saying very little. If another called it "brilliant, a classic performance," he would have said nothing at all. The first step must always be an accurate description of what the artist is trying to communicate and an assessment of his success in doing so. Both our hypothetical reviewers have ignored a major aspect of the Mitropoulos recording, and so both are guilty of irresponsibility in their journalism.

Of course reviewers are always going to have personal reactions; that is part of the nature of music and all the arts. But we don't have to worry at this point about leaving room for the writers to express their own opinions. They'll manage. Let us concentrate on bringing a new spirit to criticism, a spirit by which composers, performers, critics, and audiences can all learn from each other. Let us create a new spirit of Objectivity in music criticism.

144.

MUSIC

'More than a mirror and mouthpiece'

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critc

Hastened by a fusillade of letters following the first of my reviews of Carlo Maria Giulini and the Boston Symphony, the time has come to talk about the business of criticism itself.

The music critic, I take it, is an educator, and his main job is to write about music, as it exists both in the abstract on the printed page and brought alive in performance; not about audience response or musical politics or activities on the periphery of the musical scene, but the music itself. These other considerations each have their place, but they are subsidiary to the central concern.

To write about music you need a person trained in music. Gentleman critics have served an estimable and vital function. The best of the breed, Paul Rosenfeld, for instance, informed the public about music and offered opinions with a charm and a wit and a worldliness that's not often met today.

But most people have finally admitted that music is, au fond, a technical matter, and to write sensibly about it, to put technical knowledge in non-technical terms, one should have studied music and preferably have had some performing experience. One would expect no less in technical expertise from a writer on automobiles or one on bridge. And so, too, with music, cold, hard facts are indispensable.

WHEN ONE HAS to write about a concert, there are several obvious points to make: first, what are the merits of the pieces themselves, do they tell the audience something worth knowing about the history of music; are there features of the pieces that might be explained somewhat in detail, features of harmonic or melodic construction that might be pointed out to the litseners, that they can seize on and watch for and knowledgeably use when a similar piece is heard?

Such, for example, is the case with the late symphonies of Haydn. The slow introductions of these pieces provide the perfect illustration of the forward-looking composer of the late 18th century searching for a constructive device to further unify his work. Harmonically, these introductions sow seeds that come to fruition not immediately, but over a considerable span of time, often several movements.

When this procedure is once clearly explained and its consequences shown, there is every reason to believe that the attentive listener will hang on this small, highly significant detail, will follow it and in doing so will learn more about the piece, about the period, about the creative process itself.

IF THE CRITIC is to be of any use to a community whatsoever, he has to be more than a mirror and mouthpiece of popular taste. What is the value of criticism if the critic is as easily satisfied as the average member of the audience?

To function properly, the critic has to keep his standards high. He has to have constantly in mind the ideal performance—

'ideal' in terms of historical accuracy as to sound, phrasing, tempi and so on—and to balance this imaginary reading with the actual one, evaluated by the going professional standard, the artist's past performance and known potential.

To criticize on the basis of the "ideal" alone would be foolhardy, for with a score in hand, the imagination can supply a performance more to one's liking than most artists (and this is true, I imagine, for most musicians). Thus, to avoid judging the 'actual' on the basis of the 'ideal,' contemporary criteria are always equally as important as historical ones.

LOGICALLY, this leads to a certain type of performance that the critic I describe might favor. He would want each piece on a program to have its specific flavor, to sound like a product of its time and place, to be rich in poetic and historical references. If every piece is subjected to the same sort of sound, let us say, no matter how rich and distinctive that sound might be; if every piece is played in more or less the same way, subjected to the same dynamics (in the non-musical sense of the word), then these performances are unstatisfactory.

For each piece of music differs from each other, and none exploits more than the tinest fraction of the whole. To be accurately heard, each has to be individually thought-out and stylishly executed.

As you may see, this leads to a paradox of sorts, for the man who takes this stand and criticizes most harshly—and is thus found most radical—is in fact the most conservative, musically speaking. The attitude I describe is profundly cautious, for it implies that modern-day reading should duplicate the 'ideal' performance envisaged by the composer, in-

MOZART'S MUSIC should sound as Mozart himself must have imagined it, full of pathos and humor and elegance and simplicity, and scores of Mahler must be as sensitive and bold and infinitely touching as Mahler himself surely was. Readings that tell more about the musicians than the music are inadequate, or false, and give us all the right to feel cheated.

But the problem is more complicated, for at the same time that he so jealously guards the old, the critic must be a prime advocate of the new.

Of course new music can't and isn't to be supported indiscriminately. What one looks for first in a new score (or one of the things one might look for first) are the composer's ties with the past. What has the history of music taught him, what is important to him and how does he go about preserving it?

IT'S NOT ESSENTIAL what stylistic voice a composer speaks. It can be the traditional tonal language of most Copland and Sessions, say, or the twelve-tone idiom of Schoenberg and the Viennese or random music combined with either of these. But in whatever mode he chooses, he has to show that he has found something of musical import and that he has shaped it in a way concordant with our time and given it contemporary meaning.

As with the older music, it's the critic's job not merely to register his enjoyment at a fine performance, but to offer his educated opinion on how the end product might have been better wrought and rendered.

In any case, the critic's review isn't the final word, and shouldn't be taken as such. The best critics are the most flexible, in that they are the most willing to learn. There's a Bureau of Standards, all right, but the critic doesn't rule it. The public does. And it's the critic's toughest task—and one that demands all he can offer in knowledge, experience, taste, tact and insight—to persuade the public it should demand a more distinguished musical life.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 16 1969

Unprecedented move

BSO criticizes critic Steinberg

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

NOV 19 1969

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association has labelled Boston Globe music critic Michael Steinberg a "persona non grata" and has asked the Boston Symphony management not to welcome Mr. Steinberg at future concerts.

The action stems from a review The Globe published on Saturday, Nov. 8, under Mr. Steinberg's by-line. The lead paragraph of the review reads as follows:

"If Danny Kaye or Victor Borge were to conduct a performance of the Brahms 4th just like the one Carlo Maria Giulini conducted Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, one so raging and overwrought, one with its upbeats so stretched, with such crazed dislocations of tempo and accompanied by a similar visual production with such prodigality in expressions of tragic suffering and deep knee-bends, the audience would have been in stitches."

The BSO Members Association, reacting to Mr. Steinberg's review, sent the following telegram to the editor of The Globe:

"In view of the unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Mr. Giulini, and the continued slurs on the members of the orchestra, we have asked the Boston Symphony management to not welcome Mr. Michael Steinberg to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone far beyond the scope of musical criticism."

The manager of the orchestra, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., lent his support to the orchestra but noted that the invitation is extended to the newspaper and its representative, and not to Mr. Steinberg directly. The text of his letter to the orchestra members, in part, is as follows:

". . . The mangement, like the players, is offended by the immoderate and unwarranted tone of The Globe critic's writing and by its persistent negativism. We admire the players' initiative in sending this telegram. The Globe's tickets are in their hands for distribution to whomever they choose to send to represent the paper. The Boston Globe is a serious and concerned newspaper and we look to them to send to the concerts a representative they in conscience can consider a professional spokesman of the paper and a responsible critic and reporter. We do not feel that this is now the case. It is now for the trustees and management also to make their similar feelings known. . . ."

This series of correspondence is an unprecedented step for an entire institution — trustees, management, and players. In the past, individual trustees or people in management have expressed themselves but never before an institution.

According to Marvin Schofer, director of public information for the BSO, the argument with Mr. Steinberg does not center over his credentials to cover the orchestra properly, but over the manner of his coverage.

"First of all," explained Mr. Schofer, "we are not concerned with Michael's [redacted]ation. The point is not that we disagree, and we're not trying to convince him that his taste and judgments are wrong. It is the extra-musical aspect of some of his reviews which upsets us. You can't treat an organization like the BSO with the cavalier disregard for the sensitivities of that institution. His reviews border, at times, on insulting invective. He uses odious comparisons — apparently humorously — the net result of which is to denigrate the orchestra.

"The second point is that we are not against Michael. This is not an ad hominem attack. This is a general problem and refers just as much to similar cases from other sources. Anything I say about critics can apply to other critics and even other orchestras. It is precisely because these problems are common that we want to make our objections very clear."

B.A.D. was unable to reach Mr. Steinberg or a representative of The Globe for comment.

Harold Banks —

What troubles City Hall about the MBTA's agreement to buy the old Dover st. railroad yards from Penn Central isn't only that the 24-acre site would become tax-exempt. It would also reduce land available for industrial, tax-yielding use in the city to less than 200 acres . . . Mayor White's mother has a special as well as a general taste in books. Her latest acquisition from a West st. shop was "The History of Woodcut Illustrations Through the Ages."

The Massachusetts Trial Lawyers Ass'n is so irked by Gov. Sargent's failure to acknowledge two letters asking that it be consulted on appointments to the bench that it voted to "wait upon" him at the State House this week to get some kind of reply . . . For the first time in the Boston Symphony's 88 years, members of the orchestra, management and trustees have jointly asked a Boston newspaper (not this one) and its music critic to apologize for his "unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack" on guest conductor Carlo Maria Giulini.

Unnoticed overnight visitor here — Xerox Corp.'s Sol M. Linowitz, U. S. Ambassador to the Organization of American States and among

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 25 1969

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 387,180 SUN. 610,016

NOV 30 1969

145

Telling It Like It Is In Boston And Daytona

Orchestra Rebels Against a Critic

By FRANK PETERS

FOR THE FIRST TIME in anyone's memory, a major orchestra has got so angry at a music critic that it — both musicians and management — has asked him to stay away from its concerts. The orchestra and critic involved are big ones: the Boston Symphony vs. Michael Steinberg of the Boston Globe. Steinberg is the most prestigious critic in Boston, won a national prize last spring, and is widely known for his writings about music. The St. Louis Symphony occasionally uses program notes written by him.

Steinberg has a reputation for being honest and ruthless. He started building his reputation his first night on the job, six years ago, when he reviewed Leonard Bernstein's "Kaddish" or Symphony No. 3, a work commissioned by Boston and in many ways seeming to call, at its premiere, for respectful treatment. Steinberg attacked fearlessly. The review that touched off the recent Boston Symphony Orchestra rebellion appeared Nov. 8 under the headline "Giulini and BSO with Brahms More Like Borge."

Carlo Maria Giulini is a conductor of romantic musical inclination. He was a guest on the Boston podium that week, and with his easy, affable manner had become a personal favorite of the musicians. He let them out of rehearsals early. Fifteen of the musicians had petitioned management to bring in Giulini as resident conductor. Since the retirement of Erich Leinsdorf the orchestra has had William Steinberg (no relation to Michael) as music director, dividing his time between Boston and Pittsburgh.

THIS IS HOW Michael Steinberg opened his review of Giulini's concert:

"If Danny Kaye or Victor Borge were to conduct a performance of the Brahms Fourth just like the one Carlo Maria Giulini conducted Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, one so raging and overwrought, one with its upbeats so stretched with such crazed dislocation of tempo and accompanied by a similar visual production with such prodigality in expressions of tragic suffering and deep knee-bends, the audience would have been in stitches.

"In the solemn context of a Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concert, the audience instead took it seriously.

"Perhaps Giulini's tempest-tossed performance can be read as proceeding from a man of original and humorous spirit, loathing Brahms and the institution of the symphony concert, and inspired to deliver a devastating put-on in the most elegant deadpan style. I fear, though, that what actually happened is less interesting. The performance, instead of being the first ever fully to explore the comic possibilities of the Brahms Fourth, proceeded from nothing more uncommon than opportunism and meretricious vulgarity."

THE ORCHESTRA MUSICIANS met the next morning after a children's concert and approved a statement, which they sent to the orchestra management and summarized as follows in a telegram to the editor of the Boston Globe:

"In view of the unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious great conductor, Mr. Giulini, and the continued slurs on the members of the orchestra, we have asked the Boston Symphony management to not welcome Mr. Michael Steinberg to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone far beyond the scope of musical criticism."

The orchestra manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., replied to the musicians in a letter that ". . . the management, like the players, is offended by the immoderate and unwarranted tone of the Globe critic's writing and by its persistent negativism. We admire the players' initiative in sending this telegram. The Globe's tickets are in their hands for distribution to whomever they choose to send" (a Globe spokesman says that actually they come addressed to Steinberg) ". . . and we look to them to send to the concerts a representative they in conscience can consider a professional spokesman of the paper and a responsible critic and reporter. We do not feel that this is now the case . . ."

ALL THIS WENT UNREPORTED, a Boston newsman says, except in Boston After Dark, a tabloid weekly that caters successfully to young readers, and on the local educational-TV station. The story was ready for a full play in last week's Time, but was bumped out of the magazine by coverage of the moon landing. Through it all, according to Time correspondent Barry Hillenbrand, Steinberg has gone right on reviewing the Boston Symphony and shrugging off the uproar.

Marvin Schofer, the orchestra's press agent, made a statement to Boston After Dark that did not appreciably reinforce the case against the critic. "We are not concerned with Michael's evaluation," he is quoted as saying. "The point is not that we disagree, and we're not trying to convince him that his taste and judgments are wrong. It is the extramusical aspect of some of his reviews that upsets us. You can't treat an organization like the BSO with cavalier disregard for the sensitivities of that institution . . ."

The Birth of FIFI And the Cold Facts

SELDOM HAS a music festival come about as casually as the one in Daytona Beach, Fla. Even more seldom have a festival's affairs been discussed as candidily as they are in the report that follows. It was signed and distributed to the press by the Daytona festival's president, Jack R. Hunt.

"FLORIDA INTERNATIONAL FESTIVALS, INC.
PRESIDENT'S REPORT

"The Florida International Festivals, Inc. is a relatively new entity which was born as the Daytona Festivals, Inc. DFI was a somewhat spurious organization which came about as a result of a few community leaders getting together ostensibly to acquire a four-year college in Daytona Beach. Somehow the talk turned to music and festivals, and a letter was addressed to the London Symphony Orchetra at the address of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. In all probability the authors of the letter thought they were sending it to the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. The people at the Royal Philharmonic were quite proper, however, and forwarded the letter to the LSO.

"The LSO being one of the four major orchestras in London, which was continuously competing for sufficient engagements to keep its members employed, viewed the letter with great interest and agreed to spend a working holiday in Florida. Since that first year the LSO has returned three times to Florida and has, in fact, been the 'festival' at Daytona Beach. The only other activity in the festival has been the summer institute co-ordinated by Stetson University.

"EVEN THOUGH the LSO 'festival' has not been an outstanding financial success, it has gained considerable notoriety for the annual affair. In addition, there has evolved many close friendships between Daytona Beach residents and LSO members. In many ways, the annual LSO soiree has become more a family affair than a music festival.

"It is always difficult to introduce a nonprofit activity to a community. Skeptics abound and are quick to criticize. The dedicated people in the Daytona Beach area who have staunchly supported the festival concept have accomplished continuity for four years under unbelievable conditions against astronomical odds. By all acceptable standards of measurement, the whole endeavor should have failed after the first year.

"SOMEHOW, THE SUMMER symphony survived. Each successive summer saw the same situation until now there seems to be a general feeling that the festival is here to stay. Idealistically, the LSO has become an institution here. Realistically, the time has come to examine the institution in the light of cold hard facts:

(1) The summer "festival" has existed for four years

(2) There have been classical summer institutes with the festival

(3) The "festival" has been confined to symphonies and concerts

(4) The same orchestra has, in fact, been the "festival"

(5) In the past we have had a festival in name only

(6) FIFI has amassed a legal and moral indebtedness in excess of $150,000

"The time has come to face the facts. As I see it, we have reached the point of decision or, as the saying goes, "It's time to fish or cut bait." There is an immediate need to decide on one of the three following basic courses:

(1) Decline to accept any moral responsibility for what has transpired and bail out by committing corporate suicide, better known by the legal term — bankruptcy

(2) Attempt to retain a "business as usual attitude," try to negotiate a contract for the LSO to return next summer and hope that some miracle may be performed to pay the bills

(3) Completely reorganize the thinking about a festival. Broaden the base of membership, forego the LSO for the summer of 1970, plan a festival season for January, 1971, with special summer programs in 1970 which will produce a small profit to help keep FIFI alive while an operational plan is developed that will instill confidence in prospective contributors. I must warn you, however, that there is a special consideration which is part and parcel of this course of action. If this course is chosen, it can only be accomplished by the use of a four letter word — WORK!

Hunt's conclusion was to recommend No. 3.

Boston Critics Assailed By Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON (AP) — A chord of dissonance has been struck between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and two of its Boston critics.

The Boston Globe today said it received a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association (the players) complaining about the "unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Mr. (Carlo Maria) Giulini and the continued slurs on members of the orchestra."

Earlier, the Globe said, the members association sent a telegram to Symphony trustees urging them "not to welcome Michael Steinberg (Globe critic) to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism."

The Globe said sources at the Boston Herald Traveler reported that music critic George Gelles "had been removed by the paper's publisher from his music reviewing assignments," and since that time "his by-line has not appeared over any music review."

The Globe also quoted a letter it said was sent to the Herald from a member of the BSO board of trustees "deploring" the Herald's hiring "of one of his (Steinberg's) imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge but the same tone of voice."

The Globe said a letter from Talbott M. Banks, president of the BSO trustees, criticized Steinberg's "undisciplined and irresponsible" reviews that were "doing real injury to the music life of Boston."

Steinberg said his reviews over the past three years have been "about 40 per cent favorable and 35 per cent mixed but generally favorable.".

Steinberg said Gelles "dismissal" was an example of "power politics."

"When bad news comes, you slaughter the messenger," he said..

Globe Editor Thomas Winship said the Globe,. Steinberg and Symphony officials are "discussing the matter and intend to handle it properly from the point of view of all concerned."

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465
DEC 5 1969

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 30,034
DEC 5 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
DEC 5 1969

NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
(E) 14,827
DEC 5 1969

SUN
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
(E) 14,200
DEC 5 1969

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
(E) 7,904
DEC 6 1969

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822
DEC 8 1969

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
(E) 19,203
DEC 5 1969

BSO Plays Finale for Critics

'Slurs' on Orchestra Bring Demand for Removal

BOSTON (AP) — A chord of dissonance has been struck between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and two of its Boston critics.

The Boston Globe today said it received a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association (the players) complaining about the "unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Mr. (Carlo Maria) Giulini, and the continued slurs on members of the orchestra."

* * *

Earlier, the Globe said, the members association sent a telegram to Symphony trustees urging them "not to welcome Michael Steinberg (Globe critic) to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism."

Joel Librizzi
Talcott M. Banks
Muse is offended

The Globe also said sources at the Boston Herald Traveler reported that music critic George Gelles "had been removed by the paper's publisher from his music reviewing assignments," and since that time "his byline has not appeared over any music review."

* * *

The Globe also quoted a letter it said was sent to the Herald from a member of the BSO board of trustees "deploring" the Herald's hiring "of one of his (Steinberg's) imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge but the same tone of voice."

The Globe said a letter from Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO trustees, criticized Steinberg's "undisciplined and irresponsible" reviews that were "doing real injury to the music life of Boston."

* * *

Steinberg said his reviews over the past three years have been "about 40 per cent favorable and 35 per cent mixed but generally favorable."

Steinberg said Gelles's "dismissal" was an example of "power politics."

"When bad news comes, you slaughter the messenger," he said.

Globe editor Thomas Winship said the Globe, Steinberg and Symphony officials are "discussing the matter and intend to handle it properly from the point of view of all concerned."

Globe 12/4/69

Pops conductor scores music critics

By Leo Shapiro
Globe Staff

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pops conductor, and author of "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please," which deals with music and musicians, scored Boston's music critics yesterday, as "personally vindictive and smart-alecky."

He referred to critics who preceded them as "respectable connoisseurs" who imparted to the public "in a respectable way their considered opinions." He charged that the present group's music criticism is destructive and "attacks established artists without regard for good taste or human decency."

Dickson, who made the comments at the 65th anniversary luncheon of the Sisterhood of Temple Israel at the Temple Israel Meeting House was applauded when he voiced his feelings about music critics here.

Dickson told the women that knowing a great deal about music does not necessarily create understanding; that there must be love of music.

"My last word on music critics, is this," he said as he concluded. "Don't take them too seriously, you are often better judges than they."

Dickson, discussing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, noted that 30 years ago, when he joined it, 85 percent of the players were foreign-born and trained, but today the opposite is the case. He said this holds true of all the other major symphony orchestras in the ountry.

"We have come of age musically. We learned from our European cousins. What music we have in this country today is superior to that of any other country. And this holds true for our young talented soloists who are constantly competing in world competitions and walking off with first prizes.

"No longer do our young people feel they must go to Europe for their musical training. People are now coming to America, where we have the finest teachers and music schools," he said.

Others on the program included Rabbi Roland B. Gittelsohn, Temple Israel's spiritual leader; Solomon Stern, Temple Israel president; Mrs. Edward R. Masters, Sisterhood president; Mrs. David Rosen, program chairman; and Mrs. Harry P. Cole, luncheon chairman.

Diary for the Agnew Era, Entry No. 1: The Boston Herald has fired its bright young critic, George Gelles, reportedly on the "suggestion" of Boston Symphony trustees who objected to some of his reviews. Maybe this explains why a number of people, including colleagues, have told me that my two pieces on inner wickedness at the Metropolitan Opera were "courageous." It hadn't occurred to me, in all immodesty, that they were. ■

New York Magazine

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 461,357 SAT. 453,757
DEC 9 1969

Boston critics rile symphony

Daily News Wire Services

BOSTON — A chord of dissonance has been struck between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and two of Boston's music critics.

The Boston Globe reported last week that it had received a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Assn. complaining about the "unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Mr. Carlo Maria Giulini, and the continued slurs on members of the orchestra."

Earlier, the Globe said, the members association sent a telegram to symphony trustees from a member of the BSO board of trustees "deploring" the Herald's hiring "of one of his (Steinberg's) imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge but the same tone of voice."

THE TROUBLE was apparently sparked off by a combination of bad reviews by Steinberg and Gelles of Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Giulini and by Seiji Ozawa.

Gelles, reached at his home in Boston late Monday, said a Time Magazine report that the Herald had named him critic-at-large was, so far as he knew, unfounded, and that he

The BSO and its critics

146

A quiet controversy that has been going on for a number of years between Boston newspaper critics and the local music world in recent days has taken on a sharper tone.

The normally sensitive relationship between critic and performer flared up recently and the Boston symphony Orchestra Assn. (the players), symphony officials and members of the Board of Trustees dispatched a series of letters and telegrams to the publishers of the Boston Globe and the Boston Herald-Traveler. And the two critics counter-attacked.

The most recent development came last week when Herald-Traveler sources reported that George Gelles, the music critic, had been removed by the paper's publisher, from his music reviewing assignment. Since that time his by-line has not appeared over any music review.

Earlier, members of the orchestra, in a telegram, urged Symphony trustees "not to welcome Michael Steinberg (Globe critic) to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism."

In the past few years there has been criticism from the reviewers and some other music experts as to the qualifications of conductors hired by the board of trustees.

Here is a chronology of the present dispute.

The controversy was touched off by a Steinberg review in which he was highly critical of guest conductor Carlo Maria Giulini. It appeared in the Saturday Globe, Nov. 8.

The next day at a meeting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Assn. the telegram was sent to the management of the orchestra.

The Globe received a similar telegram complaining about the "unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Mr. Giulini, and the continued slurs on members of the orchestra."

On Nov. 11, Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the orchestra, in a response to the orchestra members, said, in part: "The management, like the players, is offended by the immoderate and unwarranted tone of the Globe critic's writing and by its persistent negativism.

"The Boston Globe is a serious and concerned newspaper and we look to them to send to the concerts a representative they in conscience can consider a professional spokesman of the paper and a responsible critic and reporter. We do not feel that this is now the case," Perry's letter said.

The following day the Globe received a copy of a letter sent to Harold E. Clancy, publisher of the Boston Herald Traveler, by Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church and a member of the Symphony board of trustees.

The letter criticized Steinberg and went on to "deplore" the Herald-Traveler's hiring "one of his imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge but the same tone of voice."

The letter stated, in part: "For several years the Boston Globe has employed Michael Steinberg as its music critic. He knows a great deal about music, is highly qualified to write about it and writes well. Unfortunately he has chosen to write in such a tone of voice, and to say things that are both unfair and rude, that major artists are reluctant to come to Boston, and some have refused to come."

On Nov. 30 Steinberg went to bat for his colleague Gelles in a memorandum he sent to music critics on major papers around the country.

On Nov. 19 the Globe received a letter from Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees, in which he said, "... I have hesitated to write both because I am a strong believer in wholly independent criticism — if informed and objective — and because I have often defended Michael Steinberg against his detractors."

This was prefaced by his statement that he now felt that Steinberg's "undisciplined and irresponsible" reviews were "doing real injury to the musical life of Boston."

Banks charged that the Steinberg review in October of the Eugene Ormandy concert (Philadelphia Orchestra) was "typically patronizing." He added that "in your issue of Nov. 8 he (Steinberg) excoriated and ridiculed Giulini, certainly one of the most respected and sensitive conductors of our time ..."

The Steinberg memorandum stated that Gelles's dismissal had been the result of pressure by the trustees of the symphony and an example of "power politics."

It is a case, Steinberg said, in an old tradition, "when bad news comes you slaughter the messenger."

Talcott M. Banks, president of the board, denied the charge and pointed out that only he and one of the other members of the trustees had communicated with the Globe denouncing Steinberg's criticism of the second concert by Giulini and the earlier concert by Ormandy and that so far as he knew only one trustee had written the Herald-Traveler. He emphasized that the board itself had taken no action and Mr. Banks denied any concerted unofficial action by the trustees.

Steinberg sent two additional memoranda to his fellow critics. In the first he retracted the insertion of the name of one trustee as having protested (He had gotten the name from a high Herald Traveler source), And in the second, urged recipients to regard the memorandum as confidential and to check all statements before writing on the situation.

Steinberg, commenting on the controversy, said, concerning Mr. Perry's charge of negativism, "looking over my reviews of the past three years I find that about 40 percent were wholly favorable and 35 percent were mixed but generally favorable. In addition, there were numerous other pieces such as interviews and previews which were of a generally supportive character."

Globe Editor Thomas Winship said: "The Globe management is aware of the current congroversy over the role of serious criticism. Representatives of the paper, Music Critic Steinberg and officials of the Symphony are discussing the matter and intend to handle it properly from the point of view of all concerned."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 5 1969 New Englar

As I Hear It

Backstage at the BSO

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

I WAS ASSIGNED a book to review this week, an extremely entertaining if superficial account of many aspects of a major symphony by a violinist with 30-year tenure in the Boston orchestra. Not only are the anecdotes hilarious, even though excavated by the most expert musical archaeologist, but there is a vast amount of information on the gears and springs which activate the workings of such a formidable organization. Harry Ellis Dickson is renowned as the orchestra's best raconteur and it is fitting and right that he should record the history of which he has been more than a run-of-the-mill participant for so long. The book is titled "Gentlemen, More Dolce, Please!" (Beacon Press, $7.50).

But between the cup and the lip there has arisen a phenomenon which prompts me to ignore my assignment partially and to devote this space to a unique development which has appeared in Boston. It might be pertinent to point out that Dickson has a chapter on music critics in general, the shortest chapter in the 162-page book. Dickson thinks "music critics are an unnecessary evil." He has "enjoyed the friendship of some critics," however. He uses the word "erudite" twice in the chapter, once to express disdain, the other time to convey admiration for an individual.

* * * *

A SITUATION has now come to the light of day which has been more or less veiled since its inception last month.

Two of Boston's papers have used reviews of Boston Symphony concerts which were ~~unfavorable and~~ against which the members of the orchestra have risen up in indignation. In fact, they have sent the editor of one paper a message: "In view of the unwarranted, crude and hostile attack" on a guest conductor and "the continued slurs on the members of the orchestra, we have asked the Boston Symphony management not to welcome your critic to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults . . ." It was signed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association.

* * * *

THE DETAILS of the sequels don't need to be spread out here but pressure, threats and gloved persuasion have been used by many of the aggrieved parties. The air is full of protests against "unfair" reporting. In the area of musical criticism the matter resolves itself on the competence to judge and the ability to write of the man assigned by the newspaper to cover the events. Newspapers in the United States almost always give a music critic a byline, thereby absolving themselves from the opinions he may express. It would be a fair assumption that an editor chooses such a man to represent the paper with care, but once the responsibility is transferred, the critic has total authority and liberty.

There is no function of our life which cannot be abused. Steps to stop or alter such infractions are possible by many avenues, but to squeal as the Boston players are obviously doing is, in the first place, infra dignatatem, and in the second place, unjustified. Dickson writes that many a time when the orchestra has had a bad evening "we sneak back to our domiciles," but the next morning "we read a glowing account of a wonderful performance." He continues, "We also shrug our shoulders when we receive a bad notice of a good concert." He fails to cite the reaction of his fellows when the audience with an utter lack of discrimination goes wild over a mediocre performance.

* * * *

CRITICS HAVE never been any better. Performers have always had to suffer for the foibles and vagaries of the incumbent, but, until the editor chooses to replace him, there is little one can do. For the orchestra members to rise up and shout "UNFAIR" is astounding, and for the management and trustees to lend aid and support to the poor wounded is beyond belief.

In my longtime association with a newspaper no one in authority has ever said a single word to apply to the nature or the balance of a review, except "Make it short!" To report a performance of the Beethoven "Fifth" or of "Macbeth" is not quite like reporting a collision of two cars at an intersection, for even there a reporter must take care not to assign responsibility before the insurance companies enter the picture.

* * * *

THERE IS REASON to believe that the Boston critics, like those in any other city, know the orchestral literature as well as the conductors and probably better than most of the performers. Indeed, Dickson mentions the boredom of the violas, as an example, in playing the inner voices of the classics. And so when one of these self-appointed critics, as our vice president calls the political analysts, says something about a piece of music or a performance thereof, it warrants consideration and even, sometimes, respect. Would the orchestra like some sort of Dow-Jones applied to their performances? "The BSO closed down three points this evening." Or a comment mentioning that it had risen an equal number of notches?

It is a conceded fact that the umpires behind the plate are always blind, and it has long been maintained that music critics suffer almost the same degree of deafness as their analogous colleagues on the ball field. Maybe Dickson is right.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

DEC 6 1969

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

DEC 6 1969

Staid Boston Symphony at Odds With Music Critics

By JOHN H. FENTON
Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Dec. 5 — A long-simmering controversy involving the Boston Symphony orchestra and the music critics for the Boston newspapers has grown more acerbic.

The situation centers on what members of the orchestra have termed as "insulting and unethical assaults" on guest conductors. But it is exacerbated by the relationship that exists between the orchestra and its older devotees. It is almost like a family affair.

Many of those whose Friday afternoon or evening concert reservations have been handed down as legacies consider the orchestra an institution that should be immune from harsh criticism.

The critic of The Boston Globe, Michael Steinberg, is one object of the controversy. Mr. Steinberg's musical scholarship has not been questioned. But one source close to the orchestra said that Mr. Steinberg's style and manner displayed a "personal arrogance that becomes offensive."

Mr. Steinberg has sent a memorandum on the situation to critics on major newspapers around the country. Today, The Globe ran its version of the controversy, which the orchestra organization is believed to accept as a reasonably fair assessment.

The Globe carried excerpts of a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Association, an organization of symphony players, demanding that Mr. Steinberg be denied admission to concerts until he apologized for recent reviews. The story also included excerpts from letters from orchestra officials and one trustee to The Globe and to The Boston Herald Traveler, whose critic, a disciple of Mr. Steinberg, was replaced last week.

In a television appearance last night, Mr. Steinberg defended the right of George Gelles, the former Herald Traveler critic, to express his views.

Mr. Gelles, an honor graduate of Princeton University and a graduate student in music at Brandeis University, worked summers as a trainee at The Globe under Mr. Steinberg. He became The Herald Traveler music critic in September. He is still on the staff, but is not writing music criticism.

Thomas Winship, editor of The Globe, said that Mr. Steinberg was still his paper's music critic. In an official statement in today's editions, Mr. Winship said that the matter was being discussed by representatives of The Globe, Mr. Steinberg and officials of the orchestra, who, he said, "intend to handle it properly from the point of view of all concerned."

Harold E. Clancy, president and publisher of The Herald Traveler, said that he had been perusing Mr. Gelles's reviews for some time and that he had concluded before the matter became public that Mr. Gelles did not fill the bill.

"He indulged too frequently in personalities instead of music," Mr. Clancy said, "but some day, he should be a good critic."

Mr. Clancy said he had received two letters from persons associated with the orchestra after Mr. Gelles had been replaced. One was from the Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Episcopal Church in Boston and an orchestra trustee. The letter did not mention Dr. Ferris's position as a trustee and Mr. Clancy said he was not aware that the clergyman was, in fact, a trustee.

One article that brought the controversy to the boiling point came after Mr. Steinberg wrote a highly critical review of a performance by Carlo Maria Gilulini, a guest conductor.

Subsequently, Mr. Gelles, in The Herald Traveler, criticized Seiji Ozawa for what he termed an "inaccurate and indifferent" performance as a guest conductor. Mr. Ozawa is the orchestra's choice to conduct the summer festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshire hills next summer.

In his letter to Mr. Clancy, Dr. Ferris said that Mr. Steinberg had "chosen to write in such a tone of voice and to say things that are both unfair and rude, that major artists are reluctant to come to Boston and some have refused to come."

"Even more unfortunately," Dr. Ferris went on, "The Boston Herald has now entered into competition with The Globe by hiring one of his young imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge, but the same tone of voice."

Mr. Gelles, in a Sunday column for The Herald Traveler on Nov. 16, wrote: "If the critic is to be of any use to a community whatsoever, he has to be more than a mirror and mouthpiece of popular taste. What is the value of criticism if the critic is as easily satisfied as the average member of the audience?"

Grant for Longhair Light Show

By MILDRED HALL

WASHINGTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been given $50,000 for development of experimental videotaped orchestral programs using new color-and-light image techniques, and for exploring the market for such programs. The donor of this and other aid-money to music projects is the National Endowment for the Arts, which gave $50,000 grants to five major orchestras and other grants to the American Symphony Orchestra league, and touring companies.

If successful, the taped symphony - light - show programs could be one answer, through showings on CATV, Pay TV, via closed circuit, and in schools, to the money shortages for symphony orchestras—like the Capital's National Symphony which has faced financial collapse and musician strikes.

Since an innovative symphony and light show has a more sharply segmented audience appeal, it would probably not be acceptable to commercial TV stations and networks. But it could be syndicated for profitable special-audience use on the Community Antenna cable systems which can now originate their own programming (and show their own commercials). It might also find its way to a select audience on the nationwide Pay TV service which performers hope will go into operation in spite of some last-minute attempts to kill it in the House.

Other government grants of $50,000 to aid "innovative" music projects went to the Detroit Symphony Orchestra to develop inner city audiences among school-age children and adults, using black conductors, soloists and composers. New York Philharmonic got its $50,000 for support of the joint project with the Central Labor Council of the AFL-CIO to promote union-oriented audience support. Minnesota Orchestra of Minneapolis, and Atlanta Symphony received $50,000 grants for audience promotion by touring ensembles.

A special grant of $15,000 to the Carnegie Hall Corp. was made for a series of "Evenings for New Music," to present works of contemporary composers. A special grant of $40,000 went to the American Symphony Orchestra League headquartered in Virginia, to explore cooperation between community orchestras and majors, in this case between the St. Louis Symphony and the Kansas City Philharmonic.

Other grants in the music area included $75,000 to support touring programs to eleven states by the Utah, Denver and Phoenix Symphony orchestras, a ballet and repertory theater groups. Western Opera Theater (the San Francisco Opera touring company) was given $100,000 to put on performances in 10 states. The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra of Missouri was granted $9,100 to assist in tours of smaller communities in northeast coastal states.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

DEC 6 1969

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday at Academy.

Musical 'freedom' Offers Leinsdorf Best of two worlds

BOSTON.—Erich Leinsdorf was staying at the Ritz Carlton, a tourist again in the town where he had been the principal musical citizen for seven years. He was back for a dozen concerts with his old ensemble, the Boston Symphony, one of which will be Monday in Philadelphia's Academy of Music.

"I like being a tourist again," he opened. "Boston's a good town to visit."

Since he dropped the baton last August at Tanglewood, Leinsdorf has been a New York resident. He did take time for 15 operatic performances at the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires and three concerts with the Chicago Symphony, but he has been reordering his life within the looser structure of his new freedom from administrative duties.

'MUSIC IS MUSIC'

He ticked off a full year of concerts—Amsterdam, London, the Holland Festival and the Gulbenkian Festival in Lisbon, noting that his activity will be aimed mostly at concert as opposed to operatic adventures.

"I didn't really give up one for the other. You see that is the advantage of my new freedom. I think I would find my musical life rather poorer without both, because certainly you find things in opera you can't get in concerts and vice versa. I regret only that I don't get around to chamber music more. After all, music is music. You can't cut it up in little segments."

Continued on Page 5, Col. 2

Leinsdorf free agent

Continued from First Page

Part of his return to the BSO podium was spent in continuing a project he had launched while still music director.

"I like to do what I feel the recording companies could do more of, too—fill out the open spots, fill the niches in the music we know.

EXPLORING REPERTORY

"I'm not one to pull out every second-rate work and proclaim it a masterpiece. I'm not of the persuasion that every work that has been laid aside is unjustly neglected. But I do feel that Schoenberg, Berg, Webern, Bartok, the people who led us to the present, should be played more. In the concerts I'm giving here and at Philharmonic Hall, I'm doing half a program of Berg—The Altenberg Lieder, 'Wozzeck' excerpts and Berg's arrangement of three movements from the Lyric Suite. The Altenberg Lieder is a premiere here.

"This repertory is not fully explored. Even the neo-classical works of Stravinsky are not nearly well enough known. So I try to bring out these works; that was my campaign when I was music director. And I must say, no one ever suggested I was not free to choose my own programs here. No one ever slipped any mayonnaise into the programming; I have no complaints on that score.

"I always felt it was part of my duty to investigate problematical music. Take the original version of 'Fidelio' which I did at Tanglewood and will do in Lisbon for the Beethoven bicentennial. Everybody wants to do something a little original for that, but finding it is something else.

INTERESTED IN CHANGE

"People assume that the final version of a work is the best. I am equally interested in a work that has been changed because right away it shows it was a problematical work and that the composer probably changed it on the advice of well-meaning friends. It is certainly true with 'Tannhauser,' 'Boris,' the Webern Six Pieces, the Fourth Schumann, 'Don Carlo,' and so many others. Where there is a second version and a third, the third represents a compromise.

"The early 'Leonore' of Beethoven contains many fine things lost in the later versions. Of course the final 'Fidelio' has some magnificent things, but as in every revised work it has lost a little in the changes.

"This campaign is an aspect of my feelings about musical institutions, that the more complex our lives and institutions become, the more rigid they become. It becomes so hard to take the trolley down a new street, because it runs only where there are rails and the rails are hard to move.

MATTER OF PEOPLE

"I am arranging my schedule so that I will have several weeks free in the fall of 1970 to write a book on the institutions of the opera and the orchestras. They are in a state of crisis, not only finances, but with the audiences and the communities.

"In Amsterdam, a new work, commissioned by a well known recorder player, has been withdrawn from one of my programs. The composer was one of several who joined a protest against the programming policies of the Concertgebouw. When he would not withdraw his protest, then he felt he had to withdraw the piece and the commissioning artist then felt he had to withdraw from the idea. So you see, we're getting something like what happened on the Berkeley campus in the concert halls.

'It is a matter of people. The issues are not as harrassing as the people. Anyway, this is what I hope to be writing about.

"I've talked about playing more of the works of the great composers who brought us up to this minute. If you find out who will lead us out of this minute, please call me—collect," he laughed.

In Philadelphia Monday evening, Leinsdorf will lead the Bostonians in a Beethoven program, Symphony No. 6 in F major, "The Pastorale," and Symphony Nov. 3 in C minor, "The Eroica."

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458

DEC 7 1969

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

DEC 5 1969

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, December 8, 1969

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

DEC 7 1969

New England

'Poppycock,' Says Casals

Symphonies Headed for Shelf?

© N.Y. Times News Service

San Juan, Puerto Rico—Are symphony orchestras in trouble because of rising costs or because their programs have become dusty? Is it true, as Leonard Bernstein says, that conventional symphony concerts will inexorably become "museum pieces" for the young generation?

These questions were discussed here by five prominent conductors who participated at the annual festival directed by Pablo Casals, the cellist.

In separate interviews, William Steinberg, Yehudi Menuhin, Alexander Schneider, Sir John Barbirolli and Daniel Barenboim agreed that the outlook was not that bad.

They also decried as simplistic the alarm raised by numerous concert managers who contend that audiences are declining for fear of crime in the streets, competition with recordings and television, and dwindling interest in classical music among the young.

Though the conductors acknowledged the need to find new means of financing to meet the problem of expanded concert seasons, they rejected the view that America's symphony orchestras were in a state of acute crisis.

"All this yelling for help and these expressions of distress we've been hearing recently are absolutely not proper," Steinberg said.

The 69-year-old German-born conductor, who will become music director of the Boston Symphony this fall, in addition to continuing as head of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, said: "I know that there is a lot of speaking and a lot of writing about panic and I wish to state that my personal experience does not give any reason to alarm.

"Concerning attendance in Pittsburgh we have tried for years to keep the attention of the young by mixing the old and the new. In addition to Mozart and Beethoven we brought in the works of Bruckner, Mahler and Reger, which had been inexplicably neglected. This was done with equal success in our tours of New York and other cities, judging by the fact that we were always reengaged.

"Another example is that that we wrote out an inexpensive subscription for student tickets and it went like hot cakes."

Menuhin, the concert violinist, who in recent years branched out into conducting, saw the problems facing orchestras as centered more on the role of music in a technological society than on economics.

"There has been a tremendous increase in the knowledgeability of audiences," he said. "There has never been a younger generation as informed, as aware, not only of contemporary trends but also very often of archaic music and medieval music."

Daniel Barenboim, the 27-year-old pianist-conductor, who makes frequent world tours with his English chamber orchestra, spoke impatiently about the pessimists.

"Among them, I am sorry to say, are some of my colleagues, saying that the concert is dead and all that will exist is the gramophone and so on," he said. "This is completely wrong because this shows a complete misunderstanding of the basis and the essence of music."

"Because the fact is," he said, "that a great piece of Mozart and Beethoven is just as modern nowadays as it was in the 18th century and it only becomes like a museum piece when it is played as a museum piece."

The young Israeli said he also felt the time had arrived when instrumentalists in an orchestra should be given more opportunity to develop themselves as soloists by incorporating chamber music as part of the regular symphony programs.

"I couldn't agree more," said Alexander Schneider, the former second violinist of the Budapest Quartet, who has become one of the most vital forces of American chamber music. "If you have good programs and good performers there will always be an audience. It's stupid to think young people will keep away. But, of course, they must be stimulated."

Sir John Barbirolli, the English conductor, is convinced that nothing bridges the generation gap as the impact of "inspiring personalities," in music as in the other arts.

This was also the view of Casals. The 92-year-old Spanish-born cellist, who still teaches here and at the Marlboro Music Festival each summer in Marlboro, Vt., said:

"Young people are the ones who have kept music alive for they know what they like and respect the integrity of true performances. The great music of today is the great music of the past and they know it. But it must have personality. To say that young people are drawing away from it is poppycock."

Boston Schools Receive $180,000 Grant For Music Enrichment

Music education in the Boston Public Schools was given a tremendous boost recently with announcement of a $180,000 grant by the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for betterment of the musical interests of Boston pupils of Grades 5 through 7. The first results will be Youth Concerts on November 10 and 14 at Boston Symphony Hall for 5,200 pupils.

The grant will finance a series of three one-hour Youth Concerts for each of the next three years. In addition the grant will provide free, five-day, all expense trips next summer to Tanglewood in the Berkshires for 320 of those 5,200 concert goers.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and there the pupils, in weekly groups of 40, will be exposed to the full range of the performing arts through a program called "Day in the Arts." They will observe the symphony's performances, rehearsals and workshops, and visit neighboring festivals, such as the Berkshire Theatre and the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival.

Each Youth Concert will be specially tailored for the age groups involved and will be presented by 60 members of the Boston Symphony. A similar program was presented free to Boston pupils last year for the first time, sponsored by the Symphony's individual donors.

The year's series opened on Monday, at 10 a.m., with a program called "This is the Orchestra." It opens with Britten's Young Person's Guide to the Orchesrta, narrated by Andrew Raeburn and the program isolates each orchestra section, detailing its functions.

That first program was attended by 2,600 pupils of Grades 5 and 6 from the following schools: Bigelow, Brooks, Dearborn, Dudley, Dwight (Hurley) Emerson, Gibson, Heemnway, Howe, Jefferson, Lyman, Mackey, McCormack, Norcross, Russell and Winthrop.

The same program will be repeated at 10 a.m. on the following Friday, November 14, for 2,600 Grade 7 pupils of the following eleven junior high schools: Barnes, Curley, Dearborn, Edwards, Gavin, Holmes, King, Lewis, Michelangelo, Thompson and Timilty.

Each of the 2,600-pupil units will be treated to similar concerts on January 16 and 23, and on March 13 and 20. Selection of the schools to attend was influenced by the stated goals of the Kennedy grant which say. "Our aim is to reach children of Boston families who would rarely, if ever, have the opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performance.

EAST BOSTON
FREE PRESS
BOSTON, MASS.

DEC 4 1969

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Thursday, December 11, 1969

Buffalo Receives Small Share of Grants

Buffalo Evening News Bureau

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11 — The national endowment program for the arts, for which President Nixon is asking Congress to double its annual allotment, is already spending about $10-million a year, but not much has found its way into the Buffalo area.

The National Council on the Arts this week issued detailed expenditures from its launching in fiscal 1966 through October 1969.

Aside from lump sums to New York State, some of which may have filtered into the Buffalo area, the Queen City area showed [illegible] of Buffalo to prepare a book on the potential applications of new technologies on environmental design.

When a series of matching grants were made in 1968 for professional experimental theater development, Buffalo's Studio Arena Theater drew $15,000, a somewhat modest grant considering total outlays of nearly $1 million at the time, including $67,500 to the Tyrone Guthrie Theater in Minneapolis and $92,500 to the Long Wharf Theater in New Heaven, Conn.

No Buffalo area institutions were cut in on such programs as choreography, where grants ran up to $100,000; education, in which Fordham University received $71,780 among others; Baltimore ($1000;, New Oreleans Friends of Music ($900), the Boston Symphony Orchestra ($[illegible]) and Maryland's Montgomery County Youth Orchestra Association ($10,000).

$20 Million Sought

The National Endowment for the Arts spent $10,813,750 in fiscal 1969 and $8,995,000 is its budget for the current fiscal year. President Nixon is asking that $20-million be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1971

The endowment's role, according to its chairman, Miss Nancy Hanks, is to "aid and encourage the arts in America," while grants to individuals carry no matching provisions.

Grants to individuals generally were not made public so it is possible that other Buffalo talent shared in some of the allocations.

The Schenectady

Young Isrc

By RICHARD VINCENT

The Schenectady Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Anthony Pezzano, presented its second concert of the current season Friday night at Linton High School auditorium. The program consisted of "La Bonne Chanson" by Charles Loweffler, Prokofieff's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra, and, finally, Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major, the "Eroica". The soloist for the evening was the young Israeli violinist Sergiu Luca.

"La Bonne Chanson" which opened the program was written by the Alsatian-born Charles Loeffler, a violinist by trade who ultimately retired from active performing (as a first violin player on the Boston Symphony Orchestra) to devote the rest of his life to composition. His reputation remains relatively minor although, Friday night's example of his work was quite pleasant. When one considers that the word pleasant is the optimum accolade for this work it could explain his obscurity.

As one listened, echoes of more than one better known French Impressionist contemporary might be reliably identified. The work is episodic in nature, following in a general way the mood and content of Paul Verlan's fifth poem in this cycle, 'La Bonne Chanson". The work was well within the capabilities of the orchestra.

The featured work was Prokofieff's Violin Concerto No. 2 in G, Minor. Appearing as soloist was a young (25) Israeli violinist, Sergiu Luca, a former student of Ivan Galamian at the Curtis Institute of Music. With no further shilly shallying it must be stated that Mr. Luca is the genuine article, a fiddle player who is a real master of his instrument. The program 148.

Afternoon at the Symphony

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

Shortly before he died, Boston Symphony founder and lifetime mainstay Henry Lee Higginson wrote somewhat wistfully: "The people of Boston have a truly remarkable knowledge of music, and I think they have appreciated the efforts to establish one of the world's great orchestras here."

Mr. Higginson would have taken considerable pleasure in the ambience of both Symphony Hall and its longtime neighbor across the world, filled every corner yesterday.

Gregarious gourmets talked music over lunch—a lot of them had BSO fiddler Harry Ellis Dickson's just-out book which is already a best-seller. And many of them were not only heading for the Mozart and Bruckner of the afternoon, but an evening with the Civic Symphony whose new conductor, the BSO's Michel Sasson, got an ovation for his first CS concert.

No temperantalist, Michel dined leisurely with the Civic Symphony's trustees and guests between the afternoon symphony and the evening concert.

Sharing the Christmastide topiary trees and carnations at lunch before Symphony were concert patrons of many years like Mrs. Frank Allen and Mrs. John Palmer, who sat with Mrs. Thomas Perry, Mrs. Talcott Banks, wife of the president of the trustees, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, who brought in some of her own charming Christmas things to add to the festive setting.

Mrs. Hovey was thanked on all sides for carrying on the late Mrs. Edwin S. Webster's wonderful habit of filling her lighted Commonwealth Avenue conservatory with the most beautiful plants from her greenhouse. Mrs. Louis Cabot and Mrs Albert Goodhue, who've done so much to implement the Council's expansion program, were there, along with the usual clutch of Harvard and MIT musicmen—a good Boston afternoon and evening.

Mrs. Lewis Clark, left, and Mrs. Louis Cabot, at BSO luncheon at Horticultural Hall.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue pours a toast for Mrs. Frank Allen, center, wife of the former Massachusetts governor, and Mrs. John Palmer, at Council of Friends luncheon. (Charles Dixon photos)

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,987
DEC 8 1969

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Council of Friends of BSO Hold Season's First Luncheon

347

THE FIRST LUNCHEON of the season for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Horticultural Hall. These luncheons were so popular last year that they are being repeated and the next three will be held Jan. 9, Feb. 13 and April 24. There were red carnations on each luncheon table and swags of greens tied with red ribbon were hung on the walls. Behind the buffet table, gold stars of varying sizes were placed against a white background.

Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson are co-chairmen of the luncheon committee, which includes Mrs. George E. Bates, whose maxi-coat was much admired, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, whose red leather dress was belted with white to match her stockings, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Stanford M. Calderwood, Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Robert Kistner and Mrs. James F. Hunnewell.

Yesterday's luncheon was under the auspices of the members of the Weston, Wellesley, Wayland, Milton and South Shore areas and the hostesses included Mrs. Lyndall F. Carter, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. William D. Manice Jr., Mrs. Donald Babson, Mrs. Karl Adams, Mrs. Roger B. Hunt, Mrs. Edward Stimpson, Mrs. M. Allen Powning, Mrs. Allan R. Finlay and Mrs. Francis Devlin.

Also, Mrs. Stephen B. Ames, Mrs. Brewster Stetson, Mrs. Sherman Whipple, Mrs. William G. S. Harris, Mrs. Lewis W. Kane, Mrs. Robert Ross, Mrs. Mayo Shattuck, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. H. Starr Ballou, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy and Mrs. Richard F. Schanzle.

Mrs. Howard Davis, who is in charge of the sale of records made by the orchestra, was handing out order blanks and suggesting that records will make a welcome Christmas gift.

Among others at the luncheon were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Talcott Banks, Mrs. Carl Hauers, Mrs. Charles F. Eaton Jr., Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. Stephen Paine, Mrs. Laura Benedict, Mrs. Franklin Hoyt, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. John W. Teele, Mrs. Ellery Rogers, Mrs. Harold Keller and Mrs. Herbert W. Kelley.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 6 1969

SOCIETY
by Miriam Tod

Imagination and ingenuity are talents that some lucky people seem to be born with. Whatever the occasion they can always find a new idea or a fresh approach to make an event different and out of the ordinary, one that will be remembered for a long time to come.

Such a person is Mrs. Melvin Field of Cambridge. Artistic and celver, she is in constant demand as decorations chairman for various events for she never fails to think of something unusual and noteworthy for each one.

A good example of this was her decorations for the black tie dinner held at the Statler Hilton Hotel before the first of

While the patrons of the Civic Symphony Orchestra were enjoying dinner and the concert the Canadian Navy was giving a bangup reception aboard the aircraft carrier, HMCS Bonaventure at the South Boston Naval Annex. Together with her destroyer escorts Ottawa and Terranova she had arrived in Boston on Thursday morning, and by Friday evening the welcome-mat was out.

Like navies the world over the members of the Royal Canadian Navy are perfect hosts. They had dressed their ship with lights from stem to stern and even the ship's name "Bonaventure" had been brightly illuminated. However cold the wind was blowing off the harbor the warmth of the welcome more than made up for it.

Many of the officers at the party were already wearing the new green uniform of the integrated services of Canada. In the near future there will no longer be a separate army, navy and air force, but one single force all wearing the same uniform with only the buttons and the hat badge distinguishing to which branch of the services the wearer nominally belongs.

The wardroom with its mahogany panneled bar and brass foot rail fashioned after an English pub was filled with guests and the officers from the three ships. A ship's band played music for dancing and stewards circulated constantly taking orders for refreshments.

Admiral Joseph Wylie, commandant of the First Naval District was there, as was his Chief of Staff, Capt. Richard Belt and his wife. President of the Southeastern Massachusetts Council of the Navy League William Rothermel was chatting with the captain of the Bonaventure, Capt. James Cutts, sad that this would be the ship's last visit to the United States as it is due to be decommissioned next May. Bill Rothermel was telling friends that he hopes to have a maritime wine tasting party at the New England Aquarium for the members of the Southeastern Council of the Navy League in the not-too-distant future. Of Plymouth, Mrs. Mayo Shattuck of Hingham, Mrs. Stephen B. Ames of Milton and Mrs. Donald Babson of Wellesley.

Others at the luncheon were Mrs. Cyrus Brewer and Mrs. B. Gring Wallace of Cambridge who came together; Mrs. John Knowles; Mrs. Russell Robb of Concord; Mrs. Howland Walter; Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham; and Mrs. Howard Davis of Concord who is working hard on the sale of Boston Symphony Orchestra records that benefit both the orchestra and the Council of Friends.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 6 1969

Rose Walsh – Yule Lunch Grea

In a christmas setting of gold angels and bright stars, subscribers to Friday's first of four Pre-symphony Luncheons enjoyed well-served beef strogonoff, salad, aspic (in holiday colors), carrots, hot rolls, red wine and ice cream roll in Horticultural Hall.

No fuss or fuming over trying to hail a cab to get to the concert in time, either. The lovely ladies sauntered leisurely across the street to Symphony Hall to hear Erich Leinsdorf conduct a program of Mozart and Bruchner music.

South Shore, Weston, Wayland, Wellesley and Milton areas of the Council had arranged the opening luncheon, under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson. Mrs. Frank W. Whitty, and Mrs. Lewis H. Clark checked off reservations.

Other duties were carried out by Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. (co-chairmen of the Council); Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. George E. Bates, and Mrs. Howard W. Davis (who is the ardent promoter of sales of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings by mail to any part of the world which benefit the BSO through the Council).

Top dogs to the record-breaking number of 2164 more than double the 1044 entered in 1960) will compete handsomely at the 56th Eastern Dog Club Show Saturday, all day, in War Memorial Auditorium, Prudential Center. Percy Roberts of Noroton Heights, Ct., will judge the best-in-show.

The all-breeds, benched production will also feature the 34th annual obedience trials conducted by the New England Dog Training Club.

Largest entry in the five colorful specialty shows is the Colonial Afghan Hound Club's of 99, competing with the other specialties, Newfoundland Club of America, 81; Colonial Shetland Sheepdog Club, 71; Downeaster Belgian Sheepdog Club, 29, and Bulldog Club of New England, 29.

Led by the Dalmatian Club of Southern New England and Irish Setter Club of New England (both with 34 entries) other clubs supporting the entry of breeds in the show are Bay State Beagle Club with 26, and the Bay Colony Pomeranian Club, 11.

The popular Siberian Huskies have accounted for the second largest breed total of the show, 94 to be entered.

The last of the larger shows of the year, Eastern will be drawing the curtain of a decade that has seen a tremendous growth in the popularity of dog breeding and dog shows. Close to one million pure breds are now registered by the American Kennel Club.

"Science speaks the same language all over the world," Prof. Victor F. Weisskopf of MIT told members and guests of Friends of Switzerland at their monthly luncheon in the French and Adams Room of the Ritz Carlton.

The former director general of CERN in Geneva had deep concern about the bleak future of Science in America and talked about the European Center for Nuclear Research.

Substituting for president of the Friends, William Ebersol, Charles Mongan presided at the luncheon. Swiss Consul Dr. Freddy Homburger proposed a special toast for good will between our country and Switzerland, and another to honorary chairman, Prof. Jerome C. Hunsaker who will soon celebrate his 83rd birthday.

In the interested gathering were Mrs. Webb B. White, Mrs. Gardner Cox, Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, E. Anthony Kutten, Richard T. Murphy, Mrs. John Latshaw (guest of Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo); Mrs. David Skinner, Betty Gibson, the Gordon F. Kingsleys, Mrs. Stephen R. Casey, Mrs. Robert C. Dean (keenly interested in the Youth Concerts); Prof. George Freimarck, Dr. Richard Gott, Mrs. Richard W. Sears, Ellen Stillman, Mrs. Sherrer B. Wells, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Ralph F. Worden, among others.

Arthur Rubinstein will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 8, for the Youth Concerts, under the auspices of the Officers and Board of Directors of the important project, marking its 11th anniversary this season.

Proceeds from the famed pianist's only Boston performance in 1970 will help to continue the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson as well as continue to provide free scholarship tickets and commissioned works by young American composers. Mrs. Jaime Pena-Vera and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, head the benefit committee.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 8 1969

TOWNSMAN
ANDOVER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,350
DEC 11 1969

MUSIC LOVERS study list of Boston Symphony Orchestra records and tapes at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Rogers, where a Christmas Shopping Sale benefitted the Orchestra. The sale is still in progress, and gift records or tapes can be ordered, to be packaged and mailed free, by contacting Mrs. Hart Leavitt or Mrs. James Grew.

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 15,000

DEC 11 1969

Seattle
Post-Intelligencer
D. 206,733 SUN. 259,237

DEC 10 1969

ROLF STROMBERG

Grafmyre's Legal Eagles' Move Defended, Praised

Rock music and festivals devoted to it have picked up a bad name because of the inconsiderate behavior of a few kooks. These are the people who "do their own thing" regardless of place or circumstance. They reserve the right to themselves alone to decide what is legal and what isn't, which is a shade short of anarchy.

Lest we get started on something irrelevant, let it be known I would no more want to sit next to a drunk in the Opera House than to sit next to someone who's "stoned" at Eagles Auditorium. It is in Boyd Grafmyre's favor that he has taken steps to see that such practices as marred Woodstock West will not occur at Eagles.

Those who protest his decision are being short-sighted and even selfish; they really don't care that much about rock music at all. It's not the listening experience that intrigues them. Grafmyre said:

"We don't make up the laws; we just ask that people abide by them. We want to reassure our audience that there is no need to worry about being busted or hassled at Eagles if they abide by laws complied to in any other place of public assembly.

"For example, no longer is there the fear of having a purse stolen or being approached by persons dealing narcotics or annoyed by an intoxicated member of the audience . . .

"So that the rock music and relaxed atmosphere at Eagles Auditorium will continue, it must be understood that these rules are placed in effect to provide a safer, unhampered hall for rock concert patrons."

Illegal activity, if it became rampant, could cause a shutdown at Eagles. The new rules that Grafmyre has put into effect are relatively minor. So that young persons can go and enjoy the music in a worthwhile atmosphere the rules are necessary. Anybody who doesn't think so is living in Lotus Land.

An interesting development has occurred in Boston, according to the Associated Press. A recent report read as follows:

"A chord of dissonance has been struck between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and two of Boston's music critics. The Boston Globe said it received a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association (with) the players complaining about the 'unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Carlo Mario Giulini, and the continued slurs on members of the orchestra.'

"Earlier, The Globe said, the members association sent a telegram to symphony trustees urging them 'not to welcome Michael Steinberg (Globe critic) until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism.'

"The Globe also said that sources at The Boston Herald Traveler reported that music critic George Gelles 'had been removed by the paper's publisher from his music-review assignments' and since that time 'his byline has not appeared over any music review . . .'

"Steinberg said his reviews over the past three years have been 'about 40 per cent favorable and 35 per cent mixed but generally favorable.' The Globe said a letter from Talbott M. Banks, president of the BSO trustees, criticized Steinberg's 'undisciplined and irresponsible' reviews that were doing 'real injury to the music life of Boston.' "

Ahhh, even in the supposedly rational Athens of America does disharmony arise. What would those people have done if they had had Claudia Cassidy, in her prime, writing about the Boston Symphony? When she worked for the Chicago Tribune, she could be harsh when displeased.

There were concert artists and conductors who refused to appear with the Chicago Symphony as long as she reviewed the performances. But there were two things about Miss Cassidy that were always obvious: She was unfailingly honest and she spoke her mind.

How many times have you paid for tickets to a musical performance in some of those smaller towns where the reviewer toadies for the orchestra, expecting to hear something fine from the review only to discover it was anything but? Those reviews are a disservice to audience and orchestra.

Maybe the Boston Symphony should try arbitration. Let's see, what was that outspoken fellow's name? Hmmm, Spiro something.

The Herald Suspends A Music Critic: Why?

By LAURA SHAPIRO

Most people don't tear open their morning newspapers in panting search for the music reviews unless they were actually playing second clarinet the night before. During the past few weeks, however, a spate of controversy has thrown unexpected attention upon the criticism of music, most lately as it is practiced in one of Boston's leading newspapers, the Herald. In its issue of November 30 the Herald carried no review of the previous afternoon's BSO concert (probably for the first time in the life of anyone you know who reads the Herald; and according to a recent survey anyone you know who reads the Herald has very likely been around for half a century or so.) Behind this departure lurks a dark confusion of rumors, denials, opinions, hints and guesses; and a step behind that sits twenty-seven year old George Gelles, former music critic for the Boston Herald, who now says with only half a smile that his typewriter has been wired to give off an electric shock when he hits the final c of "music."

The story of his "suspension" can be handled from any (or all) of three sides: Gelles' own, the public's, and the Herald's. According to the critic himself he's been "banished to the cultural fringes." Gelles has been working for the Herald since September; previously he has studied music and musicology at Julliard Prep, Manhattan School of Music, Princeton, Tanglewood, Brandeis and the Free University of Berlin. During his graduate years at Brandeis he wrote for the Boston Globe, working as a stringer for critic Michael Steinberg; and last year he was music critic for the Record-American. Before being hired at the Herald, Gelles "auditioned" for three weeks; so as he points out, his work has been seen in Boston for several years now and the Herald knew exactly what it was getting.

What it was getting was a style of criticism that some music-lovers call rigorous, perceptive and ultimately beneficial, and other music-lovers call harsh, narrow and destructive. From readers of the Herald, Gelles received generally favorable comment, he says, until his first review of a Boston Symphony concert conducted by Carlo Maria Giulini, in which he was very harsh (or perceptive) indeed. "After that I got a lot of flak from the ladies," he recalls. "I expected this, since the Herald criticism has been low-key for so many years. I enjoy these letters I get from the people. They've been shocked out of their complacency. At least they're thinking about what they've heard, and that's part of my function."

The Giulini review was followed by several others in the same controversial vein; then, Gelles says, on Friday, November 29, he was told by his immediate superior, drama critic Sam Hirsch, that he was "not up to the publisher's standards of a music critic." The Herald did not "fire" him, the word was "suspended;" and Gelles has been redirected towards other artistic events in the city at which not a note of music is expected. One mysterious or at least discordant sound in the affair is that neither the publisher nor anyone else at the Herald had expressed any previous displeasure or issued any previous warning to him. In suspending him, Hirsch "pointed to no reviews, said nothing, gave no explanation at all," Gelles says.

The members of the public who figure most prominently here happen to be on the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony, although the Board as a whole played no official part, and neither did the orchestra or its management. The names of several Bostonians active in the business and cultural life of the city have been mentioned in connetion with letters and telephone calls received by Hal Clancy, publisher of the Herald, pertaining to Gelles' work; none are substantiated except for that of the Rev. Theodore Ferris. Rev. Ferris wrote a letter to Clancy, sending a carbon to the Globe, in which he deplored the "tone of voice" used by Michael Steinberg and by Gelles. Steinberg, he said, was "highly qualified" to write about music but unfortunately did it in such a way that "major artists are reluctant to come to Boston." Gelles, on the other hand, he considered to have none of Steinberg's knowledge but all of his style. He went on to regret that the Herald seemed to have entered into competition with the Globe on this count; and stated finally that although he had given up the expectation that the Globe might change, perhaps the Herald was in a position to change its course.

The reaction to Gelles' suspension in Symphony Hall was described by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as "sheepish delight." "I'm ashamed of it, frankly," he told me, "but it's a natural reaction. This type of criticism has a detrimental effect on the whole scene." He did take exception to Rev. Ferris' letter, calling it undue pressure on the Herald. "I blew up at the Hall about it. Nobody is asking the press to be silent. George is intelligent and he's a good writer. Because of the atmosphere created by Steinberg, in order to get any kind of readership, his reviews had to be sharply delineated. In trying to make an impact he overstepped. The Herald didn't want to ruffle any feathers, the Herald is very concerned about its readership now. George is maybe being hanged for Michael's sins."

Unlike the Steinberg issue, in which the BSO made the Globe critic officially unwelcome at its concerts in reaction to what the members felt was an insulting description of Giulini, the Symphony was involved in no special protest against Gelles. Although feeling is strong in the Orchestra that his brand of criticism is destructive, many of the players have known him since his Tanglewood years and respect his knowledge and work.

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not honored with that position for reasons of their musicianship, but most carry a considerable amount of influence on the musical life here. Most, of course, are businessmen, concerned with the large deficit that the BSO runs every year, and with the diminishing audience in Symphony Hall. Whether this concern justifies their influence is a matter of debate, and the hottest debaters right now can be found in the offices of the Herald. The issue at the Herald centers less on music than on freedom of the press in general, and the freedom of individual writers in specific.

Mr. Clancy would not make himself available for comment to me, nor would his assistant, nor would his Managing Editor. Sam Hirsch had a professional reason for offering no statement: "I wouldn't release anything," he told me over the telephone, "and certainly not to the Cambridge Phoenix." I asked him why, and he referred to a short article in a recent issue of the Phoenix, describing an "anti-war gesture" on the part of the National Shakespeare Company. The Company is sponsored locally by the Herald and the article noted "a howl of indignation" from the newspaper and "a shouting match with Sam Hirsch." "I've never seen anything so full of inaccuracies," Hirsch said.

I invited him to specify the inaccuracies in a letter to this paper's publisher and assured him we would do our best to establish the truth of the matter and print it. Hirsch was not happy with this offer, and made unkind remarks about the professional policies of the Phoenix. I reminded him that in any case I had had nothing to do with the offensive article, that my domain was music and I was anxious to put forth the Herald's position fully and truthfully and thus avoid any inaccuracies myself. "There's nothing to discuss," Hirsch elaborated.

Other sources at the Herald are of a different mind and feel that there is a great deal to discuss. I spoke to several writers, all of whom had heard similar but vague reports and rumors concerning Gelles' suspension. They seemed convinced that pressure had been exerted by one or more BSO trustees and that this pressure consisted in part of implicit threats from advertisers. "You don't have to put things in writing," one told me. "When certain people call and say hello, that's enough." The highest members of the Herald are evidently no more open to their own employees than they are to questioners from the outside. Many writers expressed an air of mystery surrounding the affair. "I'm not satisfied that everything is known," one remarked. "A lot of people aren't too happy about the way the events were triggered outside the building, and how they were handled inside."

I was also told that the pressure on Gelles was not an isolated instance, and that in various subtle ways the supremacy of the advertiser makes itself known. Long or detailed reviews of events by organizations that don't advertise in the Herald rarely are seen in its pages, according to some staff members, nor are many of the cultural activities at Boston University, where formerly Hirsch was employed. In another, more familiar category, an article about a rock concert, which emphasized the fact that the police lent an oppressive atmosphere to the evening by beating up a collection of Hell's Angels, came back to the writer marked "propaganda" and "inflammatory."

If these reports are true they indicate a serious and ugly system of priorities in the handling of the news. Gelles seems to have a good deal of support at the Herald from those who are concerned with the implications of his story. I too would be extremely disappointed to find that in fact the peaceful realm of music had been thrown open to the ravaging claws of the real world.

"A lot of people aren't too happy about the way the events were triggered outside the building, and how they were handled inside."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

DEC 11 1969

149.

the lively world

by MILTON R. BASS

THERE HAS BEEN a great stirring in our state capital of late because some citizens, disguised as critics, dumped a bunch of musicians in the harbor after refusing to pay a homage tax. The musicians declared war and we are now embroiled in a revolution that has been dubbed "The Boston T, Party of the First Part versus Secondary Figures and Sundries." It's not much of a title but then it isn't a very big war.

* * *

IT IS NOT well known that Tanglewood is not the only place where the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds concerts. It also plays a few in Boston in a fortress called Symphony Hall that is guarded by little old ladies who played tennis with Chopin and Brahms in their younger days.

The critic for the Boston Globe is named Michael Steinberg and he writes sharply about flats. So sharply, in fact, that a steady rage has been building among the musicians, management and trustees of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Steinberg, however, has a loyal following among young adults; the Boston Globe has a strong sense of integrity as well as a strong bank balance; and there has been no diminution of his candid appraisals of BSO concerts, personnel and guests.

* * *

THE MUSIC critic for the Boston Herald has been a young man named George Gelles, who cut his teeth under the tutelage of Mr. Steinberg. He is not as acerbic as Mr. Steinberg, but being a Princeton man, he does have his moments of stark truth. He has not had time to build a loyal following, the Boston Herald is not as secure as the Globe, and as a result Mr. Gelles is no longer music critic for the Herald. Mr. Steinberg, in a white paper to the press throughout the country, said that Mr. Gelles had been sacrificed as a result of pressures brought on the Herald by BSO trustees, some of whom also happen to be advertisers. The inference all around is that the BSO tried to "get" Steinberg but settled for Gelles.

* * *

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS right now are in the throes of disintegration. The Ford Foundation grants of a few years ago, which supposedly were going to put them on a secure basis, have only succeeded in putting the symphonies in a more precarious position. The musicians, who had been grossly underpaid for years, demanded and got substantial raises. This ate up most of the grants. Meanwhile, other costs were skyrocketing while Symphony Hall remained the same size and, consequently, could not take in much more income through tickets. Unlike other corporations, the BSO could not become a conglomerate that would increase its income from subsidiary companies. People started talking about the end of an era.

This made the musicians nervous. Musicians are nervous to begin with, middle with and end with. They like everybody but they do make exceptions of those who do not think they are the greatest musicians in the world. They are nervous, excitable and tend to brood. The problem is that like everybody else in the arts, they have a great deal of time to brood. Even while they are warming up before a concert, they are sitting there staring into space and hating the man in the chair ahead, the chair on the side and the chair behind.

* * *

THEY NEVER READ critics because critics don't know what the hell they are writing about, and they will quote you word for word from any review that has mentioned anything to do with them. Therefore, even though they never read Messrs. Steinberg or Gelles, they know every knock these two have delivered and they want apologies and revenge and blood and good reviews in the future.

The pressure has been building for a long time in the BSO as Munch retired and Leinsdorf quit and Steinberg (the conducting one) took over as interim pope. The orchestra is all mixed up as to where the future lies. They want a loving father of a conductor who will take over all the responsibilities and keep them safe and warm and protected. And they don't want any critics yapping at them about their musical qualities, which they are somewhat unsure of themselves right now.

* * *

AND THE LITTLE old ladies, the ones who have been going to Symphony Hall every Friday afternoon since time began, want their music like the tea they order from S. S. Pierce — exactly the same as it always has been. They don't want any nasty critics carping about Brahms and Beethoven and Mozart on the programs. They don't want any bing-bong-bang music or any wild young conductors. They want the BSO led by Richard Nixon.

The trustees and management are worried about where the next dollar is coming from, and they don't want any dissonances from the sidelines. Everybody agrees that a symphony orchestra is a great thing so why endanger it with adverse criticism. We should all pitch in and carry on and pip pip, the orchestra forever.

* * *

MEANWHILE, back at the newspapers, the critics are worried about their bosses backing them up and their integrity. Critics aren't allowed to deviate from perfection; they must always be balanced and good and right. Right means writing reviews that the people being reviewed approve of. Which means writing complimentary reviews. Because no matter what they say, people being reviewed only want nice things said about them.

And that's how the situation stands in Boston right now. It's a tempest in a teapot to everybody but those intimately concerned. To them it's a war. And in a war people get killed.

A partial reprint of this is on page 162

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(D) 6,500

DEC 17 1969

Lively World

Critics Tangle With Boston Symphony

By MILTON R. BASS

THERE HAS BEEN a great stirring in Boston of late because some citizens, disguised as critics, dumped a bunch of

IT IS NOT well known that Tanglewood is not the only place where the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds concerts. It

Steinberg, in a white paper to the press throughout the country, said that Mr. Gelles had been sacrificed as a result of 150

The BSO Controversy

Turning Criticism on the Critics

By Peter M. Knapp

"Please do not shoot the pianist. He is doing his best." Sign in America noted by Oscar Wilde.

"Please do not shoot the music critic. He only wants the best." Sign now pertinent to Boston.

At times, music critics may sincerely wish to shoot the pianist, or the conductor, or the errant soprano. Instead, they sublimate their feelings into words — often harsh words — expressing their displeasure.

And at times the pianist, or the conductor, or the soprano, would like to reply in kind to the critic.

This is what is happening now in Boston. Critics and musicians have been at one another's throats since the beginning of written commentary. But the usual wrangle in Boston is getting exceptionally sharp in a series of episodes which may have lamentable consequences for the Hub's musical community.

Already there has been one casualty: George Gelles, who has been removed as music critic of the Boston Herald Traveler. But the real target of critcs of the critics undoubtedly is Michael Steinberg of The Boston Globe.

Critical Problem

The controversy is over whether criticism of Boston Symphony performances has been unfair and destructive, or fair comment, part of a critic's right to reach independent judgments and express strong opinions in strong language. It has much to do with sensitivity, use of language, probably the concern that an institution itself, rather than individual artists, is under attack.

Beyond the counter-attack on the critics is the inevitable damage to Boston's musical affairs the squabble will wreak, as allegations are made on the one hand of attempted intimidation of the press by the BSO establishment, and on the other hand of insulting and ungentlemanly press reviews.

It comes at a time of particular stress for the Boston Symphony — concerns over money (shared with all major American orchestras); the end of the contentious Erich Leinsdorf years and the search for a permanent conductor while William Steinberg serves as a respectable interim music director; the new era at Tanglewood with its shared directorate of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, with Leonard Bernstein as adviser, replacing one-man rule by the BSO music director.

It is a period of major decisions for the Boston Symphony as an institution, and collectively it seems in no mood to tolerate tart criticism — especially when the recent targets include one guest conductor highly regarded by the orchestra, Carlo Maria Giulini, and one of the Tanglewood directors: Ozawa.

Irritating A Sore Spot

But it is not a new controversy. Its roots go back to Steinberg's first season as a Globe critic. The most knowledgeable of Boston's critics, he is also the most caustic and the musicians have resented it.

For example, Harry Ellis Dickson, BSO violinist and assistant conductor of the Pops, considers music critics "an unnecessary evil" and in his recent book, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" has this to say about Steinberg: "When he was once asked why he found it necessary to be so vicious, (Steinberg) replied, 'Music critics are supposed to be policemen of the musical standards of a community, and sheep make bad policemen.' 'Agreed,' I said, 'but do tigers make better policemen?' He smiled solicitously."

On Dec. 3, Dickson sharpened his attack on Boston critics, calling them in a luncheon speech "personally vindictive and smart-alecky." Critics who preceded them were "respectable connoisseurs," he said, who brought to the public "in a respectable way their considered opinions." Dickson said the present group's music criticism is destructive and "attacks established artists without regard for good taste or human decency."

That's one point of view, and Dickson is not alone in holding it, as events have demonstrated. There is another viewpoint which says, in effect, that professional musicians — like politicians, perhaps, or writers, or baseball managers — are public figures and are fair game for public commentary on their performances as artists.

The critic in a big league musical city like Boston does not have to act as a cheerleader; he should be able to express his opinions forcefully. When critics praise performances and artists, there are no repercussions; when the critics bite, the performer, being human, is likely to take it as a personal attack on his artistic integrity.

Words Of Wisdom

It is a question of degree, of course. And again it is nothing new. The waspish George Bernard Shaw, as an active newspaper music critic in London, had this to say in 1891: "People have pointed out evidences of personal feeling in my notices as if they were accusing me of a misdemeanor, not knowing that a criticism written without personal feeling is not worth reading. It is the capacity for making good or bad art a personal matter that makes a man a critic.

"The artist who accounts for my disparagement by alleging personal animosity on my part is quite right: when people do less than their best, and do that less at once badly and self-complacently, I hate them, loathe them, detest them, long to tear them limb from limb and strew them in gobbets about the stage or platform . . .

"In the same way, really fine artists inspire me with the warmest personal regard, which I gratify in writing my notices without the smallest reference to such monstrous conceits as justice, impartiality, and the rest of the ideals."

There you have the other side of the story, the feeling that a critic should not be a complacent tabby-cat, merely purring with content or perhaps uttering an occasional rumble, but personally committed, willing to snarl and hiss at artists falling short of their own, or the critic's musical standards.

Gentlemen's Agreement

The current dispute in Boston escalated when Steinberg was strongly critical of guest conductor Carlo Maria Giulini's Nov. 7 program (as was this writer in a review of the Nov. 11 concert, which called Giulini's direction of Brahms' Symphony No. 4 "good theater but dismal Brahms — a performance so curiously overwrought as to be memorable for its extremes;" but was generally favorable of the rest of the program).

After Steinberg's review appeared, the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association in a telegram urged Symphony trustees "not to welcome Michael Steinberg to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism." A similar telegram was dispatched to The Globe.

On Nov. 11, BSO Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. replied in part to the orchestra members: "The management, like the players, is offended by the immoderate and unwarranted tone of The Globe critic's writing and by its persistent negativism." (Steinberg has rejected this charge, saying that "looking over my reviews of the past three years I find that about 40 per cent were wholly favorable and 35 per cent were mixed but generally favorable." And Steinberg has not restricted either his praise or panning to the BSO, of course.)

Hail Storm In The Mail

On Nov. 19, the Globe received another critical letter from Talcott M. Banks president of the symphony Board of Trustees. There followed another letter sent to Harold E. Clancy, publisher of the Boston Herald-Traveler, with a copy sent to The Globe, by the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church and another symphony trustee. The Rev. Mr. Ferris' letter criticized Steinberg and said he deplored the Herald Traveler's hiring "one of his imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge but the same tone of voice."

Gelles, 27, attended Juilliard Preparatory School and the Manhattan School of Music for two years, and graduated cum laude from Princeton with a degree in musicology. He did graduate work in musicology at Brandeis under a Woodrow Wilson Fellowship, and also studied at the Free University of West Berlin under a German Government grant.

During the summer of 1960, Gelles was the youngest student at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, studying French horn. While at Brandeis, he wrote music reviews as a stringer for The Boston Globe assisting Steinberg. Previously the critic for the Boston Record-American, Gelles came to the Herald Traveler in September.

Gelles was sacked as Herald Traveler music critic following a review published Nov. 22 of Seiji Ozawa's second program as guest conductor. Gelles wrote that Ozawa "has shrunk from a lightweight with charm and a real elegance to a conductor whose performances are technically inaccurate and emotionally indifferent."

Benefit Of The Doubt

Herald Traveler Publisher Clancy denies that he removed his critic as the result of protests or pressures from symphony trustees, and the charge at this point seems unprovable. "He indulged too frequently in personalities instead of music," Clancy told the New York Times. Gelles is still on the Herald Traveler staff as a cultural reporter, excluding music.

The fact remains that officials of the Boston Symphony retaliated against criticism. Whether this was cause and effect of Gelles' removal, it gives the appearance of being so, and of having Gelles shot down by bullets ricocheting off Steinberg.

Personally, I do not subscribe to the view that a music critic, or a theater critic, or an art critic, ought to set himself up as the cultural watchdog of the community. A review is, or ought to be, one person's informed opinion as to the artistic merits of a performance, and nothing more or less. Readers, whether they be the performers or members of the public, should recognize a critic's work as one listener's opinion and not as the ultimate judgment.

A critic has the responsibility to be enlightened and stimulating; he has the right to be controversial if he wishes. In turn, he must expect criticism of what he has written. Both sides should be able to take it without resorting to unusual tactics.

In short, if critics are to desist from shooting the pianist, the pianist in turn should not shoot the critics.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

DEC 12 1969

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

He stings

Two recent events have launched the now stale but still seasonal barrage against the Globe's music critic. First an indirect referral by Harry "Spiro" Dickson in a recent speech, and then an alleged backstage coup by the B.S.O. itself involving the Globe's gratis ticket.

The allegations of personal vindictiveness and obtrusive arrogance are arguably valid. But in terms of composite performance, Michael Steinberg is a generally favorable critic. More importantly though, he possesses the rare faculty among music critics of being able to construct an intelligible sentence. Steinberg stings because you know what he's said. He doesn't rehash the perennial verbal intangibles of the non-reviews which are imposed on readers by even the most noted critics.

Perhaps most revealing is that when his opinions collide with my own, I am generally motivated to reinvestigate the area of conflict. That's good music criticism.

RANDOLPH NICHOLS
Boston

Caustic, ungenerous

For many years I have enjoyed listening to the music of our Boston Symphony Orchestra. The enthusiastic approval and applause which its performances always evoke are in sharp contrast to the evaluations so often enunciated by your Michael Steinberg in his caustic, ungenerous reviews. This non-performing musicologist seems bent only on destruction. It is outrageous that any distinguished performing artists should be subjected to such vicious attacks as appear in your columns in the guise of critical reviews. I am tempted to add that I wonder how a critic can be considered musically perceptive who is so imperceptive to the harsh, unmusical quality of his own writing.

HAZEL WEBSTER
Concord

'Proper and noble role . . .'

I am utterly shocked by the current campaign against Michael Steinberg of The Globe and George Gelles of The Herald . . .

I think I have a right to speak forth on this matter, since I have been very close to newspapering for many years and have also over a long period taught an advanced course in the History and Practice of Music Criticism . . .

The fact is that the Boston Symphony was once not only the finest orchestra in the country but also the finest in the world. In recent years the Symphony has been rather consistently outplayed by three other American orchestras — and some would say four. The powers-that-be should have taken steps to ameliorate this situation instead of petulantly blasting the critics who quite accurately pointed out the orchestra's shortcomings. One need not, of course, necessarily agree with every evaluation of each work; but I have heard every Boston Symphony program this season, and both your Michael Steinberg and The Herald's George Gelles have done their jobs admirably.

Critics should be encouraged to express their judgments with candor and forthrightness — even bluntness and humor, if this is to their taste (short of libel, of course). And if they thereby become "controversial," fine! Publishers and editors should welcome this: it is good for the musical life of the city; and it is good for the newspapers, for it means that they are being read and talked about. Criticism is worthless if it is not read. And if people think that Steinberg and Gelles are too strong, they ought to read the reviews of, say, Bernard Shaw and Virgil Thomson, two of the greatest music critics of all time.

Music in Boston received a much-needed shot in the arm with your acquisition of Steinberg in 1964; and his achievement here was appropriately signalized last year, as you know, when he won a huge prize for his criticism. Then, this Fall, things looked up still more when The Herald had the good sense to entice Gelles away from The Record American, where his talents went largely wasted. Do you realize what this meant? This made Boston the only city in the country with two fine daily critics at work. Even The New York Times's stable of music critics has no one who matches either of them. And then the Herald precipitately reduced the number to one again. I ardently hope I am right in assuming that The Globe will not follow suit and succumb to similar gutlessness and spinelessness. . . .

If you are really serious about the proper and noble role of criticism in daily journalism, you will see to it that Michael Steinberg continues right on in his accustomed way, with full authorization to call the shots as he sees them.

PROF. CALDWELL TITCOMB
Brandeis University
School of Creative Arts
Waltham

Is all in order?

The controversy over Globe music critic Michael Steinberg points up an obvious omission: well balanced reporting in Boston on musical events — especially concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Neither the Globe nor Mr. Steinberg should bear the brunt of the criticism. Although the B.S.O. may be partially justified in their cry of crucifixion, it is the people of Boston, readers of your paper and concert-goers, who have allowed the situation to stagnate.

Further, it is perhaps paradoxical that after years of unfavorable reviews by your paper while the orchestra was under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, now the hue and cry is raised, only a couple of months following Mr. Leinsdorf's departure from Boston. I suggest that if charges of partiality, partisanship or axe-grinding be leveled against Mr. Steinberg and the Globe, the staff and management of the Boston Symphony might well look over their own residence at 251 Huntington av. to make sure all is in order.

NATHANIEL S. JOHNSON
Brighton

Nit-picking

I have had enough of Michael Steinberg. I have had enough of his viciousness, his pseudo-intellectuality, his nit-picking pedantry and his irrelevance.

The Dec. 7 concert is a case in point. The Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Ensemble opened its concert series with an excellent program presented in Sanders Theater on a Sunday afternoon. The performances were exceptionally fine and attended by perhaps 100 people. Now in my experience with this particular series, these chamber music concerts, perhaps the best in Boston, are characterized by two facts: their consistently high quality and their consistently small audiences. I have never understood this strange combination until a friend informed me that Michael Steinberg has reviewed them unfavorably for some time, and then again when I myself read Mr. Steinberg's incredible review.

Mr. Steinberg is entitled to any opinion he may have, intelligent or not. Nevertheless, we in Boston who have been privileged to hear the Chamber Ensemble concerts are in danger of losing them due to lack of public support. Frankly, after last year's attendance patterns, I was afraid the ensemble would not be playing again this year and noted the new series with considerable joy and relief. And yet I cannot see performances attended by 100 people as a phenomenon that will be repeated indefinitely. . . .

JANET R. BERKENFIELD
Allston

During the past two weeks The Globe has received 24 letters relating to its music critic, Michael Steinberg, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of these, 14 backed Mr. Steinberg and 10 opposed him.

Patently biased

At last the irritation experienced by so many of your readers at Michael Steinberg for the supercilious attitude which he so often manifests in his reviews of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has erupted in your own columns.

There is no question that in the long run such persistently negative and patiently biased writings can prove damaging to the reputation of even as fine an organization as the B.S.O., especially in the minds of people who are only distantly interested.

Such continued disparagement must certainly affect the sale of recordings, for one things, and eventually the support given the orchestra itself by the general public.

I have enjoyed reading music criticism for many years, but have felt cheated most of the time when I have perused the reviews of Mr. Steinberg, despite his acknowledged erudition as a musicologist. I sometimes wonder if it is that he doesn't like music less, but Michael Steinberg more.

RENE H. GINGRAS
Lynn

Acid but interesting

If it is agreed that Michael Steinberg's reviews are sometimes too acid, it must also be agreed that they are always interesting and informative. They should not be watered down. The Boston music public I think has learned to take them with a grain of salt, and will continue to do so in the future. Better this than trivial pap.

WAYNE H. SHERWOOD
Cambridge

More suitable

I write to indicate my enthusiastic support for the position articulated in an article in the Dec. 5 Globe by Mr Perry, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His article is critical of Michael Steinberg, music critic of your paper. I sincerly hope that The Globe will find a more suitable music critic who will better serve the best interests of music in this area.

FRANCIS O. SCHMITT
Brookline

GLOBE MAN'S DAILY STORY

A Boston girl newly arrived in San Francisco, on assignment with the OED, got a real shock when coworkers invited her out to a local nightclub. "Come on," they said, "you might win a prize. It's amateur topless night."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 13 1969

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,340
DEC 14 1969 New England

157

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Boston Symphony Orchestra is firing back at its critics

WHAT ARE A critic's functions? Obviously there is no quick, easy answer to such a question. At the same time there have to be standards critics should subscribe to, and standards the subjects of their writing should subscribe to.

The reason the matter comes up right now, after all these years of talking about it, is the great flap going on in Boston during past weeks. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its 88th season and presumably mature enough to be above it all, has acted like Goliath and taken up cudgels against not one but two local Davids, or music critics.

In truth, the orchestra has only permitted itself to act the monster. A group of its players, probably as anti-Philistine as any, became very upset over Boston Globe music critic Michael Steinberg's review of a concert conducted by Carlo Maria Giulini.

The review happened to be quite funny in part. Steinberg said if Victor Borge or Danny Kaye had conducted the same Brahms fourth symphony he heard Giulini conduct, the audience would have been in stitches.

Now, the players are reportedly fond of Giulini. They sent a telegram of complaint to the Globe, requesting an apology from Steinberg. That was their right.

Two weeks later George Gelles, then music critic for the Herald Traveler, was less than enchanted by a Boston Symphony, all-Stravinsky concert conducted by Seiji Ozawa. With this, orchestra trustees got into the act, one the rector of Boston's Trinity Church.

The upshot of that intervention was the removal of Gelles from his critic's function at the Herald Traveler. By this time the whole world knows of the tempest, thanks to Steinberg's friendship and championing of a younger associate. Steinberg has communicated with music critics everywhere on the affair.

What the outcome will be for Gelles, Steinberg, the Boston press and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ultimately is tomorrow's story. Likely nothing will change very much. But the situation does suggest returning to the first, old question.

Critics are called upon to be honest; to write intelligently from a base of experience and knowledge. You might add taste, as well, and individuality. They do not, by law, have to be humble. They can be, in the right sense, opinionated.

A fly in the ointment is found in one word—distance. A critic with the above attributes, writing from East Lansing, Michigan, can say what he pleases about the New York Philharmonic without anticipating retribution. A New York critic cannot, nor, as we have seen, can a Boston critic reporting his own neighborhood.

Naturally "what he pleases" means various things. It can and sometimes does mean writing in a contemptuous manner. Reasonably, he can be caustic and not contemptuous.

Yet it should mean reporting accurately what the critic hears in a performance or in the music itself, preferably using a distinct style. And devil take the hindmost.

One thing people, some critics included, forget is that critics most frequently do have enthusiasm for their experience and knowledge. You might add taste, as well, and individuality. They do not, by law, have to be humble. They can be, in the right sense, opinionated.

This presents enormous problems. The enthusiastic music critic can be absolutely turned on by the joy of a performance. On the other hand, anticipation produced by enthusiasm quickly turns to disappointment, if not depression, when performances do not live up to expectation.

There is nothing worse, let me tell you, than that kind of depression. And if a group of professional musicians plays consistently off key, and looks pleased about it to boot, a critic has little left to do but say so.

Of course he must, in fairness, apply double or even triple standards. Inexperienced musicians, students, beginners, what have you, have to be measured to the extent of their development. There are middle-ground musicians, launched on careers, too, whose performance values are treated slightly more objectively, yet in a tone that will not frustrate or inhibit further development.

Then there are the big guns. They enter the scene fully publicized in all their glamour. They are big boys and girls now, whether they are individuals whose technique has outlived their taste, or large groups with prestigious histories. There is no other way to treat them than as big boys and girls.

Certainly the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be included in this final classification. We look to it, not music critics, to uphold the great tradition in Boston. We look to music critics to write well and honestly about how it manages to uphold and improve upon that tradition.

You may well wonder in amazement that the orchestra, players and trustees, but still more the trustees, has entered into what can only be called the street brawl at Symphony Hall.

Steinberg Felt Barbs

Boston Pops Critical Critics Of Orchestra

By CARL APONE, Press Music Editor

In his book, "Instant Replay," author Jerry Kramer observed that coach Vince Lombardi was fair to all his football players on the Green Bay Packers squad. He treated them all like dogs.

In staid old Boston these days, two music critics have shown the same kind of impartiality. They have treated all performers like dogs, or so it seemed to the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO).

For a long time the orchestra seethed but remained quiet while critics Michael Steinberg, Globe, and George Gelles, Herald Traveler, threw verbal punches at performers brave enough to play Symphony Hall.

Uneasy Quiet Ends

But last month the uneasy quiet ended with a crescendo. The jabs the two critics threw at four conductors this season, William Steinberg, Eugene Ormandy, Seiji Ozawa and Carlo Giulini, helped bring an end to the uneasy truce. The critics' reviews, which read like requiems for the four musical heavyweights, went unappreciated by the orchestra.

So, when the sulphurous reviews on Giulini's concert hit the street, the orchestra erupted. Angry letters and telegrams of protests were sent to executives of both papers. After the smoke had cleared, Mr. Gelles, 27, was no longer music critic, though he had been retained as critic at large.

Publisher Harold Clancy denied the move had anything to do with pressure. He had been displeased with Mr. Gelles' reviews for some time, he said, adding, "He indulged too frequently in personalities instead of music."

Clashes Nothing New To Critic

Clashes with employers are nothing new to Mr. Gelles, an honor graduate of Princeton who also served as a summer trainee at the Globe under Mr. Steinberg. Mr. Gelles was also removed from his job as music critic of the Boston Record-American before going to the Herald Traveler. One Record-American editor said Mr. Gelles was too much of an egghead and readers couldn't understand what he wrote. Another editor said he wanted to limit his musical coverage to certain classical areas.

But the complaints of the Record-American editors are tame compared to those filed against Mr. Gelles and Mr. Steinberg by the BSO. In a telegram to the trustees, the players urged that Mr. Steinberg not be welcome to "our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism."

Pg. 16 Sec. 5—The Pittsburgh Press, Sunday, Dec. 14, 1969

On Nov. 9 a telegram from the orchestra was sent to the Globe complaining about Mr. Steinberg's "unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor, Mr. Giulin, and the continued slurs on members of the orchestra."

On Nov. 11, orchestra manager Thomas Perry Jr. let his voice be heard when he said management was also "offended by the immoderate and unwarranted tone of the Globe music critic's writing and by its persistent negativism." He added that he did not consider Mr. Steinberg as responsible critic or reporter.

Board President Objects

Not wishing to be left out, Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, sent a letter to the Globe saying Mr. Steinberg's "undisciplined and irresponsible" reviews were "doing real injury to the musical life of Boston."

He said Mr. Steinberg was "patronizing" toward Ormandy, cruel to Giulini. A trustee also wrote a scorching letter to Mr. Gelles' publisher.

The criticism and Mr. Gelles' removal were apparently too much for critic Steinberg. The man who sets fires under performers lost his cool when fires were set under him. Mr. Steinberg apparently in a bid to seek help from other U. S. music critics, quickly sent out a long, fiery letter to about 20 of them.

Although he is a man who does his homework in his newspaper job, Mr. Steinberg's letter overflowed with wild, baseless charges. The letter, which was supposed to be confidential, wasn't and ended up in the hands of BSO officials. They called it a "tissue of lies." Mr. Steinberg must have agreed for he quickly sent out two other letters of retraction and one of apology.

Orchestra Reaction Charitable

The BSO reaction to Mr. Steinberg's letter was charitable. They saw it as an emotional response of a man coming to the aid of a friend who was in trouble. The BSO wasn't nearly as charitable where the newspaper writings of both critics were concerned.

"Steinberg and Gelles have a vocabulary of invective guaranteed to be offensive," a BSO spokesman said on the telephone. "They are negative and patronizing, scorch guest conductors and regard everybody in orchestral management as a clod who is not acting out of good motives."

As an example of the invectives he found offensive, the spokesman said the critics used words like "crazed . . overwrought . . . meretricious vulgarity . . . a very dull man . . . blood-curdling," to name a few.

Critic Steinberg answered the charge of negativism by saying that in three years as Globe critic he found 40 per cent of his reviews favorable and 35 per cent mixed but generally favorable.

Judgments Miss The Mark

From my own personal observations, the two critics are knowledgeable young men who write well and show much promise. But many of the charges made against them are well taken. Too often their reviews are indeed intemperate, heavy-handed and, worst of all, wrong-headed. Their judgments on the debut of Dr. Steinberg in Boston, for example, missed the mark by a country mile.

The two remind one of music and drama critic Claudia Cassidy in her early years at the Chicago Tribune. She was then an enfant terrible bent on achieving status by clawing as many performers as possible.

Nor is the removal of a critic for negativism something new. The New York Times gave up on Stanley Kauffman in a very few months. In his brief tenure as drama critic about the only production he seemed to find worthwhile was "Superman."

Finally, however, there is something comforting in the Boston battle. In the early days the Puritan priests were all fire and brimstone and about the only relief the people had was to dance around the maypole. Nowadays Boston critics continue to provide the fire and brimstone and the people find some fun in the critic-orchestra tug of war.

So, in a changing world, some things, at least in Boston, never change.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

At the Symphony

I have just returned from a reasonably pleasant evening at Symphony. I say "reasonably pleasant" not as a complaint about the orchestra, but about the audience. If your critics would like a truly deserving target on which to vent their spleen, suggest they do a column on the Saturday evening "floor" patrons. Among those deserving my personal "Boor of the Year" award are the following:

The poor hypoglycemic soul who felt she cannot possibly survive for two hours without some nourishment. This usually takes the form of a small butter-scotch drop wrapped in horribly crinkly cellophane. Several minutes are spent unwrapping it, and several more crumpling the cellophane into as small a ball as possible.

Near her is the lady who is afraid of losing her jewels. Eight or ten bracelets travel the road from wrist to elbow dozens of times as she checks to see if all four strands of pearls are still there. She is usually accompanied by her husband, the know-it-all—he spends half the evening explaining everything to her and humming along, off-key naturally, with the orchestra. If you do manage to silence him with a dirty look, he sulks by reading the program, and you can be sure you'll hear him turning every single page.

There are always a number of unfortunates who apparently wish to spend their last Saturday on earth in Symphony Hall. They sound to me as if they need to be in a hospital with oxygen and wonder drugs, but they bravely cough and sneeze their way through the evening and survive to return the following week.

The snoozer-snorer isn't really a bother unless he's in the very next seat. I just wish he had the nerve to insist on staying home.

I suppose what really gets me is the fact that so many of these people pay so much to attend a performance when they don't really give a damn about hearing it or letting anyone else do so. It seems to be just a status thing, a way to show off new clothes or hair-dos, or to see friends, and to exchange pictures of grandchildren. They make arrangements about meeting later and dash for the doors as the last note is sounded. Why stay to applaud something they didn't even hear?

Because their ticket purchases do support the Symphony I suppose things will never change. But the orchestra has received some abuse lately and I would like them to know that they are admired and appreciated by some of us lost out there in that vast unsilent majority.

PATRICIA E. HOOLEY
Dedham

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 555,377
DEC 16 1969 New England

152.

Symphony Buffs Attack Boston Critics; One Scribe Transferred to Pop Beat

Boston, Dec. 16.

A big brouhaha is on here between the Boston Symphony Orch and music critics of two newspapers over reviews. Bad feeling has been felt but contained for a number of years. It erupted first when Boston After Dark, amusement weekly, reported that the Symphony Members Assn. had labelled Globe music critic Michael Steinberg, "persona non grata" and asked the Symphony management not to welcome him at future concerts, stemming from his review of Carlo Maria Giulini's conducting.

WBZ-TV's film-drama critic Pat Collins reprised the fuss, supplying another episode, a fight between the orch and the Boston Herald's music critic, George Gelles, who has been taken off symphony and relegated to pop. (Miss Collins, herself, was the "defendant" recently when Sack Theatres chain barred her from all its theatres. Ban still stands.)

Boston Globe

Boston Globe took notice of the situation, in an unsigned piece.

"The most recent development came last week when Herald Traveler sources reported that George Gelles, the music critic, had been removed by the paper's publisher from his music reviewing assignment. Since that time his byline has not appeared over any music review. Earlier, members of the orchestra, in a telegram, urged Symphony trustees "not to welcome Michael Steinberg (Globe critic) to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults which have gone beyond the scope of musical criticism."

Steinberg had said of Giulini's conducting: "If Danny Kaye or Victor Borge were to conduct a performance of Brahms 4th just like the one Carlo Maria Giulini conducted Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, one so raging and overwrought, one with its upbeats so stretched, with such crazed dislocations of tempo and accompanied by similar visual production with such prodigality in expressions of tragic suffering and deep knee bends, the audience would have been in stitches."

Letter From Banks

Globe disclosed that it received a letter from Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees of the orch, saying" . . . I have hesitated to write both because I am a strong believer in wholly independent criticism—if informed and objective—and because I have often defended Michael Steinberg against his detractors." This was prefaced by his statement that he now felt that Steinberg's "undisciplined and irresponsible reviews" were "doing real injury to the musical life of Boston." Banks charged that the Steinberg review of the Eugene Ormandy concert (Philadelphia Orch) was "typically patronizing."

The following day, the Globe said, it received a copy of a letter sent to Harold E. Clancy, publisher of the Boston Herald Traveler by Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, a member of the Symphony Board of Trustees. The letter criticized Steinberg and went on to "deplore" the Herald Traveler's hiring "one of his imitators, Mr. Gelles, who has nothing like the knowledge, but the same tone of voice." The letter also stated in part: "For several years, the Boston Globe has employed Michael Steinberg as its music critic. He knows a great deal about music, is highly qualified to write about it and writes well. Unfortunately he has chosen to write in such a tone of voice, and to say things that are both unfair and rude, that major artists are reluctant to come to Boston, and some have refused to come."

Steinberg Hits Back

Steinberg, striking back, went to bat for his colleague, Gelles, in a memo sent to music critics on major newspapers around the country. The Steinberg memo said that Gelles's dismissal from covering Symphony Hall concerts had been the result of pressure by the trustees of the symphony and an example of "power politics."

Said Steinberg: "It is a case in an old tradition that when bad news comes you slaughter the messenger."

Steinberg sent out two additional memos to his fellow critics, the first retracting the name of one high trustee as having protested.

The second memo said "regard this memo as confidential and check all statements before writing on the situation." Steinberg, in a statement commenting on the contro, said concerning Perry's charge of negativisim: "Looking over my reviews of the past three years, I find that about 40 percent were wholly favorable and 35 percent were mixed, but generally favorable. In addition, there were numerous other pieces such as interviews and previews which were of a generally supportive character."

The Globe's editor, Thomas Winship, stated: "The Globe management is aware of the current controversy over the role of serious criticism. Representatives of the paper, music critic Steinberg and officials of the Symphony are discussing the matter and intend to handle it properly from the point of view of all concerned." There has been no statement from the Herald, where it was understood Gelles is now covering the mod cultural music scene.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WEEKLY AMUSEMENTS
DEC 17 1969

Concerto Begs to Be Heard Again, Again

Music

By Robert Finn

This week the Cleveland Orchestra fills a major gape in its repertory by playing for the first time in its history the music of Elliott Carter.

ROBERT FINN

The event is welcome in principal, Carter being undeniably a major American figure. But the choice of his Piano Concerto for the occasion seems odd — a little like throwing differential calculus at a class still struggling with geometry.

Carter's music in general takes an uncompromising intellectual stance with little seeming concern for the outward attractiveness of its sonic surface. What makes it fascinating — and what has won for it a small but growing body of admirers — is its inherent sense of drama and the very force of its intellectual content.

CARTER IS important, but he does not write whistler's music, and his piano concerto (1967) is perhaps the thorniest abstract conundrum he has yet created. It is a fearsomely difficult work, both for performers and audience

The orchestra is not large by today's standards. A major innovation is the employment of a concertino group of seven instruments (flute, English horn, bass clarinet, violin, viola, 'cello, bass) as a kind of buffer or intermediary between the piano and orchestra.

The piece is in two closely related parts and the Boston Symphony recording runs 27 minutes rhythmic complexity is always a main feature of Carter's music, and in this piece it is beyond belief, as a glance at the piano score proves.

WHEN THE Boston Symphony gave the world premiere, foundation money was found to pay for extra rehearsals. In Cleveland there will be no extra rehearsals. In fact Louis Lane's rehearsal time will be diluted by preparations for the Christmas Festival Bach program Hence his sensible precaution of surrounding the Carter with popular masterpieces by Mozart and Beethoven that will require minimal rehearsal.

The concerto proceeds in a kind of feverish dialogue (argument, perhaps) between piano and orchestra. Rhythms are fluid, to put it mildly, and the harmony is quite dissonant. A few melodic fragments, such as one announced at the fourth bar by the bass clarinet, give the listening ear something to hang onto as the thick-textured music begins to unfold. These reappear in various guises as the piece proceeds, giving it at least some hearable cohesion.

One extraordinary feature of the second movement is the use of soft cluster-chords in the orchestra as background against which the music's dramatic action unfolds.

IF WE CAN believe the piano score, some of these chords contain 50 or 60 pitches sounding at once, very softly. Against them are played off the piano and other solo instruments, often in musical paragraphs of isolated notes in complicated rhythmic patterns.

The performace of a work like this concerto is, alas, just the kind of thing that the present concert system in this country conspires to thwart. Adequate rehearsal time is out of the question, and the subscription audience will come to the piece largely unprepared.

I have listened three times now to the Leinsdorf-Lateiner recording and if there is one thing I'm certain of it is that not even the most sophisticated listener will be able to make head or tail of this piece on a single hearing.

WHAT THIS piece needs, if we are to evaluate it fairly, is precisely what it will not get — a number of repetitions so the ear may begin to dig beneath its spiky surface. Even after hearing the recording, studying the score and perhaps attending a rehearsal or two, I would be delighted if Lane and Lateiner would repeat the piece whole-hog right after intermission Thursday night. But they won't. The system forbids it.

To the Thursday and Saturday audiences, I would say this in advance: Elliott Carter is no faker. He is a conscientious musical thinker who works slowly and does nothing by accident. Nor is he interested in a cheap and easy popular success. His high reputation is unquestionably merited.

If you can listen to this piece a number of times and honestly conclude that it is empty note-spinning, fine. But no one has the right to dismiss it as worthless after a single hearing.

Some critics have hailed the Carter Concerto as a 20th-century masterpiece. I view it right now as a kind of musical crossword puzzle whose solution may or may not be found this coming weekend at Severance Hall.

Elliott Carter

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 409,414 SUN. 545,032
DEC 14 1969

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
DEC 14 1969

The music box

Critics come in for criticism

By IRVING KOLODIN

Thanks to the latest edition of the American Musical Digest and the reportorial talents of Henry S. Humphreys, I have been able to catch up on some attitude of composer-conductor - lecturer - educator Gunther Schuller, which would have passed unnoticed otherwise.

This also provides an excellent opportunity for commending to anyone interested in music criticism the scope and inclusiveness of the Digest, a foundation-supported enterprise whose purpose is to communicate ideas and pronouncements on music from their scattered places of origin nationwide to those who might not see them otherwise. (Information on subscriptions may be obtained from American Musical Digest, 2109 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10023.)

IRVING KOLODIN

As digested by Humphreys, long associated with the Cincinnati Enquirer, Schuller's comments during last summer's Tanglewood Fesitval before a meeting of the Music Critics Association dwelt on such matters as: "Most critics are ignorant in musical matters . . . Because of this situation it would be a good thing if musical criticism were abolished altogether in this country . . . It wouldn't be so bad if the composer and performer could reply in print . . . Music critics in Germany know their subject and seek to understand what the contemporary composer is trying to say . . ."

Aaron Copland, left, conversing with Lukas Foss, center, and Gunther Schuller, once rapped music critics the way Schuller did recently.

The vibrations in these comments may sound new to some, but they struck a responsive echo with me. The mental association was with an occasion in the early Thirties when Tanglewood did not yet exist and Schuller was in all probability counting his toes. The place was the estate outside of Saratoga, known as "Yaddo," where a festival of new music was in progress.

The speaker was Aaron Copland and — in the manner of his famous "Lincoln Portrait"—What did Aaron Copland say?

This is what Aaron Copland said (among other things): "I personally am suspicious about critics who can discourse on Bach and Beethoven but who cannot form opinions about contemporary music . . . Somehow in America a composer is regarded as a menial, little place is reserved for him in the scheme of things . . ."

And, eventually, noting the attention devoted in one important paper to an event in Wuentemberg and the absence of any mention of the happenings at Yaddo, Aaron Copland said: "Under such circumstances I consider daily newspaper criticism a menace and we would be better off without it . . ."

I obviously do not have total recall of an event that happened on May 1, 1932, but I do have a scrapbook containing an account of Copland's talk which I wrote for the New York Herald Tribune of May 8, 1932. I cite this parallel not merely to identify the persistence of certain attitudes though names change, but also to note another fact.

As of 1932, Copland was still years away from writing "El Salon Mexico," "Rodeo," "Appalachian Spring" and the already mentioned "Lincoln Portrait," which made his name fondly known to music lovers nationwide, critics included.

Perhaps if Schuller's opera, "The Visitation," had been made of stuff comparable to that which ignited the press in Copland"s favor, he would have discussed some other topic in his address at Tanglewood. Incidentally, Schuller's opera, "The Visitation," made it with the German critics at its Hamburg premiere, but not, at later showings, with the American press.

* * *

A Metropolitan Opera- related event was the first audition recently (to an invited audience) of materials from the Lauder Greenway collection of vocal records he presented to the Rodgers and Hammerstein Archives of Recorded Sound in the Library-Museum of Lincoln Center.

A long-time devotee of opera as well as a past president and present chairman of the board of the Metropolitan Opera, Greenway's collection was motivated by the intention of bringing together one record at least by every singer who had performed a principal role at the Metropolitan.

153.

View of Boston's Copley Square in 1900, with Trinity Church on the left and the Public Library on the right.

Can Our Cities Be 'Works of Art?'

BY RUSSELL DONNELLY

Of The Editorial Staff

BOSTON — Today most American cities are being "renewed."

That is to say most cities were allowed to become unhappy, uninhabitable places and we look to making them livable again.

Worcester is right in the middle of her own project. Much of the old and tired is rubble. The new is about to rise.

Donnelly

But there is more to renewal than plans for demolition and construction. Cities are organic creatures in constant tension between growth and decay. And each pull in one direction, each tug in the other moves many lives. Renewal must be constant and continuous.

How do we meet this ideal?

Whose standards and values should we use in measuring urban success?

These questions and others find timely, provocative phrasing in the current centennial exhibit at the Museum of Fine Arts, "Back Bay Boston: The City as a Work of Art."

In 1840, Boston was a crammed, cramped peninsula tied tenuously to the mainland. The area lying to the right of today's Storrow Drive motorist inbound by Boston University and Copley Square was a 450-acre tidal marsh.

Less than a generation later, the fetid area had been drained, filled 20 feet deep with Needham gravel and turned into Back Bay.

The eminent architectural historian Lewis Mumford says, "Apart from L'Enfant's plan for Washington, the transformation of Boston's Back Bay is the outstanding achievement in American urban planning for the nineteenth century."

Back Bay became an enlightened example of harmonious diversity. Its architectural styles included French Academic, Queen Anne and Romanesque Revival.

The facings of its buildings varied from ausfere to elaborate in a large vocabulary of stone, brick and terra cotta.

Like an Arrow

Through the middle of Back Bay's grid-like pattern, the planners laid a wide, luxurious boulevard to rival those of Paris — Commonwealth Avenue.

Commonwealth emerges like a green arrow from the Common and the Public Garden. True to a grand master plan, the avenue became part of an "Emerald Necklace" extending through the Fens to the Arnold Arboretum.

This powerful vision of precious open space was prophetic. Some remnants of it may be seen today in the Fenway and along the Boston bank of the Charles. For although these parks, like so many others, have been cut up and partially consumed by highways, the integrity of the original plan is still evident.

The brilliance of Back Bay's conception and execution must be laid to a rare balance between enlightened private enterprise and diligent public authority.

The entire tidal marsh area was controlled by the Back Bay Commissioners. No bending bureaucrats, they rigidly enforced a code for setback and building heights from the beginning of the project. Within these specifications, the architects' imaginations could take free rein.

Out of this precept of "unified public authority" grew the Metropolitan Water Transit and Park systems — all models of their kind for the late 19th century.

Handsome Area

But the Back Bay was, and is, more than a handsome residential area. The Public Library, the Boston Symphony, the Museum of Fine Arts and Massachusetts Institute of Technology grew up there. All prosper there today, except for MIT which moved to neighboring Cambridge.

These world-renowned bastions of culture are not part of Back Bay by accident. They were in large measure the creations of a small group of wealthy patrons with strong ideas about urban excellence.

Old Yankee tradition and new Yankee vitality mingled in these exceptional families; Appletons and Bartletts, Fullers and Coolidges. Whether their money was dusty or recently acquired, they spent it with taste and a sense of public purpose. Nourished by the order and beauty of their neighborhood, they returned the gift a hundredfold.

The art and music and learning which the original patrons brought to Back Bay belong now to the city, the region and the world — exactly as intended.

Today's Back Bay

Today skyscrapers rise above the uniform roofs and spires of the 19th century. The Prudential Center will soon be balanced by the dark glass slab of the John Hancock Tower beside Trinity Church in Copley Square. And there is great pressure for more high rise apartment complexes.

Critics argue that Back Bay's uniqueness lies in her sense of human scale, a scale cruelly shattered by towers of glass and steel. Others claim that new and old can coexist, if linked by common quality of design.

Each city must find its own specific answers to the questions posed by city life. But all should aspire to those qualities which made Back Bay great.

As Lewis Mumford writes, city planning must be pledged to "manageable institutions and to stable, identifiable neighborhoods, to an urban environment sufficiently varied, socially and esthetically, to provide sustenance for every desirable kind of enterprise, communal or economic, and for every normal type of human personality."

That is the lesson of Back Bay — cities are, first of all, places for people.

Model of the John Hancock Tower, with Trinity Church to the left.

An 1806 map of Boston (white area) superimposed on present city outlines. Back Bay is in the middle of the map along Charles River.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS
(E) 94,991

DEC 15 1969

DR. HOWARD O. McMAHON, president of Arthur D. Little, Inc., is general chairman of AAAS meeting.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

DEC 14 1969

Major Scientific

By JOHN M. LANGONE
HT Medical Editor

The largest and most prestigious gathering of American scientists and technologists — 10,000 delegates, 1,500 papers on subjects ranging from anthropology to zoology—will be held at the War Memorial Auditorium and the Sheraton Boston Dec. 26-31.

The meeting is the 136th annual convention of the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS), an organization conceived in Boston in 1847, and meeting here for the eighth time.

Scores of science and medical writers will cover the meeting, thus making the Hub the world center for news about science for five days.

Many of the proceedings will be open to the public, and interest will be educatio new to the AAAS conve salute to New England Singled out for display weather (the American M Society, headquartered i celebrating its 50th ann year) and computers.

THE PAPERS to be p grouped into 10 major h summarize the problems ties and seventies: hunge nutrition, the design an cities, the earth, the sola the cosmos, health, dise haviors; social and po actions, ethics, morals, p history; life and the livin nology, economics and b

R G. BERL, will be pr of AAAS.

sion on the increasing role of science in public affairs."

"NOT ONLY WILL there be many new scientific discoveries to consider, with reviews of current scientific trends, but there also will be much involvement with the relations of science to public policy, and with the interactions of government and science. It is increasingly difficult for scientific organizations to limit their organizational activities of science in their specific competence. With increasing involvement of science in public affairs, however, it seems reasonable that scientists should consider the consequences of scientific development, and make appropriate public recommendations thereon, for the benefit of people everywhere. This remains a significant aspect of AAS activity. The Boston meeting of 1969 will give many opportunities for conversa-

INSOFAR as the possibility of student protests is concerned, Dr. Alan C. Smith of Arthur D. Little feels that it is reasonable to expect some sort of demonstration against an issue or participant. "It's in the air," he said. "I don't see how we can avoid it."

Principal officers of AAAS are Dr. Walter Orr Roberts, University Corporation for Atmospheric Research, retiring president and chairman, board of directors; Dr. H. Bentley Glass, State University of New York-Stony Brook, president; Athelstan Spilhaus, Franklin Institute, president-elect, who will take office as president in January, 1970. Dr. Roberts will give his presidential address at the Boston meeting.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 14 1969

Violist Yizhak Schotten plans innovative recital

A recital of innovative plan will be given by violist Yizhak Schotten of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday, Jan. 21, at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

According to Schotten, "I think the musical public deserves something more interesting than just a violist making his Boston recital debut." As a result, he has designed a program in which he will present three of his colleagues as assisting artists.

They will be: Betsy Moyer, harpsichordist; Frank Epstein, percussionist; Victor Rosenbaum, pianist. Planned to show many aspects of the viola as a solo instrument and as an accompanied one, the music will range from Bach and Boccherini to Brahms, Hindemith, and Colgrass.

Born in Israel, Schotten, while serving wtih his country's air force, made the acquaintance of the famous Scottish viola virtuoso, William Primrose. After hearing the airman's artistry as a viola player, Primrose urged him to study with him at the universities of Southern California and Indiana.

Schotten became a member of the Indianapolis Symphony. He served later as a member of the Pittsburgh Symphony under the direction of William Steinberg, before coming to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1967.

153.

View of Boston's Copley Square in 1900, with Trinity Church on the left and the Public Library on the right.

Can Our Cities Be 'Works of Art?'

BY RUSSELL DONNELLY

Of The Editorial Staff

BOSTON — Today most American cities are being "renewed."

That is to say most cities were allowed to become unhappy, uninhabitable places and we look to making them livable again.

Worcester is right in the middle of her own project. Much of the old and tired is rubble. The new is about to rise.

Donnelly

But there is more to renewal than plans for demolition and construction. Cities are organic creatures in constant tension between growth and decay. And each pull in one direction, each tug in the other moves many lives. Renewal must be constant and continuous.

How do we meet this ideal?

Whose standards and values should we use in measuring urban success?

These questions and others find timely, provocative phrasing in the current centennial exhibit at the Museum of Fine Arts, "Back Bay Boston: The City as a Work of Art."

In 1840, Boston was a crammed, cramped peninsula tied tenuously to the mainland. The area lying to the right of today's Storrow Drive motorist inbound by Boston University and Copley Square was a 450-acre tidal marsh.

Less than a generation later, the fetid area had been drained, filled 20 feet deep with Needham gravel and turned into Back Bay.

The eminent architectural historian Lewis Mumford says, "Apart from L'Enfant's plan for Washington, the transformation of Boston's Back Bay is the outstanding achievement in American urban planning for the nineteenth century."

Back Bay became an enlightened example of harmonious diversity. Its architectural styles included French Academic, Queen Anne and Romanesque Revival.

The facings of its buildings varied from ausfere to elaborate in a large vocabulary of stone, brick and terra cotta.

Like an Arrow

Through the middle of Back Bay's grid-like pattern, the planners laid a wide, luxurious boulevard to rival those of Paris — Commonwealth Avenue.

Commonwealth emerges like a green arrow from the Common and the Public Garden. True to a grand master plan, the avenue became part of an "Emerald Necklace" extending through the Fens to the Arnold Arboretum.

This powerful vision of precious open space was prophetic. Some remnants of it may be seen today in the Fenway and along the Boston bank of the Charles. For although these parks, like so many others, have been cut up and partially consumed by highways, the integrity of the original plan is still evident.

The brilliance of Back Bay's conception and execution must be laid to a rare balance between enlightened private enterprise and diligent public authority.

The entire tidal marsh area was controlled by the Back Bay Commissioners. No bending bureaucrats, they rigidly enforced a code for setback and building heights from the beginning of the project. Within these specifications, the architects' imaginations could take free rein.

Out of this precept of "unified public authority" grew the Metropolitan Water Transit and Park systems — all models of their kind for the late 19th century.

Handsome Area

But the Back Bay was, and is, more than a handsome residential area. The Public Library, the Boston Symphony, the Museum of Fine Arts and Massachusetts Institute of Technology grew up there. All prosper there today, except for MIT which moved to neighboring Cambridge.

These world-renowned bastions of culture are not part of Back Bay by accident. They were in large measure the creations of a small group of wealthy patrons with strong ideas about urban excellence.

Old Yankee tradition and new Yankee vitality mingled in these exceptional families; Appletons and Bartletts, Fullers and Coolidges. Whether their money was dusty or recently acquired, they spent it with taste and a sense of public purpose. Nourished by the order and beauty of their neighborhood, they returned the gift a hundredfold.

The art and music and learning which the original patrons brought to Back Bay belong now to the city, the region and the world — exactly as intended.

Today's Back Bay

Today skyscrapers rise above the uniform roofs and spires of the 19th century. The Prudential Center will soon be balanced by the dark glass slab of the John Hancock Tower beside Trinity Church in Copley Square. And there is great pressure for more high rise apartment complexes.

Critics argue that Back Bay's uniqueness lies in her sense of human scale, a scale cruelly shattered by towers of glass and steel. Others claim that new and old can coexist, if linked by common quality of design.

Each city must find its own specific answers to the questions posed by city life. But all should aspire to those qualities which made Back Bay great.

As Lewis Mumford writes, city planning must be pledged to "manageable institutions and to stable, identifiable neighborhoods, to an urban environment sufficiently varied, socially and esthetically, to provide sustenance for every desirable kind of enterprise, communal or economic, and for every normal type of human personality."

That is the lesson of Back Bay — cities are, first of all, places for people.

An 1806 map of Boston (white area) superimposed on present city outlines. Back Bay is in the middle of the map along Charles River.

Model of the John Hancock Tower, with Trinity Church to the left.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS
(E) 91,591

DEC 15 1969

Convention Ahead

of particular nal exhibits,
ntion and a technology.
are health,
eteorological n Boston, is versary this resented are eadings that of the six-

r, food, mald nature of r system and ase and belitical interhilosophy and g earth, tech-usiness; edu-

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

DEC 14 1969

cation and learning; and science and the arts.

In the midst of the five-day program, a panel of graduate students attending Greater Boston universities will represent their generation and critique the entire spectrum of contemporary science in America.

Among the major symposia topics are: arms control and disarmament, unidentified flying objects, lunar and planetary exploration in the 1970's, deep sea drilling, brain and language, marine resources of the northeast, the rational use of water and the theory and practice of biological control.

TOPICS OF INTEREST to those in the medical field include malnutrition and learning in American children, differential fertility and family planning, the non-auditory effects of noise and expanding horizons in medical education.

There also will be displays by NASA, the Boston Museum of Science and an extensive film program, as well as a concert-symposium at Jordan Hall of the New England Conservatory, and a special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Dr. Howard O. McMahon, president of Arthur D. Little, Inc., is general chairman of the meeting.

"This session," says Dr. Chauncey D. Leake of the University of California School of Medicine, "promises to be more interesting and stimulating for members and those who attend than ever before.

"NOT ONLY WILL there be many new scientific discoveries to consider, with reviews of current scientific trends, but there also will be much involvement with the relations of science to public policy, and with the interactions of government and science. It is increasingly difficult for scientific organizations to limit their organizational activities of science in their specific competence. With increasing involvement of science in public affairs, however, it seems reasonable that scientists should consider the consequences of scientific development, and make appropriate public recommendations thereon, for the benefit of people everywhere. This remains a significant aspect of AAS activity. The Boston meeting of 1969 will give many opportunities for conversation and discussion on the increasing role of science in public affairs."

DR. WALTER G. BERL, will be meeting editor of AAAS.

INSOFAR as the possibility of student protests is concerned, Dr. Alan C. Smith of Arthur D. Little feels that it is reasonable to expect some sort of demonstration against an issue or participant. "It's in the air," he said. "I don't see how we can avoid it."

Principal officers of AAAS are Dr. Walter Orr Roberts, University Corporation for Atmospheric Research, retiring president and chairman, board of directors; Dr. H. Bentley Glass, State University of New York-Stony Brook, president; Athelstan Spilhaus, Franklin Institute, president-elect, who will take office as president in January, 1970. Dr. Roberts will give his presidential address at the Boston meeting.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 14 1969

Violist Yizhak Schotten plans innovative recital

A recital of innovative plan will be given by violist Yizhak Schotten of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday, Jan. 21, at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

According to Schotten, "I think the musical public deserves something more interesting than just a violist making his Boston recital debut." As a result, he has designed a program in which he will present three of his colleagues as assisting artists.

They will be: Betsy Moyer, harpsichordist; Frank Epstein, percussionist; Victor Rosenbaum, pianist. Planned to show many aspects of the viola as a solo instrument and as an accompanied one, the music will range from Bach and Boccherini to Brahms, Hindemith, and Colgrass.

Born in Israel, Schotten, while serving wtih his country's air force, made the acquaintance of the famous Scottish viola virtuoso, William Primrose. After hearing the airman's artistry as a viola player, Primrose urged him to study with him at the universities of Southern California and Indiana.

Schotten became a member of the Indianapolis Symphony. He served later as a member of the Pittsburgh Symphony under the direction of William Steinberg, before coming to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1967.

154

'More Dolce'—I

Prima donnas looked down on Koussevitzy...at first

The glamour and the glory, the laughter and the tears of thirty years of "Married Life with the Boston Symphony Orchestra" are expressed in dozens of priceless anecdotes Harry Ellis Dickson has collected for his new book "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please" published recently by Beacon Press.

Today The Globe starts a series of eight articles taken from Mr. Dickson's book, a classic of intimate reporting about the great people who appeared on the Boston Musical Scene in the past three decades.

(Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!", Beacon Press, Copyright 1969 Harry Ellis Dickson.)

Every orchestra musician has a pet frustration and each would like to be something or somebody else. One evening before a string-quartet concert our former solo violist, the late Jean LeFranc, was furiously pacing up and down the greenroom practicing and muttering to himself. "You know, Dickson," he said to me, "I have played perhaps five, six thousand concerts in my life. All the time I am nervous. Better to be a plumbair!"

After many years of close observation it seems clear that, with few exceptions, certain characteristics go with certain instruments. Whether these characteristics prompted the choice of instrument or were acquired because of the instrument I don't know. But they are there for all to notice.

For instance, the cellists are the greatest source of trouble in an orchestra. They are the prima donnas, supersensitive, suspicious, conceited, quarrelsome, and altogether a pain in the neck to themselves, the conductor, and the rest of the orchestra.

Among the dozen cellists in an orchestra if you find two who speak to each other, things are going quite well. Most of all they hate bass players, and when Serge Koussevitzky first came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as our conductor with his reputation as a former bass virtuoso, the cellists of the orchestra looked upon him with a certain amount of disdain. After all, Arturo Toscanini was a cellist, and so was Sir John Barbirolli, and they were conductors — but a bass player? Shortly after his appointment, Koussevitzky was asked by the basses of the orchestra to play for the men. After some hesitation and a bit of coaxing, he did play for them, and one of the cellists later reported to his wife, "It was astounding! I never heard such bass playing. I closed my eyes and said to myself, 'That is not a bass. It sounds like a lousy cello!' "

★

Viola players in an orchestra are usually the least troublesome. They are mostly ex-fiddlers who have become philosophical about their role of playing, especially in classical music, the deadly, dull inner voice. A story is told about a viola player who dreamed he was playing Handel's "Messiah," and woke up to find he was! Most viola players smoke a pipe and look with detached humor upon the foibles of their colleagues. They don't even resent it when they are looked upon by their violinist colleagues as broken-down fiddlers. There was a time when the viola section of an orchestra was made up of the oldest men and any player under sixty would be looked upon with great sympathy. "So young, and already viola!" But with modern demands upon the violinist his capabilities now must be on a par with a violinist.

★

Would anyone ever imagine that two of our violinists were former amateur boxers? Or that another is an expert auto mechanic? Or another a former competitive speed-skater? Bassonist Ernst Panenka, Viennese by birth, is an amateur astronomer who spent years building his own telescope, and now, on moonlit nights when we are not playing, he invites colleagues to his roof to study the stars.

But perhaps the most unusual second interest in the orchestra is that of Bill Marshall, who sits on the first stand of second violins. The Reverend William Marshall was recently ordained a Pentecostal minister, and I doubt that any other orchestra in the world can claim a member of the clergy among its personnel.

★

An orchestra tends to stabilize itself at various player age-levels over the years. When I joined the orchestra as one of its youngest members, the average age of the players was a good deal higher than it is today. Most have gradually retired, so that today our average age is much lower; and this means that our present personnel will remain substantially the same for many years to come. We do not anticipate many changes in the foreseeable future. Indeed, as one Back Bay dowager said, "Why should anyone leave Boston? After all, we are here!"

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 13 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 15 1969

'MORE DOLCE'—3

Koussevitsky opened the way to unionize the BSO

Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" Beacon Press, copyright © 1969 Harry Ellis Dickson.)

The B.S.O. was the last of the American orchestras to hold out against the musicians' union. For some sixty years, since its founding in 1881, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had resisted all attempts from without and within to have it unionized. In 1921, while Pierre Monteaux was the conductor, there had been an abortive effort by the orchestra members, led by the concertmaster, the late Frederic Fradkin, but even after a number of the players "struck" a Saturday-night concert, refusing to go on the stage, the attempt failed.

The program that night was quickly changed and, led by Monteaux, a small Boston Symphony of chamber of proportions played a concert. It is characteristic that the management of the Boston Symphony was not vindictive and invited all of the "strikers" back.

Fradkin, however, not only left the orchestra when the "strike" failed, but practically disappeared from the concert world. He later opened a restaurant in New York city. This was a great loss to the music world for Fradkin was a great violinist.

In those days the trustees of the orchestra were fiercely opposed to anything smacking of "organized labor." Ernest B. Dane, an oil millionaire, was chairman of the trustees and he would rather have seen the orchestra collapse than join a union.

As a matter of fact, when James "Caesar" Petrillo, the president of the American Federation of Musicians, began to make things quite difficult for the orchestra by refusing to allow soloists whom he had unionized to appear with us, and these included practically everyone; then stopped us from recording with the major recording companies, which he had also unionized; and we were beginning to lose an enormous amount of inome fromm recording royalties, Dane personally made up the deficit of about one hundred thousand dollars a year. Actually for a few years he was almost our sole benefactor, adamantly refusing to recognize the union and just as doggedly willing to pay for his obstinacy.

It was not generally known at the time, but Serge Koussevitzky himself finally instigated the proceedings which led to our joining the musicinas' union. One day he telephoned his friend Carl Dreyfus, Boston newspaper publisher, and said, "Carl, I would like it to meet this Petrillo." Dreyfus, by far no means a friend of labor in general or of Petrillo in particular, told Koussey he would see what he could do. And after judicious inquiry plus a few telephone calls he got through to Petrillo, who was more than eager to meet Koussevitzky.

A meeting was arranged, and on the appointed day Petrillo drove up to the Koussevizky estate in the Berkshires in a bulletproof limousine, flanked by three bodyguards. The meeting was held in the Koussevitzky living room, and in attendance were Petrillo, his bodyguards, Koussevitzky, Carl Dreyfus, and one of the orchestra's trustees. During the course of the meeting the B.S.O. gentlemen were astounded at Petrillo's knowledge of the orchestra's affairs, financial and artistic, and all were impressed with his intelligence, candor, and reasonableness. Petrillo was ready to promise no interference in the internal affairs of the B.S.O., provided they would join his union. It was a very amicable meeting.

"CAESAR" PETRILLO, LEFT, PUT UNION'S PRESSURE ON SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Shortly afterwards (Dane having died) the orchestra committee, a group of five or six players elected by the orchestra to represent it to the management, was given some hints that the trustees might consider dealing with the union, provided the members of the orchestra so desired. There followed many orchestra meetings at which the question was debated furiously.

Most of the players were for the union, some were not. But when it was learned definitely that the trustees would not formally object, the men quickly voted for it. It was decided to engage as our counsel the eminent Judge Jacob Kaplan to represent us and to work out a contract with the trustees. He made such a strong impression upon the trustees that he was invited to become one of them, becoming the first Jewish trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Later they even invited a Catholic, a dear, decent, wonderful human being, Michael Kelliher, who had been fire commissioner for the city of Boston, and who was one of the pioneers in promoting good race relations in the state of Massachusetts.

It was inevitable that the Boston Symphony join the union. There may still be some die-hards who cannot accept the fact that artists are also human beings who work for a living and have the same need for protection from exploitation as do other workers. True, it is not exploitation for profit, since a symphony orchestra is a non-profit organization, but exploitation it can be. Fortunately, the trustees were, generally, over the years, men of high integrity and were scrupulously fair in their dealings with the musicians, and salaries were always on a par with those of other orchestras; yet in certain areas we were far behind.

Before joining the union Symphony musicians were enslaved to their jobs. There was no limit to the number of rehearsals or concerts each week. The conductor could, without notice, call for extra rehearsals at any time of the day or night, with the rehearsals lasting indefinitely. If nothing else, the union has "tamed" the tyrannical, whimsical, terrible-tempered conductor, who enjoyed his outbursts at the expense of the player.

Although we are members of the International Federation of Musicians, we in the Boston Symphony are, in practice, an autonomous organization. Unlike the custom in some other cities where the local union negotiates for the orchestra, we negotiate for ourselves.

One of the prime considerations in future negotiations with symphony players will be that of adequate pensions. The Boston Symphony has, happily, led the way in this regard and now the other major orchestras are following suit. There was a time when a man would leave the Bosto Symphony Orchestra after a lifetime of service, facing a bleak future. During my time I remember one suicide.

Today a musician retires with dignity, knowing that he can live out his remaining years with some semblance of financial security. In addition to his Social Security benefits he will receve one-half the minimum Boston Symphony salary as long as he lives; and under the present system if the orchestra salaries go up, so does his pension. Our pensioners have free access to Symphony Hall and many come back for frequent visits. As one recently said, "I come back to inspect my investment. I now have one hundred and five men working for me!"

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
DEC 11 1969

The Flutes

From "'Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!' An Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra" by Harry Ellis Dickson (Beacon, $7.50).

The dandies of any orchestra are the flute players, the best-dressed, the quietest, the most gentlemanly, the easiest to get along with. They play the least troublesome of all instruments—no reed trouble, no mouthpiece trouble, no string trouble—and so usually they are the best adjusted citizens of a symphony orchestra. And usually the most affluent. Everybody wants to take flute lessons.

155

Koussevitzky: Symphony Hall 'Our Temple'

(Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" Beacon Press, Copyright (c) 1969 Harry Ellis Dickson.)

Serge Koussevitzky always referred to Symphony Hall as "our temple", and indeed this wonderful hall has been, since 1900, the mecca of musical activity in and around Boston. No matter that occasionally it has been the scene of nonmusical affairs, like commencement exercises, political rallies, banquets, and ever New Year parties; it still remains a respected house of things artistic. The fact that Symphony Hall in Boston is one of the most perfect acoustical auditoriums in the world is no accident. It was the first concert hall ever to be built in known conformity with scientific acoustical laws, and to Prof. Wallace C. Sabine, then assistant professor of physics at Harvard, goes the credit for this achievement; also to the architects of the hall, McKim, Meade, and White, for their integrity in following his specifications. Would that all subsequent architects of concert halls had displayed the same kind of selfless integrity!

★

Auditions are usually horrible affairs. I vividly remember my own inquisition. Koussevitzky was seated in the center, a group of solemn pallbearers all around him. These were the section leaders of the orchestra, who were there to advise Koussey, but whose advice he rarely took. After I had played a concerto (Arthur Fiedler was my piano accompanist) I was given the inevitable sight-reading test. First there was an easy slow movement from a Mozart symphony, evidently to test my sense of phrasing and ability to heed the dynamics. Then came a more difficult movement from a Brahms symphony, then a Richard Strauss tone poem, then some Stravinsky. And then Dr. Koussevitzky asked the librarian to bring a symphony by Taneyev, of whom I had never even heard. While I was struggling with it, Koussevitzky kept looking at the other members of the jury with a fiendish glee. "Very good!" he exclaimed. "You have never played dat?" And I knew he was making fun of me. He said, "Thank you!" and I packed up my violin, going home to commit suicide. An hour later, however, the manager called to tell me my contract would be ready in a day or so.

★

Years ago, before the present system was established, we needed a new first clarinetist and auditions were held not only in Boston, but also in New York. Charles Munch and a jury of first players were seated in Carnegie Hall to listen to a number of clarinetists. Each came on stage in a state of nervousness, some more nervous than others, went through his ordeal, and left. One of the applicants was Gino Cioffi, an excellent clarinetist who had played under many famous conductors and who was certain that the Boston Symphony needed him more than he needed it. Cioffi came to the center of the stage, clarinet in hand, and said, "Good morning, gentlemen, what do ya wanna hear?"

Munch asked, "What have you prepared?"

"Anything you want — concerto, symphony, opera — anything!"

Munch asked, "Do you play the Mozart Concerto?"

"Ma sure!" answered Cioffi. And at this point he beckoned to his pianist and they gave a brilliant performance of the first movement. Finishing with a flourish, Cioffi waiked to the edge of the stage and said, "Pretty good, uh?"

Munch turned to Richard Burgin, cur concertmaster, and said, "Such confidence! We must have this man!" and Cioffi is still with us.

Does anything ever go wrong during a concert? Just little things. Once when we were playing Strauss' Domestic Symphony with Fritz Reiner as conductor, the tympanist discovered the middle page of his part was missing. He did not discover it until we were well into the second page. At about the same time Rolland Tapley, the inside man on the second desk of first violins, turned the page to discover the tympani part in his music. He glanced over at the tympanist, Roman Sculcz, who had turned green and, having a few bars rest, was frantically thumbing through the rest of the music on his stand. Tapley, undaunted, picked up the part and, coattails flying, made a dash toward Sculcz, on his way brushing aside four viola players, a pair of oboists, a contrabassoonist, and three trumpeters, but arriving at the grateful Sculcz's kettles in the nick of time. Meanwhile, Reiner and the rest of us thought Tapley had gone berserk and, as Reiner later acknowledged, he thought of stopping the orchestra and running for his life! I must say, in fairness to the librarians, that the misplaced sheet of music was Sculcz's own fault. Before the concert he had taken his music over to the first violins to check a cue and had inadvertently left his part.

NEXT — The B.S.O. and the Union.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 14 1969 New Engl

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY BY OLGA KOUSSEVITZKY

(Copyright 1969 Olga Koussevitzky)

'MORE DOLCE'—4

Koussevitzy lived role of splendor

(Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!", Beacon Press, Copyright © 1969 Harry Ellis Dickson.)

The history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will forever be classified into two eras: B.K. (before Koussevitzky) and A.K. (after Koussevitzky). From the time he first came to the orchestra in 1924 through the 25 years of his conductorship he was able to establish and maintain an aura of Olympian aloofness and royal untouchability. His sartorial splendor, his beautiful carriage, his reserved but dramatic gestures on the podium, all of these endeared him immediately to the Back Bay ladies. Serge Koussevitzky was an actor, a sincere and wonderful actor who not only portrayed a role but actually lived it and passionately believed in that role. And because the role demanded it, he was able, through his strong will and personality, to achieve, at enormous expense to the orchestra, a level of salary and living far beyond that of any other conductor, before or since. In those early days before the era of plane travel when the orchestra made all its out-of-town trips by train, it was customary on our annual two-week "Western Tour" for the members of the orchestra to ride in Pullman berths while Dr. Koussevitzky and his entourage, consisting of Mrs. K., the valet, the cook, a secretary, and the maid, had an entire car to themselves.

★

Koussevitzky's philosophy about music was simple and to the point. "It must always be dolce, with good tone, with good intonation, and with alive!" He was constantly preoccupied with sound. Once he stopped the orchestra and said, "Gentlemen! A noise is not a beautiful sound. A sound is a dolce who have a beautiful round tone."

★

His temper at times was ungovernable and unpredictable. One Monday morning when he and the orchestra were in a relaxed mood and things seemed to be going smoothly and happily as we ran through Copland's breezy "El Salon Mexico" in preparation for an orchestra tour, he spied a couple of wind players stamping their feet rather heavily and without warning he picked up the score and flung it through the air. He was a pretty bad shot because it landed in the lap of a second fiddler, who sat there transfixed and didn't dare to touch it. Without a word Koussey, purple with rage, left the stage for an unscheduled intermission while Louis Speyer (one of the stompers) went up to Koussey's room to apologize. By this time his anger had subsided and when it was explained to him that the men meant no disrespect for him, but were merely carried away by the music, he smiled like a benevolent father toward his misbehaved children, came back to the podium — and canceled the rest of the rehearsal.

★

Koussevitzky had a high regard for all of his musicians. "You are all great artists!" he would say over and over again and he was so convincing that it was difficult not to believe him. He was concerned about the health of each man, not in a personal, but in a possessive way. These were "his" players, his own stable of racehorses who, if treated well, perform better. Before a trip he would admonish us not to eat bad food, to dress warmly, and to get enough rest. Once before a tour he said, "Kinder, don't drink cold water after a concert. It is bad."

One stormy Winter day as we were leaving the railroad station in Buffalo he spied Burgin without a hat. After scolding him harshly, he sent his valet back into his train compartment to fetch a fur hat, which Burgin unhappily had to wear for the rest of the tour.

NEXT — The Trustees.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 16 1969 New Engla

'MORE DOLCE'—5

BSO trustee: a lofty perch

It used to be said in Boston that the Cabots spoke only to the Lowells and the Lowells spoke only to God, but the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, until recently, didn't speak to anyone. This august body, once known as the Protestant Vatican, sat on Mount Olympus, quietly dispensing its wisdom and managing the affairs of the orchestra. No one ever saw them. No one knew where or when they met. Their names appeared on every symphony program to attest the fact that they existed, yet they seemed to be mythical — until recently when, along with the emergence of the "New Boston," the trustees of the B.S.O. gradually came out of their shells and were revealed as real people.

There are nineteen of them, plus four trustees emeritus, and they represent a variety of callings—several lawyers, a couple of merchants, a banker, an insurance company executive, a minister, a priest, two publishers, a judge, a United States senator, and one woman (the latter, the charming and able Mrs. James H. Perkins, a recent tradition-shattering addition). Being a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the highest status a Bostonian can attain.

Henry B. Cabot, until very recently the chairman of the trustees, is a rare human being, forthright, honest, liberal—and loved and respected by all of the musicians. This is not the case with presidents of other orchestras, whose relationship with the players is, in some instances, one of suspicion and misunderstanding.

Cabot recently stepped down from his position and handed over his responsibilities to a fellow Bostonian, Talcott M. Banks. With characteristic modesty Cabot announced to the members of the orchestra that his failing memory had been a prime consideration in his decision to relinquish his office. He remains, however, keenly interested in the affairs of the orchestra as a trustee emeritus.

Banks is a distinguished Boston attorney, a good amateur pianist, longtime lover of music, and a great doer in the musical affairs of the community. He is a fine gentleman, respected and loved by all who know him, and there is no reason to doubt that he will continue in the Boston tradition of sound management.

In keeping with the spirit of the times the "New Boston" symphony trustees have an ecumenical face. Henry Lee Higginson, indeed, might not recognize a Boston Symphony Board of Trustees that now harbors in its ranks alongside a Cabot, a Jennings, a Perkins, and a Noonan, such names as Laughlin, Kennedy, Berkowitz, and Rabb.

What, then, are the duties and functions of a symphony board of trustees? Years ago their duties were quite simple. They were expected personally to make up the inevitable deficit at the end of each year, as Ernest Dane had, which they did without fanfare and without publicity, keeping these mundane affairs to themselves. The Boston Symphony was considered their private club and they were proud of their ordained heritage in keeping it so.

Conditions, however, have changed. The day of enormous fortunes being privately made and spent is gone. Today's trustees are not all men of wealth and their original function of giving money has changed to that of raising money to keep up with the ever increasing costs of maintaining an orchestra. Although the Boston Symphony still boasts that it is almost 75 percent self-supporting, its over-all annual budget of 5 or 6 million dollars still leaves an annual deficit of some $500,000.

And it is not too unreasonable to assume that some day in the future there will be direct government support for the arts as there has been in the European countries over the centuries.

(Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!", Beacon Press, Copyright (c) 1969 Harry Ellis Dickson.)

NEXT — In Europe.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
DEC 18 1969

156.

MIKE KELLIHER . . . IN 1954

'MORE DOLCE'—6

Kelliher, BSO in Cork

By Harry Ellis Dickson

In 1956 the Boston Symphony made its second European trip, a six-week tour climaxed by five concerts in the Soviet Union. The tour began with two concerts in Ireland, one in Cork, and one in Dublin. It was our first visit to Ireland and we enjoyed every minute of it. We had arrived in Cork two days before the concert and so were able to see a bit of the beautiful countryside. Some of us took an all-day bus trip, visiting some of the quaint towns and villages that dot the southwestern part of Ireland — Limercik, Kinsale, and Blarney. (Of course we kissed the stone at Blarney Castle.)

The bus was filled with Irish people who were the friendliest, happiest people I had ever met. There were frequent stops for a "wee bit of refreshment," and I realized this was a part of a way of life. There must be more saloons per capita in Ireland than anywhere else in the world. Yet they must know how to hold it, for in the four days we spent in Ireland I never saw anyone intoxicated.

The orchestra had been brought to Ireland through the efforts of Michael Kelliher, who had recently become our first Irish-American trustee. So proud was he, that he just had to take the Boston Symphony to County Cork, where he was born. At the concert he made a speech in which he said that he had left Cork as a poor boy many years ago and now was proud to bring back to his native city the great Boston Symphony Orchestra. He became so emotional in front of all his relatives (there must have been a thousand Kellihers in the audience) that he almost broke down.

The concert was a great success and the audience most appreciative. We were the first American orchestra to play there, but we found out later that the County Cork Musical Society had brought many other European orchestras to their city, including the Vienna Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Symphony, and the Leningrad Philharmonic.

As I walked through the streets of Cork the next day, I was particularly intrigued by a sign on a shop window— Hyman Nathan, Tailor. I couldn't resist going in. An old man greeted me. "Are you Hyman Nathan?" I asked.

"That I am," he answered in a thick brogue. When I told him I was with the Boston Symphony, he exclaimed. "The blessin's o' God upon ye! Sit down. I enjoyed your concert very much." Like most Irishmen he seemed to have plenty of time for talking, so we had a very pleasant half hour. When I asked him if he had been born in Ireland, he said, "O, no, I was born in Poland. I came here when I was a young man." He had been an itinerant peddler, traveling all through Europe and had settled in Cork.

"Why Cork?" I asked.

He was silent for a moment, then blurted out, "I'll be God-damned, I never thought about it before!" He insisted that I go home to dinner with him to meet his wife and large family of children and grandchildren, but I had to refuse because we were leaving that day for Dublin. His last words were "Too bad. Mama makes the best bloody gefilte fish you ever ate!"

★

Our three concerts in Leningrad and two in Moscow were fantastic successes, with people surrounding us after each concert and either staring or saying some words in English, occasionally asking if we knew a relative in Chicago. One man approached me after the concert in Moscow and asked if I knew his cousins, Phil and Leopold Spitalny. A theater conductor, he had not been in touch with his cousins for years and when I offered to send them his greetings, he agreed, but "please ask them not to write to me."

(Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!", Beacon Press, Copyright (c) 1969 Harry Ellis Dickson.)

NEXT — The B.S.O. on tour.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 366,377

DEC 20 1969 Ne

'Eroica' appeared, JFK was dead

By Harry Ellis Dickson

Perhaps not too many people have ever thought about the problems of logistics connected with a tour by the Boston Symphony in this country and abroad. Moving some one hundred six musicians and eleven and a half tons of instruments and baggage from one city to another and one country to another requires careful planning. There are wardrobe trunks, trunkfuls of music, music stands, a conductor's podium, nine big bass trunks, eleven cello trunks, two harps, five or six kettledrums, bass drums, snare drums, cymbals, xylophones, assorted other percussion instruments, all kinds of brass and woodwind instruments, and specially lined cases for the more delicate violins and violas.

★

The Beethoven "Eroica" symphony is carried automatically on all tours of the orchestra, to be played in case of the death of a famous person. When F.D.R. died in April, 1945, we got word on the train to Philadelphia and that night we played a memorial concert for the late President, including of course, the Funeral March of the "Eroica." As a matter of fact, this Beethoven Third Symphony has become a kind of symbol of sadness for us in the orchestra. The day J.F.K. was assassinated we had had word just before our Friday afternoon concert that he had been shot; how seriously we did not know until, after the first piece on the program, our two librarians suddenly appeared on the stage to hand out the music for the "Eroica." Then we knew.

★

During the past few years when most of our travel is by air there has arisen a new problem, that of plane mishap. Now, on all our travels the full complement of the orchestra never flies on the same plane. The orchestra is divided into two sections. The strings, the woodwinds, the brass, and the percussion are evenly divided, so that if something happened to one plane the rest could still give a concert. (A comforting thought to our wives and families!)

★

Out-of-town trips used to be much more exciting than they are today. Somehow or other, when we left Boston in our own Pullman train and, in some cases, lived on that train for two weeks, it was more glamorous than today's quick plane hops. Gone are those happy days when our wives would see us off at South Station, Boston, and wave to us as our special train would pull out with banners flying, a big BSO on tour sign at the rear of the train. Within minutes the poker game would start in the club car, a friendly game that would end the next morning in Buffalo, with a few winners, and a few minus their week's salary.

★

The first concert of every trip is the most trying — the night we discover what we forgot to bring. One night our tuba player opened his trunk only to find he had forgotten to pack his instrument. Some frantic telephone calls produced a tuba, a greatly appreciated loan from the local symphony player. On the first night as we dress in front of our enormous wardrobe trunks (each houses four people), there is a constant exchange — a pair of black socks for a white tie, a pair of trousers for a white vest, cuff links for a collar button. On one of my early tours with the orchestra I discovered I had left my white bow ties at home. A colleague loaned me one of his, the kind you have to tie yourself, which I couldn't do. When I asked him if he could tie it for me, he said, "Sure. But you'll have to lie down on the floor."

"Why?" I asked.

"Well," he said, "I used to help my father, who is an undertaker and this is the only way I know how."

"No thanks," I said, and that night I learned how to make a bow tie!

(Reprinted by permission from Harry Ellis Dickson, "Gentlemen, More Dolce, Please!" Beacon Press. Copyright, 1969, Harry Ellis Dickson.)

NEXT — Thoughts About Music Critics.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 366,377

DEC 23 1969 Ne Engl News

COINCIDENTALLY, there have just arrived on my desk two books about two of our finest symphony orchestras—"Those Fabulous Philadelphians," by Herbert Kupferberg (Scribners), which is about the Philadelphia Orchestra, and "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!," by Harry Ellis Dickson (Beacon Press), which is about the Boston Symphony and its greatest conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Kupferberg's book is the more thorough one. His sketches of the orchestra and of its two most famous maestros, Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy, are vivid. I only wish he had dwelt more on that businesslike, efficient, almost scientific rehearsal method of Stokowski's, which permitted him to go over exactly those details of a score that he knew would present difficulties and to leave everything else unrehearsed, to be pulled together by the power of his podium personality during the concert itself. Mr. Dickson has the authority of a man who actually spent three decades in the Boston Symphony, much of this time under Koussevitzky. His study of Koussevitzky's personality and methods is trenchant, humorous, and splendidly written, and though he portrays his hero as a slightly stuffy and pompous figure he convinces the reader that Koussevitzky was one of the greatest conductors of all time.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

DEC 27 1969

Rose Walsh – Music Comes Alive

After reading Boston Symphony Orchestra's noted violinist and sometimes conductor, Harry Ellis Dickson's, fascinating and entertaining, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" you have a vivid picture of the members of the world-renowned B. S. O.

You see the individual members at rehearsal, when they are playing at the traditional Friday afternoon and other concerts and when they are away on tours.

The title of the book was inspired by the great conductor Serge Koussevitsky's frequent complaint at rehearsals, "Gentlemen, it is awfully not togedder. Gentlemen, more dolce please!"

No question but that the musicians work hard and have unusual hours, or that they have temperaments, frustrations, gripes, hobbies and many idiosyncracies. In fact they are much like ordinary folk, only more so.

Harry Dickson has dedicated his book, recently published by the Beacon Press, "To my wife Jane — who adised against it." He describes the 162-page photograph-illustrated volume as 'an irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra." It includes 12 drawings by Olga Koussevitsky.

Some of the secrets he reveals are that cellists are the greatest source of trouble in an orchestra and altogether a pain in the neck to themselves, the conductor, and the rest of the orchestra.

Viola players are the less troublesome . . . most of them smoke a pipe and look with detached humor upon the foibles of their colleagues.

Being a violinist himself, he has plenty to say about the firsts and seconds and the difference in status between the two.

He hopes some day "we will do away with the term, second violin," adding "perhaps mezzo-violin would be better."

All the B. S. O. players, conductors (Koussevitsky, Monteux and Munch) guest soloists, trustees and staff come in for their full share of Dickson attention. There are anecdotes and information about Tanglewood, Youth Concerts (the author is director of the latter), Pops and Esplanade in the cleverly-written 30-year memoirs of the talented, likable musician who as a student at the New England Conservatory of Music, tipped his hat whenever he passed Symphony Hall and is "fiercely proud of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

DEC 22 1969 Ne

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

JAN 17 1970

BOOK REVIEW

The Boston In The Right Key

Gentlemen, More Dolce Please! By Harry Ellis Dickson. Beacon Press, Boston, 162 pages. $7.50 list.

NEW YORK—The subtitle of this charming book tells the story: "An Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony. . ." But this volume, titled after an expression of the late Serge Koussevitsky, is more than reminiscences by this musician-conductor.

It's an affectionate history of the organization of one of the world's great orchestras and the many outstanding names associated with it as soloists, members and conductors.

Major attractions are the drawing of outstanding conductors and other artists by Mrs. Olga Koussevitsky, the wife of the late music director and still an important force in classical music. The result is an engaging informative book.

FRED KIRBY

A vivid account of Philharmonic abroad

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

If you take Boston Symphony man Harry Dickson's "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please" in one hand and Evelyn Ames' February-due "A Wind From the West" (Bernstein and the the New York Philharmonic Abroad) in the other, you can whistle Dixie with any musicologist, or critic, on the Eastern seaboard and well beyond.

As a matter of fact, if you've read them both, you're one up on anybody in the business of Symphony music-making, including the trustees of both these maxi size orchestras.

You know how it feels to have those wings on your heels when the Mahler Fifth, that tremendous hour and fourteen minute spate of peace and passion, "goes THAT well." And because of Mrs. Ames' vivid, perceptive words, you travel with the Philharmonic, with Leonard Bernstein and his son and daughter, with a hundred and six players, by plane, by bus, and you sit in those famous chairs at La Scala or La Fenice or Amsterdam's Concertgebouw.

You experience the world of difference between Berlin and Copenhagen, the fantastic audiences of Israel and the wild wonderful acclaim in Munich, Bonn, Florence, Vienna. Mrs. Ames, whose husband Amyas is president of the Philharmonic, has written so much more than the warm intensely personal story of a great orchestra's tenuous journey across the boundaries of a world divided by hatred and fear.

The intensity of her feeling for people, those with whom she and her husband shared this incredible five weeks of concertizing, and those thousands who crossed their orbit, and her extraordinary ability turn this into a saga reminiscent of her own Danish forbears.

Bernstein reaching for the greatcape that the BSO's Serge Koussevitzy bequeathed him, or listening, his hand clapped to his mouth, while his entire orchestra, wildly out of tune, sang him "Happy Birthday" on his 50th; city after city hushed in its tracks, to hear the vital giving of the music "for which I was born."

Houghton Mifflin, February 2, and not to be missed.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) [illegible] (E) 194,70[illegible]

JAN 5 1970 Eng New

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JAN 31 1970

157.

Oh, Those Oboes

From "'Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!' an Irreversent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra," by Harry Ellis Dickson (Beacon, $7.50).

Oboe players are . . . the unhappiest of musicians, constantly complaining and bemoaning their fate at having to play such an unpredictable, treacherous instrument.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1970

Book Reviews

An 'irreverent' memoir: 30 years with the BSO

"Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!": An Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Harry Ellis Dickson; with 12 Drawings by Olga Koussevitzky. xi + 162 pp., illus., no index. Boston: Beacon Press, $7.50.

By GERALD S. FOX

THIS DELIGHTFUL book really is comprised of two distinct facets. First, it covers just about everything you might want to know about the Boston Symphony Orchestra: its conductors, its personnel, its hall, the Pops and Tanglewood seasons, management, recordings, broadcasts, tours, soloists, subscribers, and the rest of it. Second it is irrepressibly chatty and prolifically anecdotal throughout. The result is fascinating and fast reading for all music enthusiasts.

The book is an outgrowth of a chronicle that the author, who is a member of the BSO and assistant conductor of the Pops, has kept during his three decades at Symphony Hall. Because the anecdotes are mostly first-hand recollections, I should hope that only the barest minimum are apocryphal; that being so, future historians and biographers surely will find

The BSO at home (Symphony Hall, Boston); on the podium is Erich Leinsdorf, who recenty resigned from the directorship after seven seasons

What remains most vividly in my mind after having finished the book is the profusion of anecdotes—they seem to fly by on every page! Some are familiar, of course, but I suspect that the majority of these will be new even to those readers who think they have heard 'em all. Here are a few selected at random:

At a party, Charles Munch asked if anyone could explain the game of baseball to him. Isaac Stern, Leonard Bernstein, and Eugene Istomin volunteered. A snatch of the conversation that ensued: ". . .Le pitcher jete le bal et vous le frappez et run like hell à first base."

Richard Burgin, the revered BSO concertmaster for many years, was notoriousmphony

Pierre
1919 to Kousseure ex-
Charles nductor einsdorf 1969); einberg.
at the season

party in honor of th the orchestra,
habit of borrow-sing them. Ac-was hung around
f mutes was pre-ct morning at re-
his partner and mute?".
in particular frequently opt for repeats:
d been stoned (!)
oncert, the BSO
ero came to the conductor that onder they threw hat for just ng is more

.)
. But truth
sion is that iam, Munch
g. Of course
. On a per-loved for the son he was.
is said of ause, though nounced, he nductor and his book was ar enough is ethods were hired for his

f conductors,
esting tidbit
son tells us
because the ave the two
Their names
arvalho and

. concert and ally, tasteful
40th Sym-virtuoso per-bear in mind
here. Dickposers in the is the most
so exposed,
e other hand
rand orches-Wagner, and their works
ally so easy!

Almost as revered by the orchestra was Dimitri Mitropoulos, also loved dearly as both man and musician.

The author claims that Danny Kaye (!) was one of the greatest guest conductors ever engaged by the Boston Symphony. Evidently this is not mere hyperbole, the "erudite" music critic of the Christian Science Monitor (unnamed) having said the same thing. (Accolades came also from Mitropoulos—". . .this man is a great conductor!"—William Steinberg, and Jean Martinon. Kaye cannot read a note of

Dickson cannot resist some amusing, albeit deprecating remarks about music critics. He quotes a scatological one-liner that must be among the most devastating reviews ever written: "Mr.—played last night in the Hollywood Bowl. They should have flushed it."

But enough. Let me conclude by recommending this book highly to anyone who is interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra in particular or the musical scene in general. It is light reading that manages to be as informative as well.

PROFILE: Medfield's William Stokking

Versatile Cellist Knows How To Enjoy Life

By NONA G. DEARTH
Patriot Ledger Staff Reporter

MEDFIELD — William Stokking of 25 Snyder Road, a cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 20th century Renaissance man.

Deeply immersed in music and literature, he is also an ardent naturalist, camper, sailor, pilot and teacher. He takes great pleasure in his family, and at the age of 36 he has gained enough wisdom to know that life must be more than a rat race. He intends to enjoy it and is thoroughly relaxed about his many duties and hobbies. His attitude is one of intense interest.

'Everybody Has Something'

"I don't feel an individual knows enough about any one thing," Bill says. "Everybody I come in contact with has something to offer, and I listen. It has helped me many times. I try to impress this on my students and on my children."

Bill Stokking began learning at an early age. Born in Atlantic City, N.J., he started to play a quarter-size cello when he was four years old. During his junior high school years, he had a prescholarship at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia where he took cello lessons once a week. His high school years were spent at the Curtis Institute on a full scholarship. For two of those years he studied with the great Piatvgorsky.

He then went on to the Julliard School in New York City, also on a full scholarship, where he studied with Felix Salmond until he entered the Korean War.

Joining the Navy, Bill was "fortunate to get into the United States Presidential Naval Orchestra in Washington, D.C.," as he puts it, where he was on the White House staff. He played at official functions, met world famous figures and observed the scene with an interested eye.

"But that's another story," he says.

After that pleasant tour of duty, he joined the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of George Szell, in 1959, remaining there for two years. Next, it was six years with the Philadelphia Symphony, under Eugene Ormandy. During that time, he was also solo cellist with the Chamber Orchestra in Philadelphia.

'Most Decent Group'

In 1968, Bill joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a move that made him extremely happy.

"I have found the Boston Symphony the most decent group anywhere," he says. "I had never before found an orchestral management so easy to work with. Other musical managements you work 'for'; the Boston Symphony you work 'with.' It is a very healthy relationship."

During these commitments, he also taught cello. He taught at the Cleveland Institute of Music, Glassborough State Teachers College and was on the faculty at Temple University. Last summer he was on the Boston University staff at the summer session in Tanglewood. He also has private students.

Bill Stokking's early and continuing passion for music was a natural outgrowth of his background. His father was a concert master and conductor of orchestras in Amsterdam and Sweden. After coming to this country, he conducted in the Philadelphia area, then became concert master in the internationally famous Walter Damrosch orchestra. They made recordings in the 1920s in Camden, N.J., birthplace of the recording industry.

Bill's literary leanings go back even further. An ancestor, Charles Perrault, wrote the classic French fairy tales in the 1700s, and a recent publication of Perrault's charming stories graces the 1,000-volume library in the Stokking home.

Bill states with pride that his ancestor's stories were the basis of the Grimms brothers' fairy tales.

Charmed By Medfield

Bill Stokking has fallen in love with Medfield and New England.

"Every other stone and tree has an historical significance," he says, and he is gathering all the facts into his fund of knowledge.

As a typical New England town, Medfield charms him.

"It is a very healthy town to live in," he believes. "The government, as I have seen it, the merchants, the police, the people at the post office are all wonderful. I found very dear friends here immediately."

Active In Town

Bill thinks Medfield is an ideal place to raise a family, and his wife, Nancy, and their three daughters — Lisa Kim, 14, Laura Beth, 12, and Lynn Alison, 10 — agree.

Mrs. Stokking, an accomplished pianist who frequently accompanies her husband at recitals, has become an active participant in Medfield life. The family belongs to the United Church of Christ, and Mrs. Stokking is director of a 10-member group of bell ringers, with a newly acquired set of bells from England. They are members of the New England Hand Bell Society.

The Stokkings also belong to the New 'N Town Club.

But it is especially for the children that Bill is so happy about settling in Medfield. He thinks the schools are good, and he is very pleased with the music department.

"It is well programmed," he says.

Buckingham's Palace

Living in Medfield, there is all outdoors for the family to enjoy. Bill built a barn behind the house for his oldest daughter's horse, Buckingham — and, of course, the barn is Buckingham's Palace.

Animals abound at the Stokking home, and they all have unique personalities. Bill describes the large white rabbit as "the grumpiest rabbit you've ever seen."

There are also twin goats, a chameleon, an iguana who lives in a dry aquarium and subsists on lettuce, and snakes, of the garter variety. Last summer there were 52 snakes, 39 of them born in their Stokking nest, to the delight of the children.

Bill and Nancy Stokking are obviously very proud of their children and take great pleasure in them. It is a family where love and respect are evident.

Sense Of Responsibility

"The kids love the beauty of nature," Bill says, "and also the beauty man has created. They look for the best in people. We have many books on religion so they can understand and respect the beliefs of others."

With an ingrained sense of responsibility, the children take care of their animals themselves, maintaining them with money earned as babysitters.

During vacations, the family takes off in the camper, visiting national parks and other sites of interest. There is also a family interest in Bill's boating hobby. Ever since he was a boy he has built and owned boats and taken part in racing. He builds both the boats and the motors.

Bill holds a private pilot license and is just about ready to take his commercial pilot license test. His flying has a practical as well as pleasure purpose. He frequently hires a plane to fly to an engagement, most recently to Tanglewood and Long Island. Looking ahead, he plans to visit his daughters by plane when they marry and settle down.

"But they will probably all settle in Boston," he says ruefully.

'Aristocrat Of Orchestras'

But no matter what his outside interests are, no matter where the conversation wends its way, Bill Stokking inevitably returns to music and his pleasure in being a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He is especially delighted with the high level of cultural interest in the Boston area, which he found nowhere else in such a widespread degree.

"Cab drivers and gas station attendants known about the Boston Symphony and take pride in it," Bill says with some amazement. "It astonished me when I moved here a year ago."

The Boston Symphony, he notes, is known as "the aristocrat of orchestras." All the people involved in it, management and musicians, are gentlemen, and they work together to maintain the orchestra's image.

'No Communication Lack'

"There have been no strikes in the Boston Symphony," he elaborates. "I went through three strikes with the Philadelphia, each caused by lack of communication between management and players. There is no lack of communication in Boston."

Bill found Ormandy "very interesting" to work with; Szell "very demanding." He feels he has not been here long enough to judge Boston conductors, but he terms William Steinberg a gentleman, a firm conductor.

"An orchestra," Bill explains, "is the tool of the conductor. We don't always agree with his interpretation but we respond as he requests."

Bill Stokking finds it hard to pin down his favorite kind of music.

'Much Beautiful Music'

"Tastes change," he says.

As a cellist, he likes Ernest Bloch. He likes the romantic style more now than he did a few years ago. He finds much merit at times in 12-tone writing.

But Bill Stokking has one major gripe about music programming in general.

"There is still so much beautiful music that is never heard," he states. "Orchestras get in a rut with their programming."

He thinks Steinberg is trying to change this, and this is an innovation Bill looks forward to.

Asked about the recent hullabaloo in Boston when the symphony orchestra management objected to reviews written by critics, Bill is firm in his comments.

"It was unjust criticism of a guest from another country who was doing more than his best to produce fine music," said Bill. "It was a lack not of esthetic criticism but of common courtesy. We know we have our faults. But this was a fine man (Guilini) and a musician emotionally expressing the music."

Constructive Criticism

Bill believes critics should be constructive. Dwelling on the Guilini furor in which critics blasted the mannerisms of the guest conductor, he continues.

"We objected not to the criticism of the music but to the unfair criticism of the personality of a guest in our house."

The hubbub has quieted down, and serenity has descended again upon the aristocrats of the symphonic world. For the time being, anyway.

In the meantime, Bill Stokking is happy in his work, his home his family and his hobbies. And as proof that he is settling solidly into Medfield, he is now seriously considering starting an area symphony orchestra for the pleasure of semi-professional and amateur musicians.

"There are many fine musicians around who would love an opportunity to play in an orchestra," Bill says. "We shall see."

MEDFIELD MUSICIAN WILLIAM SOKKING of 25 Snyder Road, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, practices at home with his wife Nancy, an accomplished pianist who accompanies him at recitals. The Sokking family, which includes three daughters, have "fallen in love" with Medfield and New England.
(Photo by Kenneth F. McLean)

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.

DEC 27 1969

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1970

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JAN 31 1970

Oh, Those Oboes

From "'Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!' an Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra," by Harry Ellis Dickson (Beacon, $7.50).

Oboe players are . . . the unhappiest of musicians, constantly complaining and bemoaning their fate at having to play such an unpredictable, treacherous instrument.

A half-century of Boston Symphony leadership—top to bottom: Pierre Monteux, who served from 1919 to 1924; his successor, Serge Koussevitzky, whose illustrious tenure extended over a quarter-century; Charles Munch, who was the conductor from 1949 to 1962 (Erich Leinsdorf then held the post until 1969); the incumbent William Steinberg, who assumed the directorship at the beginning of the 1969-1970 season these pages valuable as well as entertaining.

There are plenty of conventional photographs, but a particular added treat are the dozen absolutely non-conventional caricatures by Olga Koussevitzky. They are among the very best of their kind. The conductor's widow has that rare, Matisse-like faculty of capturing the essence of her subject with a few lean lines. Obviously she could, if she wished, have a late-blooming career as an artist.

What remains most vividly in my mind after having finished the book is the profusion of anecdotes—they seem to fly by on every page! Some are familiar, of course, but I suspect that the majority of these will be new even to those readers who think they have heard 'em all. Here are a few selected at random:

At a party, Charles Munch asked if anyone could explain the game of baseball to him. Isaac Stern, Leonard Bernstein, and Eugene Istomin volunteered. A snatch of the conversation that ensued: ". . .Le pitcher jete le bal et vous le frappez et run like hell à first base."

Richard Burgin, the revered BSO concertmaster for many years, was notoriously absent-minded. At a party in honor of his 25th anniversary with the orchestra, much was said about his habit of borrowing mutes and then losing them. Accordingly, a large mute was hung around his neck and a bagful of mutes was presented to him. The next morning at rehearsal he turned to his partner and asked: "Do you have a mute?".

The following story in particular amused me because I so frequently opt for a conductor's observing repeats:

After the orchestra had been stoned (!) at a Franklin Park concert, the BSO bassoonist Matt Ruggiero came to the author (who was the conductor that night) and said: "No wonder they threw hat for just ng is more

.)
. But truth
sion is that ıam, Munch
. Of course
. On a per-loved for the son he was.
is said of ause, though nounced, he nductor and
his book was ir enough is ethods were nired for his conductors,
esting tidbit
son tells us
because the
ave the two
Their names
arvalho and
. concert and ıly, tasteful
40th Sym-irtuoso per-bear in mind
here. Dickposers in the
is the most
so exposed,
other hand
rand orches-Vagner, and their works
ally so easy!

Almost as revered by the orchestra was Dimitri Mitropoulos, also loved dearly as both man and musician.

The author claims that Danny Kaye (!) was one of the greatest guest conductors ever engaged by the Boston Symphony. Evidently this is not mere hyperbole, the "erudite" music critic of the Christian Science Monitor (unnamed) having said the same thing. (Accolades came also from Mitropoulos—". . .this man is a great conductor!"—William Steinberg, and Jean Martinon. Kaye cannot read a note of

Dickson cannot resist some amusing, albeit deprecating remarks about music critics. He quotes a scatological one-liner that must be among the most devastating reviews ever written: "Mr.—played last night in the Hollywood Bowl. They should have flushed it."

But enough. Let me conclude by recommending this book highly to anyone who is interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra in particular or the musical scene in general. It is light reading that manages to be as informative as well.

PROFILE: Medfield's William Stokking

Versatile Cellist Knows How

By NONA G. DEARTH
Patriot Ledger Staff Reporter

MEDFIELD — William Stokking of 25 Snyder Road, a cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 20th century Renaissance man.

Deeply immersed in music and literature, he is also an ardent naturalist, camper, sailor, pilot and teacher. He takes great pleasure in his family, and at the age of 36 he has gained enough wisdom to know that life must be more than a rat race. He intends to enjoy it and is thoroughly relaxed about his many duties and hobbies. His attitude is one of intense interest.

'Everybody Has Something'

"I don't feel an individual knows enough about any one thing," Bill says. "Everybody I come in contact with has something to offer, and I listen. It has helped me many times. I try to impress this on my students and on my children."

Bill Stokking began learning at an early age. Born in Atlantic City, N.J., he started to play a quarter-size cello when he was four years old. During his junior high school years, he had a prescholarship at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia where he took cello lessons once a week. His high school years were spent at the Curtis Institute on a full scholarship. For two of those years he studied with the great Piatvgorsky.

He then went on to the Julliard School in New York City, also on a full scholarship, where he studied with Felix Salmond until he entered the Korean War.

Joining the Navy, Bill was "fortunate to get into the United States Presidential Naval Orchestra in Washington, D.C.," as he puts it, where he was on the White House staff. He played at official functions, met world famous figures and observed the scene with an interested eye.

"But that's another story," he says.

After that pleasant tour of duty, he joined the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of George Szell, in 1959, remaining there for two years. Next, it was six years with the Philadelphia Symphony, under Eugene Ormandy. During that time, he was also solo cellist with the Chamber Orchestra in Philadelphia.

'Most Decent Group'

In 1968, Bill joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a move that made him extremely happy.

"I have found the Boston Symphony the most decent group anywhere," he says. "I had never before found an orchestral management so easy to work with. Other musical managements you work 'for'; the Boston Symphony you work 'with.' It is a very healthy relationship."

During these commitments, he also taught cello. He taught at the Cleveland Institute of Music, Glassborough State Teachers College and was on the faculty at Temple University. Last summer he was on the Boston University staff at the summer session in Tanglewood. He also has private students.

Bill Stokking's early and continuing passion for music was a natural outgrowth of his background. His father was a concert master and conductor of orchestras in Amsterdam and Sweden. After coming to this country, he conducted in the Philadelphia area, then became concert master in the internationally famous Walter Damrosch orchestra. They made recordings in the 1920s in Camden, N.J., birthplace of the recording industry.

Bill's literary leanings go back even further. An ancestor, Charles Perrault, wrote the classic French fairy tales in the 1700s, and a recent publication of Perrault's charming stories graces the 1,000-volume library in the Stokking home.

Bill states with pride that his ancestor's stories were the basis of the Grimms brothers' fairy tales.

Charmed By Medfield

Bill Stokking has fallen in love with Medfield and New England.

"Every other stone and tree has an historical significance," he says, and he is gathering all the facts into his fund of knowledge.

As a typical New England town, Medfield charms him.

"It is a very healthy town to live in," he believes. "The government, as I have seen it, the merchants, the police, the people at the post office are all wonderful. I found very dear friends here immediately."

Active In Town

Bill thinks Medfield is an ideal place to raise a family, and his wife, Nancy, and their three daughters — Lisa Kim, 14, Laura Beth, 12, and Lynn Alison, 10 — agree.

Mrs. Stokking, an accomplished pianist who frequently accompanies her husband at recitals, has become an active participant in Medfield life. The family belongs to the United Church of Christ, and Mrs. Stokking is director of a 10-member group of bell ringers, with a newly acquired set of bells from England. They are members of the New England Hand Bell Society.

The Stokkings also belong to the New 'N Town Club.

But it is especially for the children that Bill is so happy about settling in Medfield. He thinks the schools are good, and he is very pleased with the music department.

"It is well programmed," he says.

Buckingham's Palace

Living in Medfield, there is all outdoors for the family to enjoy. Bill built a barn behind the house for his oldest daughter's horse, Buckingham — and, of course, the barn is Buckingham's Palace.

Animals abound at the Stokking home, and they all have unique personalities. Bill describes the large white rabbit as "the grumpiest rabbit you've ever seen."

There are also twin goats, a chameleon, an iguana who lives in a dry aquarium and subsists on lettuce, and snakes, of the garter variety. Last summer there were 52 snakes, 39 of them born in their Stokking nest, to the delight of the children.

Bill and Nancy Stokking are obviously very proud of their children and take great pleasure in them. It is a family where love and respect are evident.

Sense Of Responsibility

"The kids love the beauty of nature," Bill says, "and also the beauty man has created. They look for the best in people. We have many books on religion so

MEDFIELD MUSICIAN WILLIAM SOKKING of 25 Snyder Road, Boston Symphony Orchestra, practices at home with his wife Nancy, a pianist who accompanies him at recitals. The Sokking family, which daughters, have "fallen in love" with Medfield and New England (Photo by Kenn

they
the Wi resp care selv
mon
Du takes natio of i famil hobb
he h
and build moto
Bill licens
to ta licens
pract purpo plane most and I
he pl
by pl settle
"Bu
settle rueful
'Ar
But intere
the co
Bill S
to mu being Sympl
He
the hi in the found widesp
"Ca attend
Boston
in it, amaze
when
The

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

DEC 27 1969

AMERICAN RECORD GUI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
JAN 1970

January, 1970

stones. You didn't make the repeat in the first movement of the symphony!"

A fascinating chapter is devoted to the personalities who make up the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Through recordings the music lovers of tomorrow will know the BSO for the magnificent instrument it is, but the flesh and blood of the orchestra no doubt will be better understood by those who know—as we learn here—that its ranks contain former amateur boxers, a bona fide Pentecostal minister, an expert auto mechanic, a former competitive speed-skater, an amateur astronomer, an ex-fighter pilot, a highly-accomplished tennis player who was the coach of his college team, several low-seventies golfers, etc. The first violist, Burton Fine, is a former N.A.S.A. employee who helped in the development of our space program. And absent-minded Richard Burgin was once the ranking bridge player of Massachusetts!

Properly, an entire chapter is devoted to Symphony Hall. It is interesting to note that the home of the BSO was the first concert room to be built in conformity with the acoustical laws of physics. Wallace C. Sabine of the Harvard physics department is credited with Symphony Hall's acoustics, which have been acclaimed by many as the finest in the world. In this perspective it is disheartening to realize that Philharmonic Hall in New York, which was built some 60 years later, has been a near-disaster acoustically. Whither science?

How does the BSO choose its musicians? The prospects are auditioned behind a curtain so that nothing but ability will influence the jury (usually the conductor and the first-desk men). One wonders, what with the recent charges of racist hiring policies levied against the New York Philharmonic, why the latter does not adopt this BSO practice. A spokesman for the Philharmonic once told me that behind-the-curtain-interviews were unsatisfactory because an examination of the artist's bowing or fingering techniques was important. This had always seemed to me a weak argument, and it seems weaker still when I consider that behind-the-curtain interviews have not had an adverse effect upon the high quality of the Boston Symphony.

The chapters on conductors were particularly fascinating. The author unequivocally believes that Koussevitzky was the greatest conductor who ever lived, but he nevertheless paints him as an unlovable and humorless man. At this point we must remind ourselves that to the orchestral musician, which the author of course is, the conductor is The Enemy—and Dickson even says as much in as many words. Koussevitzky must have been considered an unusually formidable enemy inasmuch as he enjoyed an unusually long tenure with the orchestra at a time when the men had no union to stand up for them. Dickson describes him as conceited and ruthless; the orchestra, we are told, was terrified of him. It was said that during his reign there were 105 players and 106 ulcers (one man had two). But at least it is gratifying to see the author affirm what we have always known: that Koussevitzky was, whatever his faults, the epitome of the instinctive "gut" conductor and the antithesis of the cerebral conductor. His strong points were unfailing musical instincts and good taste. The Boston Symphony "sound" under his direction was as much his as the equally celebrated Philadelphia Orchestra "sound" was Stokowski's. With his dynamic personality and iron will Koussevitzky could convince anyone that he was right, even when he was wrong. He even prevailed over composers in arguing about their own music! Yet somehow he instilled a pride in the orchestra such that after each concert its members were as wilted and emotionally spent as the conductor. And despite his tyranny he did have a high regard for his musicians. To him they were all "great artists" and before a trip he would "mother-hen" them to distraction, admonishing them to eat properly, rest, and dress warmly. He loved music as a passionate amateur, not a phlegmatic professional. This, more than anything else, probably accounted for his great achievements. His most intense dedication was given to every work he conducted—good, bad, or indifferent. Music-making of unique force and conviction was almost invariably the result.

Guest conductors are presented here in a generally favorable light. Partly, I should think, that is because they pose very little threat, not having the power to fire anyone.

Sir Thomas Beecham was loved by the men—for his wit, to be sure, but mostly for his attitude toward rehearsals. He hated them, and would as soon skip them as not.

Fritz Reiner was preceded by his reputation as a terror, but "no conductor was kinder to the orchestra."

Guido Cantelli, on the other hand, was temperamental and overbearing, walking off the stage once during a rehearsal. The BSO personnel manager, Rosario Mazzeo, made the mistake of addressing him as "Mister Cantelli". Cantelli replied: ". . .please, Mazzeo, don't call me 'Mister'. I am 'Maestro'. . . ." The next day he received a masterful comeuppance from Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall staff: "You know, Mister Cantelli, The title 'Mister' is an honored one in this country. Even the President is called 'Mister'. On the other hand, I have a barber who is called 'Maestro' by all his clients."

It will come as no surprise, perhaps, that Pierre Monteux was the most beloved of all BSO guest conductors. He emerges exactly as you would expect: benign, humane, experienced, knowledgeable, modest, and humorous, though at times politely sarcastic. In rehearsing with a singer who had been consistently flat, Monteux finally stopped, turned to her, and said, "Madame, would you kindly give us your 'A'!"

Almost as revered by the orchestra was Dimitri Mitropoulos, also loved dearly as both man and musician.

The author claims that Danny Kaye (!) was one of the greatest guest conductors ever engaged by the Boston Symphony. Evidently this is not mere hyperbole, the "erudite" music critic of the Christian Science Monitor (unnamed) having said the same thing. (Accolades came also from music; Martinon suggests that for just this reason his music-making is more instinctive, alive, and natural.)

Munch was well-liked, too. But truth to tell, the reader's impression is that this was because, like Beecham, Munch spent so little time rehearsing. Of course that was not the whole story. On a personal level Munch was much-loved for the generous, warm-hearted person he was.

Surprisingly, rather little is said of Erich Leinsdorf—perhaps because, though his retirement had been announced, he was still the incumbent conductor and hence a threat at the time this book was being written. What is clear enough is that Leinsdorf's rehearsal methods were resented even as he was admired for his musical knowledge.

Before leaving the subject of conductors, I ought to pass along an interesting tidbit related by the author. Dickson tells us that Koussevitzky resigned because the trustees would not let him have the two assistants he asked for. Their names were, and are, Eleazar de Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein.

The next time you attend a concert and politely applaud a musicianly, tasteful performance of the Mozart 40th Symphony or wildly applaud a virtuoso performance of Ein Heldenleben, bear in mind one of the "secrets" revealed here. Dickson tells us that of all the composers in the orchestral repertoire Mozart is the most difficult because his music is so exposed, pure, and meticulous. On the other hand musicians love to play the grand orchestral showpieces of Berlioz, Wagner, and Richard Strauss because all of their works that sound so difficult are really so easy!

Dickson cannot resist some amusing, albeit deprecating remarks about music critics. He quotes a scatological one-liner that must be among the most devastating reviews ever written: "Mr.—played last night in the Hollywood Bowl. They should have flushed it."

But enough. Let me conclude by recommending this book highly to anyone who is interested in the Boston Symphony

PROFILE: Medfield's William Stokking

Versatile Cellist Knows How To Enjo

By NONA G. DEARTH
Patriot Ledger Staff Reporter

MEDFIELD — William Stokking of 25 Snyder Road, a cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 20th century Renaissance man.

Deeply immersed in music and literature, he is also an ardent naturalist, camper, sailor, pilot and teacher. He takes great pleasure in his family, and at the age of 35 he has gained enough wisdom to know that life must be more than a rat race. He intends to enjoy it and is thoroughly relaxed about his many duties and hobbies. His attitude is one of intense interest.

'Everybody Has Something'

"I don't feel an individual knows enough about any one thing," Bill says. "Everybody I come in contact with has something to offer, and I listen. It has helped me many times. I try to impress this on my students and on my children."

Bill Stokking began learning at an early age. Born in Atlantic City, N.J., he started to play a quarter-size cello when he was four years old. During his junior high school years, he had a prescholarship at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia where he took cello lessons once a week. His high school years were spent at the Curtis Institute on a full scholarship. For two of those years he studied with the great Piatygorsky.

He then went on to the Julliard School in New York City, also on a full scholarship, where he studied with Felix Salmond until he entered the Korean War.

Joining the Navy, Bill was "fortunate to get into the United States Presidential Naval Orchestra in Washington, D.C.," as he puts it, where he was on the White House staff. He played at official functions, met world famous figures and observed the scene with an interested eye.

"But that's another story," he says.

After that pleasant tour of duty, he joined the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of George Szell, in 1959, remaining there for two years. Next, it was six years with the Philadelphia Symphony, under Eugene Ormandy. During that time, he was also solo cellist with the Chamber Orchestra in Philadelphia.

'Most Decent Group'

In 1968, Bill joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a move that made him extremely happy.

"I have found the Boston Symphony the most decent group anywhere," he says. "I had never before found an orchestral management so easy to work with. Other musical managements you work 'for'; the Boston Symphony you work 'with.' It is a very healthy relationship."

During these commitments, he also taught cello. He taught at the Cleveland Institute of Music, Glassborough State Teachers College and was on the faculty at Temple University. Last summer he was on the Boston University staff at the summer session in Tanglewood. He also has private students.

Bill Stokking's early and continuing passion for music was a natural outgrowth of his background. His father was a concert master and conductor of orchestras in Amsterdam and Sweden. After coming to this country, he conducted in the Philadelphia area, then became concert master in the internationally famous Walter Damrosch orchestra. They made recordings in the 1920s in Camden, N.J., birthplace of the recording industry.

Bill's literary leanings go back even further. An ancestor, Charles Perrault, wrote the classic French fairy tales in the 1700s, and a recent publication of Perrault's charming stories graces the 1,000-volume library in the Stokking home.

Bill states with pride that his ancester's stories were the basis of the Grimms brothers' fairy tales.

Charmed By Medfield

Bill Stokking has fallen in love with Medfield and New England.

"Every other stone and tree has an historical significance," he says, and he is gathering all the facts into his fund of knowledge.

As a typical New England town, Medfield charms him.

"It is a very healthy town to live in," he believes. "The government, as I have seen it, the merchants, the police, the people at the post office are all wonderful. I found very dear friends here immediately."

Active In Town

Bill thinks Medfield is an ideal place to raise a family, and his wife, Nancy, and their three daughters — Lisa Kim, 14, Laura Beth, 12, and Lynn Alison, 10 — agree.

Mrs. Stokking, an accomplished pianist who frequently accompanies her husband at recitals, has become an active participant in Medfield life. The family belongs to the United Church of Christ, and Mrs. Stokking is director of a 10-member group of bell ringers, with a newly acquired set of bells from England. They are members of the New England Hand Bell Society.

The Stokkings also belong to the New 'N Town Club.

But it is especially for the children that Bill is so happy about settling in Medfield. He thinks the schools are good, and he is very pleased with the music department.

"It is well programmed," he says.

Buckingham's Palace

Living in Medfield, there is all outdoors for the family to enjoy. Bill built a barn behind the house for his oldest daughter's horse, Buckingham — and, of course, the barn is Buckingham's Palace.

Animals abound at the Stokking home, and they all have unique personalities. Bill describes the large white rabbit as "the grumpiest rabbit you've ever seen."

There are also twin goats, a chameleon, an iguana who lives in a dry aquarium and subsists on lettuce, and snakes, of the garter variety. Last summer there were 52 snakes, 39 of them born in their Stokking nest, to the delight of the children.

Bill and Nancy Stokking are obviously very proud of their children and take great pleasure in them. It is a family where love and respect are evident.

Sense Of Responsibility

"The kids love the beauty of nature," Bill says, "and also the beauty man has created. They look for the best in people. We have many books on religion so they can understand and respect the beliefs of others."

With an ingrained sense of responsibility, the children take care of their animals themselves, maintaining them with money earned as babysitters.

During vacations, the family takes off in the camper, visiting national parks and other sites of interest. There is also a family interest in Bill's boating hobby. Ever since he was a boy he has built and owned boats and taken part in racing. He builds both the boats and the motors.

Bill holds a private pilot license and is just about ready to take his commercial pilot license test. His flying has a practical as well as pleasure purpose. He frequently hires a plane to fly to an engagement, most recently to Tanglewood and Long Island. Looking ahead, he plans to visit his daughters by plane when they marry and settle down.

"But they will probably all settle in Boston," he says ruefully.

'Aristocrat Of Orchestras'

But no matter what his outside interests are, no matter where the conversation wends its way, Bill Stokking inevitably returns to music and his pleasure in being a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He is especially delighted with the high level of cultural interest in the Boston area, which he found nowhere else in such a widespread degree.

"Cab drivers and gas station attendants known about the Boston Symphony and take pride in it," Bill says with some amazement. "It astonished me when I moved here a year ago."

The Boston Symphony, he

MEDFIELD MUSICIAN WILLIAM SOKKING of 25 Snyder Road, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, practices at home with his wife Nancy, an accomplished pianist who accompanies him at recitals. The Sokking family, which includes three daughters, have "fallen in love" with Medfield and New England.
(Photo by Kenneth F. McLean)

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
DEC 27 1969

AMERICAN RECORD GUI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1970

viction was almost invariably the result.

Guest conductors are presented here in a generally favorable light. Partly, I should think, that is because they pose very little threat, not having the power to fire anyone.

Sir Thomas Beecham was loved by the men—for his wit, to be sure, but mostly for his attitude toward rehearsals. He hated them, and would as soon skip them as not.

Fritz Reiner was preceded by his reputation as a terror, but "no conductor was kinder to the orchestra."

Guido Cantelli, on the other hand, was temperamental and overbearing, walking off the stage once during a rehearsal. The BSO personnel manager, Rosario Mazzeo, made the mistake of addressing him as "Mister Cantelli". Cantelli replied: ". . .please, Mazzeo, don't call me 'Mister'. I am 'Maestro'. . . ." The next day he received a masterful comeuppance from Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall staff: "You know, Mister Cantelli, The title 'Mister' is an honored one in this country. Even the President is called 'Mister'. On the other hand, I have a barber who is called 'Maestro' by all his clients."

It will come as no surprise, perhaps, that Pierre Monteux was the most beloved of all BSO guest conductors. He emerges exactly as you would expect: benign, humane, experienced, knowledgeable, modest, and humorous, though at times politely sarcastic. In rehearsing with a singer who had been consistently flat, Monteux finally stopped, turned to her, and said, "Madame, would you kindly give us your 'A'!"

Almost as revered by the orchestra was Dimitri Mitropoulos, also loved dearly as both man and musician.

The author claims that Danny Kaye (!) was one of the greatest guest conductors ever engaged by the Boston Symphony. Evidently this is not mere hyperbole, the "erudite" music critic of the Christian Science Monitor (unnamed) having said the same thing. (Accolades came also from Mitropoulos—". . .this man is a great conductor!"—William Steinberg, and Jean Martinon. Kaye cannot read a note of music; Martinon suggests that for just this reason his music-making is more instinctive, alive, and natural.)

Munch was well-liked, too. But truth to tell, the reader's impression is that this was because, like Beecham, Munch spent so little time rehearsing. Of course that was not the whole story. On a personal level Munch was much-loved for the generous, warm-hearted person he was.

Surprisingly, rather little is said of Erich Leinsdorf—perhaps because, though his retirement had been announced, he was still the incumbent conductor and hence a threat at the time this book was being written. What is clear enough is that Leinsdorf's rehearsal methods were resented even as he was admired for his musical knowledge.

Before leaving the subject of conductors, I ought to pass along an interesting tidbit related by the author. Dickson tells us that Koussevitzky resigned because the trustees would not let him have the two assistants he asked for. Their names were, and are, Eleazar de Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein.

The next time you attend a concert and politely applaud a musicianly, tasteful performance of the Mozart 40th Symphony or wildly applaud a virtuoso performance of Ein Heldenleben, bear in mind one of the "secrets" revealed here. Dickson tells us that of all the composers in the orchestral repertoire Mozart is the most difficult because his music is so exposed, pure, and meticulous. On the other hand musicians love to play the grand orchestral showpieces of Berlioz, Wagner, and Richard Strauss because all of their works that sound so difficult are really so easy!

Dickson cannot resist some amusing, albeit deprecating remarks about music critics. He quotes a scatological one-liner that must be among the most devastating reviews ever written: "Mr.—played last night in the Hollywood Bowl. They should have flushed it."

But enough. Let me conclude by recommending this book highly to anyone who is interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra in particular or the musical scene in general. It is light reading that manages to be as informative as well.

stones. You didn't make the repeat in the first movement of the symphony!"

A fascinating chapter is devoted to the personalities who make up the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Through recordings the music lovers of tomorrow will know the BSO for the magnificent instrument it is, but the flesh and blood of the orchestra no doubt will be better understood by those who know—as we learn here—that its ranks contain former amateur boxers, a bona fide Pentecostal minister, an expert auto mechanic, a former competitive speed-skater, an amateur astronomer, an ex-fighter pilot, a highly-accomplished tennis player who was the coach of his college team, several low-seventies golfers, etc. The first violist, Burton Fine, is a former N.A.S.A. employee who helped in the development of our space program. And absent-minded Richard Burgin was once the ranking bridge player of Massachusetts!

Properly, an entire chapter is devoted to Symphony Hall. It is interesting to note that the home of the BSO was the first concert room to be built in conformity with the acoustical laws of physics. Wallace C. Sabine of the Harvard physics department is credited with Symphony Hall's acoustics, which have been acclaimed by many as the finest in the world. In this perspective it is disheartening to realize that Philharmonic Hall in New York, which was built some 60 years later, has been a near-disaster acoustically. Whither science?

How does the BSO choose its musicians? The prospects are auditioned behind a curtain so that nothing but ability will influence the jury (usually the conductor and the first-desk men). One wonders, what with the recent charges of racist hiring policies levied against the New York Philharmonic, why the latter does not adopt this BSO practice. A spokesman for the Philharmonic once told me that behind-the-curtain-interviews were unsatisfactory because an examination of the artist's bowing or fingering techniques adverse effect upon the high quality of the Boston Symphony.

The chapters on conductors were particularly fascinating. The author unequivocally believes that Koussevitzky was the greatest conductor who ever lived, but he nevertheless paints him as an unlovable and humorless man. At this point we must remind ourselves that to the orchestral musician, which the author of course is, the conductor is The Enemy—and Dickson even says as much in as many words. Koussevitzky must have been considered an unusually formidable enemy inasmuch as he enjoyed an unusually long tenure with the orchestra at a time when the men had no union to stand up for them. Dickson describes him as conceited and ruthless; the orchestra, we are told, was terrified of him. It was said that during his reign there were 105 players and 106 ulcers (one man had two). But at least it is gratifying to see the author affirm what we have always known: that Koussevitzky was, whatever his faults, the epitome of the instinctive "gut" conductor and the antithesis of the cerebral conductor. His strong points were unfailing musical instincts and good taste. The Boston Symphony "sound" under his direction was as much his as the equally celebrated Philadelphia Orchestra "sound" was Stokowski's. With his dynamic personality and iron will Koussevitzky could convince anyone that he was right, even when he was wrong. He even prevailed over composers in arguing about their own music! Yet somehow he instilled a pride in the orchestra such that after each concert its members were as wilted and emotionally spent as the conductor. And despite his tyranny he did have a high regard for his musicians. To him they were all "great artists" and before a trip he would "mother-hen" them to distraction, admonishing them to eat properly, rest, and dress warmly. He loved music as a passionate amateur, not a phlegmatic professional. This, more than anything else, probably accounted for his

PROFILE: Medfield's William Stokking

Versatile Cellist Knows How To

By NONA G. DEARTH
Patriot Ledger Staff Reporter

MEDFIELD — William Stokking of 25 Snyder Road, a cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 20th century Renaissance man.

Deeply immersed in music and literature, he is also an ardent naturalist, camper, sailor, pilot and teacher. He takes great pleasure in his family, and at the age of 36 he has gained enough wisdom to know that life must be more than a rat race. He intends to enjoy it and is thoroughly relaxed about his many duties and hobbies. His attitude is one of intense interest.

'Everybody Has Something'

"I don't feel an individual knows enough about any one thing," Bill says. "Everybody I come in contact with has something to offer, and I listen. It has helped me many times. I try to impress this on my students and on my children."

Bill Stokking began learning at an early age. Born in Atlantic City, N.J., he started to play a quarter-size cello when he was four years old. During his junior high school years, he had a prescholarship at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia where he took cello lessons once a week. His high school years were spent at the Curtis Institute on a full scholarship. For two of those years he studied with the great Piatvgorsky.

He then went on to the Julliard School in New York City, also on a full scholarship, where he studied with Felix Salmond until he entered the Korean War.

Joining the Navy, Bill was "fortunate to get into the United States Presidential Naval Orchestra in Washington, D.C.," as he puts it, where he was on the White House staff. He played at official functions, met world famous figures and observed the scene with an interested eye.

"But that's another story," he says.

After that pleasant tour of duty, he joined the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of George Szell, in 1959, remaining there for two years. Next, it was six years with the Philadelphia Symphony, under Eugene Ormandy. During that time, he was also solo cellist with the Chamber Orchestra in Philadelphia.

'Most Decent Group'

In 1968, Bill joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a move that made him extremely happy.

"I have found the Boston Symphony the most decent group anywhere," he says. "I had never before found an orchestral management so easy to work with. Other musical managements you work 'for'; the Boston Symphony you work 'with.' It is a very healthy relationship."

During these commitments, he also taught cello. He taught at the Cleveland Institute of Music, Glassborough State Teachers College and was on the faculty at Temple University. Last summer he was on the Boston University staff at the summer session in Tanglewood. He also has private students.

Bill Stokking's early and continuing passion for music was a natural outgrowth of his background. His father was a concert master and conductor of orchestras in Amsterdam and Sweden. After coming to this country, he conducted in the Philadelphia area, then became concert master in the internationally famous Walter Damrosch orchestra. They made recordings in the 1920s in Camden, N.J., birthplace of the recording industry.

Bill's literary leanings go back even further. An ancestor, Charles Perrault, wrote the classic French fairy tales in the 1700s, and a recent publication of Perrault's charming stories graces the 1,000-volume library in the Stokking home.

Bill states with pride that his ancestor's stories were the basis of the Grimms brothers' fairy tales.

Charmed By Medfield

Bill Stokking has fallen in love with Medfield and New England.

"Every other stone and tree has an historical significance," he says, and he is gathering all the facts into his fund of knowledge.

As a typical New England town, Medfield charms him.

"It is a very healthy town to live in," he believes. "The government, as I have seen it, the merchants, the police, the people at the post office are all wonderful. I found very dear friends here immediately."

Active In Town

Bill thinks Medfield is an ideal place to raise a family, and his wife, Nancy, and their three daughters — Lisa Kim, 14, Laura Beth, 12, and Lynn Alison, 10 — agree.

Mrs. Stokking, an accomplished pianist who frequently accompanies her husband at recitals, has become an active participant in Medfield life. The family belongs to the United Church of Christ, and Mrs. Stokking is director of a 10-member group of bell ringers, with a newly acquired set of bells from England. They are members of the New England Hand Bell Society.

The Stokkings also belong to the New 'N Town Club.

But it is especially for the children that Bill is so happy about settling in Medfield. He thinks the schools are good, and he is very pleased with the music department.

"It is well programmed," he says.

Buckingham's Palace

Living in Medfield, there is all outdoors for the family to enjoy. Bill built a barn behind the house for his oldest daughter's horse, Buckingham — and, of course, the barn is Buckingham's Palace.

Animals abound at the Stokking home, and they all have unique personalities. Bill describes the large white rabbit as "the grumpiest rabbit you've ever seen."

There are also twin goats, a chameleon, an iguana who lives in a dry aquarium and subsists on lettuce, and snakes, of the garter variety. Last summer there were 52 snakes, 39 of them born in their Stokking nest, to the delight of the children.

Bill and Nancy Stokking are obviously very proud of their children and take great pleasure in them. It is a family where love and respect are evident.

Sense Of Responsibility

"The kids love the beauty of nature," Bill says, "and also the beauty man has created. They look for the best in people. We have many books on religion so they can underst the beliefs of othe

With an ingr responsibility, th selves, maintain care of their money earned as

During vacatio takes off in the national parks of interest. The family interest i hobby. Ever sinc he has built an and taken part builds both the motors.

Bill holds a license and is ju to take his co license test. His practical as we purpose. He free plane to fly to most recently and Long Island. he plans to visit by plane when t settle down.

"But they wil settle in Bosto ruefully.

'Aristocrat Of

But no matter interests are, no the conversation Bill Stokking ine to music and h being a member Symphony Orches

He is especially the high level of in the Boston a found nowhere widespread degre

"Cab drivers a attendants know Boston Symphony in it," Bill sa amazement. "It when I moved he

The Boston

MEDFIELD MUSICIAN WILLIAM SOKKING of 25 Snyder Road, cellist wi Boston Symphony Orchestra, practices at home with his wife Nancy, an accomp pianist who accompanies him at recitals. The Sokking family, which includes daughters, have "fallen in love" with Medfield and New England.
(Photo by Kenneth F. Mc

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(F) 66,387

DEC 27 1969

158.

Arthur Fiedler with his family

Arthur Fiedler becomes an Honorary Police Commissioner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

Wednesday December 17 1969 at 8.30

GALA CONCERT
IN CELEBRATION OF
ARTHUR FIEDLER'S 75TH BIRTHDAY

GALA CONCERT
IN CELEBRATION OF
ARTHUR FIEDLER'S 75TH BIRTHDAY

Wednesday December 17 1969 at 8.30

ARTHUR FIEDLER conducting the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 9 in E minor 'From the New World' op. 95
Adagio – allegro molto
Largo
Scherzo: molto vivace
Allegro con fuoco

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat op. 23*
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso – allegro con spirito
Andantino semplice – allegro vivace assai
Allegro con fuoco
MISHA DICHTER

RESPIGHI — 'Pines of Rome', symphonic poem
The pines of the Villa Borghese
Pines near a catacomb
The pines of the Janiculum
The pines of the Appian Way

Misha Dichter plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS*

159

The day they all feted Fiedler

His own fire truck

At his 75th anniversary celebrations Arthur Fiedler's wife and children presented him with a fire truck — to add to his collection of firemen's helmets.

By Louis Snyder

By official proclamation of Gov. Francis Sargent, Wednesday was "Arthur Fiedler Day" throughout Massachusetts. Ostensibly, the reason was to recognize the popular and energetic maestro's 75th birthday, and the benefit non-Pop Boston Symphony concert that he conducted that night.

However, it turned into an occasion that not only Boston and the state, but the world, had been waiting for, these many years—an opportunity for legions of Fiedler admirers in every field of endeavor to let him know how highly they prize him for his long record of accomplishments in the cause of music, and for just being a lovable man.

Magic fire music

In the morning, Mr. Fiedler, noted as a fire "spark," found a birthday surprise parked in front of his Brookline home—a 1939 pumper for his very own, acquired in New Hampshire by his wife and son, Peter. Also on hand were photographers, television cameras, radio mikes, well wishers, and a large complement of the Brookline and Boston fire and police departments, who proceeded to escort him in his new-old fire truck, sirens crescendoing, on a four-hour triumphant trip to his Symphony Hall rehearsal.

In the evening, the large Symphony Hall audience rose as one when Mr. Fiedler came onstage to direct the BSO in a program which included Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 with Misha Dichter as soloist, and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Throughout the concert, he conducted with the musicianly beat for which he has long been famous, and the result was a gorgeous outpouring of sound from the orchestra (a handsome musical present from them), and a technically brilliant keyboard performance by young Mr. Dichter. Proceeds from the evening went to the Arthur Fiedler Boston Pops Fund, recently established in his honor, to broaden the base of live music and provide performing opportunities for young musicians.

Warm words

Another fire-engine ride from Symphony Hall to Prudential Tower followed the concert. There, at a reception attended by more than 700 friends and associates, Mr. Fiedler heard words of praise and affection added to those already received from President Nixon, former President and Mrs. Johnson, and an international array of notables.

With WHDH's Vin Maloney as master of ceremonies, Talcott Banks (BSO Trustees chairman), Harry Ellis Dickson (of Pops and Esplanade concerts), Admiral William Ellis, (commanding officer), New England area, U.S. Coast Guard), Chief Joseph Kilduff (Boston Fire Department), Deputy Superintendent Oscar DuBois (Boston Police Department), Gen. Richard E. McLaughlin chairman of the birthday committee and representing Governor Sargent), Mayor Kevin White, Gerhard Bleicken (John Hancock Mutual Life), Francis W. Hatch and John Cahill (No. 1 Fiedler fan), all expressed sentiments which could only have been music to the ears of Mr. Fiedler and his family.

Birthday presents

Before the evening was over, Mr. Fiedler was promoted to honorary seaman first class in the Coast Guard; became an honorary fire commissioner and received a desk set from the fire department; was presented with a plaque emblazoned with an honorary police commissionership; and was presented with the Governor's state "Fiedler Day" proclamation, a bound volume of the congratulatory messages that have poured in to wish him many happy returns, Mayor White's Boston "Fiedler Day" citation, the original solid gold Arthur Fiedler medal, especially designed and struck for the occasion, and a huge "Esplanade" cake.

Mr. Fiedler was understandably touched by it all, and brief in his expression of gratitude—it had been a long, full day. But as Mayor White remarked, "Politicians don't survive as long as musicians," and, as Mr. Dickson predicted, in the future there is every possibility that Mr. Fiedler, after having toured the Moon with his newly organized Sea of Tranquillity Symphony, will rocket off to be the first guest conductor of the Mars Philharmonic.

Fiedler Favors Commitments Over Birthdays at 75

By LOUIS CALTA

Someone asked Arthur Fiedler yesterday whether birthdays should be celebrated or ignored. The reply from the silver-maned maestro, who recently was feted on his 75th birthday, was swift and not to be doubted: "It should be ignored, especially after your 30th year."

The question was raised at a luncheon at the Four Seasons, 52d Street and Park Avenue, honoring the conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra for his birthday and for his impending 35th anniversary of his association with R.C.A. Records as a recording artist.

'Sort of New Year's Party'

But, Mr. Fiedler, who flew in from Brookline, Mass., where he resides, for the occasion, had wired ahead that it was not to be considered a birthday party. His arm was in a sling because of bursitis, he explained.

Acceding to Mr. Fiedler's request, Norman Racusin, president of RCA Records, which sponsored the luncheon, agreed to dub it "a sort of New Year's Eve party."

"We are here," he told more than a score of guests attending the luncheon, "to pay our respects to a giant in the music world, to one of the few people who have kept pace with all the changes in the music field."

The occasion also might have been considered a Hail-and-Farewell event for Mr. Fiedler and RCA Records, which the conductor will be leaving in August. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Fiedler has been an integral part of the past 55 years, has signed new recording contracts with Deutsche Gramaphone and Mr. Fiedler has no choice but to go along with the orchestra in its new association.

A spokesman for RCA Records estimated that more than 47 million records of Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra have been sold in the past several decades. "It places him up in the same category of sales as Elvis Presley, the Beatles, Eddie Arnold and Bing Crosby," he said.

Mr. Fiedler winced at the mention of retirement. "I would be bored to death," he remarked.

His future plans? "I'm flying to Houston tonight to prepare for the annual New Year's concert with the Houston Symphony Orchestra."

After that, he will return to Boston to do a series of pop concerts in Massachusetts and then go to Washington to begin arrangements for an extensive tour with the National Symphony Orchestra.

On Jan. 5, together with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he will record the Dvorak New World Symphony for RCA Records.

Mr. Fiedler said he was not aware of the advancing years. "I don't know whether I'm fortunate or not. People ask me about my age and I have to pause and think."

The conductor, who was born in Boston on Dec. 17, 1894, is "happy with what I'm doing." "If I had had to do anything else," he added, "it might have been medicine."

41 Years of Pops Concerts

Mr. Fiedler has been conducting the Pops concerts for 41 years with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts are presented while the audience sips lemonade, light wines and beer to the sound of music. Mr. Fiedler has no use for those "snobs" who look down their noses at everything but the most highbrow music.

"I think there's good rock'n' roll and bad rock'n' roll. It's important that teenagers listen to music because eventually they'll tire of one type and listen to the other," Mr. Fiedler said.

N. Y. Times 12/30/69

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 4 1969

Gala concert to honor Fiedler's 75th

The program for the gala Symphony Hall concert in celebration of the 75th Birthday of Brookline's Arthur Fiedler Dec. 17 at 8:30 p.m., will include Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, "New World," Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, and Respighi's The Pines of Rome (1924). Fiedler will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with pianist Misha Dichter as soloist.

Mischa Dichter first appeared with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in August of 1966, after winning top honors in the Tchaikovsky contest in Moscow. Since then he has given recitals throughout the United States and has performed with many major symphony orchestras.

Proceeds from the Dec. 17 Fiedler Birthday Gala go to the Fiedler Fund, founded by friends and admirers of Arthur Fiedler. The Fiedler Fund is dedicated to insuring the Fiedler spirit and style of music-making for the future, both through the Boston Pops and the Esplanade Concerts which he founded forty years ago.

Following the concert, Patrons are invited to a Birthday Party to be held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower in the private rooms of the New England Merchants National Bank. The party offers Patrons not only a champagne buffet, but an opportunity to join Arthur Fiedler's many celebrated friends in wishing him a personal Happy Birthday.

Tickets for Dec. 17 are priced at $4.50, 5, 6, 6.50, 7, 8, and 10, and are available in person or by mail from the Box Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115. A limited number of tax deductible Patron's tickets is available at $75.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 4 1969

Symphony Concert

The program for the gala Symphony Hall concert in celebration of Arthur Fiedler's 75th Birthday, Dec. 17, at 8:30 p.m., will include Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, "New World," Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, and Respighi's The Pines of Rome (1924). Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with pianist Misha Dichter as soloist.

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
DEC 4 1969

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
DEC 4 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
DEC 4 1969

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000
DEC 4 1969

Arthur Fiedler's 75th Birthday Concert Dec. 7

The program for the gala Symphony Hall concert in celebration of Arthur Fiedler's 75th birthday December 17 at 8:30 p.m. will include Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, "New World", Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, and Respighi's The Pines of Rome (1924). Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with pianist Misha Dichter as soloist.

Misha Dichter first appeared with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in August of 1966, after winning top honors in the Tchaikovsky contest in Moscow. Since then he has given recitals throughout the United States and has performed with many major symphony orchestras.

Proceeds from the December 17 Fiedler birthday gala go to the Fiedler Fund, founded by friends and admirers of Arthur Fiedler. The Fiedler Fund is dedicated to insuring the Fiedler spirit and style of music-making for the future, both through the Boston Pops and the Esplanade Concerts which he founded 40 years ago.

Following the concert, patrons are invited to a birthday party to be held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower in the private rooms of the New England Merchants National Bank. The party offers patrons not only a champagne buffet, but an opportunity to join Arthur Fiedler's many celebrated friends in wishing him a personal Happy Birthday.

Tickets for December 17 are available in person or by mail from the box office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115. A limited number of tax deductible patron's tickets is available.

RECORD-TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,860
DEC 4 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 2 1969

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Arthur Fiedler to Conduct BSO Dec. 17 on his 75th Birthday

THE MUSIC MAN of Boston, alias Arthur Fiedler, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday evening, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall to celebrate his 75th birthday. Last March, he conducted the Boston Fire Department band at a party at the Sheraton Plaza in honor of his more than half a century of distinguished service in the world of music.

Mischa Dicter will be the soloist and the program will include Dvorak's New World Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concert No. 1 and Respighi's The Pines of Rome. Proceeds from the birthday gala will go to the Arthur Fiedler Fund, founded by friends and admirers of Arthur Fiedler.

The fund is dedicated to insuring the Fiedler style of music-making for the future, both through the Pops Concerts and the Esplanade Concerts, founded by Arthur Fiedler 40 years ago.

After the concert, patrons are invited to a birthday party to be held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower in the private rooms of the New England Merchants National Bank. The party will include not only a champagne buffet, but also an opportunity to join Arthur Fiedler's many friends in wishing him a Happy Birthday.

Tickets are priced at $4.50, $5, $6, $6.50, $7, $8, and $10, and are available in person or by mail from the box office at Symphony Hall. A limited number of tax deductible patron's tickets may be had at $75.

* * *

RCA Records to Fete Fiedler At a Luncheon Marking 75th Birthday

Arthur Fiedler, veteran maestro of the Boston Pops, will be given a "hail and farewell" luncheon in New York Monday (29) by RCA Records. Occasion marks Fiedler's 75th birthday and his upcoming 35th year of continuous association with RCA as a recording artist. During that time, he has been the bestselling artist on the Red Seal label.

The luncheon also portends Fiedler's exit from the RCA roster to join the Deutsche Grammaphon international setup, represented in the U.S. by the Polydor label. Fiedler was part of the deal under which the Boston Symphony will be moving to DGG in the summer of 1970.

In the meantime, however, RCA has a vast catalog of Boston Pops albums which it will continue to promote both in disk and tape form.

Variety 12/24/69

160.

A good old fashioned Fiedler day

Classical records

By RICHARD D. FREED

(Reprinted from the Alice Tully Hall Program, with the permission of the publisher, Saturday Review, Inc.)

This has been a year of more than a few significant musical anniversaries — for composers, for performers and for institutions. The Berlioz centenary has been marked by many special events, conductor Karl Bohm was saluted with a special Mozart album honoring his seventy-fifth birthday in August, and milestones in the third category have included the centenary of the opening of the Vienna State Opera in May and the twentieth anniversary of the Schwann Long Playing Record Catalog, observed in October. December 17 must be regarded as a date of consequence in two of these categories, for that is the birthday of Arthur Fiedler, and no one would deny that the conductor of the Boston Pops, seventy-five this month, is himself an institution as well as a performer.

Arthur Fiedler displays baton technique.

Fiedler's tenure itself is without parallel in the annals of American orchestras. He became conductor of the Pops in 1930, which means that, while he will not observe his fortieth anniversary in the post until next year, he actually conducted his fortieth season of Pops concerts in Symphony Hall this year. It means, too, that he has surpassed the record previously held by Frederick Stock, who served as conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra from 1905 until his death in 1942. (The closest runner-up today is Eugene Ormandy, five years younger than Fiedler, whose association with The Philadelphia Orchestra goes back to 1936.)

As a recording artist, too Fiedler has a career unmatched for its combination of longevity, versatility and impressive sales figures. He and the Pops have been recording for RCA since 1935, and during that period he has enjoyed the status of being the "best - selling" conductor among those represented on all the world's "classical" labels. For years, in the pre-LP era, the Fiedler disc of Jacob Gade's tango Jalousie and the "Ritual Fire Dance" from Falla's El Amor Brujo (Victor 12160) was the most successful "classical" record in any catalogue. Naturally, Jalousie has been remade more than once: the current Pops version is in a collection of Latin-flavored pieces on RCA LSC-2661.

Jalousie, of course, is not the only title in the Fiedler discography to be repeated; most of the pieces on 78s have been recorded at least once on microgroove. His two current versions of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue (one with Peter Nero as pianist, on LSC-2821, the other with Earl Wild, on LSC-2367 or, with different discmates, LSC-2746) may remind one that the first full-dress, uncut recording of the work was the one Fiedler and the Pops made with Jesus Maria Sanroma, with whom they later recorded the Gershwin Concerto (which Fiedler has also remade with both Nero, on LSC-3025, and Wild, on LSC-2586) and several other works, including the only recording to date of the Paderewski Concerto in A minor (on 78s, Victor DM-614) and the first one of the MacDowell D-minor (DM-324, also Camden LP CAL-145).

The Rhapsody in Blue was one of the first Boston Pops recordings, packaged with Strike Up the Band on side 4. Among the other early releases were such titles as Rimsky - Korsakov's Capriccio espagnol, two of Ippolitov - Ivanov's Caucasian Sketches, the "Dance of the Hours" from La Gioconda, the Grand March from Aida, Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance No. 1, the Largo from Xerxes, the "Meditation" from Thais, two dances from film musicals—The Carioca and The Continental — and the Strauss waltz Wo die Zitronen bluh'n. All of these have been remade on LP, though not all of them are available now.

The Zitronenwalzer, performed with its magical introduction and coda intact, was obviously a labor of love. Fiedler was sent to Europe to study when he was in his teens, and while he was there he played the violin in the great Strauss Orchestra, then conducted by Johann Strauss III, son of the Waltz King's youngest brother, Eduard who died earlier this year, the last of the Strauss family musicians). He absorbed the idiom so well that his first Strauss recording, the Zitronenwalzer, was hailed as "more Viennese than the Viennese," and the long list of Strauss recordings that followed included the first really complete orchestral version of Wein, Weib und Gesang as well as such delicious rarities as the Lagunen-Walzer and Neu Wien. That these last two titles have not been remade on microgroove is an oversight which must be remedied at once — surely before Fiedler's birthday. A recent and resplendent Wein, Weib und Gesang is part of the Strauss collection on LSC-2928, and an up-to-date Zitronenwalzer may be found in the package of waltzes by the three brothers Strauss on LSC-2028. A word of caution is in order regarding the latter disc, however: the entire introduction to Josef Strauss's Dynamiden has been orbitrarily hacked off—although it was intact on the mono edition of the same recording (LM-2028), which is no longer available.

The assortment offered in the first few Boston Pops releases set a pattern that was to be expanded with spectacular success over the ensuing three-and-a-half decades: "standard repertory" alternating with the lightest of lightweight 'pops." Side by side with such offerings as Turkey in the Straw and Raymond Scott's The Toy Trumpet were outstanding recordings of Beethoven's Consecration of the House Overture and Falla's Three-Cornered Hat Suite. With the first recording of Kodaly's Dances from Galanta and authoritative performances of overtures by Weber and Rossini came such gems as Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom-De-Ay, Eili Eili and The Arkansas Traveler. In recent years songs by the Beatles, tunes from Broadway musicals and more movies and even television commercials have found their way into the Fiedler discography, which also includes records with such jazz and "country-and-western" figures as Stan Getz, Chet Atkins and Al Hirt.

Next year, when the current RCA contract expires, Arthur Fiedler will have completed thirty-five years of uninterrupted affiliation with that label, and at that time both the Pops and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to enter into a new association with Deutsche Grammophon. It does not seem too likely that, having made three recordings each of such titles as Gaite Parisienne and the Rhapsody in Blue, Fiedler will round out his RCA commitment or begin his DGG activity with a fourth, and every Boston Pops fan (which means just about everyone who listens to records) has his own hopes for the new repertory. There are still some of the 78-r.p.m. titles to be remade — the Lagunen-Walzer and Neu Wien, already mentioned, and perhaps Goldmark's Sakuntala Overture and Max Schonherr's setting of Die sieben Spriinge — and there are works which have somehow escaped Fiedler's attention on records, such as the Scarlatti-Tommasini ballet The Good-Humoured Ladies. Anyone who knows Arthur Fiedler, though, must suspect that if it were left up to him he would like to revive the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta, and to do it on more than an ad hoc basis.

Back in the late Thirties, Fiedler used to tour and record with his chamber orchestra. Their small discography included the first recording of Hindemith's viola concerto Der Schwanendreher, with the composer as soloist, some organ concertos by Handel and Corelli, with E. Power Biggs, Mozart's Divertimento in B flat (K. 287) and Serenade for Winds in C minor (K. 388), the first recording of Telemann's Don Quichotte Suite and the only version of a charming Christmas Symphony by Gaetano Maria Schiassi (which ought to be reissued if not be remade). A few years ago, Fiedler conducted an "Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta" in recordings of Handel and Haydn organ concertos and Mozart's Epistle Sonatas, all with Carl Weinrich, but this was not the real thing: it was a "pickup" group of fine New York musicians, not the Fiedler Sinfonietta as of old. One hopes "the real thing" may yet be revived. It would be worthwhile for a new version of the Schiassi alone.

Herald Tribune - 12/21-69

Arthur Fiedler tests famed instruments which Boston Symphony violist Yizhak Schotten will play in his Jordan Hall recital Wednesday Jan. 21. The instrument belonged to the violist of the famous Kneisel Quartet of which Mrs. Fiedler's father, Emmanuel, had been a member. The Pops conductor, himself a former viola player, pronounced the instrument "outstanding in tone."

15 | January 4, 1970 HT

A rare Gasparo da Salò viola, played by Louis Svecenski throughout his career as violist with the Kneisel Quartet and as Boston Symphony member, will be used by a current BSO violist, Yizhak Schotton, at his debut recital in Jordan Hall on Jan. 21. The instrument, long in the Pitcairn Collection in Philadelphia, will be played in a program including works by Bach, Boccherini, Brahms, Hindemith, and Michael Colgrass, in which Mr. Schotton will be joined by Betsy Moyer, harpsichordist; Victor Rosenbaum, pianist, and Frank Epstein, percussionist. CSM 12/31/69

Philharmonic Concert Jan. 4

The N.H. Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Rolland Tapley, violinist of the Boston Symphony, will present its first concert of the 11th season at Memorial High School, Manchester, Sunday, Jan. 4 at 8 p.m.

Guest soloist for this concert will be Fredy Ostrovsky, violinist of the Boston Symphony, playing Saint-Saens violin concerto, No. 3.

Ostrovsky was born in Sofia, Bulgaria. At the age of 13 he went to Vienna and graduated with highest honors from the State Academy of Music. From there he went to London to study under the renowned violinist, Carl Flesch.

Coming to the United States in 1940, he was a student at the Berkshire Music Center.

After serving in the U.S. Army for three years during World War II, he was concertmaster for Paul Whiteman in New York, worked for the American Broadcasting Company and also played with the Little Orchestra Society in New York.

Ostrovsky joined the Boston Symphony in 1952 and has given recitals around the greater Boston area as well as being soloist with the Boston Pops. He has published violin pieces and made recordings.

He owns and plays a priceless violin made by Andreas Guarnerius in 1678 and collects rare bows and rare books on music.

Other selections on the program for the orchestra are Jules Massenet's tragic overture, "Phedra"; Jean Sibelius' First Symphony; and Henry Hadley's "Sipapu," a ritualistic Indian dance from the "Legend of Hani."

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
(E) 9,318
JAN 2 1970

Harold Banks – Fiedler Has Some RCA Record

23 Record American, Boston, Tuesday, Dec. 30, 1969

A figure that speaks volumes: Sales of William Manchester's book, "Death of a President," parts of which were objectionable to Sen. Robert F. Kennedy and Jackie Onassis have thus far racked up more than $1,000,000 in royalties for the JFK Memorial Library.

The voice that responded on Mayor White's private office phone the other morning obviously wasn't his, but the greeting was politically astute. "What can I do for you?" the voice asked. It happened to be 10-year-old Caitlin White, who had grabbed the phone before her father could reach it.

It doesn't seem right that Helen Averill's birthday on New Year's Day should go unnoted. She'll turn 100 years old then. She's at the William Francis Nursing Home at 11 Woodbridge st., North Cambridge — and she has no relatives.

The reason he lost that tooth while he was at the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary, says Executive Councilor Sonny McDonough, is because it couldn't stand any more of his "jawing." McDonough leaves Jan. 8 to spend a couple of months at his hut in Marathon on Florida's Vaca Key, from which he says he can get back here in a couple of hours if his presence is required at an Executive Council meeting.

The last of the three original Supremes is Mary Wilson, who may merely be waiting for a publisher with the right approach. She kept a secret daily diary of her 10 years with the group. In it are supposed to be the real causes of the differences which divided them from time to time.

On the ailing list — Special Justice Gertrude A. Halloran of the Quincy court, Judge William P. DiVitto of the Milford court, and Judge Arthur A. Thomson of the one in Haverhill.

More partying for Arthur Fiedler: RCA, the only record-makers for whom he has been waxing discs for more than 30 years — and that may be a record, too — lionized him at a luncheon at Manhattan's Four Seasons. From there, he flew off to Houston to maintain a fairly recent tradition for him — conducting the symphony orchestra there on New Year's Eve.

Another problem for Atty. Gen. Bob Quinn — to determine whether $3593.77 belongs to the Student Council of Mount Wachusett Community College in Gardner or should go to the state's treasury. The council sublet space in the college to a concessionaire, who agreed to pay them a commission on his sales. The commission came to the figure cited. The question is whether the council had a right to sublet space which was originally leased by the state for the college.

What would happen to the ham that was part of the Barter Theater Award presented to Pearl Bailey, who opens here in "Hello, Dolly," next month, was obvious. But what she might do with the other part — an acre of land in Virginia — was a reasonable question, so somebody asked it. "I might build a home on it for retired 'Dollys'," she said. She has been preceded in the role by Carol Channing, Mary Martin, Ginger Rogers and Betty Grable, among others.

Three of the state's chief justices — G. Joseph Tauro of the Superior Court, John A. Costello of the Probate Court and Kenneth L. Nash of the District and Municipal Courts — may be the last to hold such offices for life by appointment of the Governor.

A bill filed in the Senate would have the chief justices elected by the judges of their own courts for three-year terms and bar them from succeeding themselves. The language of the bill makes it seem that Elijah Adlow would also be the last to serve as chief justice of the Boston Municipal Court for life, too.

Atty. Bob Woolf of Brighton, who counsels a couple of platoons of pro athletes in their business affairs, is sorting out anecdotes about them for the informal remarks he'll make at the Jan. 14 meeting of the Cigar Smokers of America, Humidor 4, in the Sidney Hill C. C. And he's doing his sorting under ideal conditions — at his Florida home.

The police officer, who's on leave of absence until after his trial on charges involving postal money orders, will be defended by Atty. Mike Pizziferri of Devonshire st. Pizziferri, Atty. Lawrence Shubow and others won a new trial last week for three men sentenced to life for the slaying of a man as he was emerging from former wrestler "Crusher" Casey's cafe on Massachusetts ave.

The brief that persuaded the State Supreme Court to warn that Massachusetts hospitals are about to lose their immunity from lawsuits as charitable institutions was the second of its kind written by Asst. Atty. Gen. Joe Hurley of Framingham in his capacity as a private practitioner of law.

He put together the first one at the request of the Boston Bar Ass'n, which entered a case as a friend of the court. Chief Justice Raymond S. Wilkins and his associates might have issued the same warning then, but before the court could deliberate, the case was settled.

The end of the old charitable immunity law will probably increase hospital rates. Hospitals will have to pay higher premiums for insurance — and pass the cost on to patients.

Principal Peter Ingeneri of Mary E. Curley Junior High is one of the city's educators who some time ago anticipated the School Committee's establishment of special classes for students who can't speak English. To Spanish-speaking students he speaks their language, and for them he has arranged for math to be taught in their mother tongue.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N.H.
DEC 3
UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N.H.
DEC 3

161.

MUSIC: Steinberg takes over BSO; Thomas gets classic chance

Globe 12/28/69

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

The big news was President Nixon's request to the Congress for $40 million for the National Endowment for the Arts. What Congress will actually vote depends on you: write to your representative and senators urging support. By the end of the sixties, symphony orchestras and music schools were admitting openly that their financial conditions and prospects were desperate.

For Boston, it was a year of new faces, or rather; new backs. William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas succeeded Erich Leinsdorf and Charles Wilson as Music Director and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony. Thomas, having conducted a regular subscription pair in Boston, then got the classic break when he had to take over for the ill William Steinberg in the middle of a New York concert. And the labels on BSO records were going to be yellow instead of red: during 1970 the BSO is to sever an association with RCA that went back to the days of Karl Muck, and begin recording for Deutsche Crammophon.

Across the street from Symphony Hall, Leon Barzin became the new conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, taking over from Frederik Prausnitz. The Cantata Singers passed from Richard Kapp to John Harbison. Leon Kirchner was named Music Director of the Boston Philharmonia.

There was some rapid-fire turnover among critics, too. The Christian Science Monitor acquired Louis Snyder as its first full-time music critic since Harold Rogers' departure two years earlier. George Gelles left the Record-American for the Herald-Traveler and was succeeded at the Hearst paper by L. David Harris.

MUSIC, Page 47

WILLIAM STEINBERG takes over as conducter of Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

TIGER SHOVELNOSE CATFISH is admired by visitor to Boston's aquarium, which opened in 1969. The aquarium is part of changin Charles B. Care,

BOSTON'S new City Hall opened officially during 1969. (Globe photo by Gilbert Friedberg)

Concert by Pears-Britten most beautiful of year

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,7
(S) 562,377
DEC 28 1969

★MUSIC
Continued from Page 44

At the Herald, Gelles replaced McLaren Harris, who had been in the music critic's slot for five years. Gelles was removed as Herald Music Critic a month ago after seven weeks on the job.

There was, besides, the Boston Critics' Flap, which began in early November when BSO players voted to ask their management "not to welcome" the Globe critic to their concerts. Management declined to withdraw The Globe's press tickets, but expressed the hope that The Globe would have a more "professional spokesman" and "responsible critic" cover the concerts.

Gelles's trenchant criticism had not always given pleasure in Symphony Hall either, but the Herald-Traveler insisted that there was no connection between their displeasure with Gelles and the unhappiness of anyone in Symphony Hall.

For a more cheerful note apropos criticism: Eric Salzman (Stereo Review) and Michael Steinberg (The Boston Globe) were co-winners of the 1969 Sang Prize for Criticism in the Arts. It was the first time the prize had been awarded in music criticism.

The most interesting new pieces heard here: the Piano Sonata No. 3 by Roger Sessions, played in April by both Robert Helps and Jacob Lateiner, and again by Helps in December; Arthur Berger's Five Pieces for Piano, played in May by Robert Miller. New to Boston programs: "Form" by Stefan Wolpe (Russell Sherman), "Chronochromie" by Messiaen (BSO, Pretre), "The Idyll of Theocritus" by Sessions (NEC, Janice Harsanyi, Prausnitz), and Stravinsky's Huxley Variations (Thomas, BSO).

The original 1912 version of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" was a revival of special interest. Leinsdorf conducted it in January at BSO concerts with a cast including Claire Watson and Beverly Sills.

It was a good year for Beethoven at the New England Conservatory: Alfred Brendel played a program of four piano sonatas in March, and during the same month Rudolf Kolisch and Russell Sherman gave three concerts with all ten sonatas for violin and piano. An undergraduate string quartet (Paine-McLeod-Radd in-Clearfield) coached by Kolisch gave remarkably understanding performances of two of the late quartets, Op. 127 in January, and Op. 135 in December.

This vote for the year's most beautiful concert goes to the recital in October by tenor Peter Pears with Benjamin Britten, one of only five concerts the two have given in this country in the last 20 years, and the only one outside New York city. The program included two song cycles, Schumann's "Dichterliebe," and Britten's "Winter Words."

Other outstanding or unusually interesting performances: Denes and Anneliese Zsigmondy's playing of Bartok Sonatas; temor Huges Cuenod at the Museum of Fine Arts; Leinsdorf's Schoenberg performances with the BSO, and Variations for Orchestra, and "Survivor from Warsaw" with Sherrill Milnes; in December, the BSO Chamber Players added a superb performance of Schoenberg's String Trio.

Also: quintets by Mozart and Dvorak played by a group led by Alexander Schneider for the Harvard Summer School series; William Steinberg's performance of Elgar's 2nd Symphony with the BSO; Michael Thomas's BSO debut concert (Haydn, Ives, Stravinsky, Debussy); performances of Bach, Handel, and other Baroque composers, by violinist Robert Koff, harpsichordist Gustav Leonhardt, the Cantata Singers and the Handel and Haydn Society; John Wustman's piano playing at the recital by mezzo-soprano Irina Arkhipova.

Specially good at Tanglewood: Christoph Eschenbach and Leinsdorf in Mozart's C major Concerto, K. 467 (which got an interesting performance in Boston by Murry Perahia and the Philharmonia under Schneider); Berlioz's "Nuits d'ete" with Marilyn Horne and Henry Lewis. Impressive contributions to not wholly convincing performances: Cassilly and Milnes as Otello and Iago in Verdi's "Otello" under Leinsdorf; the playing by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in the performance Leinsdorf conducted of Berg's "Wozzeck," and which Leinsdorf later called the achievement of which he was proudest in his seven BSO years.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,723 (S) 208,349
DEC 28 1969
New England Newsclip

John Mayall, undisburdened amplification. Afternoons at the Folk Festival were as agreeable, suggesting that is the time of day to visit both.

Right after Labor Day the second St. Dunstan's College Conference on Sacred Music began, this a worthy contribution. Opera-starved buffs received surprising nourishment from the Ruffino Opera Company in October. Productions showed budgetary limitations to an extent, in sound and sight, but they contained operatic sense and vitality.

The year got off to an enjoyably controversial start with the Boston Symphony under Georges Pretre. Remember the booing and cheering for Messiaen's Chronochromie and its orchestrated bird calls?

In February the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra programmed Birds of Paradise by John La Montaine, with Mayne Miller the pianist. It elicited no booing but was admired. A month later the Philharmonic gave the premiere of Ron Nelson's ambitious and, for him experimental Trilogy (JFK-MLK-RFK). Since, neither orchestra has been as adventuresome in Providence.

162.

Beethoven to Beatles in Musical 1960s

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,830
DEC 21 1969

By ALAN BRANIGAN
Newark News Music Critic

Musical tastes underwent a drastic change during the tumultuous 1960s, just as other arts and the social fabric itself found themselves in a period of fluctuation. The concert world probably was not as violent in its variation from the norm, but the results were, in their way, just as damaging to old traditions.

The most noticeable difference was in programming. At the beginning concerts were full of old favorites—Beethoven, Tchaikovsky and Brahms symphonies, the old standard concertos, a few moderate new works by Ravel or Stravinsky or Bartok, or cycles of these composers, done in a kind of ritualistic fashion. Then, for some reason not entirely defined to this day, only a few classics survived for repeated hearings. The old war hores were not taken out and shot, but they were put to pasture for a while.

One theory regarding this change asserted that when the big orchestras went in for annual contracts for its members, it meant year-long concert schedules, something that could not be accomplished with the old ways and means. Longer, more varied and newer works were called for, to give the players more to stimulate their musical drives and to provide hi-fi trained audiences with something besides the old bread-and-butter material.

Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf, at the head of their respective orchestras, the New York Philharmonic and the Boston, contributed mightily to the new trend by plunging deeply into the lengthy works of Gustav Mahler and Anton Bruckner. The 50th anniversary of Mahler's death, noted in 1961, evoked a festival in which most of his symphonies were played, and they have been a program standby of increasing popularity ever since. One recent list of composers, judged by symphonic popularity placed Mahler in the first 10, a place that would hve been undreamed of earlier.

Vienna Influence

Mahler and Bruckner, so similar in general musical attitude, present a picture of Vienna as it was in the late 19th Century, when they were creating their works. It is odd that this febrile, intense, subjective, almost agonized music, should be in exact consonance with today's atmosphere. Somebody called Mahler "psychedelic" and it is not a bad term for the visions, the strangeness and the self-searching that can be heard in his works.

Both composers are the current heirs to the music that Wagner developed a century ago. It is restless music, changing moods and key constantly and rarely arriving at a full stop. Other composers of the day forsook the classicism of Brahms and Beethoven and adopted the freedom of the Wagner tone language. Most of these, strange to say, lived in Vienna and if is this music that came to the fore in the 1960s in scores by Alban Berg, Anton Webern and Arnold Schoenberg, all Wagnerians but with peculiar twists of dissonant harmonic systems that suit today's temper.

Meanwhile, Wagner himself suffered something of an eclipse in American opera and concert houses. It may have been the lack of suitable singers, or maybe the bad name that Wagner's music got from its abuse by the Hitler regime. Whatever the cause, it was not until the end of the decade that Wagner began to rise once again as seen in remarkable productions by Herbert Von Karajan of "Das Rheingold" and "Die Walkure" (this season's "Siegfried" has been called off at the Met). Several new Wagner books and London's fantastic stereo recording of the "Ring" were other causes for new interest in the Bayreuth master.

Another musical uprising of the 1960s uncovered the treasures of Baroque music. Many small orchestras were formed chiefly for the performance of small scores by Mozart, Haydn, Vivaldi, Corelli, Purcell, William Boyce, several of the Bach family and other composers (Dittersdorf, Michael Haydn, Paisiello) of lesser skill. Amateur players were delighted with this development, because it permitted them to play the same music as they heard on the concert stage, none of it too difficult to manage.

The 1960s can be marked down for future ages as the period when tape music came into its own, along with amazing electronic instruments like the Moog Synthesizer. Little of this music has gotten far with the general public, but it is there and it is impossible to ignore.

The era also will be noted by historians as the age of the Beatles, who began as an immensely engaging rock quartet and developed much wider and more ambitious musical personalities. The "Sgt. Pepper" album was a milestone in the progress that the heavily accented rock music has been making in the direction of wide public popularity. At the same time some of the Paul McCartney songs had the direct, touching simplicity of Franz Schubert. It was an amazing development in a decade that has been, all told, one of great fascination.

(Third in a series of four articles on the 1960s.)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 31 1969

How outsider views symphonies

By Milton R. Bass
The Berkshire Eagle

Symphony orchestras right now are in the throes of disintegration. The Ford Foundation grants of a few years ago, which supposedly were going to put them on a secure basis, have only succeeded in putting the symphonies in a more precarious position. The musicians, who had been grossly underpaid for years, demanded and got substantial raises. This ate up most of the grants. Meanwhile, other costs were skyrocketing while Symphony Hall remained the same size and, consequently, could not take in much more income through tickets. Unlike other corporations, the BSO could not become a conglomerate that would increase its income from subsidiary companies. People started talking about the end of an era.

This made the musicians nervous. Musicians are nervous to begin with, middle with and end with. They like everybody but they do make exceptions of those who do not think they are the greatest musicians in the world. They are nervous, excitable and tend to brood. The problem is that like everybody else in the arts, they have a great deal of time to brood. Even while they are warming up before a concert they are sitting there staring into space and hating the man in the chair ahead the chair on the side and the chair behind.

They never read critics because critics don't know what the hell they are writing about, and they will quote you word for word from any review that has mentioned anything to do with them. Therefore, even though they never read Messrs. Steinberg (Globe) or Gelles (Herald-Traveller) they know every knock these two have delivered and they want apologies and revenge and blood and good reviews in the future.

The pressure has been building for a long time in the BSO as Munch retired and Leinsdorf quit and Steinberg (the conducting one) took over as interim pope. The orchestra is all mixed up as to where the future lies. They want a loving father of a conductor who will take over all the responsibilities and keep them safe and warm and protected. And they don't want any critics yapping at them about their musical qualities, which they are somewhat unsure of themselves right now.

And the little old ladies, the ones who have been going to Symphony Hall every Friday afternoon since time began, want their music like the tea they order from S.S. Pierce—exactly the same as it always has been. They don't want any nasty critics carping about Brahms and Beethoven and Mozart on the programs. They don't want any bing-bong-bang music or any wild young conductors. They want the BSO led by Richard Nixon.

The trustees and management are worried about where the next dollar is coming from, and they don't want and dissonances from the sidelinees. Everybody agrees that a symphony orchestra is a great thing so why endanger it with adverse criticism. We should all pitch in and carry on and pip pip, the orchestra forever.

Meanwhile, back at the newspaper, the critics are worried about their bosses backing them up and their integrity. Critics aren't allowed to deviate from perfection; they must always be balanced and good and right. Right means writing reviews that the people being reviewed approve of. Which means writing complimentary reviews. Because no matter what they say, people being reviewed only want nice things said about them.

And that's how the situation stands in Boston right now. It's a tempest in a teapot to everybody but those intimately concerned. To them it's a war. And in a war people get killed.

(Bass, entertainment editor and columnist for the Eagle, has recently published his first novel, "Jory.")

Taken from the Dec. 11 article by Bass. The entire article is on page 149.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 29 1969

Holiday precedes youth benefit

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe staff

One of the best New Year's parties this side of the Canadian border will almost be on that dividing line, as the Garrett Schencks and their children, the Roger Moores and their four, the John Ryans with three and the Nicholas de Wolfes head for a ski rendezvous at the Greenville Inn on Moosehead Lake.

Coming up from Washington to join their former neighbors on Beacon Hill will be Dr. and Mrs. Dexter Bullard, and the snow safari may even include a snowshoe trek in to the Schencks' hunting camp.

The Robert Saltonstalls will also be "up country" for the holiday, one of the few that "Nancy Salt" as she is affectionately known, has taken from her dedicated job as chairman of the Youth Concert's benefit bringing Artur Rubinstein to Symphony Hall on Feb. 8.

All tickets sold for the one Boston appearance this season of the fabled pianist, have to be ordered by Jan. 10 in order to benefit the wonderful cause—to provide free scholarship tickets to these sold-out Harry Ellis Dickson—Boston Symphony concerts and also to commission works by young American composers.

The chic, blonde, Boston-born wife of Mexico's Consul General here, Jaime Pena-Vera, is Mrs. Saltonstall's co-chairman and has given up her own usual holiday in Mexico to help sell every seat for this special cause.

Honorary chairmen are Mrs. Kevin White, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky (whose marvelous pen-and-ink of the pianist makes the program invitation worth framing), Mrs. Edward Brooke, Mrs. Edward Kennedy and Mrs. Francis Sargent.

Others who are trying to make the Jan. 10 sale deadline include a reception committee—Mrs. Louis Cabot, Mrs. Philip Allen, Mrs. Albert Titcomb and Mrs. Robert Scully.

Also Mrs. Anthony Kutten, who helped the BSO's author-violinist Harry Dickson (don't miss his new book on the BSO whatever else you don't get to read) found the Youth Concerts, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. James Grew, Mrs. James Poppen, Mrs. William D. Schier, Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky, Mrs. Frederick Witherby, Mrs. R.C. Young Mrs. Frank Ingraham, Endicott 2d, Mrs. Stephen Paine, and Mrs. Hans Sante, wife of the German Consul General.

JOURNAL AND INQUIRER
ROCKVILLE, CONN.
(M) 9,880
DEC 29 1969

Pop Music Trend Is Anyone's Guess

By JOANNE OMANG
United Press International

The only thing that's sure about popular music in the 1970s is that no one yet knows what it will be.

The men who write it, stage it, play it, deplore it and occasionally try to anticipate it agree, however, that it won't be they who create it.

"Ten years ago we'd never have predicted acid rock," said Lawrence Berk, president of Boston's Berklee School of Music, the country's only conservatory of contemporary music. "God knows what's next."

No one seems to doubt that current rock reflects the generation gap, the general preoccupation of the young with the faults of a society that was created so the kids could have it better than the old man.

"Kids are facing problems now which a lot of Americans haven't faced," said Don Law, manager of the rock ballroom—theater The Boston Tea Party. "They believe in music the way 100 years ago they would've believed in religion—it's telling the truth."

Whether the social consciousness created the music or vice versa is another question.

Social awareness in rock seemed to spring full-blown from the heads of the Beatles, who appeared on a scene not much different lyrically from the Rock Around the Clock which started it all.

Once the English moptops made it in the mode of the early 60s, they put their gut beat under words of civil rights, politics and folk ballads. The result brought the real world and its popular music together, perhaps for the first time.

Suddenly there were rock groups everywhere, singing not only of moons and spooning and hound dogs but also of war and peace and sex and drugs.

There was another thing about the Beatles, too—their music took some skill to duplicate.

"A kid used to be able to go out and buy a guitar, learn three cords and be part of the scene," said Berk. "Not after that." Amplifiers and electric guitars along with guitar lessons, skyrocketed in sales.

The underground

Suddenly there was an underground, the far-out sounds of hyped-up amplifiers and sitars, of electronic noises and 20-minute renditions, of undisguised sex and drug-oriented lyrics, and of the fascinated pushing of sound to the point of pain.

The underground reality lacked only a stage to emerge, and Bill Graham of San Francisco's Fillmore West gave it the forum.

Entertainment In The '70s-- One Of A Series

"The rock listener is much more knowledgeable today than two years ago," said Graham. "Young people today appreciate good music, not just simple music."

And mainstream rock is anything but simple.

"A hit is a hit no matter what type it is. There are no new trends today and there haven't been for several years," argues Mel Phillips, program director for Boston's top-40 station WRKO. "The acid underground is exaggerated. Few soul sounds are big sellers any more. Sure, early rock is being used, so is folk and blues and country. There's no one source, no major trend."

"Rock and roll has changed from what it was before, and we don't know what's coming next, sighed Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the famed Boston Pops. "People are beginning to combine baroque music with jazz; now they've got electronic sound music, these kids, and it's interesting. But nobody knows what's going to happen next."

"Something simple is next," predicted Berk, an observer of 25 years of popular music. "As the young grow up, their idiom develops and changes with them. Like jazz and folk which got more and more esoteric, rock has become highly complex and esoteric.

"The sound then gets too sophisticated to appeal to the younger kids, who then come up with something new, something simple all over again. It's a cycle."

The cycle may have come complete with the Woodstock Festival, where the promise of the most famous and most esoteric groups alike drew 400,000 persons to stand in the mud with others who couldn't hear the music either.

"The music was the connection," said one not-so-young participant, "but it was the togetherness idea that really made it. It's what kids are trying to tell the society—people can get together and not hurt each other even when the going is rough. The only way out of trouble is to be natural to trust one another and share what you have."

Mainstream or esoteric, simple or complex, tomorrow's music will belong to the young. And they aren't saying yet what it will be.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 352,009 SUN. 443,090
DEC 21 1969

A 'Rock Tanglewood'? Well, Good Luck!

By KATHY ORLOFF
Chicago Sun-Times Special

LOS ANGELES — Sign of the times (or, who says rock isn't big business?).

First to break the story that John Roberts, prime financial backer of Woodstock, is planning a permanent festival community was The Wall Street Journal.

The Journal story told of Roberts' plans to create "a permanent summer festival, a sort of Rock Tanglewood" (the Tanglewood Festival is a symphony event held in Massachusetts), where there would be "Mini-Woodstocks" every weekend during the summer, within 100 miles of New York City.

PLANS HAVE not been finalized, no land has been leased or purchased and no contracts signed, but Roberts is doing his best.

All I can say is good luck! They may be able to sell the idea in the East, but after the Rolling Stones thing in Livermore, the West Coast may never see another mass gig.

The Stones concert, which was billed, incidentally, as "Woodstock West," attracted more than its share of people, trouble and publicity. Hell's Angels, reportedly hired by the Stones as "security guards," put everyone up tight, there was one death by stabbing and several bad fights. Hardly the love and peace thing.

BUT THE MUSIC was good. Besides the Stones, there was Santana, Jefferson Airplane, Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young and the Grateful Dead.

Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young had to make a fast retreat after their set, as they were due that evening at UCLA's huge Pauley Pavilion, where over 13,000 came to see them in their first arena appearance in the Los Angeles area.

163

What We've Just Been Through Was a Revolution

Boston

By Paul Hume

The 10 years that have just come to an end were quite probably the most revolutionary in the entire history of composed music.

The only concentrated period that is a possible rival, in terms of technical and theoretical innovation, would be the 14th century, called "Ars Nova," or the "New Art." That was an abrupt break from the past and triggered vehement disputes with champions of the "Art Antiqua," or "Old Art," of the previous century.

But the epoch of musical development through which we are now passing, which reached explosive levels during the 1960s, is far more shattering in its effect than any changes that occurred during the 1400s for one simple reason: that was a time of evolutionary processes in music when composers of even the most advanced thought — which focused on revolutionary rhythms—drew upon the ideas and techniques of their predecessors.

Today's younger, wilder-eyed composers are saying, "Don't bug me with music before 1930 (or 1940!) man, I'm not interested. Don't give me that Stravinsky (or Bartok or Schoenberg) stuff. Let me at that machine." That is a line being heard in the classes of teachers of composition across the country. We are in an age whose electronics, computer-programming, synthesizers, and other kinds of automation can hardly be expected to detour around the world of music. Nor have they.

In the 1960s, electronic sounds became more expressively significant than ever before, as in Leon Kirchner's Pulitzer Prize-winning Quartet No. 3 (for quartet and electronic tape) they completely took over from jazz, substituting for even the most progressive manipulations of a Modern Jazz Quartet, sheer, unbridled, overpowering, deafening sound. "Never mind the words, forget the melody, just play!" is not only a guiding motto for today's rock outfits; it operates through towering ramparts of amplified systems to obliterate everything but VOLUME.

Yet the inescapable force of rock was not only music's loudest voice in the 60s, but the one that made, and is making, contributions of continuing importance to many other kinds of music. During the last 10 years, the Beatles reached their greatest lasting achievements: Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club, the Magical Mystery Tour, and Abbey Road. Moving easily and surely from string quintet to symphony orchestra to electronic sounds, they put "Elinor Rigby," "Yesterday," and "Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds" into a circulation of millions and gave them plenty of equally good company.

Simon and Garfunkel rated so high with Leonard Berstein that he did not hesitate to rate them ahead of "most avant-garde composers of today." Their "Mrs. Robinson" became not merely a smash hit but a rallying song for dissident Catholics, demonstrators for peace, and a wide assortment of conventioneers. To say nothing of the "Scarborough Fair/Canticle" alliance that sold in the millions.

Inevitably the sources of electronic sounds came in less expensive and more accessible packages. The Moog Synthesizer with its "Switched-On-Bach" not only created a new phenomenal

See MUSIC, H2, Col. 1

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

JAN 4 1970 Boston

What We've Just Been Through Was a Revolution

MUSIC, From H1

best-seller, but was one of a type quickly mirrored by the Syn-Ket in Italy, and similar machines in many countries. Musical sounds of almost limitless variety can now be created by people with no previous knowledge of music of any kind and for hardly more than a few hundred dollars.

The ultimate value of all this electronic expansion will not appear until composers, probably in the 1970s, begin to create music of a beauty and lasting vitality in the new sounds that will rank with the new music created for the harpsichord when it took precedence over the virginal, the piano when it challenged the harpsichord, and the modern symphony orchestra as it attained its full growth after the small ensembles of early orchestral days.

It was in the 60s, however, that the first Pulitzer Prize was given to any kind of electronic music when, in 1967, Leon Kirchner was rewarded for his Quartet No. 3 for string quartet and electronic tape. (The first opera to take wide advantage of electronic sounds, "Aniara," by Sweden's Karl-Birger Blomdahl, was a product of the preceding decade.)

Electronic music, for all its rootless anarchy, was not the only musical newsmaker in the 60s. "Aleatoric," or "stochastic" music surged forward with its major practitioners under the high priesthood of Iannis Xenakis to give new accents to a technique that had been so widespread in the baroque era as to be practically universal. But now, under the simpler label of "music of chance," it was being applied with up-and-down success by men of large and small imaginations. Lukas Foss called some of his own work in this area, bulwarked by music taken from Handel, Scarlatti and Bach, "a fraud."

But an Alberto Ginastera, working with random choices melodically, harmonically, and rhythmically, used the element of chance to supply his striking operatic success "Bomarzo" with many of its most telling and effective episodes.

Among those composers whose names took on the brightest glow in the past decade, certainly those of Ginastera of Argentina and Penderecki of Poland retain the strongest light. The former moved from his "Cantata para una America Magica" through the concertos for piano, violin and harp, to that for strings, and his two operas, "Don Rodrigo" and "Bomarzo," to establish himself among the foremost musicians of the decade. The slightly younger Penderecki's famous "Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima" brought him a recognition that grew immensely with his "St. Luke Passion," and, just this year, his first opera, "The Devils of Loudun."

Broadway's composers kept the lights going as brightly as ever in the 60s with bits that continue today to pack audiences into theaters in many countries. They included "Man of La-Mancha," with its song, "To Dream the Impossible Dream," for teen-agers who dream of a more decent world; "Fiddler on the Roof," which was playing in Tokyo while "La Mancha" was doing a land-office business in Vienna; and "Hello, Dolly!" with its newest manifestation on film adding more than Wilder's wildest dreams.

In a single decade, the opening of arts centers around the country—New York, Los Angeles, Atlanta—and the promise of one called Kennedy in Washington, raised new and old questions of artistic aims, economic problems, and just what constitutes a genuine cultural boom. A beloved old Metropolitan Opera House was sung out of existence and torn down while a new one, not yet beloved, opened under the ominous shadow of a strike. Three years later the Met was darkened by a bitter and prolonged lockout.

Bitterness was a frequent and often outspoken visitor to music's labor negotiations in the 60s. Strikes by major symphony orchestras of the country became commonplace as musicians' reasonable, and long-delayed demands for decent wages and working conditions ran into a barrage of understandable money shortages and non-understandable meanness on the part of many managements. The Philadelphia Orchestra signed the first 52-week contract of any American symphony orchestra in 1963 and shortly thereafter lived through the most protracted and divisive strike in its history.

The Ford Foundation, hoping to assist the desperate needs of orchestral boards and managements around the country, gave away $81.6 million in the late 60s on a matching-funds basis that is now giving many of the recipients greater headaches than ever before. With all the questions raised by the idea of government subsidy, that form of support is obviously far nearer the formulating stage.

But the 60s saw an encouraging, if by no means sufficient, new source of income for the arts in the form of substantial gifts from corporations. The Dallas Civic Opera enjoyed the generosity of Nieman-Marcus as the Metropolitan did that of Eastern Airlines and the New York Philharmonic that of TWA. More of this kind of giving is one of the ends most ardently sought by an ad hoc committee under the chairmanship of David Rockefeller.

Technologically, the 60s opened doors, windows, and chinks that will surely widen in the 70s to proportions that are today barely glimpsed. Our entire system of concertgoing, our lifelong habits of listening to music are going to be affected by the increase in the number and versatility of reproducing gadgets already or shortly to be on the market.

To the phonograph's disc recordings in their superb stereo splendor, are now coming tapes on reels, in cartridges and in cassettes in new floods. New, too, is four channel "stereo." Within the coming year, it is probable that television sets will be placed on the market that were perfected in the last five years. These will carry a slot into which a tape cartridge can be inserted that will give the viewer-listener synchronized sight and sound. Do you want to hear AND SEE "Tosca," or "Carmen," or "Boheme?" There it will be. These popular favorites will quite probably come in new forms. Perhaps shorn of some recitative, cut in scenes that add little to the significant movement of the whole, but carrying the full authority of the original, they just might make opera a more truly popular entertainment form than it has yet become in this country. Early experiments with a "Barber of Seville," by the Metropolitan Opera and the Japanese government, and a Karajan-directed-and-conducted 'Carmen" have proved failures. But that will not even slow down the business of experimenting.

It was in the 60s that Glenn Gould, master pianist, foreswore concert-giving in favor of TV and recording projects. As he did so, he predicted that public concerts as they now exist would not last another 50 years. In the same decade, Lorin Hollander played a piano recital at Fillmore East on a Baldwin electronic concert grand, wearing bell-bottom trousers and a velvet jacket. William Masselos gave a four-hour piano concert to which the audience could come and go at intervals without feeling any need to stay for the whole thing. And Albert Fuller renounced, for all foreseeable purposes, the wearing of white tie and tails. Straws in the wind? Just watch!

The ratio of American conductors to major American orchestras was significantly lowered in the 60s when Leonard Bernstein's resignation from the New York Philharmonic saw Pierre Boulez named as his successor and Howard Mitchell's coming departure from the National Symphony brought in Antal Dorati.

The past decade was particularly hard on great conductors. Beginning with the death of Dimitri Mitropolous, it brought the deaths of Fritz Reiner, Ernest Ansermet, Bruno Walter, Sir Thomas Beecham, Pierre Monteux, Hans Rosbaud, and Hans Knappertsbusch, none of them replaceable, all of them severe losses. Two other giants on the musical scene also disappeared during the 10 years just passed: Fritz Kreisler, the violinist of singular glory, and Albert Schweitzer, whose musical gifts were sometimes lost sight of in the astonishment of his works as a theologian, doctor of medicine, and general humanitarian. Washington's loss of Gertrude Clarke Whittall was one of particular meaning.

The living were signally honored in music in the 1960s when early Aspen Humanities Awards went to Benjamin Britten and Martha Graham.

There were strong beginnings in the last 10 years: the National Arts Council, with its familial state and local councils, and the National Foundation for the Arts must be counted as immeasurably encouraging entities. For his contributions to these and to the Kennedy Center, the work of Roger Stevens deserves special credit.

Recognition came, belatedly, and still in hardly more than a trickle compared to what it will one day be, to the music of Edgard Varese, whose death in 1965 was perhaps the decade's greatest single loss among creative musicians. That he could still be publicly insulted—along with the management and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—by the management of the National Symphony Orchestra, was only one more mark of the singularly insensitive nature of that management.

On March 17, Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony on a National Symphony subscription concert in a performance of Edgard Varese's Deserts. On April 22-23 in his column, The Symphony Notebook, M. Robert Rogers, managing director of the National Symphony wrote, "Perhaps to insure attention to a piece made up from mechanistic sounds by Edgard Varese, a youthful claque was brought along by Erich Leinsdorf and distributed strategically around the hall. Our Wednesday subscription audience . . . became quickly alert to and offended by the demonstration mounted by these birsute young men as soon as the piece ended."

On May 6, at the insistence of the Boston Symphony management, Rogers issued a statement to National Symphony subscribers withdrawing the earlier unfounded charges.

Roger Sessions' opera "Montezuma" is still waiting for its U.S. premier after a world premiere in Berlin half a decade ago. Sarah Caldwell made bold moves to bring the work to Boston but that honor, if and when it comes, will go to the decade upon which we are now begun. Miss Caldwell was a pivotal figure in one of the roughest areas of musical activity of the last 10 years when she was selected to head up a national opera company to take place of the Metropolitan Opera National Company which foundered after two hope-filled seasons.

That Caldwell failed in spite of her own astounding prowess as a conductor, and with a repertoire as richly inclusive as "Falstaff," and "Lulu," as well as "Cenerentola" and "Boheme" was one result of a policy that left business as well as artistic problems in her hands.

New moves, growing out of opera's need for new modes of living, were begun during the last years of the 60s. NET's TV opera is one hopeful manifestation. Others will be disclosed in the months immediately ahead, to give the '70s a strong chance to bring to flourishing existence programs planted in the '60s.

DOWN BEAT CHICAGO, ILL.
E. O. WEEK 67,000

JAN 8 1970

Herb Pomeroy: Confessions of a Jazz Teacher

by Ira Gitler

Boston's Berklee School of Music, founded in 1945 by Lawrence Berk, its president, has grown by leaps and bounds, especially in the three-year period beginning with the move to its present quarters at 1140 Boylston Street. Last spring the building's dormitory wing was redone to allow expansion of teaching facilities, and new living space was completed at a nearby location. The enlarged print shop which turns out books and scores for Berklee is now also housed outside the main building and has grown to the point where it employs students.

Berklee currently is attended by more than 1000 students, 80 of whom come from foreign lands. As part of the equal opportunity program, and as an indication of the modern woman's continuing effort to break out of her restrictive life role, the school's female enrollment jumped from 11 in 1968 to 44 in the fall of 1969. To counter any negative aspects of the school's rapid growth, a Student Services department has been instituted, enabling individuals to receive more specialized aid with scholastic or personal difficulties. "We're like a big family," says Berk.

Part of the Berklee family are the highly respected jazzmen on the faculty: reedmen Charlie Mariano, Andy McGhee, and John La Porta; trombonist Phil Wilson; pianist Ray Santisi; bassists Tony Eira and Major Holley; drummer Alan Dawson; and trumpeters Lennie Johnson and Herb Pomeroy. The latter, who led his own small groups and big band in Boston for many years, is now in his 15th year at Berklee, the oldest resident jazzman in point of service. Only reed teacher Joe Viola and the school's dean, Richard Bobbitt, have been there longer.

In 1950-52 Pomeroy was a student at Berklee. Then he left Boston to tour with Lionel Hampton, Stan Kenton and Serge Chaloff's sextet, but the road never really appealed to him. During the summer of 1955, Lawrence Berk asked him to return as an instructor. There were then 150 to 200 students at Berklee. When I talked with him last October, he compared then and now for openers in a no-punches-pulled interview.

Pomeroy: There were aspects of that first part of the school that were, to my way of thinking, a plus compared to what we have now. I know that in my own teaching, as I would present my material, I would be able to have pretty much in mind what was going on in just about every other class in the school, and hence my teaching could be correlated to that. Now, when I am in my classroom teaching my own material, I feel very isolated and oftentimes will have to ask the students, "Well, now in coming from your last course, what material have you covered?" The school has gotten so large and there are so many different courses and different teachers and different approaches. . . .

Gitler: Is there any way the faculty is combating that isolation feeling, enlightening the teachers as to overall activity?

Pomeroy: They certainly try, but its very difficult with the breadth of material covered. It's the dean's responsibility to do this and he does, to a point, but I don't know if he can do more than he does, with the teachers so busy with their teaching and outside playing. To get them together on a regular basis to discuss what each is teaching would be difficult. We used to, some number of years ago, but in no way was the school as large then as it is now. I think he's attempting to correlate everything, but it is a physical impossibility.

As far as the teaching approach is concerned—in my own area I've been teaching the same kinds of material most of the time that I've been here: jazz writing, jazz composition and jazz arranging applied to a small group and the large jazz orchestra, and, naturally, my own approach has changed through 15 years of teaching. You learn a great deal about the material you're teaching and also your approach, and if a former student took a course with me now that had the same label 10 years ago, he wouldn't recognize the materials. I do all my teaching from my head. I do not commit outlines to paper. The material is the same basic idea, but from year to year it changes as I change.

Gitler: How has the music the students are coming in contact with today and are oriented toward before they come here affected the teaching? Five years ago they were not as affected by rock as they are now.

Pomeroy: I'm sure it has affected it a great deal. Now, the course materials I teach are jazz materials, and all the course teaching I do begins in the junior year. I teach people in the junior and senior years. I am sure that in the first two years there has been a much different approach because of the orientation of the kids coming in here. And so many that come in now have had little or no contact with jazz but are strongly involved with rock, where five, 10 years ago, a good portion of the kids were very jazz-oriented. Let's say that the number is no less than it was five years ago but that it is now a much smaller percentage of the total school. My courses are elective, and they are jazz courses, so I'm not making any conscious effort to direct them toward rock, anymore than what the rock influence has been on me as a musician. I may say and do things somewhat differently, but there has not been a conscious effort to change course material to attract the rock people.

Gitler: A question often asked of me by people outside the field about schools such as Berklee and the many colleges with jazz in their music departments and stage band programs is where do the students go when they graduate? What is their future? How do you feel about it? What do you tell your students?

Pomeroy: I feel very gloomy about that, and when I'm completely honest with the kids I must give a gloomy approach to that. When I began teaching here, I was making my living playing jazz music. Now, at the end of a year, when I make out my tax records I can see how much of my income is made playing jazz. For instance, the quintet with Charlie (Mariano) and Ray (Santisi)—we do, over the course of a year, from 15 to 20 concerts. Other than this, it's pretty rare that I do what I'd call real jazz playing. So when I examine my own situation and what I see in store, I say that if Charlie and I are playing less than we were 10, 15, 20 years ago—and we know we're better players now—what are these kids going to do who do not have the experience? They've certainly got their rock thing to go to, but when it comes to jazz. . . . I feel that if maybe from a graduating class of 60-75 kids, if one goes into playing jazz full time to make his living—I think that's being liberal. I think what we're doing, and the reason I'm still part of this thing and saying there is sense in teaching the kind of music I understand to these people—is that I believe in the tools of jazz just as strongly as I did when they attracted me into wanting to play this kind of music, and when I was making my entire living writing and playing with them. These very tools, I find, broaden the better student that comes out of this school. In other words, looking at a graduating class, if there are 75 kids, the 15 who are the best musicians as they go out are usually the 15 who will become most involved in jazz. I don't mean to make a case for jazz, but it is the kind of music that has given them some aesthetic experiences that they would not have had if they were not here. Our best student jazz activity is really comparable to a good professional level, and it just may be the highest level of performance these kids will ever take part in the rest of their musical lives. It gives them a taste of something good. It really, to my way of thinking—I hate to admit it to you and myself and anyone else who is going to hear about what we're saying here—is somewhat comparable to the situation in college when someone is preparing for a specific thing and he takes courses that do not directly prepare him for this, but open up his mind to other things that are really important to all of us but that we don't use in such a practical sense. It's like studying Latin. Even if you don't use it later, it will broaden your thinking. Jazz is almost becoming like a classical element in the instruction going on here.

Gitler: To me, jazz has become the classical music of America in many ways. It should have the respect that classical music has or had—because classical music has gone down in "popularity." It sells less records than jazz.

Pomeroy: The Boston Symphony never used to advertise their concerts in the newspaper. They were always sold out with people lined up for the "rush" seats. Now, every week, you see an ad with a listing of who the conductor is if it's a guest conductor, what the pieces are—trying to lure people into Symphony Hall. And the orchestra goes into the red, probably, say, for hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. And there's no question it's in trouble too. The jazz in schools here—you know, I've got this feeling, Ira, especially teaching here and being the director of the jazz band at M.I.T. (Massachusetts Institute of Technology), and going to the college festivals, that most of the better jazz I'm hearing (I don't go out to jazz clubs that often anymore, and there aren't that many here in Boston to go to), most of the better music is being done under the cover of education. If I would form a professional band here in Boston, I could put together a band that would be vastly superior to the best Berklee band or my M.I.T. band, but I couldn't go out and work with this band. Nobody would pay to hear it. But I can go to the college festivals with my M.I.T. band—which is a good college band—and we can play just exactly the kind of music I believe I want to play, and people enjoy it. But we're doing it under the guise of a college jazz festival. And here, down in the bottom of the building, we create some wonderful music, but its done under the cover of education. In the professional world, nobody wants to buy it.

Gitler: I noticed that some of the former Berklee students visiting here yesterday were from Buddy Rich's band. And Woody Herman has Berklee alumni in his band, doesn't he?

Pomeroy: Buddy's band is often 50 percent Berklee people. Woody's has been as much as 50, and he usually has three or four Berklee people, but after Buddy and Woody and Stan Kenton's band, which is mostly made up of young fellows from the west coast, there aren't even any jazz-oriented road bands anymore.

Gitler: Thad Jones and Mel Lewis have the New York players; Duke is Duke and Basie is Basie.

Pomeroy: And that about covers the whole thing. There isn't much of an opportunity, but in that area there isn't much less than there was 10 or 15 years ago. I think the jazz road band thing has about run its gamut, unfortunately.

Gitler: How do you feel about Blood, Sweat&Tears and other groups which are incorporating jazz techniques and feelings?

Pomeroy: I'm encouraged in this sense: I am encouraged more than just by the fact that they are incorporating. I'm beginning to see that even the rock audience seems to be beginning to respond to elements that are borrowed by rock people from jazz. Even if the audience is still naive and blasé enough to think that these elements are unique to rock, at least they are beginning to be thought of as some of the better elements in rock and they are things that the jazz musicians have been doing for years, so this is encouraging. It may run a cycle and come back to jazz. I have my fingers crossed; I don't have any real great faith in it, but it may. I see indications that it could possibly happen. Certainly the quality of rock has improved so in the last 10 years, and a lot of the improvement has to do with borrowing, in one sense or another, from jazz elements.

Gitler: If that cycle doesn't come around, what alternatives do you see?

Pomeroy: I really haven't thought too much about the alternatives. I get so involved in my work—my teaching and playing—that I don't have enough hours per day or week to sit down and think about these things. I'm not pleased with the situation, but to make a living in this business requires double duty. I cannot just teach at Berklee. I cannot just play—in Boston at least. Maybe if I were in New York I could do one or the other. I have a wife and four children to support. The small amount of thinking I've done about alternatives is that if a cycle like this doesn't happen, jazz could grind to a halt, that the number of young people who are interested as both players and listeners—late teens and early twenties—could become so small that 20 years from now there would be no jazz audience. I hope it doesn't happen.

I am 39. Charlie (Mariano) is in his early forties. We know we are better players than we were 10, 15 years ago. Neither of us have recorded in years. [Mariano cut an album with his jazz-rock group, Osmosis, for Flying Dutchman recently.] Then, we were recording often. We played clubs. I played at the Jazz Workshop for eight years. Now we just don't play in jazz clubs—not that we don't want to. No one chooses to have a quintet of ours that is contemporary, not far-out, with roots in basic jazz.

The school brings into the city of Boston semi-professional or bordering-on-professional players who really put a lot of us professionals out of work. The Boston recording scene—what there is of it— is a very black market situation, because the studios know that they can get kids out of Berklee who will come down and play for $20 an hour when scale is supposed to be $60, or something like that. And the same thing with the clubs. Ray Santisi seldom works in a club, but there are piano players who don't play as well as Ray, who are students at school, and where the top scale might be $225 they'll go out and play for a bill, bill and a quarter, and do the job adequately. So the school has drawn into Boston a reservoir of talent that is good enough to do the job, if not as good as the best professional level in Boston, but takes a lot of the work away. So the school, in a sense, does us a favor by being here. In another sense, professionally, it makes things difficult.

Gitler: What percentage of your students, over the years, have gone into not necessarily jazz, but playing music? And what percentage has gone into teaching?

Pomeroy: I find that in my classroom teaching, not my ensembles, I have contact with about 60 students a term. These are juniors and seniors. Because of their interest in jazz, they usually turn out to be among the better students in the school. A good half of them go into music education. That is one of the things that has helped the school to grow physically and to grow in all ways. Another quarter of the rest go into music in some way other than education and make a living at it. But certainly not from jazz only.

I feel some things about education which I might as well say now. I have seen many good young students who went to college when I did, who showed a great interest and great talent for music—jazz in particular, music in general—who because of their own feeling of a need for security went into music education. They were first drawn to music because they loved the music, the feeling of experiencing it both as a player and listener. So many of these people I'd see a few years later and their spirit had been broken. The very thing that drew them to this music to begin with—no longer did they get anything from it because so seldom were they involved in it. They were public school music teachers. . . .

Gitler: Is the system so strong that all these people who supposedly were jazz-oriented would not have had some kind of an effect by now? You'd think they would have been able to do some good as a force within the system.

Pomeroy: Now, I think so. Then, no. I'm talking about the early '50s. The public school stage band was virtually nil, at least in the eastern part of the country.

Gitler: Do you think that the people from the four graduating classes from Berklee (since its full accreditation) who have gone into music ed can have an effect?

Pomeroy: They're having some degree of success with this thing because the schools are broader now in what they allow in their extra-curricular activities and in the curriculum itself. I know of fellows from here who have gone to school where there was no jazz-flavored thing and have started it up and are having success with it. They are able to interest the faculty and the administration, but now the kids are not that interested in jazz. You know, the faculty and administration are now beginning to associate with jazz because it came out of their period, but now its hard to get the kids. At M.I.T. we have a good, strong jazz situation, but considering the number of students that go there it should be larger. We presently have two bands. Every fall we get enough to fill these bands, but we should have more people applying to the jazz program. I'm sure it has to do with rock.

UNITED STATES

STILL NEWSMAKING!

Shirley Temple's career grows more and more fascinating as she has become a member of the United States delegati...

BACK TO NORMAL!

It was good seeing Joan Kennedy up and about again after all her recent troubles. The occasion was the reception for William Steinberg, left, new conductor of the Boston Symphony. Right is Arthur Fiedler, Boston Pops Maestro. Joan had a new hairdo and seemed to be in good spirits, considering the difficult times she and Ted have been through in the past few months. A Kennedy wife carries on...

LIZ'S SON

MOVIEL... NEW Y... TY TIME
JAN 1970

165.

Chairman Nancy Hanks

Nixon's cultural aide

By Lynne Bennett
Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Los Angeles

President Nixon has asked approval for $40 million in new funds from both public and private sources for the arts and humanities in 1970. And Miss Nancy Hanks is "thrilled"—even though it means more paper work.

When, in October, Miss Hanks stepped into the chairmanship of the National Council on the Arts and the National Endowment for the Arts (which will receive the art's endowment share in the funds), she stepped into "piles of paper work." She also stepped into the position as "broker" for the arts—and became one of the highest ranking women in the Nixon administration.

She is less enthusiastic about the paperwork than the brokership. And she is very enthusiastic "about people who get a good idea and follow through on it."

She envisions government's role to be in large part "encouragement of what people are already interested in—a supporting of the roots of artistic expression in America."

Her first trip away from the paper work was to Los Angeles where she lectured, lunched, toured, talked, listened and learned with artists, producers, musicians, citizens, public, filmmakers, students and—briefly—family.

She is the most direct and accessible government official imaginable. And while here she elaborated on her perceptions of the government's role in the arts of the '70's.

"Government should encourage established institutions to better meet the needs of the changing public," she said. "Some of the current criticism about institutions and institutionalism is valid, but the basic problem of these institutions is still funding."

Miss Hanks thinks government should "encourage innovative ideas. It should back individuals who are creating a source for the arts. The American Film Institute (AFI) is a good example."

Miss Hanks spent a dawn to dark day in the Beverly Hills mansion that houses the AFI—one of the recipients of money from the National Endowment for the Arts. She watched films by students and by Charles Eames, world renowned designer, lunched with students, talked and listened to fellows there, toured the elaborate gardens of the refurbished mansion with AFI's young director, George Stevens Jr., watched more films, and attended a reception in the evening.

She feels the film institute is a stellar example of a "source." And it does important archival work as well. Huge amounts of Americana were disappearing in films that became damaged or lost or just unavailable. Early treasures as "The Merry Wives of Windsor," which just played successfully in New York after decades of life in retirement are an example.

Miss Hanks and Mr. Stevens are planning a national tour of American film classics—to be kicked off by President Nixon in the White House early this year. They also talked of a meeting of the national council at the Beverly Hills mansion in 1970.

Miss Hanks toured the Watts area here to visit another "good source," Studio Watts. Its roots are in the community says James M. Woods, founder and director, and that's where it will stay—although its artists, dancers, and musicians travel to other areas for performance and exposure. Mr. Woods squired Miss Hanks and his three-year-old daughter to points of artistic focus in the community.

Miss Hanks is from New York by way of Texas and Florida. She was in Miami during the Republican convention in 1968 as a Rockefeller booster and toured the city recalling where she had gone to school and how the city had changed. And she still keeps her Texas ties. Her dressmaker is there—and she occasionally sends fabrics from New York to be done up into a skirt or evening dress.

Miss Hanks worked for New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, in the Rockefeller charitable and research enterprises. She was also president of the Associated Councils of the Arts. And when friends question her on her devotion and concern for the arts after years of involvement in questions of diplomatic and political imports she smiles and says, "but the world needs fun, too."

President Nixon has suggested in his request to Congress for arts funding that in this "time of racial tension the arts can be an instrument for social change and racial harmony."

Miss Hanks would enthusiastically plow through the paper work to broker for that goal in the '70's. The arts have a friend in the new chairman of the national council.

By Lynne Bennett

When Miss Nancy Hanks stepped into the chairmanship of the National Council on the Arts and the National Endowment for the Arts she did so amidst piles of paperwork. While taking on the responsibilities of the position, she also became one of the highest ranking women in the Nixon administration.

Globe music critic Steinberg named to U.S. endowment Panel

Globe 1/6/70

Globe music critic Michael Steinberg has been appointed to the music advisory panel of the National Endowment for the Arts for 1970-71.

The seven-member panel, whose new appointees include a conservatory president, a soprano and a conductor, will hold its first meeting today in New York City. Members advise on application for grants awarded by the arts foundation of the Endowment.

Steinberg, 40, has been the Globe's music critic since January 1964. A graduate of Princeton University, he received a Fulbright grant for graduate study in musicology in Rome. Before coming to Boston, he was head of the music history department of the Manhattan School of Music. He currently teaches music history at the New England Conservatory.

The National Endowment received its Federal charter in the Johnson administration and is funded by congressional appropriation. Last month, President Nixon recommended that Congress give the Endowment $40 million for fiscal 1971, about double what had been voted for fiscal 1970.

MICHAEL STEINBERG . . . NEW APPOINTEE

New BSO Ticket Policy for Students

College students who would like to attend Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but who have stayed away in the past because of prohibitive costs and scarcity of tickets, may now take advantage of a new ticket policy. Starting ten minutes before the beginning of each BSO event, all remaining tickets in all price categories will go on sale to students only for a flat price of $3.

Symphony concerts normally sell out well in advance, but there are usually a sizeable number of returned tickets from subscribers who cannot make it to the concerts. Under the new policy all these returned tickets, plus whatever else is unsold, will be shuffled together and dealt from the top to holders of bonafide, current college I. D. cards.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,867 (E) 194,700
(S) [illegible]

JAN 13 1970

New Engl New

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 22 1970

For the arts

$184,000 Grant for School Music Project Here

NEW YORK — The Ford Foundation today announced initiation of a three-year $375,000 project to aid in the recording and dissemination of serious contemporary American music.

Also announced by the Foundation were a grant of $184,000 to the Council for Public Schools in Boston for the establishment of a Kodaly musical training center, and a grant of $41,980 to the Settlement Music School of Philadelphia to provide pre-professional private instruction for young, talented black instrumentalists.

The Foundation's one-year grant to the Council for Public Schools, Inc. in Boston will underwrite establishment of a Kodaly musical training center in the United States. The so-called Kodaly Method, named for the eminent Hungarian composer, aims at bringing about a musical literacy in all school children, not just the artistically gifted. Kodaly believed that if a musical literacy as common and well developed as language literacy were created, good music would become a central need of the society. The success of the Kodaly schools in Hungary has excited numerous American music educators including Miss Denise Bacon, director of the newly formed center.

Included in the grants and projects announced were a $12,500 grant to the Museum of Fine Arts for preparation, publication and distribution of a catalog of the Museum's American Silver collection and the assignment to the museum of Thomas P. Bruhn of Cleveland Heights, Ohio, in the Museum Curatorial Training Program with research interest in 17th and 18th Century European Decorative Arts. Bruhn has a B.A. from the University of Wisconsin and an M.A. from Chase Western Reserve University.

B.S.O. offers student discount

Globe 1/3/70

The Boston Symphony is starting a student discount policy on leftover tickets beginning Jan. 16. The price, regardless of the face value of the ticket, will be $3, and the sale will begin at the box office 10 minutes before the start of each concert. College I.D. cards (undergraduate or graduate) are required for ticket purchase.

In an effort to reach the student population, the Boston Symphony begins publication this month of the College Snake, a long information flyer that gives details of programs, times and dates, ticket and transportation information. The flyer, similar in content and format to the Boston Pops Snake, will be distributed at 400 college locations in the greater Boston area.

MYS — On the front page, yet! DHG

IDs worth bread at BSO

College students who would like to attend Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but who have stayed away in the past because of prohibitive costs and scarcity of tickets, may now take advantage of a new ticket policy. Starting ten minutes before the beginning of each BSO event, all remaining tickets in all price categories will go on sale to students only for a flat price of $3.00.

Symphony concerts normally sell out well in advance. But there are usually a sizeable number of returned tickets from subscribers who cannot make it to the concerts. Under the new policy all these returned tickets, plus whatever else be shuffled toget from the top to h fide, current colle

Whether you the second balcon row will thus be e ter of luck, but you'll save money tickets otherwise

The Symphon is trying to bring y into the fold in or its somewhat Par on the cultural s part of this praise the Symphony w three-foot-long ye ple posters on coll to inform students events.

BAD, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1970 – Page 2

BSO: pick a tic, any tic

PAGE ONE

College students who would like to attend Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but who have stayed away in the past because of prohibitive costs and scarcity of tickets, may now take advantage of a new ticket policy. Starting ten minutes before the beginning of each BSO event, all remaining tickets in all price categories will go on sale to students only for a flat price of $3.00.

Symphony concerts normally sell out well in advance. But there are usually a sizeable number of returned tickets from subscribers who cannot make it to the concerts. Under the new policy all these returned tickets, plus whatever else is unsold, will be shuffled together and dealt from the top to holders of bonafide, current college I.D. cards.

Whether you get a seat in the second balcony or the first row will thus be entirely a matter of luck, but in any event you'll save money. The cheapest tickets otherwise go for $4.50.

The Symphony management is trying to bring younger people into the fold in order to modify its somewhat Parnassian image on the cultural scene. Also as part of this praise worthy effort, the Symphony will distribute three-foot-long yellow and purple posters on college campuses to inform students of upcoming events.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JAN 14 1970

N. Eng

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. [illegible]

JAN 14 1970

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JAN 10 1970 New Engl

166

Occupation: Assistant Conductor, Boston Symphony

Age: 25

Thomas conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at Tanglewood last summer.

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas' new job is one of the nation's musical plums.

He is assistant to William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thomas had his 25th birthday on Dec. 21. Steinberg is 70.

A native of Hollywood, Calif., Thomas holds bachelor's and master's degrees in music. He is working for a doctorate jointly at the University of Southern California and New England Conservatory of Music.

Degrees Don't Matter

Audiences don't care how many degrees a conductor has. And it can't be assumed that all great conductors were born to the cause.

Thomas began musical studies when he was 10. Many performers were already on the concert stage before that age.

It wasn't until Thomas was 15 and already a promising pianist that he became aware of his serious interest in conducting.

Fate took over.

The high school music teacher was ill and unable to rehearse the orchestra. Thomas substituted.

It didn't woo him away from the keyboard, right away.

"Soon after," he recalls, "I was given the opportunity to conduct the high school orchestra in a public performance. I'll never forget it. The music was Rossini's 'La Gazza Ladra Overture'."

Another emergency came up last October in New York City.

Symphony Tour

The Boston Symphony men were on tour. They started with concerts at the University of Virginia and Baltimore.

Steinberg had undergone an operation during the summer but he felt fine.

Then, the big concert at New York's Philharmonic Hall on Oct. 22.

Steinberg conducted Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture and Brahms' Second Symphony and then he became ill.

During intermission he said to his young assistant, "Michael, it looks as if you'll have to carry on."

The balance of the program was Robert Starer's Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra (a realstickler under best conditons) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

It was a triumph for Thomas.

"He's had all kinds of offers since that night," says Marvin Schofer, head of the BSO's press department.

Thomas was already an "old" pro by the time he was appointed to the Boston Symphony.

Won Many Prizes

He had been a consistent prize winner — Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center, Musical America's Young Artists Award, USC's Alumni Prize for Outstanding Graduate.

Thomas was assistant to Pierre Boulez (one of his teachers and incoming conductor of the New York Philharmonic) and had conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Boston Philharmonia. He had conducted the Bayreuth, Germany, and Ojai, Calif., Festivals.

Such composers as Stravinsky, Stockhausen, Boulez, Foss and others had entrusted premieres of their works to Thomas.

He had a number of recordings to his credit.

Great talent is by no means a common commodity these days. Nor is it rare. Just what the magic ingredient that places a young man in his mid-20s before the Boston Symphony, Thomas was asked.

"Imagination," he replied. "That's the hope of the entire human race."

Which of the young virtuosos will survive?

Again, "those with imagination."

"We're in an age of machines, human and mechanical," says Thomas. "A dazzling kind of activity isn't that important anymore. For example, it doesn't matter how many notes a pianist can play in a given time."

How does Thomas feel as he stands before the Boston Symphony and is about to begin a concert before a packed house?

"I feel as if I'm standing before something enormous," he replied after some thought. "It's much greater than the combined number of people on stage or in the hall. I feel that the composer's personality is present. It's an immense feeling of awe, as if I'm entering into another place, physically."

Thomas doesn't talk or act like a crusader, but he's a beacon of hope to the aspiring young musician.

"I have enormous faith in my own generation," he states, and it's virtually a pronouncement.

"It wasn't so long ago," he explains, "that this conductor wasn't speaking to that conductor. Some would say, 'that's my piece and no one else has a right to play it'.

'The Common Good'

"Mine is not a proprietary generation. We all talk to each other. We all work for the common good of music. We encourage each other."

Furthermore, he believes in the new music.

"Since the '40s, music has been in an experimental stage. We are waiting for a synthesis — a strong new language. The development process of music applies to other areas.

"Audiences' attitudes will shift and adapt to what present-day composers are saying. Some of these composers disguise their methods so that they sound spontaneous. There are charlatans, of course, but they will fade away."

Thomas is far removed from the rigid right-and-wrong school of thought that has caused certain conductors' interpretations to be accepted as pontifical decrees.

Thomas feels that music has undergone even more change in this century than during any comparable time in the past.

He doesn't feel that all 19th century music will be relegated eventually to a "gingerbread" era, even though there is such a tendency nowadays.

"So-called traditions can be wrong," Thomas insists. "They have been fautly, negative approaches. Such 'conventions' haven't held water for the past 10 or 15 years. Things that were considered radical a short time ago are now regarded as roads to real understanding."

Career Decisions Important

As a 25-year-old conductor whose new instrument is one of the world's great orchestras, Thomas has already reached that stage in his career where important decisions must be made.

They are musical, and it's upon these that his star will continue to rise, or fall.

"It isn't always the same," he admits. "Sometimes when I face an orchestra something switches on and everything is secure. The orchestra plays as one organism. It's like a tape recorder in operation. Everything is undisturbed. It's all forward motion."

How does he prepare for this?

"I assume that what I see on the score is what the composer was trying to say. Having tried it, I may have to make changes in procedure to make it come across."

What about the program itself?

'Pieces I Love'

"I make up a program of pieces I love," Thomas explains. "They are things I want to do. Then I arrange them so that they work well together."

And when it's a commissioned or "strongly requested" work that isn't the greatest?

"Every professional musician has faced that situation," says Thomas. "At the time I'm conducting it, I must handle it as if it's the greatest piece of music ever written. Later on, I can put it in the dustbin."

On the wake of Boston's orchestra-critic revolt, Thomas was asked if he's influenced by the comments of music critics.

"Just as I'm influenced by other peoples' judgments," he replied. "I react according to my opinion of the individual's judgment."

No Waste of Motion

Thomas is an energetic conductor but he doesn't waste motion or deliberately "put on a show" for whatever effect it might have.

He has a tolerant attitude toward the young, flamboyant school of conducting. "I'm only interested in how the performance sounds," he says.

"I don't believe that conducting can be entirely taught," he adds. "You have to discover things for yourself — both good and bad. Sometimes you realize that these were things you were taught long ago."

Thomas likes "some rock music. But I also like Asiatic music."

His family, the Thomashefskys, has been connected with the theater for several generations.

A tall, thin, personable young man, Thomas has skyrocketed in a career since he enrolled at USC with advanced standing at the age of 18.

The awe which he admits to experiencing on the Boston Symphony podium attests to his humility as a musician.

He has faith in himself — and in his generation. And the Boston Symphony has faith in Michael Tilson Thomas.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849

JAN 11 1970

'This Is Your Moment, Kid...'

Short Notice

Conductor Richard Dufallo had just 36 hours' warning that he would replace fatally stricken Syracuse Symphony conductor Karl Kritz last December. He came through in fine style even though he had to conduct several works he knew little or nothing about.

formance has to be laid on the line —and with only the briefest notice.

The Dusty Rhodeses and the Davids crop up now and then, not only in sports and war, but in such relatively sheltered areas as the theater, the opera and the concert world.

Take, for instance, what happened a couple of months ago, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new director, William Steinberg, was giving a concert at New York's Philharmonic Hall. There was a rather long intermission. Then it was announced from the stage that Steinberg, not fully recovered from an operation he had undergone last summer, was unable to continue. His place for the remainder of the program, the announcer said, would be taken by Kritz. Dufallo faced a special hazard. He had never conducted two of the works, but he had heard them. The third one was a total stranger to him until the concert. So he conducted it without rehearsal, and things went well, but Dufallo said afterwards: "I was either mad or a fool."

Music buffs may have been reminded of an historic event of the same sort that occurred 80 years earlier in the opera house in Buenos Aires. The opera was Verdi's "Aida," a big job full of mass scenes and other ensembles. The conductor was ill. A small slender Italian youth was called from his cellist's desk in the orchestra pit to direct the performance—and that was how Arturo Toscanini, at 19, skipped several rungs on the ladder to fame.

Last season a typical case of the premature debut befell the young Spanish-born tenor Placido Domingo. Domingo, who had come from the New York City Opera to the Metropolitan, the goal that every singer dreams of, was scheduled to make his debut in Cilea's recently revived "Adriana Lecouvreur."

Four days before the date chosen for that happy event he was relaxing at his home in Teaneck, N.J. Mrs. Domingo, it may be noted, was expecting another happy event, due about the same time as her husband's debut. At 7:20 in the evening, the telephone rang. The Met was calling. Franco Corelli was ill. Could Mr. Domingo sing the tenor role in "Adriana" that night?

Most persons would have choked up in the circumstances, but Domingo said yes. (There must be something in that first name.)

the first act and Otto Edelmann took over. In one famous quick swap, the immortal tenor Enrico Caruso sang the bass solo in the last act of "La Boheme" when the basso, De Segurola, had a temporary loss of voice. (Caruso put it over by turning his back to the audience.) And in the same opera, on Dec. 5 of last year during the flu epidemic, the Met had to fall back on the platoon system.

First, tenor Nicolai Gedda was laid low by the bug and was unable to appear as Rodolfo. Luciano Pavarotti was called in. He struggled against the virus for two acts before throwing in the sponge. When manager Rudolf Bing came out at intermission to announce that the second substitute of the evening would be Barry Morell, he said, with grim humor, "I think we are losing."

There have been some singers who had the special kind of temperament that makes good pinchhitters — or relief pitchers. The Met's Frederic Jagel, a leading tenor of the '30s and '40s, was also possibly the outstanding operatic call fireman. Jagel was ready to bounce onto the stage at the drop of a high C. He knew 40 roles—one explanation of his readiness — and he had 23 years experience at the Metropolitan.

A switch—a veteran replacing a young artist—involved the pianist Gunnar Johnsen. On the afternoon Jan. 13, 1969, young Peter Serkin, who was to be piano soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra next evening at Philharmonic Hall, was taken ill.

Ordinarily there would have been plenty of pianists around to step in. The trouble was that nobody except Serkin knew the particular concerto that was to be played—not one of the big ones, arrangement of his concerto for violin.

Johansen, artist in residence at the University of Wisconsin and a thorough pro, was called and asked if he could learn and play the concerto in the short time available. He had never seen or heard the work (except in its original form) but he agreed to go ahead.

JOHANSEN got the score, drove 30 miles to his home to pack his dress suit, drove 40 more to the airport, and within two hours of his summons was on a plane for New York. He studied the concerto on the flight. In New York, he spent two hours looking for a hotel room, and finally got one, a half hour after midnight.

After a fast five hours' practice the next day, he went to Philharmonic Hall for a rehearsal with Eugene Ormandy, drilling only on the parts in which the piano was active; he also found that he had to play different cadenzas — the showy, unaccompanied solo flourishes— from those in the score. He read them at sight.

He snatched a bit of supper and went back to practice until 10 minutes before performance time. Of such stuff are heroes made, and if you don't think playing under those circumstances was a feat, ask any pianist.

Oftenest, of course, the understudy just sits around, vainly hoping that the star will be stricken by something benign but thoroughly incapacitating. And not all the pinchhitters clear the bases. History has a merciful way of not recording the ones who struck out.

Michael Thomas Guest Conductor Of Philharmonia

Michael Tilson Thomas will be the guest conductor of the Philharmonia's third concert of the season, Sunday at 7 p.m. in Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Thomas, now in this first season as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is featuring the St. Paul BKOYS Choir in Monteverdi's "Sonata Sancta Maria" and Wagner's "Kinder-Katechismus Musik," which will beaheard for the first time in the United States.

Another work by Wagner, "Siegried Idyl," and Haydn's "Symphony No. 80 in D minor" contrast with "Times Five," music written by Earl Brown for five instruments and tape recorder. The concert will conclude with Hindemith's "Kammermusik No. 1."

Thomas, a native of California, made his first Boston appearance with the Philharmonia in April, 1969. Named in June as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he made his first appearance in that capacity in October, and conducted the orchestra during its East Coast tour in November.

~~Globe~~ H.T.
1/23/70

Whittenberg Appointed To Bruckner Society

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.

JAN 3 1970 Eng

STORRS — Charles Whittenberg, a prominent professor-composer on the University of Connecticut music faculty, has been appointed a member of the Bruckner Society of America.

The Society is an organization of scholars who have "contributed significantly" to knowledge about the great Austrian composer's work.

Toward this end, Professor Whittenberg recently has been completing a monograph (lengthy essay) on one of Bruckner's works. Title is "Anton Bruckner's 'Eight Symphony' and Erich Leinsdorf The Articulation of a Symphonic Macrocosm." In connection with his research, the UofC composer was guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 6, when Mr. Leinsdorf returned to conduct the symphony for the BSO. Publication of the monograph is scheduled this year (1970) by the Bruckner Society.

Last month the UofC composer was honored by the Library of Congress at a Dec. 17 concert in the Coolidge Auditorium. At that time he was asked to donate all sketches and original manuscripts of his own compositions to the Library of purposes of evaluation and research.

In recent years, Professor Whittenberg has been commissioned to create several compositions, including "Event for Chamber Orchestra," "Correlatives for Orchestras," and "Concerto for Brass Quintet." His compositions have been performed in every state of the continental U.S., in a number of European concert halls and in the Far East. His works also have been performed by the BBC in London and the German Radio of Cologne, Baden-Baden and Hamberg.

Also on the Library of Congress program with Professor Whittenberg was Piera Bollex, newly appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and Milton Babbitt, distinguished exponent of contemporary music and Conat Professor of Music at Princeton University.

Thomas had his 25th birthday on Dec. 21. Steinberg is 70.

A native of Hollywood, Calif., Thomas holds bachelor's and master's degrees in music. He is working for a doctorate jointly at the University of Southern California and New England Conservatory of Music.

Degrees Don't Matter

Audiences don't care how many degrees a conductor has. And it can't be assumed that all great conductors were born to the cause.

Thomas began musical studies when he was 10. Many performers were already on the concert stage before that age.

It wasn't until Thomas was 15 and already a promising pianist that he became aware of his serious interest in conducting.

Fate took over.

The high school music teacher was ill and unable to rehearse the orchestra. Thomas substituted.

It didn't woo him away from the keyboard, right away.

"Soon after," he recalls, "I was given the opportunity to conduct the high school orchestra in a public performance. I'll never forget it. The music was Rossini's 'La Gazza Ladra Overture'."

Another emergency came up last October in New York City.

Symphony Tour

The Boston Symphony men were on tour. They started with concerts at the University of Virginia and Baltimore.

Steinberg had undergone an operation during the summer but he felt fine.

young assistant, "Michael, it looks as if you'll have to carry on."

The balance of the program was Robert Starer's Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra (a realstickler under best conditons) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

It was a triumph for Thomas.

"He's had all kinds of offers since that night," says Marvin Schofer, head of the BSO's press department.

Thomas was already an "old" pro by the time he was appointed to the Boston Symphony.

Won Many Prizes

He had been a consistent prize winner — Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center, Musical America's Young Artists Award, USC's Alumni Prize for Outstanding Graduate.

Thomas was assistant to Pierre Boulez (one of his teachers and incoming conductor of the New York Philharmonic) and had conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Boston Philharmonia. He had conducted the Bayreuth, Germany, and Ojai, Calif., Festivals.

Such composers as Stravinsky, Stockhausen, Boulez, Foss and others had entrusted premieres of their works to Thomas.

He had a number of recordings to his credit.

Great talent is by no means a common commodity these days. Nor is it rare. Just what the magic ingredient that places a young man in his mid-20s before the Boston Symphony, Thomas was asked.

dazzling kind of ac[illegible]ty isn't that important anymore. For example, it doesn't matter how many notes a pianist can play in a given time."

How does Thomas feel as he stands before the Boston Symphony and is about to begin a concert before a packed house?

"I feel as if I'm standing before something enormous," he replied after some thought. "It's much greater than the combined number of people on stage or in the hall. I feel that the composer's personality is present. It's an immense feeling of awe, as if I'm entering into another place, physically."

Thomas doesn't talk or act like a crusader, but he's a beacon of hope to the aspiring young musician.

"I have enormous faith in my own generation," he states, and it's virtually a pronouncement.

"It wasn't so long ago," he explains, "that this conductor wasn't speaking to that conductor. Some would say, 'that's my piece and no one else has a right to play it'.

'The Common Good'

"Mine is not a proprietary generation. We all talk to each other. We all work for the common good of music. We encourage each other."

Furthermore, he believes in the new music.

"Since the '40s, music has been in an experimental stage. We are waiting for a synthesis — a strong new language.

The development process of music applies to other areas.

"Audiences' attitudes will shift and adapt to what present-day composers are saying. Some of these composers disguise their methods so that they sound spontaneous. There are charlatans, of course, but they will fade away."

Thomas is far removed from the rigid right-and-wrong school of thought that has caused certain conductors' interpretations to be accepted as pontifical decrees.

Thomas feels that music has undergone even more change in this century than during any comparable time in the past.

He doesn't feel that all 19th century music will be relegated eventually to a "gingerbread" era, even though there is such a tendency nowadays.

Thomas insists. "They have been faulty, negative approaches. Such 'conventions' haven't held water for the past 10 or 15 years. Things that were considered radical a short time ago are now regarded as roads to real understanding."

Career Decisions Important

As a 25-year-old conductor whose new instrument is one of the world's great orchestras, Thomas has already reached that stage in his career where important decisions must be made.

They are musical, and it's upon these that his star will continue to rise, or fall.

"It isn't always the same," he admits. "Sometimes when I face an orchestra something switches on and everything is secure. The orchestra plays as one organism. It's like a tape recorder in operation. Everything is undisturbed. It's all forward motion."

How does he prepare for this?

"I assume that what I see on the score is what the composer was trying to say. Having tried it, I may have to make changes in procedure to make it come across."

What about the program itself?

'Pieces I Love'

"I make up a program of pieces I love," Thomas explains. "They are things I want to do. Then I arrange them so that they work well together."

And when it's a commissioned or "strongly requested" work that isn't the greatest?

"Every professional musician has faced that situation," says Thomas. "At the time I'm conducting it, I must music ever written. Later on, I can put it in the dustbin."

On the wake of Boston's orchestra-critic revolt, Thomas was asked if he's influenced by the comments of music critics.

"Just as I'm influenced by other peoples' judgments," he replied. "I react according to my opinion of the individual's judgment."

No Waste of Motion

Thomas is an energetic conductor but he doesn't waste motion or deliberately "put on a show" for whatever effect it might have.

He has a tolerant attitude toward the young, flamboyant school of conducting. "I'm only interested in how the performance sounds," he says.

"I don't believe that conducting can be entirely taught," he adds. "You have to discover things for yourself — both good and bad. Sometimes you realize that these were things you were taught long ago."

Thomas likes "some rock music. But I also like Asiatic music."

His family, the Thomashefskys, has been connected with the theater for several generations.

A tall, thin, personable young man, Thomas has skyrocketed in a career since he enrolled at USC with advanced standing at the age of 18.

The awe which he admits to experiencing on the Boston Symphony podium attests to his humility as a musician.

He has faith in himself — and in his generation. And the Boston Symphony has faith in Michael Tilson Thomas.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
JAN 11 1970

'This Is Your Moment, Kid...'

Whether it's a grind house or grand opera, there's always that crisis when the star can't go on and some brave youngster gets the spotlight for a few fabulous minutes that can make stage history . . . or nip a career in the bud

By ROBERT MOLLOY

Music lovers will recognize, in photo above, baritone Frank Guarrera, tenor Brian Sullivan and contralto Herta Glaz at Met rehearsal with a promising young soprano from the Bronx. And who is the soprano? For that matter, who is the dapper cellist at right? If the names don't come to mind immediately, read on . . .

EVER since Little David took his sling and went in as a substitute for Israel's army to show up the Philistines' giant man of war, the pinchhitter has rated high with the public.

The fellow who takes over an army or a ship at zero hour is a sure candidate for admiration. And although the term pinchhitting comes from baseball, the kind of steel-nerved rising to the occasion it describes is common to nearly all human doings in which per-the orchestra's assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas.

Conducting any symphony orchestra, even one like the Boston, whose members probably could play in the dark, is no easy job. It may look to most of us like a matter of waving a stick fast or slow, but there are a dozen or more separate sections and parts to be cued in, reminded about loudness and softness and other details, not to mention kept in balance.

Faced with this sink-or-swim situation, Thomas kept his nerve. He had in his favor the fact that he knew his job and his chief's style, and he had the priceless advantage of being only 24 years old. He bowed modestly with the two soloists who were to play a contemporary concerto, turned to the orchestra, and proceeded like an old hand.

Steinberg continued to ail, so Thomas conducted several concerts in New York and vicinity, one offering the program he had prepared for his formal debut in Boston. It looks now as if Thomas started near the top.

AND, only last December, Richard Dufallo agreed on 36 hours' notice, to replace the fatally stricken conductor of the Syracuse Symphony, Karl Domingo did not waste any time getting into his car. Teaneck is six miles northwest of the George Washington Bridge but he reached the Met 36 minutes after the telephone call, warming up his voice as he drove. At 7:56 he was getting into his costume and putting on his makeup. The performance began only a few minutes late.

Another unexpected debut, the kind of impromptu appearance that can swing the door to a career a little wider, took place a bit farther back in operatic history—Nov. 17, 1950, to be exact.

Mozart's "Don Giovanni" was scheduled at the Met, and Nadine Connor was cast as the peasant girl Zerlina.

That noon Miss Connor suffered an attack of food poisoning, and a hurry call was made to the Bronx home of a very pretty 20-year-old girl named Roberta Peters, who was under contract but had not made her debut. She had the nerves and the confidence to accept the assignment, and with just a few hours' coaching with the stage director and an assistant conductor, she was ready. She gave such a good account of herself that she has been looking beautiful and singing charmingly ever since.

Replacements even occur during performances. During Wagner's "Parsifal" a dozen or so years ago, basso Jerome Hines was overcome by laryngitis after

They Are . . .

Soprano in top photo is Roberta Peters, shown shortly after her sensational 1950 substitution for the ailing Nadine Connor in "Don Giovanni." Mustachioed musician above may not be remembered as a cellist, but he received renown as the immortal maestro Arturo Toscanini.

but Beethoven's own unfamiliar piano

Michael Thomas Guest Conductor Of Philharmonia

Michael Tilson Thomas will be the guest conductor of the Philharmonia's third concert of the season, Sunday at 7 p.m. in Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Thomas, now in this first season as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is featuring the St. Paul BKOYS Choir in Monteverdi's "Sonata Sancta Maria" and Wagner's "Kinder-Katechismus Musik," which will beaheard for the first time in the United States.

Another work by Wagner, "Siegried Idyl," and Haydn's "Symphony No. 80 in D minor" contrast with "Times Five," music written by Earl Brown for five instruments and tape recorder. The concert will conclude with Hindemith's "Kammermusik No. 1."

Thomas, a native of California, made his first Boston appearance with the Philharmonia in April, 1969. Named in June as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he made his first appearance in that capacity in October, and conducted the orchestra during its East Coast tour in November.

Globe H.T.
1/23/70

Whittenberg Appointed To Bruckner Society

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
JAN 3 1970 Eng

STORRS — Charles Whittenberg, a prominent professor-composer on the University of Connecticut music faculty, has been appointed a member of the Bruckner Society of America.

The Society is an organization of scholars who have "contributed significantly" to knowledge about the great Austrian composer's work.

Toward this end, Professor Whittenberg recently has been completing a monograph (lengthy essay) on one of Bruckner's works. Title is "Anton Bruckner's 'Eight Symphony' and Erich Leinsdorf The Articulation of a Symphonic Macrocosm." In connection with his research, the UofC composer was guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 6, when Mr. Leinsdorf returned to conduct the symphony for the BSO. Publication of the monograph is scheduled this year (1970) by the Bruckner Society.

Last month the UofC composer was honored by the Library of Congress at a Dec. 17 concert in the Coolidge Auditorium. At that time he was asked to donate all sketches and original manuscripts of his own compositions to the Library of purposes of evaluation and research.

In recent years, Professor Whittenberg has been commissioned to create several compositions, including "Event for Chamber Orchestra," "Correlatives for Orchestras," and "Concerto for Brass Quintet." His compositions have been performed in every state of the continental U.S., in a number of European concert halls and in the Far East. His works also have been performed by the BBC in London and the German Radio of Cologne, Baden-Baden and Hamberg.

Also on the Library of Congress program with Professor Whittenberg was Piera Bollex, newly appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and Milton Babbitt, distinguished exponent of contemporary music and Conat Professor of Music at Princeton University.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JAN 10 1970

166

Occupation: Assistant Conductor, Boston Symphony

Age: 25

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas' new job is one of the nation's musical plums.

He is assistant to William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thomas had his 25th birthday on Dec. 21. Steinberg is 70.

A native of Hollywood, Calif., Thomas holds bachelor's and master's degrees in music. He is working for a doctorate jointly at the University of Southern California and New England Conservatory of Music.

Degrees Don't Matter

Audiences don't care how many degrees a conductor has. And it can't be assumed that all great conductors were born to the cause.

Thomas began musical studies when he was 10. Many performers were already on the concert stage before that age.

It wasn't until Thomas was 15 and already a promising pianist that he became aware of his serious interest in conducting.

Fate took over.

The high school music teacher was ill and unable to rehearse the orchestra. Thomas substituted.

It didn't woo him away from the keyboard, right away.

"Soon after," he recalls, "I was given the opportunity to conduct the high school orchestra in a public performance. I'll never forget it. The music was Rossini's 'La Gazza Ladra Overture'."

Another emergency came up last October in New York City.

Symphony Tour

The Boston Symphony men were on tour. They started with concerts at the University of Virginia and Baltimore.

Steinberg had undergone an operation during the summer but he felt fine.

Then, the big concert at New York's Philharmonic Hall on Oct. 22.

Steinberg conducted Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture and Brahms' Second Symphony and then he became ill.

During intermission he said to his young assistant, "Michael, it looks as if you'll have to carry on."

The balance of the program was Robert Starer's Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra (a realstickler under best conditons) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

It was a triumph for Thomas.

"He's had all kinds of offers since that night," says Marvin Schofer, head of the BSO's press department.

Thomas was already an "old" pro by the time he was appointed to the Boston Symphony.

Won Many Prizes

He had been a consistent prize winner — Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center, Musical America's Young Artists Award, USC's Alumni Prize for Outstanding Graduate.

Thomas was assistant to Pierre Boulez (one of his teachers and incoming conductor of the New York Philharmonic) and had conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Boston Philharmonia. He had conducted the Bayreuth, Germany, and Ojai, Calif., Festivals.

Such composers as Stravinsky, Stockhausen, Boulez, Foss and others had entrusted premieres of their works to Thomas.

He had a number of recordings to his credit.

Great talent is by no means a common commodity these days. Nor is it rare. Just what the magic ingredient that places a young man in his mid-20s before the Boston Symphony, Thomas was asked.

"Imagination," he replied. "That's the hope of the entire human race."

Which of the young virtuosos will survive?

Again, "those with imagination."

"We're in an age of machines, human and mechanical," says Thomas. "A dazzling kind of activity isn't that important anymore. For example, it doesn't matter how many notes a pianist can play in a given time."

How does Thomas feel as he stands before the Boston Symphony and is about to begin a concert before a packed house?

"I feel as if I'm standing before something enormous," he replied after some thought. "It's much greater than the combined number of people on stage or in the hall. I feel that the composer's personality is present. It's an immense feeling of awe, as if I'm entering into another place, physically."

Thomas doesn't talk or act like a crusader, but he's a beacon of hope to the aspiring young musician.

"I have enormous faith in my own generation," he states, and it's virtually a pronouncement.

"It wasn't so long ago," he explains, "that this conductor wasn't speaking to that conductor. Some would say, 'that's my piece and no one else has a right to play it'.

'The Common Good'

"Mine is not a proprietary generation. We all talk to each other. We all work for the common good of music. We encourage each other."

Furthermore, he believes in the new music.

"Since the '40s, music has been in an experimental stage. We are waiting for a synthesis — a strong new language.

Thomas conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at Tanglewood last summer.

The development process of music applies to other areas.

"Audiences' attitudes will shift and adapt to what present-day composers are saying. Some of these composers disguise their methods so that they sound spontaneous. There are charlatans, of course, but they will fade away."

Thomas is far removed from the rigid right-and-wrong school of thought that has caused certain conductors' interpretations to be accepted as pontifical decrees.

Thomas feels that music has undergone even more change in this century than during any comparable time in the past.

He doesn't feel that all 19th century music will be relegated eventually to a "gingerbread" era, even though there is such a tendency nowadays.

"So-called traditions can be wrong," Thomas insists. "They have been fautly, negative approaches. Such 'conventions' haven't held water for the past 10 or 15 years. Things that were considered radical a short time ago are now regarded as roads to real understanding."

Career Decisions Important

As a 25-year-old conductor whose new instrument is one of the world's great orchestras, Thomas has already reached that stage in his career where important decisions must be made.

They are musical, and it's upon these that his star will continue to rise, or fall.

"It isn't always the same," he admits. "Sometimes when I face an orchestra something switches on and everything is secure. The orchestra plays as one organism. It's like a tape recorder in operation. Everything is undisturbed. It's all forward motion."

How does he prepare for this?

"I assume that what I see on the score is what the composer was trying to say. Having tried it, I may have to make changes in procedure to make it come across."

What about the program itself?

'Pieces I Love'

"I make up a program of pieces I love," Thomas explains. "They are things I want to do. Then I arrange them so that they work well together."

And when it's a commissioned or "strongly requested" work that isn't the greatest?

"Every professional musician has faced that situation," says Thomas. "At the time I'm conducting it, I must handle it as if it's the greatest piece of music ever written. Later on, I can put it in the dustbin."

On the wake of Boston's orchestra-critic revolt, Thomas was asked if he's influenced by the comments of music critics.

"Just as I'm influenced by other peoples' judgments," he replied. "I react according to my opinion of the individual's judgment."

No Waste of Motion

Thomas is an energetic conductor but he doesn't waste motion or deliberately "put on a show" for whatever effect it might have.

He has a tolerant attitude toward the young, flamboyant school of conducting. "I'm only interested in how the performance sounds," he says.

"I don't believe that conducting can be entirely taught," he adds. "You have to discover things for yourself — both good and bad. Sometimes you realize that these were things you were taught long ago."

Thomas likes "some rock music. But I also like Asiatic music."

His family, the Thomashefskys, has been connected with the theater for several generations.

A tall, thin, personable young man, Thomas has skyrocketed in a career since he enrolled at USC with advanced standing at the age of 18.

The awe which he admits to experiencing on the Boston Symphony podium attests to his humility as a musician.

He has faith in himself — and in his generation. And the Boston Symphony has faith in Michael Tilson Thomas.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,949

JAN 11 1970

'This Is Your Moment, Kid...'

Short Notice

Conductor Richard Dufallo had just 36 hours' warning that he would replace fatally stricken Syracuse Symphony conductor Karl Kritz last December. He came through in fine style even though he had to conduct several works he knew little or nothing about.

formance has to be laid on the line —and with only the briefest notice.

The Dusty Rhodeses and the Davids crop up now and then, not only in sports and war, but in such relatively sheltered areas as the theater, the opera and the concert world.

Take, for instance, what happened a couple of months ago, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new director, William Steinberg, was giving a concert at New York's Philharmonic Hall. There was a rather long intermission. Then it was announced from the stage that Steinberg, not fully recovered from an operation he had undergone last summer, was unable to continue. His place for the remainder of the program, the announcer said, would be taken by Karl Kritz. Dufallo faced a special hazard. He had never conducted two of the works, but he had heard them. The third one was a total stranger to him until the concert. So he conducted it without rehearsal, and things went well, but Dufallo said afterwards: "I was either mad or a fool."

Music buffs may have been reminded of an historic event of the same sort that occurred 80 years earlier in the opera house in Buenos Aires. The opera was Verdi's "Aida," a big job full of mass scenes and other ensembles. The conductor was ill. A small slender Italian youth was called from his cellist's desk in the orchestra pit to direct the performance—and that was how Arturo Toscanini, at 19, skipped several rungs on the ladder to fame.

Last season a typical case of the premature debut befell the young Spanish-born tenor Placido Domingo. Domingo, who had come from the New York City Opera to the Metropolitan, the goal that every singer dreams of, was scheduled to make his debut in Cilea's recently revived "Adriana Lecouvreur."

Four days before the date chosen for that happy event he was relaxing at his home in Teaneck, N.J. Mrs. Domingo, it may be noted, was expecting another happy event, due about the same time as her husband's debut. At 7:20 in the evening, the telephone rang. The Met was calling. Franco Corelli was ill. Could Mr. Domingo sing the tenor role in "Adriana" that night?

Most persons would have choked up in the circumstances, but Domingo said yes. (There must be something in that first name.)

the first act and Otto Edelmann took over. In one famous quick swap, the immortal tenor Enrico Caruso sang the bass solo in the last act of "La Boheme" when the basso, De Segurola, had a temporary loss of voice. (Caruso put it over by turning his back to the audience.) And in the same opera, on Dec. 5 of last year during the flu epidemic, the Met had to fall back on the platoon system.

First, tenor Nicolai Gedda was laid low by the bug and was unable to appear as Rodolfo. Luciano Pavarotti was called in. He struggled against the virus for two acts before throwing in the sponge. When manager Rudolf Bing came out at intermission to announce that the second substitute of the evening would be Barry Morell, he said, with grim humor, "I think we are losing."

There have been some singers who had the special kind of temperament that makes good pinchhitters — or relief pitchers. The Met's Frederic Jagel, a leading tenor of the '30s and '40s, was also possibly the outstanding operatic call fireman. Jagel was ready to bounce onto the stage at the drop of a high C. He knew 40 roles—one explanation of his readiness — and he had 23 years experience at the Metropolitan.

A switch—a veteran replacing a young artist—involved the pianist Gunnar Johnsen. On the afternoon Jan. 13, 1969, young Peter Serkin, who was to be piano soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra next evening at Philharmonic Hall, was taken ill.

Ordinarily there would have been plenty of pianists around to step in. The trouble was that nobody except Serkin knew the particular concerto that was to be played—not one of the big ones, arrangement of his concerto for violin.

Johansen, artist in residence at the University of Wisconsin and a thorough pro, was called and asked if he could learn and play the concerto in the short time available. He had never seen or heard the work (except in its original form) but he agreed to go ahead.

JOHANSEN got the score, drove 30 miles to his home to pack his dress suit, drove 40 more to the airport, and within two hours of his summons was on a plane for New York. He studied the concerto on the flight. In New York, he spent two hours looking for a hotel room, and finally got one, a half hour after midnight.

After a fast five hours' practice the next day, he went to Philharmonic Hall for a rehearsal with Eugene Ormandy, drilling only on the parts in which the piano was active; he also found that he had to play different cadenzas — the showy, unaccompanied solo flourishes— from those in the score. He read them at sight.

He snatched a bit of supper and went back to practice until 10 minutes before performance time. Of such stuff are heroes made, and if you don't think playing under those circumstances was a feat, ask any pianist.

Oftenest, of course, the understudy just sits around, vainly hoping that the star will be stricken by something benign but thoroughly incapacitating. And not all the pinchhitters clear the bases. History has a merciful way of not recording the ones who struck out.

Michael Thomas Guest Conductor Of Philharmonia

Michael Tilson Thomas will be the guest conductor of the Philharmonia's third concert of the season, Sunday at 7 p.m. in Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Thomas, now in this first season as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is featuring the St. Paul BKOYS Choir in Monteverdi's "Sonata Sancta Maria" and Wagner's "Kinder-Katechismus Musik," which will beaheard for the first time in the United States.

Another work by Wagner, "Siegried Idyl," and Haydn's "Symphony No. 80 in D minor" contrast with "Times Five," music written by Earl Brown for five instruments and tape recorder. The concert will conclude with Hindemith's "Kammermusik No. 1."

Thomas, a native of California, made his first Boston appearance with the Philharmonia in April, 1969. Named in June as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he made his first appearance in that capacity in October, and conducted the orchestra during its East Coast tour in November.

~~Globe~~ H.T.
1/23/70

Whittenberg Appointed To Bruckner Society

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.

JAN 3 1970

STORRS — Charles Whittenberg, a prominent professor-composer on the University of Connecticut music faculty, has been appointed a member of the Bruckner Society of America.

The Society is an organization of scholars who have "contributed significantly" to knowledge about the great Austrian composer's work.

Toward this end, Professor Whittenberg recently has been completing a monograph (lengthy essay) on one of Bruckner's works. Title is "Anton Bruckner's 'Eight Symphony' and Erich Leinsdorf The Articulation of a Symphonic Macrocosm." In connection with his research, the UofC composer was guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 6, when Mr. Leinsdorf returned to conduct the symphony for the BSO. Publication of the monograph is scheduled this year (1970) by the Bruckner Society.

Last month the UofC composer was honored by the Library of Congress at a Dec. 17 concert in the Coolidge Auditorium. At that time he was asked to donate all sketches and original manuscripts of his own compositions to the Library of purposes of evaluation and research.

In recent years, Professor Whittenberg has been commissioned to create several compositions, including "Event for Chamber Orchestra," "Correlatives for Orchestras," and "Concerto for Brass Quintet." His compositions have been performed in every state of the continental U.S., in a number of European concert halls and in the Far East. His works also have been performed by the BBC in London and the German Radio of Cologne, Baden-Baden and Hamberg.

Also on the Library of Congress program with Professor Whittenberg was Piera Bollex, newly appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and Milton Babbitt, distinguished exponent of contemporary music and Conat Professor of Music at Princeton University.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
JAN 18 1970

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

On Sunday, Feb. 1, at 3 p.m. in Keith Junior High School Auditorium, the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of John R. Pandolfi, will do its musical bit in celebration of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth.

Appropriately enough, the entire program will be devoted to three works by Beethoven — the "Egmont" Overture," "Symphony No. 3," (Eroica), and the Violin Concerto in D Major, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The "Egmont" is part of the incidental music which Beethoven composed for the 1810 production of Goethe's romantic play about the attempt of The Netherlands to overthrow Spanish rule. As for the "Eroica," it was, according to most biographers, Beethoven's own favorite symphony, originally dedicated to Napoleon. However, when Napoleon assumed the title of Emperor, Beethoven became angry and disillusioned and changed both the title and the dedication of the symphony.

But no matter to whom it is dedicated, it is, of course, one of the masterworks of the world — prodigious in conception, filled with grandeur, and boasting, in its famous slow movement, a funeral march that has become a standy at the requiem rites for eminent persons.

The violin concerto is Beethoven's only work in the genre — and it is among the four or five most beloved compositions of its kind. The reasons for its popularity are obvious — it has melodic invention, a remarkable logic and lucidity of organization, and splendid spaciousness of design.

Mr. Silverstein, who will perform the concerto with the orchestra, is, of course, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. However, aside from his duties as concertmaster, which he fulfills with high competence, he is also a frequent soloist with the Boston group and with other major orchestras. In addition, he is a rewarding recitalist and a member of several outstanding chamber music ensembles. I have heard Mr. Silverstein play on innumerable occasions, and I am delighted that he will be heard locally with our own orchestra.

Tickets for this concert will be available at the door. Certainly, area music lovers should avail themselves of this opportunity to celebrate the anniversary year of one of the titans in the history of music.

Youth Concerts Jan. 10, 17 at Symphony Hall

HT 1/3/70

Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall presents the second concert of its three-concert series on Saturdays Jan. 10 and 17 at 11 a.m. in Symphony Hall. Harry Ellis Dickson, Founder and Music Director of Youth Concerts, conducts members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program called 'Same Axe — Different Bag.'

The program demonstrates the use of the same instrument in different styles. The Carl Atkins Group, featuring Andy McGhee, alto sax; Carl Atkins, tenor - sax; Herb Pomeroy, trumpet; Harvey Mason, drums; Don Pate, bass and Cedric Lawson, piano; perform in a variety of works with and without the orchestra, individually and as a group.

Works by Haydn, Ibert, Dragonetti, and Milhaud are contrasted with the Atkins Group general improvisitory repertoire. Other soloists in clude Everett Firth, principal tympanist of the Boston Symphony, William Rhein, bass with the Orchestra, and Roger Voisin, trumpet.

This program will be repeated on Friday mornings Jan. 16 and 23 at 10:20 for junior high school students of the Boston Public Schools. These concerts are made possible through a grant given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation. Under the terms of this grant, 5,200 junior high school pupils attend three concerts a year at Symphony Hall during the next three years. Several hundred are selected to spend a week at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

Pupils Attend Hub Youth Concert

167.

BEVERLY — Students from schools attended the second of 3 junior high and elementary youth concerts presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Saturday.

Attendance at the series is sponsored by the Beverly Public Schools Music Department and is open to pupils in Grades 6, 7 and 8.

Saturday's concrt was entitled "Do Your Own Thing," and featured the music of Haydn, Ibert, Dragonetti and Milhaud. In addition, a professional jazz group performed.

Third and final program in the series will be presnted on March 21. Students participating in the program represnted the 2 junior high schools and 11 of the 13 elementary schools. Chaperones are director of Music Lawrence Drouin, Miss Susan Johnson of the elemntary music staff, Mrs. A. Frederick Grassin of 87 Essex St., and Mrs. DeWolf Merriam of 15 Sonning Road.

Attending were:

Memorial Jur. High — John Bagnall, Charles Close, John Daly, Chris Mrriam, Renee Enos, Margaret Florini, Richard Frost, Susan MacKenzie, Beth Manaster, Donald Spiridigliozzi, David Sylvain, Holly Vickers; Colson John Gillessen, John MacDougall, Elaine Nelson, Paul Rudenberg.

Cove - Montserrat — Scott Carger, Carl Hin - Hansen, Susan Letterman, John Pesinos, Holly Hubis, Jessica Sterman, Dana Zarkades; North Beverly — Patricia Barry, David Carnevale, Robert Mercer, Kevin Rainville, Jonathan Salt; Bronw — Joyce Blatt, Beverly Brine, Amy Merriam, Scott Doig, Steven Schug.

Edwards — Claudette Bouchard, Katherine Colson, Glen Gall, Judith Ann Keaney, Nancy Keaney; McKay — Mary Louise Broll; Hannah — Mark Callahan, Paula Holmes; Ryal Side — Cynthia Cannell.

Beverly Farms — Allen Carito, Helen Florini, Cindy Lee, Peter Lee, David Mersfelder, Lauren Power; Hardie — Lorraine Grassin; Washington — Elizabeth Hudson; Centerville — Scott Myers, Ronald Russell, Jeff Zaginailoff, Steven Landers.

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
(E) 28,099
JAN 20 1970

YOUTH CONCERT, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall. Program designed for students in grades 5-12. No pre-school children admitted. Children shown above examine ancient instruments on exhibit in the Old Instrument Room before the concert Saturday morning, Jan. 10. Call CO 6-1492, 11 a.m.-12 noon.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,70
JAN 14 1970

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230
JAN 20 1970

Youth Concert At Symphony Hall

A Youth Concert, sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Frederick J. Kennedy Foundation, Harry Ellis Dickson, directing, will take place in Symphony Hall on Friday, Jan. 23 at 10:20 a.m.

Titled "Same Axe — Different Bag," the concert will feature the Cark Atkins Group as soloists, The concert is for high school age students.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 20 1970

Children Attend Symphony Concert

BEVERLY — Students from Beverly elementary schools attended the second of three "Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall" presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday. The series is sponsored by the Beverly Public Schools Music Department, and is open to all students in grades six, even and eight.

The concert program was entitled "Do Your Own Thing," and featured the music of Haydn, Jaques Ibert, Dragonetti and Darius Milhaud. A professional jazz group also performed. The theme of the program was an emphasis on the many and varied ways of expressing oneself through music.

The next program in the series will be presented on March 21. The 55 students participating in the program are:

Cove - Montserrat School, Scott Carter, Carl Hein - Hansen, Susan Letterman, John Persinos, Holly Hubis, Jessica Sterman and Dena Zarkades; Memorial Junior High — John Bagnall, Charles Close, John Daly, Chris Merriam, Renee Enos, Margaret Florini, Richard Frost, Susan MacKenzie, Beth Manaster, Donald Spiridigliozzi, David Sylvain and Holly Vickers; North Beverly School — Patricia Barry, David Carnevale, Robert Mercer, Kevin Rainville and Jonathan Salt.

Brown School — Joyce Blatt, Beverly Brine, Amy Merriam, Scott Doig and Steven Schug; Hannah School — Mark Callahan and Paula Holmes; Edwards School — Claudette Bouchard, Katherine Colson, Glen Gall, Judith Ann Keaney and Nancy L. Keaney; Ryal Side School — Cynthia Cannell; McKay — Mary Louise Broll.

Beverly Farms — Allen Carto, Helen Florini, Cindy Lee, Peter Lee, David Mersfelder and Lauren Power; Briscoe Junior High — Sean Colson, John Gillessen, John MacDougall, Elaine Nelson and Paul Rudenberg; Centerville School — Scott Myers, Ronald Russell, Jeff Zaginailoff and Steven Landers; Hardie School — Lorraine Grassin; and Washington School — Elizabeth Hudson.

Chaperones for the trips are Lawrence Drouin, director of music for the public schools, Miss Susan Johnson of the elementary music staff, Mrs. A. Frederick Grassin, 87 Essex St., and Mrs. DeWolf Merriam, 15 Sonning Road.

Silverstein, Bloom To Give Concert On Feb. 11

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD TRIBUNE
D. 31,000 S. 35,000
JAN 18 1970

Violinist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with noted oboist Robert Bloom of the Yale Graduate School of Music, will perform a concert assisted by the Florida West Coast Chamber Orchestra conducted by Paul Wolfe on February 11 to benefit the New College Summer Music Festival Scholarship Fund.

Reservations are now being taken for the concert in which the internationally-known soloists and the chamber group will preform a program of music by C.P.E. Bach, Mozart, Bloom, Beethoven and J. S. Bach at Sarasota's Van Wezel Performing Arts Hall.

Proceeds of the benefit performance will go toward providing financial assistance for qualified music students to attend the Sixth Annual New College Summer Music Festival June 1-20.

Silverstein, who has appeared as soloist with many of the world's leading orchestras, also has recorded extensively for RCA Victor and other companies. He is chairman of the string department of the New England Conservatory of Music and is also chairman of the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass.

Bloom is professor of woodwind music at the Yale Graduate School of Music, composer, and authority on the interpretation of baroque music. A solo oboist with many symphony orchestras, including the NBC Symphony under Toscanini, Bloom is a member of the Bach Aria Group and appears with them in concerts all over the world.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

ROBERT BLOOM

With the seating capacity of the new Van Wezel Hall, there is a new opportunity for a much larger audience to hear the concert than has been possible in prior years.

Various types of sponsorships have been arranged to permit assistance to prospective, qualified student musicians attending the Summer Music Festival. Such sponsorships entitle the donor to two seats in the front section of the orchestra.

Single admissions, available only after Feb. 1, will be for seats in the center and rear sections.

The program for this year's Gala Scholarship Benefit concert includes: Mozart's Violin Concerto in D Major and Beethoven's Romance in G Major, with soloist Silverstein. Composer-oboist Bloom will perform an original work of his own, titled Requiem, and C.P.E. Bach's Oboe Concerto in E Flat Major. Together, the two artists will perform J.S. Bach's Double Concerto in C Minor.

Scholarships provided by the benefit concert permit the attraction of outstanding student musicians from the local area as well as those from other parts of the country. Last year, over 100 attended. They are brought together during the festival to study with such faculty members as Bloom, a charter member of the festival faculty, and Silverstein, who was a member of the 1969 faculty and a visiting artist of the 1968 festival and who has appeared in two previous benefit concerts. Both artists will be members of the 1970 festival faculty.

This year, the festival faculty will offer six public concerts; students participate in their own concerts held throughout the festival.

Of last year's festival, a Mimai newspaper music critic said: " . . . pure music-making of the most uncompromising kind and the highest value . . . undoubtedly the most exciting musical development in Florida and one of the finest chamber music study-and-performance events in the country."

Full information on reservations for the benefit concert may be obtained by calling the Humanities Division at the college or by writing New College Summer Music Festival, Gala Scholarship Benefit Concert, P.O. Box 1898, Sarasota, Florida, 33578.

At Andover

CSM 1/14

A joint program of cello and piano music will be given by Jules and Virginia Eskin as the second concert in the Andover Celebrity Series on Friday evening, Jan. 23, in George Washington Hall, Phillips Academy, Andover. Mr. Eskin is the principal cellist of the Boston Symphony, and his wife is a well-known recitalist here and abroad. Reservations may be made by writing Concert Committee, Phillips Academy, Andover, or calling GR 5-3400.

New Bedford Symphony Sets Special Event

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest soloist with the New Bedford Symphony in a special, all-Beethoven program conducted by John Pandolfi.

This concert is the highlight of the symphony's 1969-70 season and will be given Sunday at Keith Junior High School, New Bedford at 3 p.m. Tickets can be bought at the door. The program includes the Egmont Overture (Op. 84), Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica) and the Violin Concerto in D Major.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 14,087
JAN 29 1970

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946
JAN 28 1970

Lynn concert

The Mid-Winter Concert of the North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra now in its 22d season will be held Sunday at 7:30 p.m., at the Lynn City Hall Memorial Auditorium. Ann Hobson, second harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist. Rolland Tapley is the conductor.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 466,377
JAN 24 1970

Cantata Singers Concert Here

The Cantata Singers' winter concert will be the occasion of Joseph Silverstein's Boston debut as a conductor. Mr. Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a performance including the Lord Nelson Mass and C Major Violin Concerto of Haydn and Byrd's Mass for Four Voices, on Wednesday, February 18, at 8:30 p.m. in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Mr. Silverstein will be the soloist in the concerto.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516
JAN 29 1970

168

A magic Youth formula

BSO is real Pied Piper

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 194,70
JAN 18 1970

WINGS OF MUSIC carry David Simmons of Palmer on symphonic journey at Youth Concert.

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

Question: What can stop hundreds of small shuffling feet in their tracks?

Answer: Harry Ellis Dickson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Youth Concerts.

Author-player-conductor Dickson should know. He's stilled the restless youngsters for 11 years in a row now, and brought them backstage in eager surges. Harry always finds time.

Because of Harry and a friend of his named Artur Rubinstein, who's the world's best-known, most-loved pianist for at least two generations, kids who'd like to hear a real live orchestra "just once," get to ride those pumpkin-color buses to Symphony Hall regularly.

They get to talk to the players, these solemn-eyed girls and young tow-headed boys from more than a hundred New England towns. "They" said it couldn't be done. That Brahms and Beethoven and Shostakovich weren't for the eight year-old.

That the last thing the kid from the disadvantaged area wants to do "for free" is to sit in Symphony Hall and listen to a symphony orchestra dish out long-haired stuff.

"They" were wrong.

Hundreds of eager young faces line up every Youth Concert week-end hoping there'll be a vacancy. A seat on the B.S. O. bus. And because they're waiting, hopefully, V.I.P. pianist Artur Rubinstein, known from here to Australia, and the love of anyone who's ever been lucky enough to see those articulate fingers spew music out of a grand piano, will play his only Boston concert on Feb. 8 at three o'clock in Symphony Hall.

This fantastic 81-year-old master of the keyboard, longtime friend of the late great Serge Koussevitzky and his wife Olga, who has limned him from life in one of her unforgettable drawings, will not only play the concert on the 8th, but mingle with Boston constituents afterwards at a sponsors' reception that will set a new goal for aspiring committees.

Mrs. Jaime Pena-Vera, wife of the Mexican Consul General, and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall are working like mad to see that all goes well for the 8th, and pledged to their aid are Mrs. Kevin White (even though her baby's due that week); Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mrs. Edward Brooke, Mrs. Edward Kennedy, and Mrs. Francis Sargent.

Dedicated gals have been at Symphony Hall for a decade of early Saturday morning welcome-ins for the youngsters, like founder-trustee Felicia Kutten and Norma Jeab Calderwood, Nancy Saltonstall, Mary Lou Cabot, and the dauntless crew that will be there also numbers Mrs. Arnold Jenkins, Mrs. James Poppen, Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky, Mrs. Stephen Paine, Mrs. Edwin Ohl, Mrs. Albert Titcomb, Mrs. Walter Hunnewell Jr., Mrs. Robert Scully, Mrs. William D. Sohier and so many more.

HE KNOWS THE SCORE—BSO violinist, founder-conductor of Youth Concerts and bestseller author of "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please," is Harry Ellis Dickson. Here he keeps grandchildren Robert and Michael Shain and John Dukakis, right, waiting while he explains day's score to Yvonne Delchen, Dana Besse and Cynthia Pandisco. Artur Rubinstein, great pianist, will play on Feb. 8 to benefit Youth Concert scholarships, and commissioned works by young composers.

(Globe photos by Jack Sheahan)

THOUGHTS OF YOUTH—Charles Kaplan of Bedford takes a long, slow look at BSO as it weaves soaring carpet. Given chance to hear great music, young people respond, far from rock racket.

MUSIC GOES ROUND AND ROUND but comes out mellow from French horn, as Boston Symphony's Ralph Pottle explains to Becky Lougee at Youth Concert. Symphony members delight in telling intent youngsters about instruments and music.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JAN 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Council of Friends Thinking 'Spring'

Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Belmont, Cambridge, Dedham, Lincoln and Newton areas are thinking "Spring" for Friday's second luncheon under their auspices. The affair is in the popular series of Pre-Symphony Luncheons and will be held at 12:15 in Horticultural Hall.

Members of the decorating committee met recently at the Newton home of Mrs. William Bruce to complete plans. They went right to work on a yellow and green color scheme (to change the cold, drab winter feeling).

Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, co-chairmen of the series, suggest that Friends wishing to attend call Mrs. Kay Whitty, executive secretary of the Council, at Symphony Hall (266-1348). They may invite guests by making reservations.

The Ticket Resale Plan (as with Symphony tickets) applies to luncheon tickets. A Friend wishing to release a ticket for resale should call Mrs. Whitty.

Busy members of Friday's decorating committee are Mrs. Paul Dodson, Mrs. Thatcher Luequer, Mrs. B. Garfield Ras, Jr., Mrs. Carlton P. Fuller, Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. Stanley Hech, Mrs. Henry Warner, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. William Bruce.

Beginning the 1970 season in traditional Beacon Hill style, a "new members" tea will be held at the Nichols House Museum, 55 Mt. Vernon st., Sunday from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. The handsome 19th century brick townhouse with its own lovely garden entrance is the only private house on the Hill open to the public (Wednesday and Saturday afternoons).

Beautifully furnished, it was willed by the late Rose Standish Nichols to further international good will. In cooperation with the State Dept., the first floor is the headquarters of the Boston Council for International Visitors.

Local activities are supported by Nichols House Museum members and super-

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
JAN 10 1970 New England

Navy League social at Aquarium, naturally

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

The fish will be watching the people drink at a very posh first wine-tasting at the New England Aquarium on Feb. 6. The party, one of the very few of its kind, will close the home of our most fascinating fishes to the public from 7:30 p.m. on, and, invitations, which have to come from the Southeastern Massachusetts Council of the Navy League, will be at a premium. Invited to have champagne and other vintage delights will be the important four-stripers from here to Norfolk, and a nice dusting of admirals.

The Navy League was founded by President Theodore Roosevelt, and a great day it was, too. A stouter link between the civilian and the man in uniform has seldom been forged. William Rothermel is president of the Southeastern Council.

BSO FRIENDS

It was wine for Spring and flowers to match at the Symphony Council of Friends lunch-in yesterday at Horticultural Hall. That charisma of all Springs, the primrose, blossomed in gentle profusion, and people took heart from this happy welcome even before they settled at familiar tables with longtime friends. Mr. Linehan's veal paprika with noodles added to the escape-from-Winter feeling, and not even the most ardent dieters skipped their petit Napoleons.

The BSO regulars were out in force, and the area gals sparking this nice start to a favorite two hours of music, checked in from Dedham, Lincoln, Belmont and Cambridge to work with green-thumb genius Anita (Mrs. Charles) Hovey.

Symphony's Kay Whitty as usual set all ticket and table problems straight—and yes, you can invite a guest (her most-asked question) if you telephone Kay ahead of time.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are council co-chairmen, with Mrs. Josiah Spaulding, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. James H. Perkins and Mrs. Whitty as their crew.

PALACE SAFARI

Like to start your 1970 travels off with a six-palace safari? Take the once-only tour the English-Speaking Union has dreamed up for its 50th jubilee year.

On Tuesday, Jan. 13, at 8 p.m., at the World Affairs Council Theater, 70 Hereford st., in glorious color, Buckingham, St. James, Kensington, Hampton Court, Windsor Castle and the Palace of Holyrood House.

FAMILY AFFAIR

Children, bring your parents to the Museum of Fine Arts today for a family program, "Artists in Training." It will wind up with a visit to the School of the Museum to watch students in painting

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
JAN 6 1970 New England

Art safari to Egypt for Museum group

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

It'll be the preview of all time for those members of the Museum of Fine Arts lucky enough to be touching down in Egypt on Feb. 7 with the museum's enterprising Felicia Kutten.

If you recall, Felicia sparked the first private-collection invitation trip to Europe made by any museum when she shepherded MFAers overseas in the late '50s.

The February voyagers who'll safari up the Nile from treasure to treasure will get an unforgettable glimpse of the fantastic exhibit that's headed for Boston in March to be one of the coups of the centennial year of the MFA.

Dr. Edward L. B. Terrace, assistant curator, is already in Egypt working with William J. Young, head of research for the museum, and they will welcome-in the New Englanders as they head for Luxor and history's timeless "Valley of the Kings" where the ancient tombs hold a whole civilization. They'll also see the relocated Temples of Rameses II (the engineering miracle of the 20th century), and Cairo, Sakkara, and Aswan in a series of private visits that are unprecedented.

And in May, the tireless Felicia, who is also a star turn of both Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall and the New England Conservatory's brilliant programming, will be off again. This time it will be Greece, and museum members will, by rare special permission, be allowed to visit Thera, where on the Island of Santorini, archeologists who are long-time authorities think they have the find of the centuries—the Lost Atlantis.

This dazzle of choices, for which museum membership is the magic password, will be followed by another sparkler that would give the museum another top first—a hush-hush invitation goody that would open America's most fabulous collectors' doors for a one-time-only look.

★

UP-COMING DATES TO REMEMBER

Those dates not to forget:

Sunday night, Jan. 11 and history will repeat itself when the great violinist David Oistrakh, who last played at Symphony Hall for a Pension Fund concert for the BSO in December of 1955, will solo the same Brahms Violin Concerto in D major for the same good cause. The performance begins at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall.

Friday, Feb. 6 and the first big dance of 1970, the glamorous hearts-and-flowers Valentine Ball at the Sheraton Plaza, to raise money for the Newton-Wellesley Hospital. Mrs. James T. Godino is chairman, and the handsome prizes are "escape weekends" for two from North Conway all the way to Bermuda. This promises to be the party you won't want to miss. Mini, midi, or maxi, girls, and black tie for your partner. Gourmet dinner at nine, and Skitch Henderson (first time in Boston) for dancing til one.

And speaking of gourmets, remember that double date for all Escoffiers, Jan. 14 and 15, with French author-chef-wine expert Bruce Axler stirring up many more conversation pieces. He'll be using his wire whip from 10 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. and again from 2 to 4:30 p.m. both days, and there'll be bouillabaisse, quenelles de Brochet, and such at noontime. The Junior League is doing the honors, and all proceeds go to the Community Program Trust.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
JAN 7 1970 England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

A picnic in winter sounds an unusual event with the snow on the ground and the temperature hovering in the teens. It is traditional though, at the Vincent Club and it is held in the warm, comfortable and informal atmosphere of the clubhouse on Brimmer Street for the purpose of airing the original music written by the members for the upcoming Vincent Show.

Last night Vincent Club members gathered for the 1970 picnic. They brought their own sandwiches, dressed informally and sat on the floor to listen to Mrs. James H. Gilman, Jr., the 1970 show chairman, describe the new show, and Alfred Burke, the production manager, share some of the details of this event which last year raised $55,000 for the Vincent Memorial Hospital.

The picnic is the opening meeting for the show and from now on it will be more meetings, rehearsals and just plain hard work for all those connected with it. The provisional members, now back at college, have already done their share by spending much of their Christmas vacation calling on prospective advertisers for the big yellow and mauve program and obtaining contracts for the thousands of ads listed in it.

Among the many members working on the 1970 show are Mrs. Edwin W. Hiam, Mrs. G. Alvin Crowell, Jr., Mrs. William S. Olney, Mrs. Francis R. Austin, Mrs. Vcevold O. Strekalovsky, Mrs. George M. Lovejoy, Jr., Mrs. Ralph E. Thompson, Jr., Mrs. A. Diehl Jenkins, Jr., Mrs. Thomas B. Wheeler, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge, Jr. and Mrs. Emily Saltonstall Byrd.

❧ ❧ ❧

One of the most pleasant of the many events organized by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the series of pre-symphony luncheons held in Horticultural Hall. In addition to being a great convenience for these attending the concert later across the street the luncheons are a pleasant way to join friends and are invariably beautifully decorated and well-catered affairs.

The next one in the series of four will be held next Friday at 12:15 p.m. Always completed in plenty of time for the 2 p.m. concert the luncheons are under the direction of different area groups of the Council of Friends. On Friday it will be the turn of the council members from Belmont, Cambridge, Dedham, Lincoln and Newton.

Spring colors of green and yellow have been chosen by the decorating committee as their theme to turn drab Horticultural Hall into a glorious premature springtime. Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill and Mrs. John M. Ferry of Cambridge are cochairmen of the decorating committee and they met recently with members to complete plans for the affair. Among those on this committee are Mrs. Paul Dodson, Mrs. Thatcher Luquer, Mrs. B. Garfield Rae, Jr., Mrs. Carlton P. Fuller, Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. Stanley Hech, Mrs. Henry Warner and Mrs. William Bruce.

Friends wishing to attend this luncheon may do so by calling Mrs. Kay Whitty, executive secretary of the Council of Friends at Symphony Hall. In addition Friends who wish to invite guests may also do so by telephoning for reservations. The Ticket Resale Plan, as with Symphony tickets, applies to these luncheon tickets. A Friend wishing to release a ticket for resale should call Mrs. Whitty and will receive acknowledgement from the treasurer.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JAN 12 1970 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Exhibition of Art To Be Intriguing

A unique art exhibition, "The Past and Present Tense of Art" will be at the State Street Bank Concourse Gallery from 8:45 a. m. to 4:45 p. m. Monday to Friday, Jan. 19 to 27.

Organized by the Thomas F. Ford Galleries of Boston (specializing in ancient and primitive art), Mr. Ford had conducted this intriguing experiment in his summer gallery on the Vineyard. He had juxtaposed primitive art with modern art and found that the mixture enhanced both.

The past tense is represented by excellent examples of pre-Columbian art from Mexico and tribal art from Oceania and western Africa. The present tense includes a wide range of some of the most inventive and accomplished artists of today.

Among the artists whose work will be shown is Kib Bramhall ("Turtlebrook Pond"); Katherine Zimmerman's (Watercolors) dazzling paintings of Albert Alcalay; Stanley Murphy's landscapes and portraits; Max Kahn's "Moonrise" and bird paintings; and Thomas Gratz' series of small portraits of the same face subtly altered in each square.

Sprawling branches decorated with bright yellow tissue-paper flowers and green leaves made a cheery background for Friday's Council of Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall. Artistic members of the Belmont, Cambridge, Dedham and Newton areas of the Council meeting at "do it ourselves" sessions the previous weeks had produced the effective early spring arrangements. Tables were centered with real white narcissi and primroses.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue, cochairman of the Council with Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., welcomed Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO trustees. They stopped to chat with Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson, committee chairmen of the festive luncheons.

Busy with hostess and committee duties were Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Arnold Jenkins, Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Charles Almy, Mrs. Carlton P. Fuller, Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Richard Ely (Weston area chairman); Mrs. Howard W. Davis (keeping an eye on Symphony record sales which benefit the Orchestra); and Mrs. Frank W. Whitty, executive secretary of the Council.

After lunch the guests walked across the street to Symphony Hall to enjoy the Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt concert conducted by William Steinberg.

As soon as genial Frank Hatch arrived in Boston's old City Hall for Thursday night's "salute to its bright new future," a piano was rolled in and he was beseiged by requests for "Hatch music." He didn't bother with the piano but gave forth with his terrific song, "Some Coward Closed the Old Howard, We Don't Have Burly Anymore." The clamor for "more, more," resulted in singing another of his clever tunes about James Michael Curley, "The Wild Purple Shamrock."

Mayor White received a round of applause when he and John Warner, BRA, director hurried into the party in the former City Council chamber. Both were just back from Washington business and had to climb the four flights of stairs because the elevator had broken down. The mayor noted that his grandfather, father and father-in-law, had served in the Council and that he was the last Mayor to leave the historic building.

Roger Webb, president of the Old City Hall Landmark Corp., which is going to convert the building into offices and shops, was accompanied by Mrs. Webb.

Distinguished white-bearded Walter Muir Whitehill of the Bostonian Society and Boston Athanaeum, chatted with the Charles F. Hoveys, Francis X. Maloney of the public library; Bertram K. Little, director and corresponding secretary of the Society for the Preservation of New England Antiquities and other friends.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
JAN 12 1970

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

There are some streets and sections of Boston that seem to attract every puff of bitterly cold wind. The corner of Tremont and Boylston Streets is notorious for this and so is Massachusetts Avenue where the wind whistles straight off the Charles River.

So it was on Friday that the guests at the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pre-Symphony luncheon were more than pleased to find evidence of springtime, either real or simulated, on every side as they came into the hall from the bitter cold of Massachusetts Avenue.

Much foot stamping and face rubbing went on in the lobby as the ladies warmed up from their walk along the avenue from their parked cars. One of the first welcome sites to meet their gaze was a huge bowl of paper white narcissi placed behind the long table at which sat Mrs. Kay Whitty, the wonderfully efficient and devoted executive secretary of the Council of Friends. The fragrance of the narcissi permeated the air, and was the first of many such bowls placed on the round luncheon tables and throughout the huge hall. The flowers had been forced by Mrs. Thomas Otis of Newton especially for the luncheon, and tricky as it is to time the planting and blossoming of such bulbs for a special date, she had judged it perfectly.

Azaleas in pinks and reds were in large wicker baskets hung around the walls of the hall where the buffet luncheon was served. The huge bare trees placed behind the buffet table were decorated with green and yellow paper flowers, and every table held pots of primulas in various colors or the bowls of white narcissi.

There are many groups of friends who make a point of attending each of these luncheons and sharing a table together. One such group are from the Dover-Wellesley area and consisted of Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley Hills, Mrs. Cyril Shelvey of Dover, Mrs. Robert Wiese of Wellesley Hills and Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston.

Sitting together on Friday were the two cochairmen of the Pre-Symphony luncheons, Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich of Marblehead, and Mrs. George A. Parsons of Boston. Both chose deep purple wool to wear, Mrs. Parsons in a suit trimmed with silver buttons, and Mrs. Aldrich a long-sleeved dress. They were discussing the antique shop owned and run by Mrs. Parsons and her friend, Mrs. Henry H. Wilder of Dedham, called "Creative Antiques." Seated with them was attractive Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham, one of the few women who can wear the new washerwoman hair style and not look like a washerwoman. She and Mrs. Aldrich were comparing notes on their college age daughters, Ann Cabot who is at Sarah Lawrence and Rosalie Aldrich at Stanford.

Among the sell-out crowd at this second luncheon in the 1969-70 series enjoying the veal paprika, noodles, pear and cream cheese salad and tiny delicious Napoleons and brownies for dessert were Mrs. E. Morton Jennings of Chestnut Hill and Duxbury; Mrs. Franklin Snell in a stunning large mink beret; Mrs. Lewis Cabot telling friends she won't be able to relax until after the April 27 Symphony Ball of which she is chairman; Mrs. Reynolds Fuller and her daughter, Mrs. Alfred Donovan; Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley; Mrs. B. Gring Wallace, off on some fabulous trips in the future; Mrs. James M. Gavin; Mrs. Arnold Jenkins of Dedham; Mrs. James Mountz of Weston and Mrs. Walter Amory of Wellesley.

❧ ❧ ❧

A kind of thank you party for the past and a look forward party for the future took place on Thursday evening in a building in downtown Boston that has been a landmark on the city scene for 104 years.

Old Boston City Hall has seen its ups and downs, its good guys and bad occupying the various offices and rooms in this first large scale building to be built in this country in the style of the French Second Empire of Napoleon II.

As always, when the new City Hall in the Government Center was occupied, there were those ready and willing to tear down this landmark on the Freedom Trail and replace it with the usual steel and glass horror of the present day. Thanks to Architectural Heritage, Inc. the non-profit group dedicated to saving such buildings for posterity, the old hall has been rescued from oblivion and with the help of some of Boston's leading businessmen will be turned into an unusual and attractive office building complete with restaurant and outdoor cafe in the forecourt, but retaining the architecture and charm of the building as it has always been.

The party on Thursday evening was to introduce the new ideas for the building, and to say thank you to all the dozens of people who have worked so hard to save it. One of these is John L. Hall II of Chestnut Hill who has devoted months to the myriad details entailed in a project of this kind, George Howland of Needham was another there, as was Roger Webb, the president of Architectural Heritage, Inc. whose pretty wife was greeting the guests.

Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill, whose name appears on any committee connected with beauty or preservation, was talking to friends accompanied by her tall husband, and Paul Norton was another enjoying the party.

Huge swags of red, white and blue bunting draped the walls of the old Council chamber where the affair was held, just as it did when the city fathers gathered there for the past 100 years. Groups of flags protruded overhead, and around the walls were photographs of old Boston showing the downtown area as it was long ago. Keeper of the Prints at the Boston Public Library, Sinclair Hitchings, had arranged them, and he was there with his pretty tuburn-haired wife, the former Catherine Farlow of Needham.

There were many well-known figures at the event. Boston's unofficial historian, Walter Muir Whitehill, director of the Boston Athenaeum, who always looks so distinguished with his white beard, was talking to Bertram Little, director of the Society for the Preservation of New England Antiquities, John Sears, Mayor Kevin White and director of the B.R.A., John Warner were other well-known names attending.

The highlight of the evening came for many when Frank Hatch, without benefit of music or piano, entertained the guests briefly with some of his wonderful "witty ditties." Boston's own troubadour, he sang about the late James Curley, and of the Old Howard, much to the delight of the guests.

It was an all-age party. There were young girls there from the B.R.A. whose pet project this had been; there were those interested in preservation; there were businessmen, and there were well-known names. It was a gay party and a last 170.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JAN 26 1970

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Council of Friends Entertained By Boston Symphony Harpist

TRAVELS WITH A HARP were described yesterday morning by Ann Hobson, who has been appointed to the second harp position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. This was the second in the series of Stage Door Lectures presented by the Council of Friends of the orchestra in the basement of Symphony Hall. When Miss Hobson is asked why she chose the harp, she often asks herself the question during her travels here and abroad with the unwieldy instrument. But she confessed it was because she wanted to be different.

She started learning the piano with her mother, formerly a concert pianist and now a music teacher in the Philadelphia public schools. While at high school, Ann Hobson began studying the harp and then went to the Philadelphia Music Academy and the Institute of Music in Cleveland. Before coming to Boston she was the principal harp player of the Washington National Symphony.

Learning to play the harp meant cutting off her long finger nails — a hard decision for a fashion-conscious teenager. She explained that harps are completely hand-made and have colored strings. One like hers costs more than $4000. It takes five years to break one in, and unlike a violin, a harp depreciates in value with age. Hers is seven years old. Handel and Mozart wrote music for early harps, and music by Ravel and Debussy is more suitable for the modern versions.

Her audience, seated at small tables on the cement floor with pipes overhead, listened intently and laughed and clapped delightedly. To be on the inside of their beloved Symphony was a thrill. Box lunches, complete with pickles and stuffed eggs, were eaten after the lecture, and bouillon, hot coffee and an a la carte bar were welcome on the cold day.

Yesterday's lecture was under the auspices of the areas of Milton, Marblehead, Weston and Wayland. Hostesses were Mrs. Lewis W. Kane, Mrs. John Thayer, Mrs. Stephen B. Ames, Mrs. William G. Harris, Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. Samuel Rogers, Mrs. William D. Manice Jr., Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. James T. Mountz, Mrs. M. Allen Powning, Mrs. Francis Devlin, and Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot, who said she had no idea harps were so complicated.

Mrs. Charles E. Hovey arrived just as the lecture was over, and among others were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Marcien Jenckes, Mrs. William Manice, Mrs. Frank G. Allen and Mrs. Robert Hopkins.

Also, Mrs. Victor Jones, Mrs. Howard Davis, Mrs. Charles Barnes, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Robert Millar, Miss Eleanor Hunneman, Mrs. Franklin Hoyt, Mrs. Charles F. Eaton Jr., Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Lewis Cabot, Mrs. John Knowles, Mrs. Henderson Inches Jr., Mrs. Robert Ross and Mrs. Malcolm Bradlee.

Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird are chairmen of the committee planning these Stage Door Lectures.

* * *

MGH League to Hold Luncheon

THE MIDWINTER LUNCHEON of the Massachusetts General Hospital Service League will be held at Boston 1800 in East Boston, Tuesday, Feb. 3. On the attractive invitations, Dr. Jack Dreyfus has sketched the Bunker Hill Monument, Boston Harbor and Old Ironsides. The sherry hour will begin at noon and luncheon will be served at 12:30. Mrs. Francis W. Sargent will be guest of honor.

After luncheon, Dr. John P. Connolly, executive director of Bunker Hill Health Center of the Massachusetts General Hospital, will introduce a new concept in Family Medical Care, creating a precedent in the New Boston.

Mrs. Lawrence L. Robbins of Winchester is chairman of the luncheon. Other committee members are Mrs. W. Gerald Austin, Mrs. Mortimer Buckley, Mrs. Lawrence E. Martin, Mrs. Howard Ulfelder and Mrs. Avery Weisman. Hostesses include Mrs. George Prout, Mrs. Sylvester B. Kelley, Mrs. Richard Kitz, Mrs. Myron Laver and Mrs. Francis Ingersoll.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JAN 24 1970

New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JAN 19 1970

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Why should the harpist in an orchestra be the one chosen as the butt of all the practical jokes? According to Ann Hobson, harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this is traditionally what happens in a symphony orchestra. Her tales of the jokes played on her and other experiences with various musical organizations were the subject of her lecture to the members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday in Symphony Hall.

The second in the series of four Stage Door Lectures and box lunches arranged by the Council of Friends, Miss Hobson replaced the previously engaged flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer who was unable to appear. Only in her twenties, dark haired and attractive Miss Hobson explained the harp, its history, its cost and the fact that all harps are made by one factory in Chicago, and by one master craftsman who is responsible for the five major parts and the 2,000 minor moving parts that go into the building of the instrument.

Despite the bitterly cold temperature the basement room where the lectures are held was full. As at all the other events held last week boots and fur coats were the most popular mode of apparel, and comfort took precedence over fashion. Sweaters were worn under the furs and other sleeveless dresses on Friday, and guests cared not if they didn't look as glamorous as they would have liked.

Mrs. Thomas Perry, Jr. sported a gay red woolen beret with her red dress, and Mrs. John Knowles, busy as usual with her peti-point, wore a black and white matching dress and coat, the lining of which was a brilliant scarlet. Mrs. George Sargeant was another in red, hers a long sleeved wool in this shade.

The members of the Council of Friends from Milton, Marblehead, Weston and Wayland areas responsible for this lecture had introduced touches of spring in the big pots of daffodils and pink cyclamen placed around the podium and on the table containing the box lunches. Christmas seemed to have returned with these for tucked into the elastic bands around the square white boxes were sprays of artificial green leaves and white berries that looked remarkably like mistletoe.

To many the exciting news of the morning was the announcement of the fabulous prizes to be won in connection with the April 27 Boston Symphony Orchestra Ball. Mrs. Albert Goodhue, chairman with Mrs. John Grandin of the Council of Friends, announced that tickets for these prizes would go on sale Friday, Feb. 13 at the Friends office in Symphony Hall and would be available from the chairmen of the various area groups of the Council of Friends. Each ticket will cost $10 and are available to everyone. The drawing will be at the ball itself, but it will not be necessary to be present at the event in order to be a winner.

Among the outstanding prizes collected are a Porsche 40 sedan; a chalet at Sugar Hill, N.H. for a week with all kinds of extras offered; a trip to Paris for two for a long weekend; a portrait to be painted by famous artist William Draper; and a trip to Rome for two for a week, then on to Sardinia for two weeks where the lucky winners will be the guests of the Aga Khan and his Begum either in a private cottage or one of his hotels. This latter prize has been given by the Aga Khan himself.

After the lecture the ladies left their tables to stand in line at the two bars or at the coffee and bouillon urns. Glimpsed were Mrs. Charles Coolidge, Jr.; Mrs. Frank Allen; Mrs. Thomas Franks of Wellesley, Mrs. Francis Gummere; Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley; Mrs. Cyril Shelvey of Dover; Mrs. Howland Walter and Mrs. Hollis Gleason of Cohasset in a very chic grey Cossack fur hat.

* * *

Rose Walsh — Museum Birthday to Be A Gala Event

Gov. Sargent, Mayor White and other government officials, led by Perry T. Rathbone, director of the Museum of Fine Arts, will do some strenuous blowing out of candles Feb. 4 at the Museum's 100th birthday.

It will be a gala event with music and everyone is invited. Ceremonies beginning at 3 p. m. in the rotunda will feature David McCord, nationally known author and poet, reading his specially commissioned Centennial poem.

Birthday cake will be served in the tapestry hall and the Mayor and Governor will greet guests. Perry Rathbone will also autograph copies of the new record and slide kit called "Director's Choice," which is being introduced for the Centennial.

Another interest will be the premier of a slide tape program, "Ten Times Ten" which traces the history of the Museum with highlights of the Centennial acquisitions exhibit, "Art Treasures for Tomorrow."

Throughout the day Museum members are invited from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. to preview the brilliant array of Centennial treasures in the special exhibition galleries. The 130 objects to be unveiled are a far cry from the plaster casts which comprised most of the early collection in the old Copley sq. building in the 1870s.

Representing every age of human creativity, from 2500 B. C. to the present, the acquisitions come from all over the world. Each one is an important addition to the Museum's permanent collection.

Since the exhibition was made possible through the generosity of donors in all parts of the nation, the entire Museum and the Centennial exhibition will be open free to everyone from Feb. 5 to 13.

In the evening of the birthday anniversary, guests from Scotland, New York, Washington and the West Coast, will fly in for a special dinner and reception honoring international patrons and special Centennial donors.

The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres from Scotland, a trustee of the British Museum, chairman of the National Art Collections Fund and former chairman of the National Trust, will speak at the dinner.

Working with Mrs. Matthew Brown of Brookline, chairman of the Centennial Committee, are Mrs. Claude Welch of Belmont, vice chairman; Mrs. Charles G. Mixter and Mrs. Mark C. Wheeler of Needham, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy, Jr., of Manchester, Mrs. Thomas L. Delorme of Milton, Mrs. George D. Nason, Waban, and Mrs. Morgan H. Plummer, Westwood.

So many advantages go with being a member of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra like the Council's new Stage Door Lectures, "Know Your Orchestra." Under the chairmanship of Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., the second in the series will take place Friday at 11:30 a. m.

Miss Ann Hobson, the Orchestra's new harpist will do the "lecturing," and give behind-the-scenes anecdotes. Milton, Marblehead, Weston and Wayland areas of the Council of Friends are in charge of the surprise box luncheon. An a la carte bar will be available.

Subscribers who wish to release tickets for resale or who would like to bring a guest should call Mrs. Kay Whitty in the Friends' office, Symphony Hall (266-1348) by Wednesday.

New York Post
D. 708,150 S.M. 369,902

JAN 27 1970

FUN AND GAMES

Overtures

LARRY MERCHANT

Not since the Philharmonic picked a successor to Leonard Bernstein has the music world been in such a state of suspense. Mike Reid, the pianist from Penn State, is available in the football draft today, to be held of course at Julliard.

It is fairly certain that the Steelers, in behalf of themselves and the Pittsburgh Symphony, will make Terry Bradshaw of Louisiana Tech the first choice. He is considered the most precocious quarterback-conductor in the graduating class. As the saying goes, you can't win without a maestro.

The Packers, who traded two electric guitarists and an organist to the Bears for their top pick, may very well go for the versatile Reid over tympanist Mike McCoy of Notre Dame or oboist Phil Olsen of Utah State. Reid can play end like Jones, tackle like Lilly and piano like Rubenstein.

* * *

It is bad enough for an ordinary jocko to become forced labor in Green Bay for some of the best years of his life. For Reid it would be tragic. The only group he could play with after hours is the Down Home Trio at the Off Tackle Lounge. And he doesn't go for that sort of thing anymore.

"I used to be a big hit in the fourth or fifth grade with 'I'm Looking Over a Four-Leaf Clover,'" Mike Reid said. "But right now I'm working on a Beethoven sonata, a Liszt tone poem and Chopin for an audition with the Utah Symphony."

REID

There is no franchise in Salt Lake City yet. But Cleveland, Boston and Philadelphia have teams and orchestras that need a Reid desperately.

Said George Szell, conductor of the Cleveland: "The strength of any orchestra is in the front line—strings and piano. Reid is a tremendous prospect. He could step right in and play because he would be surrounded by experienced men. I would think he could replace Jim Kanicki immediately. Kanicki, whom we sent to the New York Philharmonic in the trade for Homer Jones, is a solid but not brilliant performer, although he hasn't been the same since a kettle drum fell on his leg early last season. Ron Johnson couldn't break into our lineup with Leroy Kelly and Bo Scott as the first-chair brass stars, but he has outstanding potential. Wayne Meylan could win a first-string job in the viola section. The acquisition of Jones gives us a flashy if erratic soloist to replace the great Paul Warfield at harp. It's a trade that will help both orchestras."

Eugene Ormandy, the emotional conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, was near tears when he learned that Reid most likely would be picked by Green Bay or Cleveland. With young talent like Mel Tom, Gary Pettigrew and Tom Rossovich, all built like pianos, Ormandy had hoped to convert Reid to the violin or viola, where the Philadelphia is showing signs of age. "We always go for the best musician and find a place for him," said Ormandy. "Reid could play anything, including bassoon."

* * *

But the greatest distress showed in Boston, where Reid is viewed as potentially a better all-around messiah than Handel's. The Patriots draft fourth, and both the Boston Pops and the Boston Symphony are watching closely. So is Reid.

"I really don't have a preference, but Boston would be great with Arthur Fielder and the Pops and Erich Leinsdorf and the Symphony," said Reid, long distance. "I'd like to go anyplace with a good music and art center. But if not, there's not much I can do about it. It's not my decision. I'm handcuffed."

Handcuffing a pianist is criminal but Reid is cheerful enough about it. "Dave Bradley, a friend of mine from Penn State, is a reserve tackle at Green Bay. He says there's not a lot to do there. Maybe I could go to Milwaukee or Chicago on a day off for a concert. I'd just have to make the best of it. I've lived in Altoona all my life and I've never seen the Altoona Symphony. I have my records. Being isolated in a small town might be a good thing for six months every year. I write music too; I might be productive. The main issue is football. I want to be a pro. I'm much more advanced as a football player than a pianist."

* * *

If it's to be Green Bay then, or even Cleveland for that matter, Mike Reid is well-equipped to survive the violence on Sunday and the desolation Monday through Saturday. "I always play the piano or records after a game," he said. "I 'cold turkey' my way out of football through music. They're very emotional aspects of life."

While a 255-pound pianist might do wonders for culturally deprived wastelands, Boston needs him as a triple threat—to play the line, play the piano and keep the franchise. The Patriots do not have a fit place to play and since Harvard won't let them use their stadium, which has nothing to do 360 days of the year, they might have to leave town. It is hoped by Fiedler, Leinsdorf and Clive Rush that Harvard may yet be convinced professional football is one of the lively arts when Mike Reid starts alternately pounding quarterbacks and keys.

171.

"THE WAY I HEARD IT"

by John Gruber

Back in July I did a two-part article on the Boston Symphony and its ups and downs during my lifetime. I pointed out that it was in one of its downswings at the moment and that the appointment of William Steinberg as music director, spending half his time in Pittsburgh, wasn't likely to raise standards by much. The guest conductors never can help in this regard, since they have no authority.

Apparently my guess has been pretty accurate; there is quite a hassle going on in the bean town. Six years ago the Boston Globe hired Michael Steinberg as music critics, and he hadn't been there two months when I began to get letters from people I know in Boston, asking what I knew about him, and complaining that he was knocking their sacred cow, the BSO.

Pressure was applied to get the Globe to fire him, but the paper steadfastly backed him up, and he's still holding forth at the old stand. To tell the truth, his cracks were justified. Previously, Globe readers had enjoyed reviews by Cy Durgin for something over 30 years. Cy was complacent and never knocked anything, so Steinberg's approach was something of a shock to the Bostonians.

This September, the Boston Herald-Traveler hired George Gelles as music critic. He had been writing for other Boston papers for four years, and his style and abilities were reasonably well known. Like Steinberg, he was not an admirer of the status quo prevailing at Symphony Hall.

Both of the papers were now knocking the orchestra and its board of directors. Matters came to a crux when Steinberg really roasted Carlo Maria Giulini in a program which he guested. Giulini is a reasonably competent opera conductor, but scarcely of the caliber to be taken very seriously at the helm of such a world-famous group.

Nevertheless, 15 of the members had petitioned the management to hire him as the permanent conductor. Why? Well, because he's a nice guy, easy-going, and was satisfied with what they were willing to put forth instead of what they were capable of doing. Moreover, he let them go 15 minutes early from rehearsal.

Apparently the results of this approach were not so hot, and Steinberg and Gelles both started giving unfavorable reviews, which were by no means parallel. This brought out the letter writers, and the orchestra members sent a telegram to The Globe.

"In view of the unwarranted, cruel, and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor Mr. Giulini, and the continued slurs on the members of the orchestra, we have asked the Boston symphony management not to welcome Mr. Steinberg to our concerts until he publicly apologizes for his insulting and unethical assaults, which have gone far beyond the scope of musical criticism."

All this went unreported in the Boston press except for an interview that "Boston After Dark" prinited with Marvin Schofer, PRO of the BSO. This is a weekly tabloid that caters to the younger set.

The management "promised to pursue the matter" with The Globe, only to find it still stood steadfastly behind Mr. Steinberg. But after three unfavorable reviews in a row, Gelles was informed that his pending reviews would not be published, and then that he was not to cover the next orchestral concert.

(It was given out that he was sick.)

Nothing Gelles said was questioned as to factual accuracy, but he was transferred to another department. The publisher felt he "was not competent to handle the job." The question was put as to how The Herald came to the conclusion that a fully trained musician was considered competent only in the field of non-musical subjects, but the spokesman for the paper declined comment.

"The Nation" has averred that there was a "reliably attested threat of advertising withdrawals" behind the transfer. At present, the Herald-Traveler is running a syndicated column by Harold Schonberg of the New York Times.

Ironically enough, the very Schonberg compared Vice President Agnew's recent attacks on the news media to the reaction of a performer who has received bad reviews!

The trouble in Boston seems to be that there are too many stand-patters there. This is true of the audience, the management, and the players. There are a bunch of old biddies who attend the Friday afternoon performances who are definitely "set in their ways" and those ways are anything but progressive. Just take a look at them waiting for taxis if you're at Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues when the show lets out! They are caricatures of Grant Wood's "American Gothic."

The management couldn't care less about the artistic status of the organization. Management is concerned with only the size of deficits. This is true here, as well as in Boston. One year I happened to have a past president of Connecticut Opera tell me "This is the best season we've ever had.!"

I was startled, since I didn't think it had been, and asked how he came to his conclusion. The answer "We have the smallest deficit in nearly 20 years!" This is typical of the thinking of management in matters artistic.

It would be bad enough if they only worried about deficits, but the guarantors feel it is their prerogative to dictate programs and even guest performers. They're paying the tab; who has a better right? So goes their thinking. This is the actual trouble behind the scenes with all too many musical organizations.

Really great conductors won't stand for it, and resign. Then the orchestra goes further downhill.

The BSO still isn't a bad orchestra, but Bostonians steadfastly believe it to be at least among the top three, and secretly feel it is the top one. Once upon a time this attitude was justified; it no longer is.

Michael Sternberg stated his feelings in the Cambridge Phoenix as follows:

"Criticism and hostility are thought to be the same thing. This bothers me. I'm very concerned for music in Boston in a positive sense. I'm angry it isn't better because it could very well be better. Criticism should proceed from love for the thing, and from concern over it. It's positive."

George Gelles clarified his attidude in the Boston Herald in these words:

"If the critic is to be of any use whatsoever, he has to be more than a mirror and mouthpiece of popular taste. What is the value of criticism if the critic is as easily satisfied as the average member of the audience?"

(Unless somebody stops me, I'll examine some other orchestras in my next.)

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210

JAN 26 1970

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JAN 31 1970

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181

FEB 1 1970

Russian Conductor Receives Petition From U. S. Jews

BOSTON (UPI)—Jews in the United States urged Kiril Kondrashin, conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, to remind people in the Soviet Union of the plight of Russian Jews.

Kondrashin, in Boston for a guest performance Sunday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented a letter signed by Lewis H. Weinstein of Waban, chairman of the American Jewish Conference on Soviet Jewry, and Robert M. Segal of Newton, president of the Jewish Community Council of Metropolitan Boston.

The letter detailed the alleged discriminatory practices facing 3 million Jews in the Soviet Union, and it urges Kondrashin to "remind his countrymen of the (Premier Alexei) Kosygin promise to permit emigration of Jews wishing to become reunited with their families outside Russia."

"We appeal to you to carry back to your compatriots the sense of deep anguish in the hearts of American Jews when they contemplate that Jews in the Soviet Union are deprived of rights and privileges afforded to other national and religious entities," the letter read.

"It is said to contrast the position of the 5.5 million Jews of the United States with that of the 3 million Jews in the USSR.

"From the depths of our beings we appeal to you to help make it possible for the Jews of Russia to regain their lives as Jews. Surely, you who live in the world of creative art must appreciate the human need for such opportunity," the letter concluded.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

FEB 1 1970

U.S. Jews Appeal To Conductor

BOSTON (UPI)—Jews in the United States urged Kiril Kondrashin, conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, to remind people in the Soviet Union of the plight of Russian Jews.

Kondrashin, in Boston for a guest performance Sunday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented a letter signed by Lewis H. Weinstein of Waban, chairman of the American Jewish Conference on Soviet Jewry, and Robert M. Segal of Newton, president of the Jewish Community Council of Metropolitan Boston.

The letter detailed the alleged discriminatory practices facing 3 million Jews in the Soviet Union, and it urges Kondrashin to "remind his countrymen of the (Premier Alexei) Kosygin promise to permit emigration of Jews wishing to become reunited with their families outside Russia."

"We appeal to you to carry back to your compatriots the sense of deep anguish in the hearts of American Jews when they contemplate that Jews in the Soviet Union are deprived of rights and privileges afforded to other national and religious entities," the letter read.

"It is said to contrast the position of the 5.5 million Jews of the United States with that of the 3 million Jews in the USSR.

"From the depths of our beings we appeal to you to help make it possible for the Jews of Russia to regain their lives as Jews. Surely, you who live in the world of creative art must appreciate the human need for such opportunity," the letter concluded.

As I Hear It

Complete Selection

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

SO FAR AS avoirdupois is concerned, artists come in a complete selection, large and small, heavy and light, well-shaped and, er — passable. None of these attributes, so far as I know, affects their ability, although a well-tailored jacket over a broad back has been mentioned sometimes as affecting a conductor's popularity.

The smallest conductor in size and weight now on the concert stage probably is the dynamic Oseiji Ozawa. Of all the beatnics which come to mind, he comes nearest to being the metro-gnome. On the other end of the scale in that respect probably would come Otto Klemperer, who when he was in his most energetic vigor was an erect 6 feet 7. He disdained a platform which would raise him even a few inches above the orchestra level to be better observed by the musicians.

* * * *

BETWEEN THESE two examples, of course, there have been all manner of sizes and shapes. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had three musical directors since it took up summer residence in the Berkshires. Koussevitzky was a man of average stature but impressive in elegance and natural majesty. In making comparisons it must not be assumed that any also-rans are poor seconds, but for stage presence I have always considered him as outstanding. For me he was always Koussy von tutti. There was an intangible presence of glamor and even of awe in his personal entrances, a conveyance of fastidious distinction when appropriate and a canvas of infinite grandeur when timely. The refinement and grace of the Mozart A Major Symphony, Opus 29, and the magnificence of the arrival at the final Allegro Maestoso of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony are as imperishably marked in my memory as are pictures of the Pyramids and the Taj Mahal.

* * * *

CHARLES MUNCH was a big man in size. So far as I could judge there was no man on a podium who sought the limelight less. To my discernment he was a genuinely humble man. He did his job and then asked for nothing but neglect. That alone was not the reason for the reputation he acquired, but was certainly one of the reasons why his appearances were so welcome everywhere he traveled.

I think I learned more from Erich Leinsdorf's performances than from any other conductor I have listened to. One could see the wheels turn and the gears mesh when he conducted more clearly than from any other leader's reading. But in my estimation, his relaxed manner of exchanging small talk of some nature with the men of the orchestra within propinquity lowered the decorum and formality of a concert to a degree slightly pejorative.

* * * *

FEW OF US are so favored that we may ridicule with impunity what it pleases the Lord to allot others in the way of embonpoint and endowments. There are some, of course, such as Itzak Perlman, who have overcome physical handicaps. Perlman gets on stage with the aid of two crutches and then, seated, is handed his violin. The late Sir Thomas Beecham found that his gout in his last years on the podium hindered and delayed his entrances to the center of the stage, and when the audience chose to applaud him ruthlessly, he did not walk off and return for bows but remained until he thought their enthusiasm had been totally expended.

I have often tried to visualize the reported meeting of clubfooted Lord Byron and the limping (caused by poliomyelitis) Sir Walter Scott, and wondered if they exchanged remarks on their disabilities.

* * * *

ONE WOULD THINK that musicians would give as much attention to their stage presence as do actors in dramas but it is apparently not so. Some, by scarcely traceable savoir-faire, take charge of their audience at once; others are ill at ease until they can tuck their fiddles under their chin, get their piano stools at the right height or ensconce themselves in the proper curve of the piano before a sound is emitted from their throats. The late Geraldine Farrar, a "grand" performer in every sense of the word, once came on stage in recital, and the accompanist found he had the wrong music. He left the platform and left her, so-to-speak, abandoned in midstream. Geraldine spread the enormous peacock feather fan she carried, and held it below her smiling visage while bowing. The audience broke into a spontaneous round of applause and the awkward moment became a triumph.

* * * *

STRING INSTRUMENT soloists diminish their initial impact on an audience by endless tuning, betraying a nervous insecurity. The antics of some of them while they must await, and endure, long orchestral introductions during which they must not yet participate, make their audiences as fidgety as they themselves obviously are. It seems to me that conservatory teachers should instruct their best students in stage deportment in addition to teaching them command of their instruments or voices, just as medical schools instruct their graduating-class students in the matter of fees. It all adds up to the Compleat Angler.

Music

Herald Traveler 1/25/70

'I thought it would be fun'

By George Gelles
HT Critic

MUNICH — Of the chief cultural centers in Germany — Berlin, Hamburg and Munich - it is only his last that still supports two first-rate conservatories — the Staatliche Akademie fuer Tonkunst and the Richard Strauss Konservatorium — and of these the latter is distinguished among German music schools in having as Director an American.

Peter Jona Korn — composer, conductor, educator — was born in Berlin, but while still in his teens left his homeland, as the Nazi assumed more and more power. Like many others who played a part in the intellectual wave that flooded the states in the 30s, Korn eventually settled in California, where he continued his studies with another refugee, Arnold Schoenberg.

The reason for Korn's return, as he recently explained over lunch in the Bavarian capital, was simple: "I was between jobs and was asked if I'd like to head the Conservatory. I thought it would be fun, so I said yes".

With about 600 students, the institution that he runs is comparable in size with Boston's New England Conservatory. In its scope it differs, for students at the Strauss Conservatory are not able to study music history in depth, and to change this is one of the challenges facing Korn.

"It's a bad system we've inherited. Musikwissenschaft— musicology — is taught here only in the universities, and practical music in the Hochschules and Conservatories. What I'd like to see is Musikwissenschaft and solo instrumental performance taught in the Conservatories, and orchestral performance alone offered by the Hochschules. At my Conservatory I've tried to change things somewhat, though things are still far from ideal. I've soft-pedaled the piano department (and please excuse the pun), and I've tried to strengthen the opera workshop."

Indeed, the stage seems closest to Korn's heart. When he came to the Munich two years ago he appointed as head of the Conservatory's Opera Division the young Peter Ebert, Intendant of the Augsburg Opera and son of the well-known director Carl Ebert.

The first big production under the Korn-Ebert regime, given last year as part of the centenary observations of the composer's birth, was Hans Pfitzner's "Christelflein", which had been premiered in Munich some 63 years earlier.

"Pfitzner's not a great composer, but one whose music also ought to be heard. And 'Christelflein', I think, is an uneven masterpiece. With a real masterpiece you don't have to worry that the composer will trip you up; in Pfitzner's opera there are dull stretches, admittedly, but every once in a while something wonderful happens."

The production was given 3 times to a total audience of 1500 and was a success — "each of the three casts did very good work and the orchestra played as well as the best Hochschule orchestra in Germany", which according to Korn is that of the rival school in Munich.

Korn returns frequently to America, and often to hear his music conducted by William Steinberg, an old and close friend. Steinberg, who with his Pittsburgh Symphony will premiere Korn's latest orchestral score this coming Spring, is "definitely one of the greatest conductors of the century, and years ago many of us thought that he and not Leinsdorf should have gotten the Boston orchestra."

It was Steinberg who gave Korn his first major performances, and although none of his music has been scheduled by Steinberg during his premiere season with the BSO, the relationship of the men is founded on loyalty and mutual fondness, and all but promises that before too long Korn will have reason to visit Boston.

William Steinberg ill

1/23/70 Globe

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston and Pittsburgh Symphony orchestras, has been admitted to Western Pennsylvanian Hospital, Pittsburgh, suffering from servere abdominal pains. No further medical details were available yesterday.

Having conducted concerts with the Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday of last week, Steinberg was scheduled to conduct the Pittsburgh Symphony this week-end and to take that orchestra on a three-week tour. But his physician has informed the Pittsburgh management that he will be unable to do so.

The 70-year-old conductor has been briefly hospitalized twice before during this season, and has had to cancel concerts with both his orchestras.

Boston Globe - Jan. 28, 1970

Gelles named Washington Star music critic

The Washington Evening Star announces the appointment of George Gelles as Associate Music Critic and Dance Critic. He will assume his new duties early in February. The Star's principal music critic is Irving Lowens, a leading authority in the field of American music.

Gelles, 27, is an honors graduate of Princeton, who received training also at the Mahattan School of Music and, at post-graduate level, at Brandeis University and the Free University of Berlin, Germany. Recently he was a guest of the government of the German Federal Republic, visiting opera houses and theaters in Germany.

Gelles did his first work in music criticism when he took part in the The Boston Globe's Summer internship program in 1966. He was a contributing critic for The Globe in 1967-68 until he became music critic of the Boston Record-American. At the beginning of the current season he became music critic of the Boston Herald-Traveler, but was removed from that assignment at the end of November after some reviews critical of the Boston Symphony.

172

WITH OR WITHOUT BATON?

Lewis Harlow

Boston Symphony

Stokowsky offered a quality of tone that seemed completely detached from the mechanics of music making — he conducted without a baton.

Toscanini was crystalline in a material sort of way. You were always aware of the man and his human musicians — he usually used a baton.

Koussevitsky could cajole great musicianship, precision, technique, and virtuosity out of his players — he conducted without a baton.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 16,000

FEB 1970

This is a personal experience report on conducting, sometimes (for what I considered very good reasons) with a baton and sometimes (for other seemingly good reasons) without a baton. There will be no moral at the end and no attempt to sway any conductor who may have developed fixed habits in the practice of his profession.

The idea of conducting with two bare hands came to me during an April week in the late 1930's. I was still an impressionable young band leader then and I had accepted the baton unquestioningly as the badge of my profession. On this particular week, Stokowsky and the Philadelphia Orchestra were on tour, and they had chosen Monday night for a concert at Boston's Symphony Hall, a place convenient for me to attend live performances. On Wednesday of the same week, Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic, also on tour, scheduled their Boston concert at the same Symphony Hall. And to make matters even more enjoyable, Koussevitsky and the Boston

Lewis Harlow was educated at Harvard University where he studied under Walter Spaulding, Archie Davison, and Ed Hill. He received the Payne award and continued his studies in Paris. His background includes many years of experience in leading adult amateur bands and in supervising instrumental music teaching at the grade school level in New England. At present his livelihood is mainly from writing.

Arturo Toscanini, with baton

Leopold Stokowski, without baton

Serge Koussevitsky, with baton them at all and it was up to me to prove my musicianship in other ways that they knew well. Also, I wanted to get the best possible music out of them in return for the union scale that I was paying. In this kind of work, the audience was not to be considered at all. They would be watching what was happening on the stage above.

I have never conducted a band at a televised halftime ceremony at a football game. If this situation should arise, I would use a baton. However well the band might know me and be ready to respond to my most delicate expression of demand, I would use a baton for the sake of the television audience. The television picture at halftime is painted with a broad brush and all possible visual symbolism is helpful to the whole.

Choral conducting

I have observed that batonless conducting is quite common in choral music. Probably the less likely of two reasons is that the conductor has come directly out of the ranks of the chorus being conducted; the use of a baton conductor.

ng reason, though. I as-r is schooled, probably ely in other aspects of and note values. Given ral conductor has good re hands. This chorus is ay even learn its songs ling acquaintance with ont of such a chorus, it stick to the rhythm of ven forget the fundasure. Certainly neither d by a baton, and there ay wish that he had a chorus I did as the Rowho preceeded me used didn't. This was just tanding. If the chorus

y rote, I conducted by rhythms and freezing
nstrumentally oriented
my effort was sincere.
ctive has always been
the conditions at hand.
y one exception. The mergency. The regular nd I was called in to Song of Destiny, the vise instrumental pro-cted by the orchestra
onductor ahead of me orchestra conductor
would use it in the — except that it was lucting. I was to have ady for the big event
ation of the situation.
nance would be using
, would probably be aton in these rehearsonal manner. Except imply beat time, and ance that they could or to come.

The rehearsals were accompanied by piano, with the pianist handling the unusual assignment alertly and sympathetically. The chorus also rose to the challenge and in the course of the two rehearsals learned to follow me precisely — and to find a new kind of meaning on the printed pages of their octavo parts.

We all knew that they had done well and that they had gained the confidence they might have needed. I congratulated them, and also told them that I would be at their concert. I attended, and was very proud of "my" chorus.

Through all of the above experiences, I have failed to mention one item. What is my innermost personal attitude toward conducting without a baton? I approve of the technique wholeheartedly. I am sure that I conduct better without than with. Without a baton, I feel that I am communicating more eloquently to my musicians. The proof of this is that they seem to understand me and give me the extra musicianship for which I ask. ■

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JAN 28 1970

Schuman Now Basking in 'Total Sunshine'

By DONAL HENAHAN

William Howard Schuman, looking too contented to be confused with Napoleon on Elba or Lyndon Johnson on the LBJ Ranch, sounded a bit smug about his new life.

"I've had the most fantastic experience in this past year, the first year in 35 that I wasn't under some sort of institutional umbrella. I can report total sunshine."

Mr. Schuman, the 59-year-old composer, who is president emeritus of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts and president emeritus of the Juilliard School, lounged in his upper Fifth Avenue apartment and talked of the old days, a little more than a year ago, when he was buried under the cares of cultural state, and was widely regarded as the most powerful man in American musical life.

"I've always had to write down how many hours a year I wanted to devote to composing—about 600, it was—and stick to it. But this year I've stopped that. Now I know I'll have enough time. Before, if I didn't assure myself I was spending that many hours composing, I'd find everything frittered away in raising money for a new cafeteria or something." He was asked to write a piece for the Boston Symphony's 75th anniversary, Mr. Schuman said, and "I got it in just in time for their 80th."

The New York Times

William Howard Schuman in his apartment on Fifth Avenue

Premiere for New Work

The first evidence of the new freedom, Mr. Schuman went on, is "In Praise of Shahn," a one-movement, 16-minute work that will be given its world premiere by the New York Philharmonic tomorrow night. The piece, in memory of Ben Shahn, was commissioned last spring by a group of the artist's friends.

"If I had still been at Lincoln Center, and anyone had asked me to write a piece on such short notice, it would have been impossible," the composer said.

Mr. Schuman, after seven years as president of Lincoln Center, left in December, 1968, after the center ran low on funds and decided to cut back some projects.

Mr. Schuman's concept of Lincoln Center's function was expansive, and included sponsoring chamber music, a film festival, summer festivals, visits by foreign opera companies, and much else. He suggested without discernible rancor that many of his plans for the center were "in abeyance," awaiting a new inrush of funds.

"I still believe in the original concept for Lincoln Center," he said. "The present kind of leadership is wholly logical for present purposes, and for housekeeping duties. It is a holding action until the money comes.

"If the original idea cannot be reinstated, Lincoln Center could not do better than with its present administrators. [John W. Mazzola was elected executive vice president and general manager of the center shortly after Mr. Schuman resigned.] But if the day comes when the old concept revives, the center will again have to turn to an artist for leadership."

The idea of Lincoln Center, Mr. Schuman said, was not merely to provide housing for the constituent members, but to take the initiative in imaginative programing of its own.

Unless Lincoln Center can resume such programing it will not be true to itself," the president emeritus said.

Besides the new Shahn piece, Mr. Schuman has "a whole bunch of commissions —I'm booked through 1972," and is particularly interested in getting back to choral and band music. "I love to do such things. You feel like a citizen. You write it, go to a school and hear them sing it."

"I've also begun my memoirs," Mr. Schuman continued. "Not just the Lincoln Center side of my career, not just personal experiences, but things of general interest. The book will take the form of an autobiography and I haven't found any reasonable way to apologize for that."

And Besides Composing...

The other activities that engage Mr. Schuman at the moment, he said, include "educational consultant on the arts" (he is involved in an audio-visual project for the Columbia Broadcasting System); "serving on boards in the public interest" (he is now chairman of the National Educational Television network's council on programs), and "keeping myself sufficiently flexible so that I can take on ad hoc assignments from the Government" (in March he goes to Japan as a member of the Committee for Educational and Cultural Cooperation).

But Mr. Schuman's prime role is that of composer, and he feels he is still contemporary, if no longer in the avant-garde.

"The whole thing about the avant-garde is that after 10 years, if it still remains avant-garde, I begin to think it's derrière. Something is wrong."

"After all, the whole thing is so simple. All a composer has to do is be honest. He has to write from the gut, from inside himself. I feel such a sense of sorrow for any composer who thinks he has to be fashionable, because that's absolutely the one true way of going out of date."

Mr. Schuman's firm tone suggested he did not intend to become that kind of composer emeritus.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,508 SUN. 1,445,507

JAN 28 1970

Schuman Now Basking in 'Total Su

By DONAL HENAHAN

William Howard Schuman, looking too contented to be confused with Napoleon on Elba or Lyndon Johnson on the LBJ Ranch, sounded a bit smug about his new life.

"I've had the most fantas-tic experience in this past

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 16,000

FEB 1970

leader? It was agreed that I would not use a baton in our public performances before our local audience; these people knew us well, liked the music we played, and the way we played it, and would not be needing the extra pretense of professionalism. It was agreed that I would conduct with baton on out-of-town jobs; here we were being hired by relative or absolute strangers, and the money they were investing in the presence of a small professional band should bring them a traditional band leader with baton.

Time passed with the new rules in effect, and I began might seem austentatious to this conductor.

I prefer to believe the following reason, though. I assume that every choral conductor is schooled, probably schooled in conducting and surely in other aspects of music which include time beating and note values. Given this benefit of the doubt, the choral conductor has good reason to lead his chorus with bare hands. This chorus is almost surely amateur, and it may even learn its songs by rote — with less than a nodding acquaintance with measure bars and the like. In front of such a chorus, it is expedient that the conductor [illegible]

Symphony were at home and playing their regular Friday-Saturday subscription series.

Here was the opportunity of a lifetime for a young band leader to observe and benefit from the conducting techniques of three of the greatest men in the trade, and I attended the programs of all three. It would be presumptive and tasteless for me to say that one was "better" than another, but the results attained were quite different and you can take your choice as to which you prefer.

Stokowsky offered a quality of tone that seemed completely detatched from the mechanical processes of music making. I lost Stokowsky and I lost his musicians as living people. I could only hear — and think about — the composition as a message from the composer.

Toscanini was crystalline in a material sort of way. I was always aware of the man Toscanini and his human musicians. When Brahms doubled a pair of clarinets with a pair of bassoons, I could not hear a composite tone but rather the four instruments exactly as Brahms had scored them.

Koussevitsky, when the spirit moved, could cajole or drive more musicianship, more precision, more technique, and more virtuosity out of his players than merely human minds and fingers are capable of delivering. On this occasion, the spirit moved happily.

Stokowsky conducted without a baton. I had heard through the grapevine that this had been his regular practice for some years previous, and in a 1969 televised Stokowsky performance which I "attended" in my living room, I can report that he is still conducting without a baton.

Toscanini conducted without a baton. This was a shocker to me and others. In opera, I had seen him throw or "lose" his baton up into the flies in a paroxysm of rage or other emotion, but always it was retrieved for him or replaced as quickly and unobtrusively as possible. At Symphony Hall, he started the concert batonless and persisted throughout. Perhaps he had heard about the Stokowsky technique and was curious or competitive. We will never know. For the record, I later saw him on a few occasions and he was again using a baton.

Koussevitsky conducted with a baton. His results were usually supurbly precise, but I have never witnessed as seemingly inept and uncertain baton technique as was his regular habit. In fact, I could not bear to watch it. If I wanted to enjoy the music, I would watch the tympanist or the harpist — or even pretend to read my program notes.

This Koussevitsky phenomenon mystified me for all of 20 years, but then I happened onto what may be the answer. Leonard Bernstein had been a pupil of Koussevitsky's, and in the late 1950's Bernstein came to Boston to guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I attended his open rehearsal and the program started with a very straightforward Mozart symphony, a piece that this orchestra and this conductor could have presented sympathetically and accurately with no rehearsal at all. Bernstein, an excellent technician and communicator in any category of orchestral music, stopped the players again and again to plead that they "relax" and "play together" on their own.

Perhaps this was the disclosure of the Koussevitsky secret. Infinite rehearsal and then a self-containing performance with a minimum of molestation from the podium.

After this threefold orgy of objective concert going, it was natural that I would make some practical use of what I had seen and heard. As I drove to my band rehearsal the following week, I had already decided to try conducting without a baton. I liked what I had heard from Stokowsky, and if Toscanini could make the transition abruptly with no apparent loss of his communicative powers, why couldn't I do the same?

My band of the moment was a pretty good one, and we played a repertory considerably more demanding of leader communication than the fundamental display of two, three or four beats to the measure. The band was small, mostly adult, and professional to the extent that the modest gross receipts from all public appearances were distributed to the band members as a semi-annual dividend. The leader did not share in this melon cutting; he was on an annual retainer from the largish manufacturer who dominated the smallish town in which he was located — and sponsored many of the town's social activities. Locally, the band played a summer series of ten concerts in the little circular bandstand on the common, and in the winter there was an occasional concert, minstrel show, or other event involving public assembly. Out of town, there were concerts, parades on all holidays, firemen's musters, and the like.

But back to the rehearsal that was to be my first experiment at batonless conducting. I began it with a note by note story of my experiences of the previous week. I had seen and heard two of the best conductors of the era working without baton. Obviously, their objective was better performance from their musicians that would result from better communication between conductor and players. If this was the new thing, why shouldn't we try it? At our own more modest level of leader ability to ask and player ability to respond, perhaps we could improve our own net result. My band seemed interested and willing to try the experiment, so I distributed the parts for the "Prelude" to Die Meistersinger and we went to work, first at sightreading and then at as much refining as the two-hour rehearsal would allow.

For my part, I was too busy communicating to give any thought to the fact that I was doing it with two bare hands. The transition from baton was natural and effortless. I did not feel awkward, embarrassed, or handicapped in any way. It was as though the baton had never been a part of my earlier life.

My band never played better. They knew it and enjoyed the experience to the utmost. They gave me a level of musicianship and alert attention that we had never before shared. I responded in turn, asked for the impossible, and got it.

I am sure that my batonless conducting deserved only a small part of the credit for the result attained. Much more important was the discussion that had started the rehearsal. Never before had I used the word "communication" in talking to this band or any other. The idea of sharing as a confidence the mechanical aspects of the relationship between conductor and players was as new to me as it was to them. With all of us thinking about this hitherto secret facet of ensemble playing, we all responded at a level higher than our fondest dreams.

At the end of the rehearsal, no one packed up to go home. We sat around and talked. At future rehearsals, of course, I would conduct without baton, but what about the visual tradition that the baton is the badge of the leader? It was agreed that I would not use a baton in our public performances before our local audience; these people knew us well, liked the music we played, and the way we played it, and would not be needing the extra pretense of professionalism. It was agreed that I would conduct with baton on out-of-town jobs; here we were being hired by relative or absolute strangers, and the money they were investing in the presence of a small professional band should bring them a traditional band leader with baton.

Time passed with the new rules in effect, and I began to notice a secondary benefit. With this new general consciousness of the visual aspects of "being a band," I began to see better polished instruments and better pressed uniforms and a more businesslike and punctual approach to the bandstand at concert starts and after intermissions. The symptom first showed itself on the out-of-town jobs, but eventually it became standard practice even at home.

On those occasions when, by our set of rules, I conducted with baton, the band seemed to feel that I was working under a handicap and that it was up to them to be especially attentive and responsive to my fumbling communication.

Not infrequently, there would be calls for me to serve as guest conductor of amateur bands. The situation usually provided minimum time (or no time at all) for rehearsal, and I have usually found the establishment of rapport with amateur musicians to be a slow process. Here there was need for instant dignity and at least the look of competence. I used a baton — as assurance to my musicians that I was really a band leader. My audience of strangers too, would react more favorably to the music if the unknown substitute conductor looked traditional on the podium.

On other occasions, I conducted in a theater pit for one-time events and promotions that ran the full range from amateur musical shows and local beauty contests to celebrity welcomings and political rallies. Here my responsibility was to show up with an appropriate library and an assortment of 20 men or so whom I had recruited from Local Nine of the American Federation of Musicians. These men I conducted with bare hands. Top-flight professional instrumentalists are very worldly and they have their own criteria with which to judge the competence of their conductor. A baton would not have kidded them at all and it was up to me to prove my musicianship in other ways that they knew well. Also, I wanted to get the best possible music out of them in return for the union scale that I was paying. In this kind of work, the audience was not to be considered at all. They would be watching what was happening on the stage above.

I have never conducted a band at a televised halftime ceremony at a football game. If this situation should arise, I would use a baton. However well the band might know me and be ready to respond to my most delicate expression of demand, I would use a baton for the sake of the television audience. The television picture at halftime is painted with a broad brush and all possible visual symbolism is helpful to the whole.

Choral conducting

I have observed that batonless conducting is quite common in choral music. Probably the less likely of two reasons is that the conductor has come directly out of the ranks of the chorus being conducted; the use of a baton might seem austentatious to this conductor.

I prefer to believe the following reason, though. I assume that every choral conductor is schooled, probably schooled in conducting and surely in other aspects of music which include time beating and note values. Given this benefit of the doubt, the choral conductor has good reason to lead his chorus with bare hands. This chorus is almost surely amateur, and it may even learn its songs by rote — with less than a nodding acquaintance with measure bars and the like. In front of such a chorus, it is expedient that the conductor stick to the rhythm of the melodic line and possibly even forget the fundamental idea of beats to the measure. Certainly neither of his hands should be encumbered by a baton, and there are many occasions where he may wish that he had a third hand.

When I was guest conducting a chorus I did as the Romans do. If the regular conductor who preceeded me used a baton, I used a baton. If not, I didn't. This was just to save confusion and misunderstanding. If the chorus seemed to have learned its music by rote, I conducted by rote, waving jerkily on the dotted rhythms and freezing on the sustained syllables. To an instrumentally oriented conductor, this was not easy, but my effort was sincere. Whatever the handicaps, my objective has always been the best possible performance from the conditions at hand.

Any rule is said to be proved by one exception. The occasion for my exception was an emergency. The regular conductor of this chorus was ill, and I was called in to finish the preparation of Brahms' Song of Destiny, the work to be included in an otherwise instrumental program and the whole to be conducted by the orchestra conductor. I knew that the choral conductor ahead of me did not use a baton, but that the orchestra conductor to follow me did use a baton, and would use it in the Brahms. I did not know the chorus — except that it was somewhat dependent on rote conducting. I was to have two rehearsals to get the chorus ready for the big event and I began with a complete explanation of the situation. The conductor of the public performance would be using a baton, and as they, the chorus, would probably be baton shy, I had decided to use a baton in these rehearsals. I would use it in the professional manner. Except for cuing their entrances, I would simply beat time, and this would be the very least assistance that they could expect from the orchestra conductor to come.

The rehearsals were accompanied by piano, with the pianist handling the unusual assignment alertly and sympathetically. The chorus also rose to the challenge and in the course of the two rehearsals learned to follow me precisely — and to find a new kind of meaning on the printed pages of their octavo parts.

We all knew that they had done well and that they had gained the confidence they might have needed. I congratulated them, and also told them that I would be at their concert. I attended, and was very proud of "my" chorus.

Through all of the above experiences, I have failed to mention one item. What is my innermost personal attitude toward conducting without a baton? I approve of the technique wholeheartedly. I am sure that I conduct better without than with. Without a baton, I feel that I am communicating more eloquently to my musicians. The proof of this is that they seem to understand me and give me the extra musicianship for which I ask. ■

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 16,000

FEB 1970

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JAN 28 1970

Schuman Now Basking in 'Total Sunshine'

By DONAL HENAHAN

William Howard Schuman, looking too contented to be confused with Napoleon on Elba or Lyndon Johnson on the LBJ Ranch, sounded a bit smug about his new life.

"I've had the most fantastic experience in this past year, the first year in 35 that I wasn't under some sort of institutional umbrella. I can report total sunshine."

Mr. Schuman, the 59-year-old composer, who is president emeritus of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts and president emeritus of the Juilliard School, lounged in his upper Fifth Avenue apartment and talked of the old days, a little more than a year ago, when he was buried under the cares of cultural state, and was widely regarded as the most powerful man in American musical life.

"I've always had to write down how many hours a year I wanted to devote to composing—about 600, it was—and stick to it. But this year I've stopped that. Now I know I'll have enough time. Before, if I didn't assure myself I was spending that many hours composing, I'd find everything frittered away in raising money for a new cafeteria or something." He was asked to write a piece for the Boston Symphony's 75th anniversary, Mr. Schuman said, and "I got it in just in time for their 80th."

The New York Times

William Howard Schuman in his apartment on Fifth Avenue

Premiere for New Work

The first evidence of the new freedom, Mr. Schuman went on, is "In Praise of Shahn," a one-movement, 16-minute work that will be given its world premiere by the New York Philharmonic tomorrow night. The piece, in memory of Ben Shahn, was commissioned last spring by a group of the artist's friends.

"If I had still been at Lincoln Center, and anyone had asked me to write a piece on such short notice, it would have been impossible," the composer said.

Mr. Schuman, after seven years as president of Lincoln Center, left in December, 1968, after the center ran low on funds and decided to cut back some projects.

Mr. Schuman's concept of Lincoln Center's function was expansive, and included sponsoring chamber music, a film festival, summer festivals, visits by foreign opera companies, and much else. He suggested without discernible rancor that many of his plans for the center were "in abeyance," awaiting a new inrush of funds.

"I still believe in the original concept for Lincoln Center," he said. "The present kind of leadership is wholly logical for present purposes, and for housekeeping duties. It is a holding action until the money comes.

"If the original idea cannot be reinstated, Lincoln Center could not do better than with its present administrators. [John W. Mazzola was elected executive vice president and general manager of the center shortly after Mr. Schuman resigned.] But if the day comes when the old concept revives, the center will again have to turn to an artist for leadership."

The idea of Lincoln Center, Mr. Schuman said, was not merely to provide housing for the constituent members, but to take the initiative in imaginative programing of its own.

Unless Lincoln Center can resume such programing it will not be true to itself," the president emeritus said.

Besides the new Shahn piece, Mr. Schuman has "a whole bunch of commissions —I'm booked through 1972," and is particularly interested in getting back to choral and band music. "I love to do such things. You feel like a citizen. You write it, go to a school and hear them sing it."

"I've also begun my memoirs," Mr. Schuman continued. "Not just the Lincoln Center side of my career, not just personal experiences, but things of general interest. The book will take the form of an autobiography and I haven't found any reasonable way to apologize for that."

And Besides Composing . . .

The other activities that engage Mr. Schuman at the moment, he said, include "educational consultant on the arts" (he is involved in an audio-visual project for the Columbia Broadcasting System); "serving on boards in the public interest" (he is now chairman of the National Educational Television network's council on programs), and "keeping myself sufficiently flexible so that I can take on ad hoc assignments from the Government" (in March he goes to Japan as a member of the Committee for Educational and Cultural Cooperation).

But Mr. Schuman's prime role is that of composer, and he feels he is still contemporary, if no longer in the avant-garde.

"The whole thing about the avant-garde is that after 10 years, if it still remains avant-garde, I begin to think it's derrière. Something is wrong."

"After all, the whole thing is so simple. All a composer has to do is be honest. He has to write from the gut, from inside himself. I feel such a sense of sorrow for any composer who thinks he has to be fashionable, because that's absolutely the one true way of going out of date."

Mr. Schuman's firm tone suggested he did not intend to become that kind of composer emeritus.

more MUSIC

Thomas: from which legends grow

by Carol L. Eron

Boston music critics have given Michael Tilson Thomas, the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, superlative reception. They wrote: ". . .right now he is one of the ablest and most interesting conductors in the profession," "his movements are in themselves arresting and even beautiful, but particularly because they are unfailingly relevant to the musical result," "he has, as well, an easy melodic gift and an uncommon sense of style and phrasing," "one of the liveliest and finest concerts I have heard at the Boston Symphony," "the debut of Michael Tilson Thomas is the stuff from which legends grow." Etcetera. At 24, Mr. Thomas is the youngest conductor ever engaged by the orchestra.

IN THIS ISSUE

Art.....15-17
Classifieds.....6-7
Clubs.....22-23
Film.....27, 31
FM.....18-21
Letters.....8
Music.....24-27
Priority Ticket Service...2
Theater.....4-5
What's Happening...10-13

From the podium Mr. Thomas conveys authority, self-confidence, and elegance. When I met him for lunch recently, those same qualities were evicent, but tempered with considerable modesty; and he expressed ingenuous delight with his new position. While Mr. Thomas fortified himself with Campari, shrimp cocktail, eggplant parmigiana, and buttered spaghetti, I attempted to find out what the responsibilities of the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony are and how he came to Boston. Aside from condusting six performances of his program this season, he assured me that he is kept busy. "To begin with I learn every piece that is perfromed by the Orchestra. In case of illness I am always ready to conduct. This involves attending all rehearsals to learn how a particular conductor does each part. Also I play piano and all keyboard instruments for the orchestra and am called upon to play rehearsals with soloist and the conductor. And I'm a kind of troubleshooter for the orchestra—for example, if a certain piece requires a celeste, it might be a four or five octave celeste. I find out which and see that we have it." In addition he is the pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and a guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia. This summer he will prepare and conduct concerts at the Berkshire Music Center as well as regular Boston Symphony Tanglewood performances.

Recalling rumors of antagonism between orchestra members and Erich Leinsdorf and a statement by a BSO violinist that conductors are the natural enemy of players, I inquired about Mr. Thomas's relationship with the orchestra. "It's great," he said immediately. "At my first rehearsal, for the first few minutes I was working I felt the reserve you feel in any new position or relationship, but the cooperation, the superb playing, the affection for and from the orchestra members—and the fact that the people and the critics liked my concerts—that for me is most wonderful. My relationahip with the orchestra and their acceptance of me is marvelous. You have to be paranoid to believe that players and conductors are enemies."

But what about critics? I asked. "I am delighted," he said, displaying a talent for evasive

(Continued on Page 27)

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

FEB 11 1970

More on BSO's Michael Tilton Thomas

(Continued from Page 1)

tact, "if anyone in the audience is moved, excited, or pleased by my work. If that person happens to be a critic, so much the better. But people forget that a critic can be reduced to a person—a person with likes and dislikes, his own taste." I wondered if he had been as pleased with his debut concert as the critics were. He admitted that he was, and after a long silence added, "It is rare, though, that you find out about something you didn't already know in reading a critic. However, I always pay attention to serious or thoughtful comment—whether it comes from someone in the audience, a colleague, a critic, or a member of the orchestra. I am open to criticism from whatever source it comes—and I've taken my share of negative criticism, too."

What is his opinion of Boston critics? "I think it is interesting in a town where there is more than one critic—in Los Angeles, where I grew up, for a long time there was only one—and several personalities are involved." I repeated the question, but he simply said, "I think they are competent."

Mr. Thomas's impressive career had an almost inconspicuous start as he remembers. "I don't really know when I first had ideas of becoming a conductor. It was sometime in junior high school. I played in the school orchestra. One day the teacher was sick, and a substitute was sent who didn't know much—a shop teacher—so I conducted." During high school he played a number of orchestral instruments, did a lot of conducting, and studied piano, which he had begun to play by ear at the age of five, taught by his father. His first professional conducting assignment began in 1965 while he was a student at the University of Southern California—with the Young Musician's Foundation Orchestra. Last season, at a rehearsal of the Boston Philharmonia (which he was guest conducting), Thomas was surprised to see William Steinberg, who afterward requested an interview with him at Symphony Hall; and shortly he was offered a contract with the Boston Symphony.

(Between the Young Musician's Orchestra and the Boston Symphony, Thomas was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the Bayreuth Festival in 1966 and for three years at the Ojai Festival. In 1968 he directed orchestral preparation for the Heifetz-Piatagorsky concerts in Los Angeles; and more recently he prepared the singers and played for the premiere performance and a recording of Les Noces and Requiem Canticles, with Stravinsky himself presiding. As a pianist he played for two years in the master classes of Gregor Piatagorsky and has given concerts at Town Hall and Hunter College. In 1968 he won the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center and last year served as a conducting fellow there, where he evidently caught the attention of the BSO management.)

Mr. Thomas's choice of program for the Boston Symphony this season (Haydn, Stravinsky, Ives and Debussy) suggests that he is a representative of a new genre of conductors whose musical tastes are strongly modern. He admits great interest in "new music, especially what might be called theater music, mixtures of performers, actors, different media—like The Knight's Tour by Lasemann, for example. It's a graphics piece with a structural outline, but there is variability in what the players produce. This kind of ensemble has a collective brain of its own. I find this kind of conducting very interesting, more so than regular orchestral work. I've done some in Los Angeles and hope to do more here." As for his "non-musical" interests, aside from voracious reading (about five books a week), he mentioned experimentation with multi-media environments, "getting together with friends who are in different fields, like cinema, plastics, physics, and music, and creating events that use all our skills," and listening to "old blues like Bessie Smith, some rock, the Rolling Stones, Beatles, Dylan, Jim Hendrix, and best of all—James Brown."

When I asked about his presence at Moratorium Day observances on the Common last fall—something I found unusual, in view of the traditionally apolitical nature of artists—he said, "I was there out of sympathy." His thought is that "artists should be involved in politics, but not the art itself for propaganda causes—ridiculous things happen when this is done, like Shostakovich subtitiling his Fifth Symphony, 'In Answer to Previous Criticism.' This is not to say that I'm not concerned with political and social problems. I am very much. On the West Coast I have gone to neighborhood settlement houses with a few musicians and played for children who had never heard classical music before. This is the kind of thing I think I can do best."

As lunch concluded with cassata and espresso in a cup rubbed with lemon peel, I couldn't resist asking Mr. Thomas, a representative of a profession reigned by older men, about discrimination against women and youth. "Women haven't succeeded in conducting, except of course for the classic exception, Nadia Boulanger," he thinks, "because there are few women who have been willing or able to give up traditional ideas of the role of woman in interpersonal relationships in order to assume the air, the authority which is necessary for conducting. It has to do with the way women relate to men. Conducting is a man's kind of situation. Women would feel they were compromising their femininity. Women," he added slyly, "could become conductors, if they wouldn't wear sleeveless dresses—their bare arms flapping around with a lot of bracelets on them look ridiculous."

As for discrimination against youth? "I haven't noticed any."

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY

JAN 1970

Boston Sym. (Michael Tilson Thomas)

Michael Tilson Thomas is beginning to show up everywhere. As Southern California's pride and joy, he has for a number of years conducted its Young Musicians' Federation Orchestra; and he is a regular figure at the annual Ojai Festival. As a pianist, he is to be heard on the new Angel recording of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring in a two-piano version (reviewed in the October 1969 issue of High Fidelity). Last season I attended one of the Monday Evening Concerts in Los Angeles, which was to have been conducted by Pierre Boulez. Boulez was unable to show. His pupil, Mike Thomas, took over.

The audience at the Boston Symphony's opening New York concert on October 22 at Philharmonic Hall came to hear how the BSO would sound under its new music director, William Steinberg. For the first half of the evening, Steinberg conducted the Brahms Second Symphony, and it sounded just fine. But midway in the evening Steinberg became ill and had to be rushed to the hospital. The assistant conductor, who happens this year to be the twenty-four-year-old Thomas, stepped onto the podium and led throughout the rest of the program.

He was, of course, merely holding them to Steinberg's own interpretations of the music, and so the concert did not give a true impression of his own interpretative capabilities. Such an impression was, however, to be gained the following Saturday at Carnegie Hall (October 25), when young Thomas, still standing in for the indisposed senior conductor, made a complete program change. This included music that he himself had worked up with the orchestra—works by Debussy, Ives, Stravinsky, and Haydn. As programing, it reflected Thomas' leaning towards the modern (he was a pupil of composer/conductor Ingolf Dahl). It also showed his imaginativeness: both the Haydn Symphony No. 98 and Ives's Three Places in New England have movements which employ the device of juxtaposing weighty doings by full orchestra with light-hearted, almost trivial interludes played by solo instruments. In both works, the effect is one of witty incongruity.

As a conductor, Thomas seems to have everything going for him: good looks, a striking podium personality, formidable ability and experience, and —as evidenced by a single week that included debuts in both Philharmonic and Carnegie halls—fantastic luck.

JACK HIEMENZ

Monique Charland, piano

Monique Charland, a Canadian pianist who studied with Darré and Anda, offered a recital at Tully Hall on October 12. It was a program highly slanted toward romantic pianism, and as such might be described as a bit démodé by current tastes, which prefer Mozart or Beethoven to Czerny's La Ricordanza and Brahms or Schumann to César Franck's Prelude, Chorale, et Fugue. I myself had quite forgotten just how soporific a piece the Franck is.

Mlle. Charland sounded a bit nonplussed by Czerny's dowdy filigree, but a use of similar bel canto mannerisms proved amenable to the Franck. Three pieces by Jacques Miller, Petit Caprice, Consolation, and Scherzo Brillante, were brilliantly unfurled. Miller clearly has a profound knowledge of the instrument he is writing for. His style is wholly pianistic and might be described as Rachmaninoff cum Debussy, Godowsky, Chopin, and Liszt. In other words, one heard a lot of densely crowded notes and I do not imagine that it is easy to play them. Fortunately, they are easy to listen to.

Lord Berners' Three Little Funeral Marches (1. "For a Statesman"; 2. "For a Canary"; and 3. "For a Rich Aunt") proved quite as witty and humorous as the titles would indicate. A Liszt group had plenty of dash and

Michael Tilson Thomas

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

FEB 1 1970 New England

. . . JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performs the Beethoven violin concerto today with New Bedford Symphony at Keith Junior High School, New Bedford. The concert, under John Pandolfi's direction, starts at 3 p.m.

E. J. Dias Review

Pandolfi, Silverstein, Symphony All Superb

As a part of the current international celebration of the bicentennial annievrsary of Beethoven's birth, the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of John R. Pandolfi, presented a concert, yesterday afternoon in Keith Junior High School Auditorium, featuring three works by the honored composer.

Highlight of the performance was, of course, the appearance of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as soloist in the violin concerto.

Besides the violin work, the concert included the "Egmont Overture, Opus 84" and "Symphony No. 3 in E Flat" — the famed "Eroica."

Mr. Silverstein, a violinist of impeccable tone and technique, made his contribution to the program a memorable one. Moreover, the orchestra rose well to the occasion in the precision of its accompaniment. In the opening Allegro, Mr. Silverstein's runs and trills were artfully performed as were the numerous difficult chords. In exquisite Larghetto, Mr. Silverstein's tonal quality was exquisite, especially in the upper positions. And his bow control in the Rondo, plus his beautifully-modulated cadenza, gave striking evidence of his musicianship and virtuoso equipment.

Beethoven, of course, studied the violin in his youth and thus knew the capabilities of the instrument at first hand. Consequently, his only violin concerto is a treasure for the virtuoso performer — with its display of occasional pyrotechniques, it demands for a singing tone, its challenging rapid passage work. That Mr. Silverstein met the changes of the work was obvious from the ovation he received from the good-sized audience. Like all genuine professionals, he makes the difficult seem deceptively easy.

As for the orchestra's efforts in the remainder of the program, they were both respectable and workmanlike. Mr. Pandolfi and his musicians gave a spirited reading of the "Egmont," and in the "Eroica" also gave good accounts of themselves.

Perhaps the best played movement of the "Eroica" was the second — the celebrated, Funeral March — which was accomplished with first-rate instrumental balance and cohesiveness. Acceptably performed, too, was the stirring Finale. There were passages of occasional raggeness in the intricate Scherzo, whose tricky rhythms sometimes bother even the greatest orchestras. However, on the whole, Mr. Pandolfi and his ensemble acquitted themselves well in this afternoon of tribute to one of the giants in the history of music.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 2 1970 New Eng New

VERMONT CATHOLIC DIGEST

FEB 07 1970
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VERMONT
(M) 41,288

FEB 5 1970 New Eng New
EXPRESS
NEWPORT, VERMONT
(E) 4,280

FEB 6 1970 New Eng New

Boston Symphony Organist To Give Recital in St. Michael's Chapel

Organist Berj Zamkochian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a public recital Sunday, Feb. 15, at 8 p.m. at the Chapel of St. Michael the Archangel on the St. Michael's College campus.

His program will include works by J. S. Bach, Comidas Vartabet, Edward Gurbashian and Franz Liszt.

A native of Boston, Zamkochian is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music where he studied organ under Gerald Faxon. During his years of graduate study at the Conservatory, he was appointed to the Organ Faculty.

He has made numerous concert appearances throughout North America and Europe and has appeared as soloist with the major orchestras in the United States.

Zamkochian was appointed organist of the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestra in 1957. His recordings with the Boston Symphony on the Victor label have won international acclaim for him. He also has recorded works for Gregorian Institute of America Records.

In 1965, he was the first American organist to tour the Soviet Union. Since that time, he has made six tours of the country. In the fall of 1960, he gave concerts in the capital cities of Russia. He also appeared in Lebanon and Holland.

Last September, Zamkochian became the first person to be named University organist in residence at Boston College.

In his St. Michael's concert, he will play four selections by J. S. Bach, Toccata in F Major; Chorale-Prelude, In the Hour of Most Need; Trio Sonata No. 6; Vivace, Lento, Allegro; and Fantasie and Fugue in G Minor.

Zamkochian also will perform Vartabet's Hymn of Vesting from the Armenian liturgy, Gurbashian's Prelude and Toccata and Liszt's Chorale Fantasie on the theme, Ad Nos Ad Salutarem Undum, Introduction and Fugue.

His appearance is being sponsored by the colleege's Fine Arts Department.

BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN at work.

174.

Color 'Quota' Not For Music World

Black Assistant Manager Of Boston Symphony Gives Views Here

By JAMES DONAHUE
Gazette Staff Writer

Richard White, the new 28-year-old assistant manager of the Boston Symphony and former candidate for the manager's position with the Kalamazoo Symphony, was in town this past week to renew old acquaintances.

The visit might ordinarily have raised little interest, but White is a Negro and thus represents a new and rare breed of black newcomers to the world of symphonic music.

And he had some opinions on the subject.

While White admitted that the accomplished black musicians performing today with U.S. symphony orchestras can be easily counted, he did not advocate a push to place a "black quota" of performers in these positions.

"Theoretically, any musician who thinks he is qualified has the opportunity to be auditioned and if he is good, to be accepted (in a major symphony)," White said. "No artist worth his salt, black or white, should be admitted because of his color. A symphony is a performing institution and success depends upon the ability of the performers as individuals.

"This goal of perfect performance and interpretation is so crucial that it cannot be compromised in order to make a quota," White said.

Yet some of the major U.S. symphonies have been confronted in recent years with charges of discrimination stemming from the national drive for racial freedom and equality.

The Detroit Smyphony was so charged about a year ago, even though three black musicians had reportedly just turned down offers to join the orchestra to take better paying positions with jazz and pop bands. There are no black musicians with the Detroit Symphony this year.

In New York, the Philharmonic Symphony there is being tried, through a civil rights hearing, for racial discrimination. Two performers have charged they were discriminated against because they auditioned for jobs with the symphony but turned down.

The outcome of this hearing may have a dramatic effect on the future practice of hiring by symphony orchestras, said White. "Although it is an unpleasant situation, it is a very important situation."

But the civil rights struggle has served as an important wedge to loosen up hiring practices by symphony orchestras, reports White. "Years ago it was very difficult for minority groups — Jews and Negroes — to get in. But I think in the last two decades the whole psychology of openness has developed. The orchestras are now looking for perfection and nothing else," he said.

The Boston Symphony, as an example, goes to great lengths "to avoid any kind of bias possible" and actually uses screened auditions — that is, the performer plays before a panel of judges from behind a curtain — as part of the audition, White said.

If the orchestras are not discriminating, why are there so few black performers employed in this area of the fine arts?

"The black musicians have historically gone to jazz because it's the fabric of the colored man." White explained. "Also the jobs as jazz and pop artists are much more [illegible] tive. There is more money and more security — all the attractions that a person who wants to eat and live better will be interested in.

"We have to go beyond the fine arts and look at the child's environment to really understand," White said. "The whites are often in a better economic situation and the parents can expose and motivate the child in directions beyond simple survival. But Negroes in this country are still a survival oriented race. We grow up in ghettos and the first thing we occupy ourselves with is making a living. It is a rare black child who has a chance to study ballet or violin at an early enough age to become an accomplished concert performer."

White said he felt it was "sad that we have so many talented children who need to be exposed to the broad spectrum of culture they live in. Some have the talent to perform in it."

He said he felt "the burden of proof is now on musical institutions involved in education. I feel we are under an obligation to accept black musicians as students in conservatory settings, even though they may be undeveloped.

"The (educational) institutions have an obligation to recruit and develop black students. But the performing institutions are under no obligation whatsoever to accept none other than the best qualified musicians, no matter what," White said.

White is one of those exceptions who emerged from within the black ranks to find some chance for success in the fine arts.

He grew up in New York City, once studied seriously as a musician, but abandoned this in college when he "weighed my ability against that of the other music students," and switched his study to economics. After a military hitch, he returned to Howard University, Washington, D.C., to acquire a law degree, and then obtained a Ford Foundation grant to study for managership of symphonic orchestras.

By coincidence, both White and Carlos Wilson, manager of the Kalamazoo Symphony, studied with the Detroit Symphony and became good friends.

Both applied for the position in Kalamazoo, but White withdrew his application to accept the job with the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON VISITOR WHITE (LEFT) WITH WILSON
Negro Role In Symphonic Music Discussed

KALAMAZOO GAZETTE
KALAMAZOO, MICH.
D. 58,086 SUN. 60,100
FEB 15 1970

HARVARD CRIMSON
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
(M) 4,500
FEB 13 1970

Symphony orchestras looking for angels

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI) — An artistic enterprise of pure practicality is to identify those congressmen who believe symphonic music locally performed is essential to American culture.

When identified they'll be asked to persuade their fellows to subsidize it, in part, with federal funds. Without this succor local orchestras will be collapsing like so many poisoned flies.

The poison in them is too much outgo — too little income. The death now threatening is that of bankruptcy. They've been quietly ailing for several years. Now their desperate sickness is in the open.

THE PRESIDENTS or board chairmen of 77 orchestras have formed themselves into an "AD HOC Committee of the whole" to lobby in Washington. They know it is going to be tough sledding.

The Federal government has never directly subsidized symphonic orchestras (or any other performers) even though there is plenty of precedence for it in Europe where governments have always picked up much of the tabs.

Right now the federal government is cutting expenditures, to stem inflation. Scientific and educational groups are agonizing over drastic cuts in their governmental grants. Symphonic music's pleas for money hardly could come at a less propitious time.

Amyas Ames, president of the New York Philharmonic and chairman of the committee, acknowledges a further handicap. Orchestras have always relied on the best heeled among the local citizenry to make up their deficits. They don't quite know where to begin with Congress.

Ames said they would spend a few months "exploring" with congressmen who are acquaintances or friends of the committee members. With this knowledgable advice they hope to organize an effective lobbying campaign.

THE COMMITTEEMEN displayed the fever charts in a two-day emergency meeting in New York. In the five years ending in 1967 the outgo of the principal American Orchestras totalled $77 million, an increase of more than 100 per cent.

At the current rate it will reach $87 million by 1973, a further increase of 34 per cent. At the end of the current season the orchestras will have a deficit of over $5 million and this will reach $13 million by 1973, despite frenzied local efforts to increase income, by better boxoffice takes and more generous private contributions.

"Ours is not a spirit of helplessness," Ames said. "We do not expect others to assume our responsibilities."

Nevertheless, orchestra tickets can't be priced much higher without pricing a lot of customers out of the halls. Demands on corporate and individual philanthropies now come from efforts to eliminate ghettos and other social improvement programs. Less is available for music culture.

THE COMMITTEE hopes to get a federal appropriation of $8.5 million for the 1970 - 71 symphonic season. It would be allotted among those orchestras which maintain a high level of boxoffice earnings and local contributions.

The chief cause of the steep rise in outgo has been the insistence of musicians on pay scales comparable to those of truck drivers, plumbers and other skilled workers, meaning annual wage rates of $10,000 to $15,000.

Furthermore, they want a full-year employment at these rates wherever it is at all possible. This has forced many orchestras to lengthen their seasons but in the outgo-income tug that has been no help. When each concert is played at a loss, the larger the number of concerts, the larger the deficit.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 8 1970

Modern Music Appreciation May Be Enriched By Listening

By Irene Jarry
News Music Columnist

When discussing music appreciation I am often asked, "Do you really like modern music?" "Yes, I do," I reply. My questioners usually look incredulous, voice their resentment of disonance and report that Stravinsky or Sessions, for instance, are just a meaningless jumble of sounds to them. They must listen with fresh ears.

Beethoven was accused of using too many dissonant harmonies in his day. Play the early Beethoven concertos and symphonies and see what a radical change there is when compared with his mature works. Notice the jump and almost complete change of style in his Third Symphony. The first two symphonies are Mozart and Haydn-like - - - classical in style and harmony. To the people of that period the Third Symphony, which we find very beautiful today, was something of a shock.

If you demand that all new music must resemble some familiar school or tradition like the classic, romantic, or impressionistic, you will be alienated by the markedly different style. If you consciously or unconsciously look for a certain kind of melody, harmony, or timbre, you will have difficulty in finding the new expressive arrangements of sounds.

Listen To Records

Perhaps the best way to learn is to have a system. Get Aaron Copland's book, "Our New Music" and listen to records of each composer that he writes about, following each school and style that leads up to our modern form of expression from the early Romantics to the late Romantics: Strauss, Mahler, Scriabin, Sibelius, Rachmaninoff, gradually adding Prokofieff, Poulenc, William Walton, etc. As dissonances become familiar they lose their terrors.

Perhaps you could borrow records of especially beautiful modern composers' works, such as Prokofieff's "G Minor Violin Concerto," William Walton's "Adagio for Strings," to name a few of my favorites. Each should have repeated hearings. Then branch out to the other works of these men. You will find it rewarding.

Criticized

Charles Munch, former musical director of the Boston Symphony, was criticized by some of his subscribers when he introduced two exacting works to Boston, Igor Stravinsky's "Canticum Sacrum" and Roger Session's "Third Symphony."

Here is how he replied to their protests: "You reproach me for playing too much contemporary music and I understand your point of view since you come to concerts for amusement and distraction, or perhaps for consolation—surely for pleasure. But we are asking you to do something, to participate actively in an exchange between performer and public when we want you to listen to something new, something difficult to understand, even difficult to listen to, especially at first encounter. I consider it our duty to listen to music written in our time. We must listen to the music that represents the artistic expression of the time we live in, music that may at the same time prepare for the future."

As someone else said, "Let's have an open mind."

Happy listening!

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,[illegible]
FEB 19 1970

Boston

The BSO in Pain

IT IS depressing to observe the decline and fall of a great orchestra, especially when that orchestra is close to home. Nevertheless, the former aristocrat of orchestras, the Boston Symphony, has fallen on hard times, and its problems merit some serious consideration.

Nearly everyone in Boston—even those people whose idea of a cultural evening is an excursion to Fenway Park—is aware of the recent departure of Erich Leinsdorf from the podium of the BSO. Not too many local critics, however, have sought to delve too deeply into the behind-the-scenes conflicts at the orchestra. Those who have made inquiries either end up fired, like George Gelles, or reprimanded, like Michael Steinberg. Probably no one outside of the Symphony hierarchy is completely aware of all of the problems which face the organization at the moment, but some have become public knowledge.

Morale at the orchestra was at its lowest in recent memory when Leinsdorf departed, and the BSO, which had been one of the international greats under Koussevitsky and Munch, was trailing each of the other four major American orchestras in record sales. When RCA Victor picked up the contract for Ormandy and the Philadelphia, there were rumors that the company would phase out Boston, because of the lack of magnetism in Leinsdorf's conducting. Leinsdorf was criticized as being excessively Germanic in interpretation, and at least one orchestra member publicly stated that he would rather be conducted by a metronome.

Conflict broke out the year before Leinsdorf left, when, for the first time in the history of the orchestra, the orchestra members refused to give the traditional Christmas gift to the conductor. The animosity between maestro and players became more apparent when trumpeter Roger Voisin "stepped down" from his position in the first chair after an incident in a public performance during which he allegedly misplayed a passage deliberately to cause Leinsdorf embarrassment. With the orchestra's prestige falling apart, it was obvious that new blood was needed, and Leinsdorf's resignation was not too surprising. His successor, William Steinberg of Pittsburgh, came somewhat as a surprise. Pittsburgh was not one of the major orchestras, although Steinberg himself was a man of proven competence. This year, he began his career at the BSO, serving as Music Director and conducting part time while finishing out his tenure at Pittsburgh.

THE QUALITY of this season has been good, if simply for the variety of conductors who have been invited to fill in for Steinberg. Unfortunately, there persists the tendency to stick to the warhorses and shy away from experimentation, as witnessed by the disastrous concerts given by Carlo Maria Giulini. His histrionic performance of the "Pathetique" Symphony pleased the Friday afternoon matrons but caused a furor which led the members of the orchestra to request publicly that several Boston critics be banned from future performances. Seiji Ozawa's interpretation of Carmina Burana was much better, and Claudio Abbado's choice of new music was a refreshing change.

Even more refreshing than that, however, is the news that several of the older, less inspiring members of the orchestra are being given their notice.

Likewise, the news that the BSO has removed itself from the clutches of RCA Victor and signed a recording contract with the prestigious Deutsche Gramophon Gesellschaft must hearten owners of high priced music systems who appreciate the better quality of DGG recordings. The extent of the changes Steinberg is making is not fully known, however, since he, most tactfully, is not publicly announcing them. Rather, the word has leaked out from the people involved of the vast changes going on in the makeup of the organization.

Hopefully, a proper selection of new people will restore the "Boston sound" which existed under Koussevitsky and even came through in the sometimes sloppy conducting of Munch. Then, for the first time in almost a decade, Boston won't have to lay claim to the dubious distinction of having Arthur Fiedler as its greatest resident conductor.

—MICHAEL J. RYAN

BSO Sets $750,000 Munch Fund

BOSTON — Taking a lead from universities, where endowed chairs or professorships are commonplace, the Boston Symphony has begun to endow chairs occupied by its principal players.

The orchestra announces creation of the $750,000 Charles Munch concertmaster's chair, named in memory of the late conductor and given by former trustee president Henry B. Cabot, trustee Henry A. Laughlin and trustee emeritus Edward A. Taft. The orchestra's present concertmaster is Joseph Silverstein.

An anonymous donor has given the $100,000 Walter Piston flute chair, honoring the American composer. Many of his works, written while he was professor of music at Harvard, were given their premieres by the B.S.O. Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer is the orchestra's first flute.

The concertmaster and flute chairs are the third and fourth to be endowed. There already exist the Charles S. Dana viola and the Philip R. Allen cello chairs, occupied respectively by Burton Fine and Jules Eskin and named for trustees.

The endowing of chairs is part of the orchestra's 90th anniversary fund campaign, which seeks to raise $6 million. Ten other principal chairs remain available for endowment.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
FEB 21 1970

$750,000 BSO fund named for Munch

GLOBE 2/13/70

Taking a lead from universities, where endowed chairs or professorships are commonplace, the Boston Symphony has begun to endow chairs occupied by its principal players.

The orchestra announces creation of the $750,000 Charles Munch concertmaster's chair, named in memory of the late conductor and given by former trustee president Henry B. Cabot, trustee Henry A. Laughlin and trustee emeritus Edward A. Taft. The orchestra's present concertmaster is Joseph Silverstein.

An anonymous donor has given the $100,000 Walter Piston flute chair, honoring the American composer. Many of his works, written while he was professor of music at Harvard, were given their premieres by the B.S.O. Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer is the orchestra's first flute.

The concertmaster and flute chairs are the third and fourth to be endowed. There already exist the Charles S. Dana viola and the Philip R. Allen cello chairs, occupied respectively by Burton Fine and Jules Eskin and named for trustees.

The endowing of chairs is part of the orchestra's 90th anniversary fund campaign, which seeks to raise $6 million. Ten other principal chairs remain available for endowment.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
FEB 21 1970

The concertmaster chair of the Boston Symphony has been endowed through a gift of $750,000 in memory of Charles Munch by Henry B. Cabot. The principal flute chair has also been endowed for $100,000 by an anonymous donor, in honor of composer Walter Piston.

175

A touch of Paris in the Spring

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

Nostalgic for a bit of Paris?

Whether your bailiwick is the Place Vendome or the Rive Gauche — or even the doorway at 3 Rue Royale that says Maxim's — you'll get wafted away this Spring.

Tantalizing as the magic names like St. Laurent, Givenchy, Chanel and Dior will be the April-in-Paris parties already calendared for Boston, with a new date logged today — Apr. 17 for a Right Bank-Left Bank dazzler on the banks of the Charles.

Street scenes of Paris, with posters, lights and directions for Montmatre or Pigalle will rim those small cafe under-the-awning tables that are the heart of Paris for everybody. It's a do-it-yourself for the English Speaking Union and their YMG — Younger Members Group — and that means all those stalwart rugby blues and good looking internationals from Australia and Rhodesia and such.

ESU President John Ewell is pretty handy with a hammer or carrying the rugby ball, so it'll be an April-in-Paris no one is likely to forget. Get your bid in early.

Maxim's maxi — gorgeous, greying Louis Vaudable — will be here himself for the Boston ball of the century, Symphony's Paris edition on April 27. With him will fly the vintage velvet of a place as Parisian as the Rud de la Paix — from wines to whisks, from chefs to a chandelier or two.

The tab for this historic benefit for the Boston Symphony's deficit will be the year's most astronomical, but it looks like it will be worth it just to be on the rolls for this Rockefeller - Rosenfeld - Cabot cook-in that will be the talk of all the towns for years to come.

★

Also on the big, big party horizon is the Association of Performing Arts' Boston Ball at the Walter Cabot Baylies' town house, 5 Commonwealth ave., on March 21.

If you don't remember Boston when it was Boston, this will be the night to find out what it was like to have that two-hour supper that began its 10-course run with oysters and sherry, made quite simple by 10 live-in help, and an extra maid or two for the evening.

If you were among the happy few who sat late on Bunny and Gerry Roberts' beautiful back terrace the night the APA was born and have seen its encouragement for the performing arts in Boston, a reality in effect not shared by the city's politicians (given another year the APA could have taken on the Patriots, too), then you'll not want to miss this chance to enjoy Boston as it was (complete even to the jade brocade bought for Charlotte Baylies' 1912 coming-out ball). Charlotte fought a spinster's doom at 19 by founding the Anti-On-the-Shelf Club, with dances in the ballroom her parents built and lingering in the flowery conservatory between dances.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
FEB 2 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
FEB 4 1970
New England News

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 9 1970
New Engl News

The biggest ball to be held during the month of April will no doubt be the 90th Anniversary Ball of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld as committee heads, the event threatens to outdo the fabulous Golden Trumpet ball held in the same august surroundings of Symphony Hall in 1965. David Rockefeller Jr. and Richard F. Treadway are in charge of the men's committee, and with Coolidges, Devens, Hunnewells, Perkings, Parsons. Bradleys and Hardings on the committee this is one that will be the ultimiate in Proper Bostonians. The date is April 27.

* * *

The Vincent Show opens in April — on the seventh day at New England Life Hall. The Metropolitan Opera comes to the newly named Hynes Civic Auditorium, opening April 20. Boston's own Opera Company has an opening on the third at the Rockwell Cage at MIT — the production is "The Good Soldier Schweik." Parties will surround all these openings.

There will be a benefit of "Hair" at the Wilbur Theater on April Fool's Day — April 1. This will be for the Massachusetts Association of Mental Health, and the committee is headed by Joe Edinburg of Chestnut Hill. There will be a Stage Door Lecture and Box Luncheon at Symphony Hall on the 17th, and a wind up of the symphony season with a Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall on the 24th. There will be a University Hospital Auction during the month, and the big preview party for the week-long Women's City Club Antiques Show at 39-40 Beacon Street on the 13th.

And so it goes, a never ending social whirl. Anyone planning to be a part of the April social marathon would be wise to take a vacation and rest up as much as possible before entering the fashionable fray..

Concert, parties will be long remembered

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

If you weren't at Symphony Hall yesterday, standing to applaud the fantastic concert by Artur Rubinstein, then you missed the most memorable weekend of any year.

It began with sundry events at the Museum of Fine Arts Centennial, then moved to the Aquarium with 600 of the Navy League — what a turnout! — and on to the pace-setting party, the Valentine Ball (with Skitch Henderson) which Jean and Jim Godino made an all-time honey of a party. Everyone was making dates with Skitch for his newest housewarming in the Virgin Islands.

The long handsome night didn't mean that Jean and Jim weren't right on hand Sunday to welcome the divine Artur, together with most of their No. 1 table guests from Friday night like Dr. and Mrs. Melvine Field — who also managed to get to the Boston Ballet bow - the - knee for beautiful Margot Fonteyn. If the ballerina and pianist Rubinstein ever did a program, nobody would go home, ever.

The Youth Concert benefit brought out five - year - olds and the last of the Dowagers, the Washington circuit's notables like John Nicholas Brown, and the Boston Symphony's greats, like gorgeous Mme. Serge Koussevitsky, whose fantastic drawings of Artur lined the sponsor - party - room along with Gunther Schulz' tender pussywillows and exquisite yellow dogwood. It was a never-to - be - forgotten few hours.

Brahms, Chopin, DeFalla, and Schumann, plus Debussy, Chopin and Moussorsky encores of incredible brilliance, brought the wildly applauding audience to its feet again and again and again. The silver-crested, soldier-backed pianist, who makes you think of his longtime friend, Boston's greatest BSO conductor Serge Koussevitzky because of that rare combination of austerity and love, had time for frail Fragonard-like Olga Koussevitzky, and for a turn with another old friend, the BSO's author of the year, Harry Ellis Dickson, whose "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please," was Koussy's favorite plea to the Symphony.

Harry, who founded those wonderful, wonderful Youth Concerts, shared a decade of memories with Mrs. Albert Titcomb, Ellen Stillman, Mrs. Manuel Kurland, and other stalwart pioneers of these concerts for the young, a program Rubinstein thinks is "the tops." "If," he adds with a wry look at the schedule you wouldn't believe, "you have the time."

Over from the Museum and a painstaking reassemble of the lovely tulips, anemones, freesia and forced pear blossom that make a background for Boston's most personalized treasure offerings in three generations, Mrs. Wallace McMeel and Mrs. Curt Gowdy still managed to get to the Symphony on time for the beautiful Brahms beginning, Dr. McMeel and their guest, Augusta Hornblower, sharing stage seats along with more thn a hundred other fans.

The fantastic audience, which stood and pounded its palms and its feet for nearly half an hour after the long generous concert, and was rewarded by encore after encore, was full of amiliar faces. The Robert Saltonstalls; Ingrid Anderson just back from the wedding of her college roommate Jo Fields (daughter of the late Mrshall) to John Porovona at the Virginia house of her mother, Mrs. John Bross' McLean; Mrs. Arnold Jenkins; Mrs. Alfred Willmann and her lovely Lynnie; Mrs. Charles Clute; Dr. Leo Alexander; the John Constavles; the Julian Rogers; Mexican Consul Jaime Pena-Vera and his charmer of a wife, and scores more.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
FEB 16 1970

Spring seemed "right around the corner" at Friday's delightful pre-Symphony Luncheon in Horticultural Hall, with blossoming pink geraniums on the tables and varying sized red hearts marking the places. The third luncheon in the Council of Friends of BSO popular series, chaired by Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., was under the auspices of the Boston, Brookline, Chestnut Hill and Lincoln area members, who did the artistic decor.

Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, who had entertained the Beacon Hill Garden Club at her Beacon street home on Thursday (and brought camellias from her small Duxbury greenhouse for that gathering) was one of Friday's hostesses.

Among others were Mrs. James H. Currens, Mrs. George Draper, Mrs. Walter Watson II, Mrs. A. Turner Wells, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. James Welch, Jr., Mrs. Hollis Plimpton, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. William Boardman, Mrs. Stephen H. Harris, Mrs. Edwin Cole, Mrs. Albert England Jr., Mrs. Stanley Hech and Mrs. Henry Warner.

The loyal support of the Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra has played a major role in maintaining its standard of excellence and prominent position among the orchestras of the world. The final luncheon in the 1969-70 series is scheduled for April 24. On Friday, April 17, the 4th Stage Door Lecture, sponsored by The Friends, will take place at Symphony Hall.

STELLAR STARS Joan Kennedy, left, and premiere ballerina Margot Fonteyn at a Boston Ballet for sponsors only at Townhouse. A new monitoring center for Newton-Wellesley Hospital thanks to the Valentine Ball, whose chairman was Mrs. James Goino, left. (Don Preston photos)

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

BSO Saturday Evening Friends To Hold a Stage Door Buffet

ANOTHER FIRST in the lively history of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., will be chalked up Saturday evening, March 7, when Saturday Evening Friends gather at the Stage Door Buffet before the concert. Responsible for arranging the buffet are the Brookline-Chestnut-Newton Areas, headed by Mrs. Allen P. Joslin and Mrs. Walter Cahners.

Mrs. Roger Voisin, Mrs. Herbert Harwood and Mrs. William Boardman are planning the colorful tablecloths, posters and flowers. Mrs. Samuel Proger and Mrs. James O. Welch Jr. have charge of the door list, and Mrs. Cahners, Mrs. Herbert Hoffman and Mrs. Bela Kalman will arrange for cocktails and the dinner menu.

Hostesses will be Mrs. Edward Caredis, Mrs. Hugh Tomb and Mrs. Joslin. Other members of the committee are Mrs. Julius Grossman, Mrs. Robert T. Hamlin Jr., Mrs. Donald Harding, Mrs. Stephen F. Harris, Mrs. Robert H. Hopkins, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Hollis Plimpton Jr. and Mrs. Henry K. White.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are looking forward to the third Pre-Symphony Luncheon, Friday, Feb. 13, at 12:15, at Horticultural Hall, sponsored by the Council of Friends. The luncheon chairmen, Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, will have on their committee members of the Council of Friends from the Boston, Brookline, Chestnut Hill and Lincoln Areas.

These luncheons continue to be sold out due to the enthusiastic response in supporting the orchestra. Subscribers who wish to release tickets for resale or who would like to bring a guest, should call Mrs. Kay Whitty, executive secretary, at the Friends' office in Symphony Hall.

* * *

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
FEB 9 1970
New Engl

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 16 1970
New Engl New

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 14 1970
New Engl

The April ball of the year will be the Anniversary Ball at Symphony Hall to celebrate the 90th year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday evening, April 27. This promises to surpass even the Golden Trumpet Ball held there in 1965.

Valentine Motif at Symphony Luncheon

VALENTINE RED HEARTS decorated Horticultural Hall yesterday and there were pots of pink geraniums on the tables for the Pre-Symphony luncheon. This was the third in this season's series of four, and was under the auspices of the Boston, Brookline, Chestnut Hill and Lincoln areas.

The decorating committee and hostesses included Mrs. Walter Watson 2d, Mrs. George Draper, Mrs. James H. Currens, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. James Welch Jr., Mrs. Hollis Plimpton, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. William Boardman, Mrs. Stephen F. Harris, Mrs. Edwin Cole, Mrs. Albert England Jr., Mrs. Stanley Hech, Mrs. Henry Warner, Mrs. A. Turner Wells, who wore a diamond heart pin with her brown dress, and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, who has camellias growing in her Duxbury greenhouse.

Although fur coats and knee-high boots were the rule, Mrs. Richard Ely wore a tiny hat of pink flowers with her mink coat. Mrs. Albert Goodhue wore Valentine red. She and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Nelson Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson are co-chairmen of the luncheons.

Among the many at the luncheon were Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. James Perkins, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. William Manice, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk, Mrs. Charles Barnes, Mrs. S. Abbot Smith, Mrs. Frederick Stare, Mrs. W. Emerson Barrett, Mrs. Franklin Hoyt, Mrs. John Knowles, Mrs. John Hill, Mrs. Weston Adams, Mrs. James M. Baty, Mrs. Edward L. Francis, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. John Cornish, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Charles F. Eaton Jr., Mrs. Victor Jones, Mrs. Howard Davis and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair.

Mounted police escorted the luncheon guests across the street to Symphony Hall, where they heard Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra and music director designate of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden, conduct Mozart's piano concerto, "Coronation," the overture to "Idomeneo," and Elgar's First Symphony.

* * *

176.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

FEB 19 1970

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

As details become available, it is apparent that the 90th Anniversary Ball of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the ball of the 70's, just as its predecessor, the Golden Trumpet Ball, was the top social event of the last decade.

Everything about this event which is being planned and organized by the ladies of the Council of Friends of the orchestra, will be as near perfect as they can make it. From the champagne — Moet et Chandon, no less — to the prizes raffled, from the food served to the decorations planned for Symphony Hall, all will be the ultimate in good taste.

On Tuesday afternoon the chairman and members of the committee entertained two of France's most distinguished citizens, M. Maurice Carrere, and M. Louis Vaudable, the gentlemen who will bring the world famous Maxim's of Paris to Boston's Symphony Hall on April 27. Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, cochairman of the ball, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John Grandin, cochairmen of the Council of Friends, and members of the ball committee Mrs. Lewis Clark of Cambridge and Mrs. Karl Riemer of Westwood were the hostesses.

Over glasses of the Moet et Chandon champagne that will be flowing on the big night, tall, silver-haired M. Vaudable, whose family has owned Maxim's since 1932, explained how his chefs, complete with their own cooking pots, will be flown from Paris to Boston for the event. Some foods for the dinner, such as truffles, they will bring with them. But other items like bib lettuce and celery are much better here, he said. So they plan to combine the best foods of both countries in the gourmet dinner.

His friend and colleague, M. Carrere, shorter and with an expressive personality, told the committee that he will donate his lovely chateau in the Basque section of France, the Chateau de Larraldia, for a weekend for two as one of the ball prizes. Dinner at the Paris Maxim's is another prize offered.

This is not the first United States ball for which these gentlemen have donated their services. Known throughout Europe for the superlative manner in which they run parties, they came to Washington to assist with a ball at the French embassy in 1965 when M. Henri Alphand and his decorative wife were their country's representatives here. This was a Maxim's "under a tent" which almost turned to disaster when a storm blew half the tenting away just as they had everything set up and ready.

The whole of Symphony Hall will be transformed into a second Maxim's for the evening. In addition to actual panels and decorations to be flown over from Paris, special effects are being created to change the hall into a replica of a ballroom of the Belle Epoque. Arthur Fieldler and the Boston Pops Orchestra and Ruby Newman and his orchestra will play for dancing.

To the original five raffle prizes are being added more exotic offerings each week. In addition to the trips to Paris, Rome and the Costa Smeralda, the chalet for two weeks in New Hampshire, the portrait to be painted by William Draper and the new Porsche 40, comes M. Carrere's offer of his chateau, the dinner at Maxim's and cases of French vintage wines given by an anonymous friend. Anyone who knows his wines, though, will recognize the famous donor upon reading the name of the vineyards on the labels.

This benefit evening does not come cheaply, but then perfection seldom does. The tab is $300 a couple and the raffle tickets are $10 each. These are available to everyone and may be obtained from any of the area chairmen of the Council of Friends, or from the Friends office at Symphony Hall. The souvenir program of the ball, which will contain a pictorial history of the orchestra, will have single sponsor pages to be sold for $1,000 each. The financial goal of the evening is $150,000, and knowing the members of the Council of Friends, their hard work, their high standards, and their powers of persuasion, it's a sure bet they will make it.

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Dinner by Maxim's of Paris To Raise $150,000 for BSO

047

THE APPEAL OF FOOD is so great that food will be the means of raising $150,000 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Maxim's of Paris is sending two chefs and two assistants to prepare a magnificent gourmet dinner in Symphony Hall with the help of a local caterer. The occasion is the 90th Anniversary Ball being held April 27 to help the Friends of the Orchestra meet their annual goal of $440,000.

Yesterday afternoon, Louis Vaudable of Maxim's and Maurice Carrere, who will create a replica of Maxim's in Symphony Hall, met with some of the committee in the Cabot-Cahners Room at Symphony Hall. While sipping champagne, the ladies groaned with delight at the prospect of the wonderful feast. (The food columns will give more details later.)

Some of the food will be flown from Paris by Pan American World Airways and some will be prepared right in Symphony Hall. And, of course, vintage French wines will be served. After working as a cook in France and the United States, Louis Vaudable entered the wine business before opening Maxim's in 1964.

Symphony Hall will be transformed into a huge ballroom and the foyer will be done in the style of Maxim's of Paris. The evening is planned for 600—$300 per couple and $500 for sponsors

Listening to M. Vaudable and M. Carrere were Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, co-chairman of the ball with Mrs. Lewis Cabot, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark and Mrs. Karl Reimer.

And do you know there's a Maxim's in Chicago and Tokyo and that you can buy Maxim's frozen foods?

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 18 1970

Lecture by Ralph Pottle For Friends of Symphony

By LINDA MANN

047

Like mailmen, neither rain, nor snow, nor sleet deter the faithful Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Umbrellas, boots, rainhats and coats were the foul-weather gear of the ladies yesterday morning as they attended the third Stage Door Lecture of this season.

Once inside and past the trunks and instrument carrying cases of the orchestra in the basement of Symphony Hall, the outlook was surprisingly bright and cheerful.

Pink tablecloths covered the tables for four, a pink backdrop curtain with a mural of shells and instruments in pastel colors hid the "view," and the brick columns were decorated with yellow, blue, green and pink paper flowers with green crepe paper stems. Mrs. Roger Voisin, who created the flowers, also designed a gilt tree, hung with orange and gold leaves, on the hostess table.

To add even more color, the box lunches served after the lecture were decorated with lime, turquoise, orange and fuchsia feathers, which some of the ladies pinned on their suits and dresses to "add that touch of spring" as one noted gaily.

Yesterday's lecture was under the auspices of the Wellesley, Belmont, Dedham, Dover and Newton areas. Greeting the Friends, and identifiable by their pink or avocado smocks were Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Stephen B. Wellington, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine and Mrs. Richard R. Higgins.

Also, Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen Jr., Mrs. Marshall K. Bartlett, Mrs. Robert G. Millar, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Herbert C. Lee, Mrs. John Cancian, Mrs. August R. Meyer and Mrs. Robinson Murray Jr.

Mrs. David Bird, co-chairman with Mrs. George E. Bates of the lecture series, introduced Ralph Pottle, who plays the French horn with the orchestra. His amusing anecdotes about his childhood and his three loves—the French horn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his wife, Connie—delighted the audience. He demonstrated the evolution of the horns, from conch shell, mammal horn, hand horn to valve horn. It wasn't until the 17th century that horns were used in music.

He accompanied his wife in two duets by Shubert for hand horn and voice and later, Dorothy MacMurray joined them at the piano and Mrs. Pottle sang and he played today's version of the French horn in a piece by Brahms, as the audience sat entranced.

Among the many who enjoyed the lecture and the box luncheon of sandwiches, deviled eggs, chips and cookies and found it "so much more convenient to attend the Symphony" were Mrs. Sherman R. Thayer, in a bright coral suit, Mrs. Stephen Mugar, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr. and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock.

Dressed in a bright plaid suit with a matching bow in her hair was Mrs. Albert Goodhue, who had just returned from New York. Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., her co-chairman of the Council of Friends, also was in the audience.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 14 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,067 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,577

FEB 18 1970

GLOBE MAN'S DAILY STORY

Conductor Charles Munch spent so lavishly on his art collection that he fell into the habit of justifying each extravagant purchase.

Once, after the Boston Symphony had played a brilliant concert, he treated himself to an oil painting and told a friend:

"It's a reward for work well done."

Some weeks later, the orchestra gave a lackluster performance. The following day, Much spent a small fortune on another painting.

"And why are you buying this?" his friend wanted to know.

"I need consolation."

Silverstein debuts as conductor

Globe 2/18/70

The Boston Symphony's concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will make his conducting debut at tonight's Sanders Theater concert by the Cantata Singers. Silverstein will also be soloist in the Haydn Violin Concerto in C major. The 8:30 program wil include Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass and Byrd's Mass for Four Voices.

A member of the B.S.O. since 1955, when he was 23 years old and the youngst player at the tiame, Silverstein was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of the Belgians competition, and the follwing year won the Naumberg Foundation award. Violinist with the B.S.O. String Trio, he was one of the organizers of the Boston Symphony Chaber Players, is on the faculty of the New England Conservatory and is faculty chairman of the B.S.O.'s Berkshire Music Center.

Silverstein Debut

The Cantata Singers' Winter concert will be the occasion of Joseph Silverstein's Boston debut as a conductor. Mr. Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a performance including the Lord Nelson Mass and C-Major Violin Concerto of Haydn and Byrd's Mass for Four Voices, tonight at 8:30 in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. Mr. Silverstein will be the soloist in the concerto. Patriot Ledger 2-18

Maxim's is coming to Boston

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

The ambiance was eloquent and elegant, yet it's hard to think of a more austere, historic corner of Boston that the Cahners-Cabot Room at Symphony Hall, named for the two women who sparked the BSO's Women's Council.

Seldom is champagne popped in Symphony Hall before 8:30 on a Pops evening, but the sun streamed in on handsome silver coolers and a famous French vineyard's best vintage yesterday because of the visit here of two men who stand for international oases wherever they go.

The multi-dimensioned lives of Maurice Bertrand Carrere and Louis Vaudable, two of the most suave, greying aristocrats of the Escoffier tradition in all of Europe today, cross at many levels, but Maxim's, that Paris top-all of two generations, is probably its highest common denominator.

Both these legends-in-their-own-time will be at Symphony Hall April 27. They've also been invited to Tanglewood, Summer home of the BSO, for a glorious private ball on June 27.

The 90th annoversary ball for the Boston Symphony could very well never be equalled. Certainly an afternoon like yesterday is a moon-rocket plus Telstar when you think of the Boston committee scene.

"Maxim's will be nude," declared M. Vaudable when asked what will be flown over from the famous Paris bailiwick for the Boston ball in April.

Chefs, their favorite pans, and a host of Paris-onlys will be jetted to Boston for this night in history, slated to raise better than $150,000 for the Symphony. Only 600 people can be part of this once-in-a-lifetime night.

The two shrewd, amiable honor guests, whose vested interests staddle the world at this point, spare nothing, least of all themselves, in their peripatetic existence. They're here today and in Monaco tomorrow, and they leave a delightful nostalgia like a vapor trail from their jets that span the continents. Basque-born M. Carrere added a fabulous prize to the benefit ball list yesterday with his offer of a week-end at his fabled Chateau de Larraldia, six miles from Biarrtz.

Maxim's has been in Louis Vaudable's family for more than 30 years and with many longtime client in mind he has generously contributed Maxim's services for Symphony's 90th.

Sharing yesterday's delight were Boston's Louise Riemer, Elaine Rosenfeld, Betsy Goodhue, Barbara Clark and Susanne Grandin and the BSO's David Rockefeller, Marvin Schofer and David Levinson.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,067 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,577

FEB 18 1970

Rose Walsh – Maxim's Aids Ball

Tall, slim, distinguished M. Louis Vaudable, head of Maxim's in Paris, and attractive, affable M. Maurice Bertrand Carrere, a member of its board of directors, who are contributing Maxim's services for the elaborate 90th Anniversary Boston Symphony Ball, April 27th, flew here yesterday for a meeting with the members of the Ball committee (Council of Friends of the BSO).

The Maxim VIP's reminisced about the last elegant American party they prepared which was at the French Embassy in Washington for the retiring Ambassador Herve Alphand and Mme. Alphand. It was June of '65 and the day before the important event everyone connected with its was in a tizzy whether the weather would permit outside (as it had been planned) or inside festivity. A perfect day dawned and the Alphands were ecstatic.

M. Carrere will recreate the ambience of Maxim's in the foyer of Symphony Hall for the brilliant ball, at which 700 beautifully dressed guests will cocktail, dine, wine and dance for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

M. Vaudable, who will come to Boston a week ahead to do his "shopping" for fresh lobster, lettuce and other gourmet items for the dinner, is in charge of its preparation. Some of the food will be flown from France, as will two of the chefs, and some will be prepared here.

Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome M. Rosenfeld are co-chairmen of the glamorous evening. Arthur Fiedler will conduct his Boston Pops orchestra for dancing and Ruby Newman will alternate with his celebrated musicians.

Discussing details with the Maxim celebrities at the Tuesday session were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Rosenfield, Mrs. Karl Riemer, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. John L. Grandin, David Rockefeller, Jr., and Symphony public relations staff members, Marvin Schofer and David Levinson.

Introduced by Boston philanthropist Eli Goldston as "an outsider giving an inside view of Boston," Bernard Taper, author of "The Arts in Boston, (scheduled for publication this spring), a panelist at the dinner meeting of the Radcliffe Club of Boston and their guests, revealed the results of his research here. He stated that the "Hub of the Universe" and "Athens of America" contributes less to the Arts than any other city he has screened, and that with the exception of the Gardner Museum, they are all having tough financial sledding.

Panelists John Coolidge, former director of the Fogg Museum, and Elma Lewis, director of the Elma Lewis School for Fine Arts in Roxbury, presented interesting facts about the Boston situation.

Mrs. Bucknam McPeek, president of the Radcliffe Club, now celebrating its 50th anniversary, presided at the meeting atop the State Street Bank & Trust Co. Club members are busily working simultaneously on two scholarship programs — the Club's Boston Scholarship Fund and the 50th Anniversary Endowed Scholarship Fund. On the latter $10,000 has already been given to Radcliffe president, Dr. Mary Bunting, and the plans are to present an equal amount in June.

Dr. and Mrs. George A. Marks, the Eliot Forbes, and the Talbot Rantouls were among the honor guests.

Mrs. Wilbur J. Bender and Mrs. A. S. Morison headed the efficient committee which included Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman, Jr., Mrs. Donald J. Hurley, Mrs. Robert E. Levi, Mrs. Gerald F. Mahoney, Jr., Mrs. Clifton Helman (chairman of Radcliffe's Champagne Reception to be held in April at the new City Hall), Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, Mrs. Shepherd Brooks, Mrs. Fred L. Glimp and others.

Maestro Kurt Adler, conductor and chorus master at the Metropolitan Opera and Eastern Region Head of Judges for the Metropolitan Opera Regional Auditions, will judge the 10 finalists of the 12th annual New England Regional Auditions on Sunday afternoon in Jordan Hall. A cordial invitation is extended to the public to attend.

Dr. Richmond Holder of Chestnut Hill is N. E. Regional chairman and the Peter L. Runtons of Milton, directors of the 1969-70 Regional Auditions. Noted in the impressive list of patrons are the John M. Aldens, the John B. Bennetts, Mrs. George R. Brown, Mrs. Richard E. Carter, Mrs. John H. Carter, Miss Ethel Damon Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Brooks Potter, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, the John S. Drabiks, Dr. and Mrs. J. Wallace McMeel.

Also Cmdr. and Mrs. Kendall Preston, Mrs. H. S. Payson Rowe, the James M. Sampsons, the George C. Seybolts, Mrs. Frederick J. Stare, the George L. Stouts, Mrs. Sherman R. Thayer, Mrs. Richard H. Thompson, Mrs. Lauriston Ward, Jr., the Carl A. Weyerhausers, Dr. and Mrs. W. Lawrence Wilde, and the Keith C. Steeles.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are silhouetted against their music as they play for Boston Ballet at Symphony Hall. Musicians intently follow sheet music.

—Record American Photo, Mike Andersen

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

FEB 21 1970

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS
(M&E) 433,300

FEB 19 1970

Silverstein leads Cantata Singers in conducting debut...

By Michael Steinberg

Few concertmasters have become important conductors — Munch is the only name that comes to mind just now — but they all seem to lust after the baton. The Boston Symphony's Joseph Silverstein is no exception. He has done some conducting with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at Tanglewood in recent years, and Wednesday evening he made his Boston conducting debut with the Cantata Singers at Sanders Theater in an ambitious, earnest, and generally lifeless concert. The beautifully chosen program was William Byrd's Mass for Four Voices and two works by Haydn, the C major Violin Concerto and the Lord Nelson Mass.

Except in the Violin Concerto, where the lurching rhythms made the performance sound downright amateurish, everything was clean, transparent, and carefully prepared. What was lacking was animation. Every phrase, every paragraph, every movement of the gorgeous Byrd Mass sounded like every other, with little variation in volume or in intensity produced by any other means and with everything plodding along all at the same tempo. In so far as the Lord Nelson Mass went better — and it was not so very far — it was mainly because the piece has got so much more variety composed into it.

The solo quartet for the Haydn Mass had a very good bass and alto (David Evitts and Pamela Gore), but a somewhat waily tenor and a soprano without the easy brilliance and purity of voice for which that virtuosic part calls. The Cantata Singers Chorus sang with good pitch, clear diction, and agreeable sound. The orchestral playing was enlivened by Robert Levin's work at harpsichord and organ (though the harpsichord itself is a good candidate for burning at Harvard's next auto-da-fe), and the trumpet and kettledrum playing was beautifully refined. As one member of the audience remarked, now that they have the two masses all worked up someone should perform them.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
FEB 19 1970 New Engla

Silverstein debuts as conductor

The Boston Symphony's concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will make his conducting debut at tonight's Sanders Theater concert by the Cantata Singers. Silverstein will also be soloist in the Haydn Violin Concerto in C major. The 8:30 program will include Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass and Byrd's Mass for Four Voices.

A member of the B.S.O. since 1955, when he was 23 years old and the youngest player at the time, Silverstein was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of the Belgians competition and the following year won the Naumberg Foundation award.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
FEB 19 1970 New Engla

AKRON BEACON JOURNAL
AKRON, OHIO
D. 175,468 SUN. 203,118
FEB 8 1970

Storm Over Critics In Boston

By THEODORE PRICE
Beacon Journal Music Critic

Out of the recent melange of critical pot-shots and counter-pot-shots comes an unmistakable conclusion: Boston Tea Parties no longer serve petits fours and Lapsang Souchong.

Now the menu is hot blood and the head of a young but competent critic on a platter, all served up by his former employer, The Boston Herald Traveler.

George Gelles, a Princeton University honor graduate, became music critic for the Herald Traveler last September. During the Summer of 1966, he had served as an apprentice to Boston Globe music critic Michael Steinberg, one of the two or three most highly-qualified American music critics. Winters, Gelles pursued post-graduate work in music at nearby Brandeis University.

IN EARLY November both Steinberg and Gelles wrote a series of unfavorable reviews on the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Student did not parrot teacher.

But it was clear both critics found sufficient reasons, both objective and subjective, to pan what they had heard and evaluated.

While Steinberg, who won a national prize in music criticism last year, is still ensconced at the Globe, Gelles was suspended at the Herald Traveler.

MICHAEL STEINBERG and GEORGE GELLES

The reasons why Gelles was forced to step down by the management of his own paper reflect on the pragmatic and unwitting willingness of many newspaper managements to submit to the power of the musical establishment even when it has been criticized on highly professional grounds.

IN EARLY November, after conductor Carlo Maria Guilini interpreted Brahms Fourth Symphony in front of the Boston Symphony, Steinberg wrote in the Globe:

"If Danny Kaye or Victor Borge were to conduct a performance of the Brahms Fourth just like the one Carlo Maria Guilini conducted Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, one so raging and overwrought, one with its upbeats so stretched, with such crazed dislocation of tempo and accompanied by a similar visual production with such prodigality in expressions of tragic suffering and deep kneebends, the audience would have been in stitches.

"In the solemn context of a Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concert," Steinberg continued, "the audience instead took it seriously . . . The performance, instead of being the first ever fully to explore the comic possibilities of the Brahms Fourth, proceeded from nothing more uncommon than opportunism and meretricious vulgarity."

AFTER A CHILDREN'S concert the next day, symphony musicians penned a statement to the orchestra management, a capsule version of which went in telegram form to the editor of the Globe. The telegram read:

"In view of the unwarranted, cruel and hostile attack on our illustrious guest conductor Mr. Guilini, and the continued slurs on the members of the orchestra, we have asked the Boston Symphony Management not to welcome Mr. Michael Steinberg to our concerts until he has publicly apologized for his insulting and unethical assaults, which have gone far beyond the scope of musical criticism."

ARTISTS, ESPECIALLY those handle-with-care temperaments who sit in the ranks of the American "Big Five" orchestras (Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia), are an understandably touchy group of personae in the "cultural" drama.

However, critics such as Steinberg know what they are doing when they swear allegiance FIRST to music, to its perpetuation in some reasonable form unfettered by hero-worship and personality cult.

Responsible editors, and publishers as well, know what they are doing when they encourage equally responsible criticism and when they close ranks against the whirlpool of hysterical rage that surges around reasoned critical commentary — "bad" as well as "good" criticism — by trained writers.

SO THE GLOBE DID NOT dismiss Steinberg. The paper merely published the telegram admonishing BSO management "not to welcome" Steinberg at its subsequent concerts, with excerpts of letters from orchestra officials, trustees to the Globe and to the Herald Traveler.

Steinberg is still reviewing BSO.

"I never stopped reviewing BSO," Steinberg said last week, "except once when I had a cold. And no situation ever developed at the Globe."

Gelles' "situation" over at the Herald Traveler was of another stripe. Since September, publisher Harold E. Clancy had been examining the new music critic's review.

IN A NEW YORK TIMES interview, Clancy said, "He indulged too frequently in personalities instead of music. But someday he should be a good critic."

It takes about 10 to 15 years to become a "good critic." Even publishers know that. But apparently Clancy was pressured by other knowledge as well.

One of the two letters he received from orchestra trustees after Gelles wrote a negative review (accusing Sejei Osawa of an "inaccurate and indifferent" performance) was written by Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Boston's Trinity Episcopal Church.

Dr. Ferris, contradicting the credibility most people endow upon men of the cloth, did not identify himself as a BSO trustee in the letter.

GELLES WAS REMOVED from the HT music desk, but not from the payroll. He made a brief trip to Germany to do a magazine story. Beginning Monday he will be dance critic and assistant music critic at the Washington Evening Star.

During the controversy, Gelles wrote, "If the critic is to be of any use to a community whatsoever, he has to be more than a mirror and mouthpiece of popular taste. What is the value of criticism if the critic is as easily satisfied as the average member of the audience?"

Should the critic mirror the masses, or reflect his own respect for principled performances of musical art itself?

Should the critic honor an orchestra just because it is the oldest musical institution in town, or should he pounce upon the sham that often masquerades in front of it as artistic integrity?

SHOULD HE COPY THE PUFFY press release extolling a musical organization for the length of its service to a community, or should he evaluate such service on a concert-to-concert basis?

Should he "integrate" himself into the Musical Establishment, or should he speak fearlessly as a well-informed outsider?

George Gelles answered No, then Yes to each of these double-barreled questions.

I DON'T KNOW the man personally. I regret his suspension at the Herald Traveler. I wish there were more like him in the ranks. The crust that surrounds music criticism is sometimes as thick as the conservative image the BSO holds of itself.

Perhaps Boston's loss of Gelles will be Washington's gain. But only "perhaps."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 25 1970 New Engla

* * * 041

Program Book a Collector's Item

A COLLECTOR'S ITEM will be the handsome program book nearing completion for the Symphony Orchestra's 90th Anniversary Ball. It will be designed in the Art Nouveau style of the ball, itself, which is inspired by Paris's world-famous restaurant, Maxim's, which will provide the food.

The program will feature pictures drawn mainly from the 90 years of Boston Symphony archives, showing the orchestra and its players and conductors in characteristic colorful, historic and often amusing moments through the years.

Other artists, Paderewski, and Isadora Duncan and her Duncan Dancers, among them, will be shown as they appeared in Symphony Hall. This will be the first time many of these pictures have been seen and the first time many of them have been published. The program will be distributed to everyone attending the ball, Monday evening, April 27, as a souvenir.

Co-chairmen of the ball are Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld. Mrs. Howard Davis and Mrs. Erick Kauders head the advertising committee. Their team captains include Mrs. H. Starr Ballou, Mrs. Robert H. Cain, Mrs. George P. Gardner Jr., Mrs. Stephen Harris and Mrs. Charles F. Hovey.

The men's committee is headed by David Rockefeller Jr. and Richard F. Treadway, with Richard S. Shreve and Robert Fitzgerald as vice-chairmen. They have been contributing much of their time in obtaining sponsors who help the orchestra by underwriting the program's $1,000 pages.

Their committee includes Richard Berenson, Henry B. Cabot Jr., Louis W. Cabot, Thomas D. Cabot, Stanford Calderwood, Robert B. Cheyne, Frederic C. Church, Byron K. Elliott, Alexander Ellis Jr., Patrick Fitzpatrick, Hugh K. Foster, Thomas J. Galligan, John T. Galvin, John L. Grandin Jr., Everett P. Grossman, Edward B. Hanify and Donald J. Hurley.

Also, Maurice Lazarus, Caleb Loring Jr., Charles S. Narins, David E. Place, Bergen B. Rapalyea, Harry Remis, Jerome Rosenfeld, Frank Sawyer, Dr. Donald B. Sinclair, Cameron S. Thompson, Richard Thorndike, Franklin Wyman Jr. and Samuel H. Wolcott.

* * *

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Many of the leading charity balls have a program that lists the chairmen and the members of the committee, gives a resume of the charity involved and contains as many pages of advertisements as possible in order to swell the amount given to the organization. To date two of the most outstanding examples of this have been the souvenir programs of the Constitution Ball for the benefit of the Navy Relief Society, and the beautifully illustrated books that are a feature of the Speech and Hearing Balls.

However, as in every other phase of this particular party, the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 90th Anniversary Ball promises to outdo all others. With pages selling to the sponsors for $1,000 each the committee claims that the entire book will become a collector's item in time.

Mrs. Ducey Ryerson is in charge of the program and Mrs. Howard Davis of Concord and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead are the cochairmen of the advertising. Assisting Mrs. Ryerson are Mrs. Samuel S. Drury of Chestnut Hill and Mrs. Robert M. Jenney and Mrs. Franklin Wyman Jr. of Brookline. The hardworking team captains assisting Mrs. Davis and Mrs. Kauders are Mrs. H. Starr Ballou of Wellesley, Mrs. Robert H. Cain, Mrs. George Peabody Gardner Jr. and Mrs. Stephen Harris of Brookline and Mrs. Charles P. Hovey of Chestnut Hill.

The program will be in the art nouveau style in keeping with the decor of the April 27 ball at Symphony Hall. It will feature pictures from the 90 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's history with special emphasis on the conductors and players.

The world famous Maxim's of Paris is providing the gourmet food and the decorations for the event, and conferring with Maxim's M. Louis Vaudable and M. Maurice Carrere at this moment at Maxim's in Paris is the attractive Australian-born cochairman of the ball, Mrs. Lewis Cabot of Beacon Hill. She flew there to arrange final details in the intricate organization of a ball of this magnitude.

This is far from being an exclusively female-arranged event. There is an active men's committee under the direction of th young and very "with-it" David Rockefeller Jr. and Richard Treadway, who are working hard lining up sponsors of the ball whose names will be listed in the program. The vice-chairmen are Robert Fitzgerald and Richard S. Shreve of Milton, and among those on the committee are Richard A. Berenson, Henry B. Cabot Jr. of Beacon Hill, Louis W. Cabot of Wenham, Thomas D. Cabot of Weston, Stanford Calderwood of Belmont, Robert B. Cheyne, Frederic C. Church of Beverly Farms, Byron K. Elliott of Needham, Alexander Ellis Jr. of Concord, Patrick Fitzpatrick, Hugh K. Foster of Needham, Thomas J. Galligan Jr., John T. Galvin, John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill, Everett P. Grossman of Newton, Edward B. Hanify of Belmont, Donald J. Hurley of Weston and Maurice Lazarus.

Also Caleb Loring Jr. of Prides Crossing, Charles S. Narins of Newton, David E. Place of Cohasset, Bergen B. Rapalyea, Harry Remis, Jerome Rosenfeld of Chestnut Hill, Frank Sawyer, Dr. Donald B. Sinclair, Cameron S. Thompson of Wellesley, Richard Thorndike of Beverly Farms, Franklin Wyman Jr. of Brookline and Samuel H. Wolcott of Milton.

* * *

A new group that has only been formed during this academic year will be featured at the third and last concert of the series sponsored by the South Shore Branch of the New England Conservatory and the Hingham Historical Society. Called the Scholarship Woodwind Quartet of the New England Conservatory of Music the group is comprised of an oboe, clarinet and flute. They will perform "melodious music" as the invitation says, after which "mello wines" will be served.

The event will take place at the Old Derby Building, Lower Main Street, Hingham at 4 p.m. next Sunday afternoon. The cochairmen of the series of concerts are Mrs. E. S. Beveridge and Mrs. Paul Reardon. Tickets may be bought at the door.

"Firsts" seem to be the vogue for various organizations. The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill are cochairman, are also having a first time event on March 7 when Friends who attend the Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall will gather for a Stage Door Buffet before the event.

Cocktails will be served in an atmosphere gay with tablecloths, posters and fresh flowers. Arranging the event, which is sure to become another tradition surrounding Symphony before long, are the members of the Council of Friends from the Brookline-Chestnut Hill and Newton areas. Mrs. Allen P. Joslin and Mrs. Walter Cahners are the cochairmen of the evening. The members of their committee include Mrs. Roger Voisin, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. William Boardman, Mrs. Samuel Proger, Mrs. James O. Welch Jr., Mrs. Herbert Hoffman, Mrs. Bella Kalman, Mrs. Edward Caredis and Mrs. Hugh Tomb.

Others include Mrs. Julius Grossman, Mrs. Robert T. Hamlin Jr., Mrs. Donald Harding, Mrs. Stephen F. Harris, Mrs. Robert E. Hopinks, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Hollis Plimpton Jr. and Mrs. Henry K. White.

Go BSO

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

While Symphony Ball top-idea gal Judy (Mrs. Lewis) Cabot is in Paris today taking notes at Maxim's, her biggest helping hand, Elaine Rosenfeld (Mrs. Jerome) is whipping up ideas for the souvenir program along with Dick Treadway and David Rockefeller Jr. and Dick Shreve and any number of terriffic talent like Bergen Rapalyea, Caleb Loring Jr., Thomas Cabot and Henry Cabot Jr., Jerry Rosenfeld and on and on.

Treasured Symphony early-earlys like Isadora Duncan and Ignace Paderewski will smile from the pages of the thousand-dollar-a-page program for this 90th birthday ball extravaganza which will have the plans shuttling in from Europe on the hour every hour the day before the much-circled 27th of April.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
FEB 25 1970 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
FEB 25 1970

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
FEB 27 1970

778.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

There is a special ambiance surrounding the dinners given before the Civic Symphony Orchestra's performances. Unlike those affairs where hundreds attend, they are comparatively small and intimate. Composed of old friends who are genuinely interested in both the performances and the continuation of this orchestra which has been giving enjoyment both to Bostonians and to its own amateur players since its formation in 1925, the dinners are black tie and make an extremely pleasant way to start the evening.

The second of the three concerts in the 1969-70 series will be given next Sunday evening at 8.30 p.m. in Jordan Hall under the Civic Symphony Orchestra's new young conductor, Michel Sasson. A member of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Sasson has chosen two pieces of music by favorite composers that have not been played in Boston since the latter part of the last century. One is Mozart's Piano Concerto in C which will be played by the young Brazilian pianist, Maria Clodes, with the orchestra, and the other is Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 3, known as the Polish Symphony. Also on the program is Delius' "The Walk to the Paradise Garden."

Chairman of the dinner committee, Dr. Simon P. Devine, and the committee have arranged to hold the pre-concert dinner at Trader Vic's in the Statler Hilton Hotel. The menu will consist of the restaurant's traditionally exotic fare with some extra surprises. Polynesian flowers will decorate the tables. Buses will take the guests to Jordan Hall in time for the concert.

Among those attending will be the Irish consul in Boston, Sean Donlan and Mrs. Donlan, and the vice-consul, Miss Carmel O'Leary, all of whom will be the guests of honor. Also there will be the Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais, the David Skinners, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Bernat, Admiral William Ellis, commander of the First Coast Guard District, and Mrs. Ellis, William Pear, III, Mrs. John Donahue, Dr. and Mrs. Melvin Field, and the president of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston, Gerard Hayes.

* * *

Dinners of one kind or another held before the various concerts given in Boston are becoming more and more popular. The members of the Brookline-Chestnut Hill-Newton areas of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have arranged a pre-performance buffet for those Friends attending next Saturday's concert at Symphony Hall. Following their example the Cambridge Friends have planned a similar event for the Tuesday evening subscribers on March 10. Mrs. Edwin T. Green of Cambridge is chairman of this event, assisted by Mrs. Levin Campbell, Mrs. Henry Lyman and Mrs. John D. MacDonald.

On April 6 at Symphony Hall the patrons and guarantors of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be guests at a reception given in honor of Isaac Stern and Rudolf Serkin, the guest artists at the April Beethoven Festival of the orchestra. Following the reception and informal supper, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give an intimate concert on the stage of Symphony Hall where both players and guests will be seated either on or around the stage.

John W. Calkins is chairman of this special event and he is assisted by members of the Council of Friends of the orchestra. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Lyman of Canton and Mr. and Mrs. Donald F. Harding of Chestnut Hill. Also Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Thrasher, Mr. and Mrs. E. Lauriston Ward Jr. of Wellesley, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Rozelle Jr. and Mr. and Mrs. David A. Lownes.

The third Stage Door Lecture will be held at 11:30 March 13. The lecturers are members of the orchestra and their talks give the Friends an insight into what goes on behind the scenes. The brass section will be represented at this lecture by Ralph Pottle who will give the guests some amusing anecdotes about the members of this section. The lectures are followed by an la carte bar and box luncheon.

Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird are cochairmen of the series, and on March 13 will be assisted by the members of the Council of Friends from Wellesley, Belmont, Dedham, and Newton areas.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

MAR 3 1970

CIVIC SYMPHONY Pres. Gerard Hayes gets a Menehunes luck charm from Hawaiian Calena Chu, a student at Boston University, for next Sunday's Civic Symphony concert at Jordan Hall. Dinner at Trader Vic's at the Statler Hilton will honor the BSO's Michel Sasson, who will conduct the concert. (John Hurley Photo)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 4 1970 New

LIVING

A Maxim's party for the BSO

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

Best-kept secret in Boston right now is Princess Margaret's bid (at a London dinner party) for an invitation to Boston's Symphony Ball. If Queen Elizabeth's party-loving sister does put Apr. 27 on her jet schedule, what a practicing of "Hail Britannia" and the curtsey there'll be.

Second biggest scoop is what Maxim's of Paris will whip over from 3 rue Royale, to serve the gentry whose $300 dinner tab at Symphony Hall on Apr. 27 is about the same as for a like number of courses at this most golden of all ambiences.

It'll be chez Maxim's for the Symphony's 90th anniversary ball, and it's already a two-continent enterprise — the goal $150,000.

Suave proprietor M. Louis Vaudable and his colleague, M. Maurice Carrere, came on to inspect the hall — the Boston Brahmins' last bailiwick, a partridge-tasting preceding the champagne.

Between thoughtful tastes of the silver-coolered champagne (Maxim's cellar is even more celebrated than its Cappiello murals), Vaudable complimented Boston for its young lettuces, and its lobster, (could the fish course on Apr. 27 be that Escoffierean triumph of chef Humbert's, homard a la Bordelaise?)

If you know Maxim's well enough to prefer your table in the Imperiale rather than the "new" top floor or the "omnibus" end of the main dining room, then you can obviously guess at what may be jetting over on the 27th, along with the pans, the whisks and France's best "saucier." Brill at-Savarin always felt that anyone could learn to cook, but one had to be born a sauce-maker.

Even the magnificent BSO, for whom all this is going on, are placing small bets on the Maxim menu.

TRUFFLES AND PATE—Maxim's Roger and Helen Ayer share ideas on some of the specialities de la maison heading for the BSO Ball.

IT'S MAXIM'S IN PARIS—Beyond its famous facade at 3, Rue Royale, loom the pillars of the immortal Church of the Madeleine. Rendezvousing there are Bostonians Judy (Mrs. Lewis) Cabot and Helen (Mrs. Neil) Ayer.

Other Photos From United Press International, Paris

Boston Sunday Globe, March 8, 1970

IN THE HEART of Maxim's, Judy Cabot takes a look at some of the treasures that will be moved for the first time in history and jet across the Atlantic for Boston's Symphony Ball on Apr. 27.

Mrs. Talcott M. Banks, Wife Of Boston Symphony's Head

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Mar. 8—Mrs. Ann L. Smith Banks, a pianist and the wife of Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died of acncer at Massachusetts General Hospital yesterday. She was 62 years old and lived in Lincoln, Mass.

Mrs. Banks, a 1928 graduate of Vassar College, had played with the Boston Pops Orchestra. She was a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and had also been active in the work of the legal Defense and Education Fund of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. She was a member of the Cosmopolitan Club in New York.

Her husband, Dr. John P. Monks, died in 1956.

Besides Mr. Banks, to whom she was married in 1967, Mrs. Banks is survived by three daughters, Mrs. John N. Lukens Jr., Mrs. Thomas M. Kimball and Mrs. William H. Barry; a brother and seven grandchildren.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

MAR 9 1970

OBITUARIES

Mrs. Ann Banks, 62, wife of BSO president

LINCOLN — Services for Mrs. Ann S. M. (Smith) Banks, 62, of Bedford road will be at noon tomorrow at Kings Chapel, Boston.

Mrs. Banks, wife of Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died Saturday at Phillips House, Massachusetts General Hospital.

She was born in Louisville, Ky. and graduated with honors from Vassar in 1928. She was the widow of Dr. John Peabody Monks of Boston who died in 1956.

She married Mr. Banks in 1967. An accomplished pianist, she had played with the Boston Pops Orchestra and was chosen by Quincy Porter as a pianist for the first performance of his concerto for two pianos with the Louisville Symphony.

She was a member of the Chilton Club and the Cosmopolitan Club of of New York, a trustee of New England Conservatory of Music and was active in NAACP.

Besides her husband, she leaves a brother, Judge Macauley Smith of Louisville; three daughters, Mrs. John N. Lukens Jr. of Columbia, Mo.; Mrs. Thomas M. Kimball of Henniker, N.H., and Mrs. William H. Barry of Menlo Park, Calif., and seven grandchildren.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 9 1970 New

Boston Concertmaster In Recital Here Sunday

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of The Boston Symphony, will make his Philadelphia recital debut at 8 P. M. Sunday at the Settlement Music School, 416 Queen st. His program will include three Bach and two Mozart sonatas.

Silverstein's a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory, as well as chairman of the faculty of Berkshire Music Center. His recital is being presented by the Alumni and Friends of the Settlement Music School.

Reception for Festival Artists

AN INFORMAL SUPPER and reception in honor of Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern, guest artists for the Beethoven Festival, will take place at Symphony Hall, Monday, April 6, at 5:30. A concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Players will follow the dinner at 7 o'clock, at which the guests, as well as the players, will be seated in the round or on the stage of Symphony Hall.

The patrons, guarantors and benefactors of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will receive invitations to this unusual party from the Trustees and Council of Friends.

John Calkins, chairman of the special event, is assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Lyman and Mr. and Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Thrasher, Mr. and Mrs. E. Lauriston Ward Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Rozelle Jr. and Mr. and Mrs. David A. Lownes.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 2 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 2 1970 New England

Another symphony coup in April (in addition to THE Ball) will be a first-time supper party honoring Isaac Stern and Rudolf Serkin, star turns for the Beethoven Festival at Symphony. Guests, patrons, guarantors, and benefactors of the Friends of the BSO will sit with the players on the stage of Symphony, and there'll be a special concert after the 7 p.m. supper.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

MAR 5 1970

Trip to Paris, Villa Vacation Benefit BSO

LINCOLN - A concert in your own home by a quartet from the Boston Symphony, round-trip transportation for two people from Boston to Paris, a 1970 Prosche Audi sedan, a 14-day vacation for two including air transportation at the Aga Khan's villa on Sardinia, a portrait to be painted by artist William Draper, one week at a ski lodge in Sugar Hill, N.H. (nine people) - or, at the very least, for three lucky winners, three cases for each of Haut Brion wine (this is considered a consolation prize, coming at the tail end of this fabulous list)...all these impossible dreams are being raffled off by ladies in Lincoln who are trying to help the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Priscilla England and Lucy Cole are Lincoln Chairmen for the effort being made here by the Lincoln Committee of the Council of BSO Friends. If you run into them at the Post Office, they won't tell you a thing (something about not dealing with raffle tickets on Federal property even though it isn't really Federal property). However, it's all very proper over on the other side. Or somewhere. Prizes will be announced at the 90th Anniversary Grand Prix ball for the benefit of the BSO, April 27 (Maxim's is being flown to Boston for this, we understand) but you don't have to be there.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

MAR 8 1970 N

THE CONCERTMASTER'S CHAIR of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now endowed and will be known as the Charles Munch Concertmaster's Chair.

It has been made possible through a gift of $750,000 from Henry B. Cabot, president emeritus of the orchestra's trustees, Henry A. Laughlin and Edward A. Taft, also trustees.

The orchestra's principal flute chair has also been endowed with $100,000 by an anonymous donor. It will be called the Walter Piston Principal Flute, in honor of Boston's famed composer.

The late Charles Munch was Erich Leinsdorf's predecessor as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Present concertmaster of the orchestra is Joseph Silverstein.

It is fitting that the flute chair should honor Piston, whose most famous work remains "The Incredible Flutist," written in 1938 for performances by Hans Wiener's dancers at the pops concerts in Symphony Hall.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer is the orchestra's first flutist.

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS

MAR 6 1970

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JEWISH EXPONENT
W. 45,000

MAR 6 1970

Settlement School Concert To Feature Concertmaster

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will give a violin recital Sunday, 8 p.m., at the Settlement Music School, 416 Queen St. The concert, which marks Silverstein's recital debut here, is sponsored by the alumni and friends of the school. The program will include three Bach and two Mozart sonatas.

Silverstein is first violinist of the Boston Symphony, a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston String Trio. He is on the faculty of the New England Conservatory and chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAR 16 1970

Rose Walsh – His Life Is Music

Music is the life story of Boston Symphony Orchestra French-horn player, personable Ralph Pottle who was guest speaker at Friday's third Stage Door lecture, sponsored by the Council of Friends of B.S.O at Symphony Hall.

He frankly revealed the three loves in his life — music, Boston Symphony Orchestra and his talented and attractive wife, Constance, who has resumed her singing career and joined him in two duets (he playing the horn and she singing) at the close of the lecture.

The artist, who began his musical career at age 4 playing a fiddle ("I must have been terrible," he said) and at 5 was playing a solo trumpet on the Orpheum Circuit, was born into a musical family. He was among the first horn players to receive a Fulbright Scholarship and studied at the National Academy of Music in Vienna.

Mr. Pottle delighted his audience with anecdotes of his musical progress — at one time he was enamored with the trumpet, laughingly adding, "What a dumb instrument to play!" He tried the oboe ("awful") and now as a French-horn player he has performed in most parts of the world, not only with the symphony orchestra, but as a soloist and with chamber groups. During the lecture he demonstrated several horns from the conche to today's modern instrument.

Mrs. Roger Voisin (husband is noted B.S.O. musician) did the attractive spring flower decor for the lecture. The series, inaugurated this year by the council headed by Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., has been a huge success.

Wellesley, Belmont, Dedham, Dover and Newton members were hostesses for the Pottle lecture. In that group were Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Stephen B. Wellington, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. John Cancian, Mrs. Robinson Murray, Jr., Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Richard Higgins and others.

180.

FESTIVAL STRING QUARTET is newly formed by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drawn from the four corners of the world. Australia was the birthplace of first violinist Christopher Kimber (left). The other violinist, Miss Ikuko Mizuno, came from Japan for advanced study at Boston University. Israel was the original homeland of violist Yizhak Shotten (right). Cellist, Jerome Patterson is a Connecticut Yankee. On Sunday afternoon, March 22, at three p.m., in Jordan Hall, they will perform works of Kirchner, Beethoven and Schurmann. Guest artist in the Schumann Piano Quartet will be Victor Rosenbaum.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAR 19 1970

Boston Symphony Trumpeter

Armando Ghitalla Will Perform At GHS June 3

GORHAM — Although the next performance of the Gorham High School Band will take place in Northampton, Mass., this weekend, most music buffs can hardly wait until the June 3, annual Pops Concert at Gorham High School.

On that date, the GHS band will be performing with Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a June 3 concert ~~in Gorham.~~

Performs

Ghitalla will perform four numbers at the concert— Concerto for Trumpet in E Major by John Hummel; The Carnival of Venice by Del Staigers, The Lost Chord by Sir Arthur Sullivan and Bugler's Holiday by Leroy Anderson. Two members of the GHS band trumpet section will perform the last number with Ghitalla.

Ghitalla, a native of Knoxville. Ill., attended Illinois Weslayan University for one year and then transferred to the famous Julliard School of Music. There he received a Bachelor of Science Degree in trumpet. He has been a member of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, the New York City Orchestra and in 1951 was appointed third trumpet and assistant princpial trumpet in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1965, he became principal trumpet for that orchestra.

Also A Teacher

Ghitalla, as well as being one of the finest trumpeters in America, is also a noted lecturer and a member of the faculties of the New England Conservatory and Boston University.

He will arrive in Gorham on May 31 for four days of intensive rehearsals with the Gorham musicians.

Other spring activities for the Gorham Band and chorus include seven other local performances, highlighted by the North Country Music Festival at Gorham on May 22. On March 22, the band travels to Northampton High School for the second part of an exchange concert.

On March 25, the Folk Singers will appear for the Gorham Knights of Columbus meeting. The Folk Singers will also appear for the State Rotary Convention in Gorham on May 1 or 2.

On May 24, the band will appear in the Knights of Columbus Parade in Berlin and on Memorial Day will appear in Gorham's annual Memorial Day parade.

The June 3 Pops Concert winds us the year's musical events for both the band and the ~~chorus.~~

Armando Ghitalla

REPORTER
BERLIN, N. H.
WEEKLY 7,200

MAR 19 1970

RECORDER - TRANSCRIPT
JAFFREY, N. H.
4,100

MAR 12 1970

ARMANDO GHITALIA

Trumpet Soloist In Spring Concert

Armando Ghitalla, first trumpeter of the ~~Boston Symphony Orchestra,~~ will be the featured soloist at the fourth annual spring concert of the N.H. Philharmonic Orchester under the direction of Rolland Tapley, for the benefit of the Monadnock Hospital Aid Society on Friday, March 20.

Mr. Ghitalla is considered one of the world's greatest trumpet soloists of symphonic music. He plays as many as nine trumpets, built in various keys, during a single engagement.

In 1957 he gave the first complete trumpet recital ever performed in New York City at Town Hall, and in March 1960 he also gave a trumpet recital at Carnegie Hall, an unusual happening for concert trumpeters.

Ghitalla was a perennial favorite as soloist with the Boston Pops and received many standing ovations in Boston's Symphony Hall.

Local member artists who will be performing include Evelyn Querfurth of Peterborough, flutist; David Marlowe, a PCS student, french horn; Ken LaRoche, PCS student, flutist; Peg French of Dublin, flutist; and Patricia Robitaille of Greenville, violinist.

The concert will be held at PCS auditorium on Friday, March 20, at 8:15 p.m. Tickets are $1.50 for adults and 75¢ for students, and they are available at Steele's Bookstore and the Village Pharmacy or may be purchased at the door.

Annual Concert To Be Presented

PETERBOROUGH — Armando Ghitalla, first trumpeter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured soloist at the fourth annual spring concert of the N.H. Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Rolland Tappley, for the benefit of the Monadnock Community Hospital Aid Society here Friday.

Local member artists who will be performing include Evelyn Querfurth of Peterborough, flutist; David Marlowe, a PSC student, French horn; Ken LaRoche, PCS student, flutist; Peg French of Dublin, flutist, and Patricia Robitaille of Greenville, violinist.

The concert will be held at PSC auditorium at 8:15 p.m. Tickets are available at Steele's Bookstore and the Village Pharmacy or may be purchased at the door.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

MAR 18 1970

DISTINGUISHED MUSICIAN — Richard Burgin, concertmaster for the Boston Symphony for 42 years, half that time associate conductor, will be at Polk Junior College Saturday for a string workshop.

Music Workshop Program At Polk Junior Announced

The schedule for the String Workshop being sponsored by the Polk Junior College Music Department here Saturday was announced today.

The workshop is open to students, teachers, professionals and amateurs — anyone who is interested in participating, either for all day or for specific events. There is no charge.

The theme will be "Grass Roots — How to Grow Them," and the emphasis will be on how to become more adequate players and teachers "thereby stimulating growth of music in our communities and schools."

The artist-teachers who will direct the workshop include Dr. Richard Bergin, who was concertmaster with the Boston Symphony for over 40 years and is now the Florida State University concertmaster. He is a violinist. Joining him will be Miss Marjory Enix, cellist, of the University of South Florida, and Food Foundation Coordinator; and Lee Eubanks, bass, of the the University of South Florida and a principal of the Gulf Coast Symphony. Eubanks is formerly from Indiana University.

The program will be opened at 8:45 a.m. by Prof. Virginia Davidson of the Polk Junior College Music Department faculty, serving as moderator. Dr. Bertram Gable, head of the PJC Music and Arts Departments, will welcome the group.

Elementary students, both young and old, will take part in the morning workshop, which starts at 9 and continues until 10:45. Following a coffee break with the Winter Haven Orchestra Association as host, a general session will be held at 11 a.m. devoted to the problem of "Building String Programs and Community Orchestras."

The workshop will resume at 1:45 with a general session during which demonstrations will be given by musicians. At 2:45 there will be a workshop for advanced students, followed by a general session at 4:30 for a summary and questions.

"This string workshop is designed to benefit string players of all ages and stages," said Mrs. Davidson. It will also be a benefit to parents and teachers not actively involved in string but interested, she said.

Anyone who wishes any further information about the workshop or would like to register may call the Polk Junior College Music Department, or Mrs. Davidson.

WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
NEWS-CHIEF
D. 8,500 S. 9,500

MAR 19 1970

Richard Burgin To Attend Polk College Workshop

WINTER HAVEN (By Staff Writer) — Richard Burgin, famed symphony conductor, will be here for the string workshop at Polk Junior College March 21.

The them for the workshop will be, "Grassroots and How To Grow Them."

Burgin was concertmaster with the Boston Symphony for 42 years and was associate conductor for the same orchestra for 21 years.

He has served as musical director for the Institute of the Florida Festival at Daytona Beach and for the Congress of Strings at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

He has appeared as guest conductor with numerous orchestras.

Two other artist-teachers will also participate in the workshop. They are Miss Marjory Enni, cellist, who teaches at the University of South Florida and Lee Eubanks, bass, also at the University of South Florida. He is now a principal with the Gulf Coast Symphony.

Further information on the workshop may be obtained from the Polk Junior College Music Department or Virginia S. Davidson, professor of Music.

Richard Burgin
. . . famed conductor

THE TAMPA TRIBUNE
TAMPA, FLA.

MAR 13 1970

MUSIC

BSO In Anecdote

By JOHN THORNTON

HARRY ELLIS DIXON is a suave, elegant, sophisticated violinist who is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's "front man" for all open rehearsals. ~~Before the conductor~~ comes onstage, Dixon regales the music lovers, who always pack the hall for these popular affairs, with anecdotes about the music and jokes about his colleagues.

A natural showman with a sharp sense of humour, Dixon began these lectures about the orchestra and its members before various women's clubs. In due course he developed a large collection of backstage stories and compiled several notebooks of material on musicians, conductors and guests artists.

His book "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" (An Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra) published by Beacon Press of Boston, brings together recollections of a talented musician and conductor.

He writes as a solid and respected member of The Establishment, that closed fraternity of professional orchestra musicians who collectively have awesome artistic power.

For the aspiring musician whose ambition it is to become a regular player with a major symphony, "More Dolce, Please!" is a treasure house of information. It has even wider appeal for the lay listener, for Dixon in 20 chapters effectively covers the daily activity of one of the great orchestras of the world.

It is a slender volume of 162 pages, moderately sprinkled with drawings by Olga Koussevitzky, and photographs, including John Brook's memorable shot of Monteaux, Koussevitzky and Munch.

Dixon is not a historian, nor does he pretend to be a polished professional writer. He writes just like what he is, a fine violinist who hugely enjoys telling stories about the orchestra and his colleagues, and who sets it all down in simple, direct and charming fashion.

BECAUSE HE IS A WORKING pro who takes part in everything the orchestra does, and because he writes with the authority of three decades of experience with the BSO, his book is highly entertaining.

Commenting on various kinds of music the orchestra schedules Dixon says, "I think it would be agreed that the music of Mozart is the most difficult, because it is exposed, pure, meticulous. No musician can play Mozart without perspiring . . so we must put Mozart at the head of music musicians hate to play . . . while the difficult sounding bombastic music of Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, Dovorak, Wagner, and Richard Strauss is easy."

There is sentimental reference to a gala party held by the BSO for Pierre Monteux on the occasion of his 80th birthday.

During the affair a group of 20 musicians who had been engaged by Monteux when he conducted the BSO in the 20's, played a humorous arrangement of "Happy Birthday". Then orchestra leader Dixon announced a "new" piece by an unknown composer, performed to test the infallible memory of their Maitre.

Soon after the music started, Monteux began to grin, for he recognized a score he had written as a young man of 18, which he had hidden in disgust. Mrs. Monteux had unearthed the music for the party. When it was over Monteux thanked the musicians and said, "I think you will agree that after hearing this piece we should let the composer remain unknown!"

Dixon studied conducting under Monteux at his school in Hancock and recalls a delightful scene that took place in the Forest Studio: "Once his irrepressible wife, Doris, burst into the studio . . . during a class and shouted, "Pierre, I am leaving you and I am never coming back!" There was a hush among the orchestra . . . Monteux stepped up to the front of the stage and said nonchalantly, "Leave the checkbook" and went back to his seat..."

He writes a flood of interesting anecdotes about BSO guest conductors, some of the best being those about Sir Thomas Beecham. He remembers that Beecham, unfamiliar with rehearsal schedules, was in his hotel while the orchestra waited onstage the morning after a concert. Hastily summoned, Beecham strode to the podium, demanding to know "the reason for this meeting." Satisfying himself the musicians were pleased with their previous performance, he dismissed them in seconds, cancelling the rehearsal.

Festival quartet in debut

CSM 3/24/70

Four young musicians who have arrived from different parts of the world to become members of the Boston Symphony in recent years have formed the Festival String Quartet, which made an auspicious official debut in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon. Australian Christopher Kimber and Japanese Ikuko Mizuno are the violinists; Israeli Yizhak Schotten, violist, and Connecticut Yankee Jerome Patterson, cellist. They would seem to have been brought together, not by geographical considerations, but through a common basis of fine musical training, youthful inquisitiveness and ambition, and an obvious love of playing chamber music.

A going concern

They came well prepared on Sunday with a challenging program—Leon Kirchner's intriguing but difficult String Quartet (1949), the Beethoven Quartet Op. 59 No. 1 ("Rasumovsky"), and—without Miss Mizuno, but with Victor Rosenbaum of the New England Conservatory piano faculty—the Schumann E-flat major Piano Quartet.

Throughout the afternoon, the ensemble playing was of the highest quality, and when opportunities arose, as they did frequently, to appraise individual sound, it was in each case well-rounded and declarative. Not all quartets give the impression, even after their formative years, of working easily together, but the Festival players seem already to have achieved an enviable degree of togetherness in performance, a plus for the future.

All three works gave pleasure in their separate ways by virtue of a definitive shaping—the expansive Kirchner, the elegant "Rasumovsky," and the romantic Schumann, in which Mr. Rosenbaum's substantial pianistic contribution was very much in the frame.

There were recalls for everybody, and cheers—a wonderful way to start such a fresh and promising enterprise. L. Sn.

Another review of this on p. 80.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 24 1970 New

★

The Boston Symphony is trekking to Constitution Hall in Washington on the 31st, and with them a hand-picked potpourri of devoted donors who'll be asked across the Potomac to McLean, Va., and the Edward Kennedys' for a round-the-fireplaces old home night.

★

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAR 20 1970

Speaking of attractive invitations, Boston Symphony Orchestra's golden colophon (chosen by the Orchestra's founder Henry Lee Higginson) heads that beautifully-engraved "bid" for the glittering 90th Anniversary Ball on April 27 at Symphony Hall. Guests will pay $300 per couple for the highlight event benefiting our world-famous BSO.

Among those who have been working on the hundreds of details for the Ball co-chairmanned by Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge, Mrs. Howard Davis, Mrs. Charles Devens.

Also Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. James M. Gavin, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Francis Hatch, Jr., Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. James M. Perkins (one of two lady trustees, the other is Mrs. Harris Fahnestock); Mrs. Karl Riemer and Mrs. Ducey Ryerson.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 24 1970 N

THE BOOK ABOUNDS with malapropisms, funny twists of English uttered by players and conductors, many of them attributed to Koussevitzky, who never mastered the language.

Here are a few choice Koussevitzkyisms: "He stopped the violas once in the first movement of Brahms First Symphony and said, "Kinder; Di main thing is ta-ta-ta. But ven it isn't, vot it is?"

Once, venting his rage on a string player who was playing without vibrato: "How can you play with died fingers?"

A typical barrage from the podium: "Gentlemen, you are awfully not togedder. You play di notes in time, but vot is between the times you don't care about . . . you are awfully bad in tune today. . .Ve cannot permit us di luxus to be n not in tune."

Joseph De Pasquale, the first viola who left to rejoin the Philadelphia Orchestra to be with his brothers in the ensemble, got off a beauty of a malapropism. It happened just before his first child arrived.

Dixon memtioned how one of his children had almost been born in a taxi on the way to the hospital, but his warning failed to impress the violist: "Oh, . . . that's so terrible? If the baby comes, all you got to do is cut the biblical cord!"

Dixon categorizes his colleagues according to what they play: Oboists are tough, double - reed "roosters" who passionately hate string players; flutists are the dandies, the quietest and best dressed; clarinet players are cry - babies; bassoonists "a happy lot;" trumpets are debonair and dashing; and trombonists are dull, moral, "like ministers."

Horn players are the rebels of the brass section, constantly agitating for more pay and less work.

Tuba players, he writes, are uncommunicative and morose, who never talk but who sing to themselves.

Percussionists are he - men who like the outdoors life (Firth, the BSO tympanist, is a big game hunter who prowls around South American jungles or takes off for Arctic circles on his vacations) and harp players are a breed apart. The male species "is always well-shaved, well dressed, and beautifully manicured."

In his final chapter, Dixon dwells on "The Next 20 Years," gloomily concluding that by AD 2000 "we will all be so saturated with music that all our emotion will have been drained out of our systems. Concert going will be an exercise in brain function, nothing more...I'm glad I won't be around to enjoy it."

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181

MAR 15 1970 N Eng

Joan does her thing hostessing concert

By ELEANOR ROBERTS
MT Television Editor

In a whirlwind life of politics, social commitments and grand scale entertaining there is nothing that Joan Kennedy enjoys more than hostessing a TV concert of prize-winning young musicians as she did last night on Ch. 2.

"Ted knows how interested I am in music," Joan told me at a champagne reception after the performance. "He likes me to do it. He told me laughingly one day, 'Go ahead and do your thing.' "

Joan looked more like a golden girl straight out of MGM casting as she sat in a folding chair perched high on a platform, reading the teleprompter and introducing the three top winners of the recent Massachusetts Council on Arts and Humanities competition, with graciousness and charm.

SHE COULD HAVE stepped right off the cover of Vogue in her smart mini-skirted ruby velvet cocktail gown that enhanced her long blonde hair and Dresden china complexion.

She was totally absorbed, completely poised. When she finished introducing the last number, the brilliant young pianist Jerri Onaran of Brookline, she sat in the audience listening raptly to a Brahms Rhapsody.

The senator didn't catch his wife's performance. "He's speaking in Lowell," Joan explained. "But I brought two of the children to Boston with me, Kara who is 10 and Teddy, Jr., 8. I stretched their bedtime so they could see half of the concert.

"But I'm a very strict mother. Both children take piano lessons and I make Kara practice. I crack the whip."

"The Majority Whip?" Attorney General Robert Quinn punned.

IT'S DIFFERENT with Teddy. How can he insist upon a boy practicing the piano?" she asked with a gay smile.

Mrs. Kennedy, who endeared herself to TV viewers across the nation when she narrated "Peter and the Wolf," has always loved music.

"It was my major at Manhattanville," she explained. "I'm on the board of the National Symphony in Washington and Ted is on the board of the Boston Symphony. There's a conflict right there.

"We're giving a party at our home in McLean, Va., for the Boston Symphony Orchestra after their performance at Constitution Hall, next Tuesday," she said. "I'll have to do the same for my symphony."

Fifty members of the orchestra and their wives will be the Kennedy guests. "People always give parties after concerts and invite only the board members, never the musicians. I always try to have the men in the orchestra and their wives. It's so much more fun."

IT WAS TYPICAL of Joan not to say a word about her hard work at the rehearsal for last night's TV performance or the full day she put in last week taping interviews with the winners. Producer Bill Cosel had to tell us that as VIP's, including the forever-young Arthur Fiedler, crowded around to congratulate her.

The Kennedys and their children take off for Burlington, Vt., tomorrow where they'll spend Easter Sunday skiing. Despite the senator's back injury he's able to enjoy skiing. "But he's simmered down to my pace now," Joan said. "Not that I'm slow but he used to be a whiz."

The telecast featured lyric soprano Gretchen d'Armand of Amherst, the Cambridge Brass Quintet and the afore-mentioned pianist Jerri Onaran.

JOAN KENNEDY

★ ★ ★

THERE'S TREAT in store for music lovers, this summer. Arthur Fiedler and his famous Pops Orchestra will be featured in 13 TV programs titled "Sunday Night at the Pops" on 180 stations of PBS, starting July 5 at 10 p.m. on the east coast.

★ ★ ★

WHILE JACKIE GLEASON is on a luxury liner bound for Europe with girl friend Beverly McKittrick, ART CARNEY is in New York wrestling with a dilemma.

Richard Rodgers has offered Carney the lead, as Noah, in his new musical "Two by Two" based on the old Clifford Odets play, "The Flowering Peach." But the Great One hasn't indicated whether he'll do a series of CBS-TV specials next season. Carney is waiting. So is Rodgers who must soon start casting.

★ ★ ★

MEMO TO E. ROBERTS: A nice lady from Bridgewater called to inform us that on "For Women Today" (Ch. 4) yesterday morning, during a discussion of sex in marriage, a kindly-looking, grandmotherly lady doctor named Dr. Eleanor Hamilton uttered the ultimate four-letter obscenity on the air.

Our informant was so shocked that she didn't watch any further. End of memo.

A call to Ch. 4 brought the admission from a spokesman that, alas, this was indeed true and that the station "regretted it."

Other calls of protest: Viewers expressing their anger that Ch. 4 should choose Holy Week to air a five-part series on sex including Wednesday's upcoming discussion on homosexuality.

It certainly is untimely, we agree. And one can't help but wonder if it isn't a ploy to grab viewers on a show whose ratings have been low—viewers who might look in purely out of curiosity.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 9 1970 New

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

The invitation to watch for on the hall table — the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Washington concert and the after-party at the Kennedys in Virginia.

In status, second only to the "private ball" in Tanglewood in June, for the international establishment in music.

The weekend was international enough, for those who make the rounds. The Iranian ambassador at the Museum of Fine Arts, and a small but top-echelon party at the Austrian Consul Edward Masterman's, and the Civic Symphony's marvelous Michel Sasson, with and Polynesian party first and another consular turnout.

The Mastermans' elegant Chestnut Hill house has a very Washington atmosphere with internationals constantly coming and going and good talk and good food at all hours.

Spring's fragrant Narcissus and Mimosa, white tulips in a baccarat setting, and pots of daffodils minimized winter, and the conversation telstared round the world in a dozen languages.

Canada's loved Stuart Hemsley, who's off to Ottawa and Toronto for good in June after a consular deanship here that's set a record in friendship as well as year, talked painting with his vivid talented hostess — he likes her "Cocktail Party" painting better than the Chagall that hangs round the corner from it. Stuart is determined to get in a bit of New England seacoast painting himself before he leaves.

Mrs. Masterman's exquisite watercolors of her children fascinated Natalie (Mrs. Kenneth) Robertson, who's also getting an "honored service" party later this month for her dedicated job at the French Center.

182.

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

047

Invitations in the Mail to BSO 90th Anniversary Ball April 27

THE GOLDEN COLOPHON of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chosen by founder Henry Lee Higginson, heads the beautifully engraved invitations to the 90th Anniversary Ball, which are in the mail today. On the second page of the invitations to the ball, Monday evening, April 27, at Symphony Hall, are listed the names of the distinguished group of Trustees of the orchestra.

They include Talcott M. Banks, president, Philip K. Allen, Richard H. Chapman, Abram T. Collier, the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, Robert H. Gardiner, Francis W. Hatch Jr., Andrew Heiskell, John L. Thorndike, Harold D. Hodgkinson, E. Morton Jennings Jr., Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Henry A. Laughlin, the Rev. Edward G. Murray, John T. Noonan and Sidney R. Rabb.

At the time of the Golden Trumpet Ball five years ago, Mrs. James H. Perkins was the only woman trustee. She has been joined by Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, who was elected a trusteee last November. Trustees Emeritus are Henry B. Cabot, the Rev. Palfrey Perkins, Edward A. Rabb and Judge Raymond S. Wilkins.

Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld head the committee for ball. Among those who have been working on details for many months are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge, Mrs. Howard Davis, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Richard Ely and Mrs. John M. Ferry.

Others include Mrs. James M. Gavin, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Donald F. Harding, Mrs. Francis Hatch Jr., Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Erich Kauders, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. Karl Riemer and Mrs. Ducey Ryerson.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 20 1970

Five Serve on Symphony Comm.

Five area residents are involved directly and indirectly with the forthcoming 90th Anniversary Ball of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be held at Symphony Hall on April 27.

Serving as trustees of the orchestra are: Talcott M. Banks of Lincoln, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord and Henry A. McLaughlin of Concord.

On the ball committee are Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge of Belmont and Mrs. Howard Davis of Concord.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

MAR 26 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

MAR 26 1970

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

MAR 26 1970

Something new in the way of a party will be happening April 6 at Symphony Hall, when Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern, guest artists for the Beethoven Festival, will be feted at a reception and informal supper. Patrons, guarantors and benefactors of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been invited by the Trustees and Council of Friends.

A concert to be given by the Chamber Players will follow the 7 o'clock feast. Guests as well as the players will be seated in the round or on the stage of Symphony Hall. Friends of the B.S.O included in the higher category of giving for the current year are promised an enjoyable evening.

Working with John W. Calkins, chairman of the special event are the Charles P. Lymans, the Donald F. Hardings from the Council of Friends; the Hugh Thrashers, the E. Lauriston Ward, Jrs.; Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Rozelle, Jr., and the David A. Lowneses.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAR 27 1970

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 213,580 SUN. 318,425

MAR 29 1970

BSO bucks snow, strike

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

It takes a lot more than snow and strike threats to keep the Boston Symphony from its rounds, in this case tonight's Washington concert. The henchmen were posted with bus and train timetables after storming the shuttle line yesterday.

When last heard from, the BSOmen, fiddle cases and all, had gotten as far as New York, where the word was: "We may be playing Los Angeles before we can get to Constitution Hall. We think the bass fiddles are still in Hartford."

And even if the bus drivers do take Ethel Kennedy's driveway instead of Sen. Edward's, as they did last year, it'll seem a short trip after the national transport back-up.

The prestigious National Symphony audience will be rustling in at 8 p.m. anyhow, perfectly confident they'll be settling down to Tschaikovsky's "First," the Mozart "Aria," and Stravinsky's "Symphony in Three Movements."

And on their way to join them from Symphony are the Henry Laughlins; trustee Philip Allen and his daughter, Mrs. John Ross; Rev. Seavey Joyce; Gunther Schuller; the Tom Perrys; Harry Kraut; Marvin Schofer; Roger Stevens and a Rockefeller or two.

They're all invited for post-concert coffee and cognac across the Potomac at the Edward Kennedys' McLean house where fires and flowers—and chintzes in Joan's favorite yellow shades—warm the welcome.

Capitalites there to talk shop (the Tanglewood private ball in June, for instance), will, of course, include Mrs. Jouett Shouse. Born a Filene, in Boston, she handed over her Virginia "Wolftrap Farm" to provide acreage and prestige for the National Association of American Symphony Orchestras.

A plush clutch of the senator's colleagues is expected to wander in through the spotlighted patio to share the hometown handshaking.

SCHOOL MUSIC NEWS
ONEONTA, N. Y.
MAY 1970 3,030

APR

"At Large" A Critic

It usually takes years to become honored with the title "critic at large." But George Gelles, music critic of the Boston HERALD TRAVELER, reached that status in two months, at the age of twenty-seven. How? Very simple. Just by chiding guest conductor Seiji Ozawa's performance with the Boston Symphony. His review went this way: "Ozawa has shrunk from a lightweight with charm and real elegance to a conductor whose performances are technically inaccurate and emotionally indifferent."

Friends of the Boston Symphony bridled and sent protest letters to The HERALD. A board of trustees member wrote to the publisher stating, "We think that perhaps The HERALD might be in a position to alter its course."

Publisher Clancy denies that he was reacting to any pressure, but Gelles was suddenly promoted to critic at large. So far, his duties are not exactly defined. One thing is perfectly clear, though: "at large" does not include the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CENTER CITY
PHILADELPHIAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 1970

■ Boston Symphony's Concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, made his Philadelphia recital debut in a concert presented by The Alumni & Friends of the Settlement Music School, March 8 at the Settlement Music School, 416 Queen st. His program included three Bach and two Mozart sonatas.

Silverstein is an internationally known performer - as soloist; first violinist of the Boston Symphony, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players; and member of the Boston String Trio. He is on the faculty of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 2 1970 1 En

Harold Banks – Cap

Always irony — one member of the Dukes County grand jury, which will begin its own probe of the Kopechne case Monday, built that fateful Chappaquiddick bridge, the one that Sen. Ted Kennedy must wish he could burn behind him.

William Steinberg won't be back to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, which is his first — too ill. That's why the orchestra's Council of Friends says, in its invitation to an April 8 soiree, that Steinberg's assistant, Michael Tilson Thomas, will be there to outline his plans for the spring season. There's only a month to go, anyway, before Arthur Fiedler breaks into "Pops" for his 38th season.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 31 1970 New England

Podium Prince
And Orchestral Peasants

By R. P. HARRISS
Art, Music and Drama Editor

A national research institute has projected a fiscal forecast for nine symphony orchestras, predicting financial trouble for them during the 1970s. The Baltimore is one of the nine, the others being those of Atlanta, Dallas, Houston, Kansas City, Louisville, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh and Seattle.

R. P. HARRISS

Significantly, the Boston Symphony is not among the nine, for the excellent reason that its endowment came at a time when the nation's merchant princes did not pay income tax and before many of them had discovered that art museums were more fun to support. When you amass a collection of paintings and give them, in your name, they don't threaten to strike for higher pay.

The heyday of the merchant princes coincided with that of the princely conductors, and one of the greatest and almost the last of these was Serge Koussevitzky. In a highly entertaining history of the last 30 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, titled "Gentleman, More Dolce Please!" (Beacon Press, Boston; $7.50), Harry Ellis Dickson writes:

"From the time he (Koussevitzky) first came to the orchestra in 1924 through the 25 years of his conductorship he was able to establish and maintain an aura of Olympian aloofness and royal untouchability. His sartorial splendor, his beautiful carriage, his reserved but dramatic gestures on the podium, all of these endeared him" — to Back Bay society.

He was deeply respected by the orchestra, but seemed not to have endeared himself to it.

Before the era of plane travel, when the Boston Symphony went on its two-week Western tour, the musicians rode in Pullman berths but Dr. Koussevitsky and his entourage — which included chef, valet, secretary and maid — enjoyed an entire car.

KOUSSEVITZKY was indeed a prince of the podium, as was also Arturo Toscanini. Few if any in our own time enjoy comparable rank. The late Sir Thomas Beecham had the jovially autocratic air of a duke, if not of a prince, but he had inherited a baronetcy and a fortune — which bolstered his position. The dean of present-day conductors, and perhaps the world's greatest, is Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra. His manner is magisterial, if not regal.

But Koussey dates back to truly autocratic rule, when a bad-tempered conductor could chew out musicians fiercely and with impunity. He the ruler, they his peasants. Today, with strong union backing, the musician's lot is vastly improved in every particular. Orchestra members today do not meekly accept sarcastic admonitions from the conductor, certainly not from a guest conductor; and at least one major orchestra, the New York Philarmonic, has long been noted for hazing the luckless visiting conductor who incurs its ill will.

Mr. Dickson, who is now an associate conductor of the Boston Symphony as well as being still a member of the orchestra, gives both sides of it — the conductor's and the musicians'. Discussing the various orchestral choirs, he makes some frank if highly questionable generalizations:

CELLISTS are "the greatest source of trouble in an orchestra . . . prima donnas, supersensitive, suspicious, conceited, quarrelsome." Viola players "are usually the least troublesome. They are mostly ex-violinists who have "become philosophical."

Oboe players are "only slightly less troublesome than the cellists . . . a breed unto themselves . . . the unhappiest of musicians," because they play a treacherous double - reed instrument. The oboist, when not actually playing, is always whittling away at reeds — and never getting perfect ones. "The first oboist of every orchestra," declares Dickson, "is usually not on speaking terms with the conductor, and he hates string players with a passion." (I must say, I have known some who seemed rather genial chaps.) Clarinetists are "the classic cry-babies of every orchestra . . . constantly being persecuted, they think, by the conductor."

BASSOONISTS, though theirs is a double - reed instrument, are "a most affable lot." (Dickson doesn't mention the tradition (unproved) that the bassoon eventually induces hallucinations comparable to marijuana.) Most trumpet players are "handsome, dashing, debonair." Trombone players are "like ministers . . . quiet, dull, very moral." The tuba player is "silent, morose, uncommunicative."

Dickson maintains: "The dandies of any orchestra are the flute players, the best dressed, the most gentlemanly, the easiest to get along with." But the male harpist is the Beau Brummell: "He plays so seldom that he has plenty of time to shop for new clothes". Strangers often mistake him for the conductor. He is always beautifully manicured.

The tympanist is "the grand potentate of the percussionists." But "the first violins in the orchestra will continue to be the aristocrats."

WHAT DO MUSICIANS expect of a conductor? He must know the score and know it better than the players. He must have the power to communicate and to inspire. He must instill discipline. Most successful conductors today instill it through the respect in which they are held. In bygone times, more often than not, they instilled it through fear. I can well recall, away back in the days when musicians had no union protection or job tenure, hearing Gustav Strube bawling out the Baltimore Symphony musicians at rehearsal like a Prussian drill sergeant:

MAESTRO — Serge Koussevitzky, from a drawing by Olga Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzky was smoother "Gentlemen, more dolce please?" But still his word was absolute law; he brooked no interference from anyone.

The Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, is as well known as the Boston Symphony — in fact, says Dickson, "with the exception of some first players the Pops personnel is substantially that of the Boston Symphony." — Not always! When the Boston Symphony was not available for a Southern tour in February 1965, Arthur Fiedler engaged the Baltimore Symphony, which played all the concerts on the itinerary. Critics said the "Boston Pops" played unusually well that trip.

Koussevitzky did not like the idea of Pops concerts. "We could always expect at our first rehearsal in Tanglewood, following the Pops season", says Dickson, "a Koussevitzky tirade. After a few minutes of rehearsing he would invariably stop and say, 'Vot happened to mine orkester? I know! Too much Pops!'"

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 2 1970 New

Pleased by critic

As one who has often been critical of the critic of the Boston Globe, I would like to keep my accounts straight by expressing my pleasure at some of Michael Steinberg's recent reviews. In addition to his usual excellent annotative material he has cordially praised the performances. I refer to two Boston Symphony concerts and one by the Festival Quartet.

At this rate one's inferiority complex about the Home Team could soon disappear; it would be OK once again to be a Rabid Rooter.

CHARLES P. FISHER
Framingham

Library film

This year is the Beethoven BiCentennial. Celebrate by seeing his latest movie, "Beethoven — Ordeal and Triumph."

The music of Beethoven and performed by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in the film.

It will be shown one day only, at noon and 1 p.m., Friday in the Public Library Auditorium, 8th and Vine streets. No admission charges.

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,618

APR 2 1970

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000
APR 1 1970

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
MAR 29 1970

182a

What Comes After Overnight Success?

By HOWARD KLEIN

THE cab stops before an undistinguished six-story house on Berkeley Street in downtown Boston. In the vestibule, the little button next to the name "Thomas" is pushed, identification is voiced into the intercom and a voice answers: "I'll be down in a second." A few minutes later the inner door bursts open and there stands Michael (25-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony) Tilson (pale, about six-feet-one, with piercing blue-grey eyes and black, wavy hair) Thomas (grandson of the great New York Yiddish theater personalities, Boris and Bessie Thomashefsky).

He is full of nervous energy and very direct. Amenities are brief. "You should have kept the cab," he says smiling, looking out into the street through the glass door. "We have to meet the photographer at Symphony Hall."

Boston is full of students and Thomas looks like any of them. He is wearing a calf-length blue overcoat with a double row of brass buttons over his blue Nehru jacket, pale blue pants, striped blue tie and blue shirt. A black Persian lamb fedora breaks the color pattern.

Thomas is by now used to, and probably bored by, interviews. Success has come swiftly and decisively to the young musician from Los Angeles. He entered the University of Southern California as a music major at 18, in a year was conducting the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra (whose alumni include New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis and Lawrence Foster, now making a name for himself in England). He has served as assistant to Pierre Boulez both in Bayreuth, Germany, and at the Ojai Festival in California; won the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at Tanglewood in 1968 and was catapulted into the New York limelight last Oct. 23 when he substituted for conductor William Steinberg who became ill in the middle of a Philharmonic Hall concert with the Boston Symphony. Rushed in to conduct the last two works on the program, Thomas "came on stage with an air of immense confidence and authority, and showed that his confidence was not misplaced," Harold C. Schonberg wrote in The Times the next morning. "Mr. Thomas knows his business and we shall be hearing from him again." The young conductor again made an excellent impression when he led the orchestra in two concerts here on subsequent nights. All the world loves an overnight success but it is clear that Thomas is determined to keep his laurels by consistent performance whenever he is on. He is now "on" most of the time, doing concerts in Boston and on tour. He will once more guide the orchestra in New York on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday.

*

At Symphony Hall, Thomas breezes in with a "Hi" here and there, friendly, businesslike. He leads the way to an upstairs office. A highly strung, energetic man-boy, he speaks fast, covering much ground with pertinent comments and enthusiasm. He is open and yet strangely evasive about some things. He refuses to say when his birthday is—the press bio says Dec. 21, 1944—claiming he has a phobia about birthdays.

He is still unmarried; music, he says, takes all his time. "I don't even see many movies now," he says, "but I've seen 'Last Year at Marienbad' and Fellini's '8½' about 20 times each. I had a very Fellini childhood—I grew up with stories of the theater, of childhoods in Russia. My father, Ted Thomas, shortened the Thomashefsky. He's a writer, director and producer of films and TV in L.A. He went there years ago to rewrite some material for a cousin of ours, Paul Muni, and I was born in Hollywood. I had played piano by ear at about 5, learned to read at 8 and started at USC's prep school at 10 but I was more interested in science—mineralogy, crystallography, inorganic and then organic chemistry—than I was in music or theater. I won science prizes but the men of the arts impressed me more than men of science so I majored in music at USC after high school.

*

"You cannot imagine the diverse influences on the coast. Aldous Huxley once said, 'Los Angeles is the place where geniuses go to die.' I would play the piano accompaniment of a Haydn Cello Concerto for a Gregor Piatigorsky class in the morning, then work on a Haydn symphony in the afternoon with Pierre Boulez—this provides an incredible artistic shock. I accompanied Heifetz, got to know Igor Stravinsky and Robert Craft and of course worked with my teachers, Ingolf Dahl and Robert Crown. Crown taught me piano and Dahl conducting, but Dahl really taught ear training, music history, structural analysis. His is an overwhelming figure.

"I was the despair of the music department. I took graduate courses as a sophomore—that was before courses were computerized—and in my last year had to take freshman courses. And I filled up on non-music subjects such as The Development of the Doric Order and Asiatic studies—I almost majored in that."

"What is your I.Q.?" I ask.

"I don't know," he says, wincing away the question, "that's not important. Have you seen the orchestra's library?"

*

He charges into a small room down the hall. Its shelves are stacked to the ceiling with conductors' scores. He goes to the catalogue book, notes a number, reaches for a volume numbered 568A, opens it and scans the pasted-in sheets at the front which list every performance of a work ever done by the Boston Symphony.

"Look," he says eagerly, "the first performance of Debussy's 'La Mer' was by Karl Muck in 1907. And here's Liszt's 'Festklänge,' first done by Artur Nikisch in 1889. I like the library even better than the concert hall. But it's marvelous, too. Have you seen it?"

Onstage, he sits at the piano and plays. He leans back, long arms arching over the keys, long fingers skimming over them with a fast, light touch. His fingers turn up at the ends. He plays with sturdy rhythmic precision, bits of Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, and then "La Mer."

"This is the most beautiful F sharp minor chord in all of music," he says over his playing—he is lost in some gorgeous passage of the Debussy. "The trick is to maintain two opposing forces: you must be able to melt over a lovely spot in the music but realize that it belongs to an extended section which, if pulled out of shape to indulge the lovely spot, would distort the whole piece. Many young musicians are now applying analysis to their work, instead of 'interpretation.' We do not have a proprietary interest in music. We don't think of our Beethoven, we don't own any pieces the way previous generations of musicians thought they did. My credo is to resist the dogmatism of the avant and arrière garde. My idea of a performance is one that presents new ideas about the music. Recordings have worked against this in music. Suppose a theater audience dismissed a Hamlet because he took a soliloquy faster than an Olivier recording! That would be the death of performing in the theater and it threatens the life of performance in music. There is no one way to play anything."

Thomas's sense of history pulls him in another direction. "See the nude statues of gods and goddesses lining the walls in the hall?" he says gesturing. "When Isadora Duncan shocked Boston by baring her breasts on this stage in the early 1900's, she pointed to those as her defense."

*

It is early afternoon but Thomas, who studied scores all morning, has not eaten. The photographer has been snapping away and Thomas, patient for a while, fixes him with a stern smile and says, "This is your last picture." We leave the hall and descend the subway steps nearby to go get him some breakfast. A young hippie and his girl draw near, she hanging back, he going straight for the young conductor. "You're Thomas, aren't you? I saw you conduct Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra on TV the other day. I'm a conducting student at the New England Conservatory. I liked what you did with the last movement."

Thomas is pleased and immediately interested. "That last one is the hardest to conduct. Not everyone realizes that. Getting the voice-leading balanced as it goes from one instrument to another around the orchestra is some problem for a conductor."

At breakfast—an omelette, Nova Scotia salmon and bagel—Thomas continues. "My own conducting style has changed since I've been leading the Boston. I had (Continued on Page 28)

Ivan Massar

Michael Tilson Thomas, who will lead the Boston Symphony here this week
"I like the Beatles, but my all-time favorite hero is James Brown"

After Overnight Success?

Continued from Page 17

conducted the Debut Orchestra in L.A. for four years but I find I am conducting less now—using fewer motions. The Boston players are absolutely great. They are open, friendly, easy to work with. Of course they helped me enormously in that emergency that first night—an orchestra always pulls the conductor through. God! I still don't remember a thing that happened onstage. Steinberg came backstage after the Brahms and said 'Put on your suit, I think you're going to conduct.' I stood there numb while he took another bow, then ran to get my tails from my trunk. I don't know how I conducted. Afterward I kept asking everybody was it any good, how was it? At a dinner later, Leonard Bernstein told me to study my scores, that after he made his first substitution for Bruno Walter in 1943, he had to conduct other concerts as well. How right Mr. Bernstein was! I've had the last several weeks and will also conduct the final two weeks of the winter season. I've learned a couple of years' worth in the last six months.

*

"I think that Stravinsky is the most influential conductor of the 20th century and next are Koussevitzky and Stokowski. Toscanini and Reiner and others of that type may be more important for what they did with music. But these three are far more important for what they did for music. As far as my own tastes in music, I think much too much is being written today, and little of it is of much value. I compose, but only for myself. The music of the immediate past is boring to us. Composers have been writing for their colleagues at universities. We will probably have a revival of music of the 1940's now—we're all sick of the cliches of the 60's.

*

"I'd like to do other things with the orchestra, music by Monteverdi, Lassus, Perotin, go into the pre-baroque repertory for instruments and voices. Perhaps the big orchestras will be breaking up into smaller units, such as the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, for which I am the pianist.

"I never listen to classical music any more on records, though. Of course, I like the Beatles, but my all-time favorite hero is James Brown—what a towering performer! And his band plays such intricate rhythms with such precision. Someone should play a James Brown record for Stravinsky, he'd love it! I listen to Bessie Smith a lot, and the Rolling Stones, Peggy Lee, whose rubato is like Heifetz's, and Japanese Gagaku music.—Well, I've got to take a nap before the concert."

*

Later, Symphony Hall is filled for the evening concert. There are many young people. The program includes J. C. Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat (first performance with the Boston Symphony, although the work was written around 1775), Stravinsky's Symphony in three movements and the First Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The tall, lanky figure picks his way to the podium. A woman behind me says, "My, he's so young." He launches authoritatively into the program, his movement not suavely designed to please the audience but clear and straightforward to communicate better with the players. Occasionally a long arm reaches out to scoop a whole section up in a cue. The men of the orchestra show their respect for Thomas by playing beautifully for him. The concert is over, clearly another success. Bostonians like him, like his work.

In the green room, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, a veteran of the Boston Symphony and a highly respected musician, assesses the orchestra's young helmsman.

"An orchestra needs a papa—a music director—and that we have in William Steinberg. He will be back next fall. We are very happy with Michael in the meantime. He is a first-rate musician, an excellent young conductor and a very talented boy. A very talented boy. He has a great future."

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, 24, American, right. Spectacular New York début. Assistant conductor: Boston Symphony. Plays harpsichord, Moogs; collects books, minerals. "I have tremendous faith in my generation ...musically."

RAFAEL FRÜHBECK DE BURGOS, 36, Spanish, above. "Music lives in the moment." Music D National Orc 1826.

Rose Walsh BSO Kennedy Guests

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 1 1970

Gracious Joan Kennedy cut short her skiing Easter weekend at Stow, Vt., to warmly welcome members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at her McLean, Va., home, last night following their second Washington concert in Constitution Hall.

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the BSO, conducted the concert and received a standing ovation from the capacity audience.

As hostess at a cocktail party and buffet supper, Mrs. Kennedy wore a sparkling silver gown. A cheery fire burned in the huge fireplace of the library where arrangements of gay spring flowers enhanced the setting.

Among the guests were Ambassador and Mrs. Sol Linowitz, Congressman Peter H. B. Frelinghuysen; the Roger L. Stevens; the George Londons; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur P. Hendrick and Frederick L. Holborn (from the Washington Performing Arts Society).

Bonita Valente, who was soloist with the orchestra, was accompanied by her husband, Tony Cecchia, managing director of the Marlboro Festival.

Also in attendance were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Perry of the BSO staff; Mr. and Mrs. David Rockefeller, Jr. (development coordinator); Harry J. Kraut; Richard C. White, Miss Mary Riley, (Tanglewood Friends coordinator); Miss Mary Smith (concert manager); Janice Revitz (attorney with Securities and Exchange Commission); Sen. Thomas Eagleton; the Wyatt Dickersons, the David McGifferts (house guest); the Wynant Vanderpools; the John Hechingers and the Lloyd Cutlers.

Toasts to brilliant young conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, will be proposed with four German wines and an Austrain selection at a Wine Tasting Party, Wednesday evening, April 8, from 6 to 8 p. m. at the Marriott Motor Hotel. Planned by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in conjunction with the Ball Committee of the 90th Anniversary Dinner Ball, the party will celebrate the association of the BSO's Beethoven Week which begins Monday.

Mr. Thomas, assistant conductor of the orchestra, has conducted it several times this spring. He will address some 200 subscribers to the BSO and members of its administration concerning his plans for the spring session. Mr. Talcott Banks, president of the board of trustees, will discuss the Ball plans and the work of the Council of Friends.

On the guest list are Mr. and Mrs. Walter Watson II. the Walter J. Cahners, Mrs. Allen Joslin, the Donald B. Sinclairs, the Albert Englands, C. Russell Eddy and Mrs. James M. Gavin.

Arrangements for the gala evening have been made by Mrs. John H. Knowles. Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Howard Davis, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow, Jr., Mrs. Harris Fhanestock, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. James H. Perkins, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., (co-chairman of the Council of Friends) Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld (co-chairmen of the Ball).

joan's late show

Drawings by Kenneth Paul Block

Joan Kennedy — Mrs. Wynant Vanderpool — Mrs. Arthur Hendricks — Mrs. John Heckinger

WASHINGTON.—

JOAN KENNEDY GAVE A MUSICAL MIDNIGHT PARTY TUESDAY.

She wanted her friends who love music like she dos, to meet a sensational young conductor named Michael Tilson Thomas.

Thomas is only 25 years old and already he's creating a fabulous career for himself, standing in for William Steinberg of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is on a year's leave of absence due to illness.

Thomas conducted the BSO in Washington Tuesday Night in a rendition of Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Parts and Mozart's Exultate Jibilate that roused a normally lethargic audience into a 10-minute round of bravos and a standing ovation to boot.

Even Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, who sleeps through a lot of things these days, particularly concerts, stayed awake.

Joan herself slipped into her box half-way through the concert wearing a black coacchman's coat edged with rhinestones. (She never removed it because she slipped out before the end of the concert to get the house ready for the party.)

She looked younger, prettier and more little-girlish than ever. Her hair was in a pony tail, and blonde tendrils framed her face. Her face was tan from skiing and she wore no makeup. She seemed nervous and chatted animatedly with her escort, but her nervousness is becoming.

AFTERWARD, 50 MEMBERS OF THE SYMPHONY (THEY DREW STRAWS TO SEE WHO COULD GO TO THE PARTY) PILED ONTO A CHARTERED BUS . . . and led the long procession of limousines through the fog on Chain Bridge Road to a sign marked "Kennedy 636" for Joan's midnight buffet.

A line formed in the sunken courtyard outside the gray Kennedy house as Joan welcomed one after the other with warm personal greetings, or a kiss and a hug, or an explanation that Teddy had gone to the side of his best friend John Tunney in California because of the Tunney family tragedy.

Then Joan mingled freely with her guests who roamed from room to room of the Early American house admiring the fur rugs in the library, the silver apargne filled with carnations in the candlelit dining room or the hundreds of Kennedy photos lining the walls of the downstairs game room.

IT WAS ALL VERY CASUAL.

Joan even sent out the word — "no black tie." The Kennedys detest forced formality, so those who had gone to the concert in formal dress, including conductor Thomas himself, went home nad changed into business suits.

Joan herself did not dress to the teeth nor buy a new eye stopper for the occasion. She wore the silver sequined mini with rhinestone trim that she's practically worn out. But she loves it because Teddy does.

Even the buffet was not elaborate. There was plenty of it, but it was no caviar and pheasant under glass, only a simple chicken dish with rice, green salad and coffee.

But Joan was not out to impress, she merely wanted to gather her musical friends. There was Mrs. David Rockefeller, 3d, from Boston in an orange jersey dress, who's a big supporter of the B.S.O. The Ralph Beckers were there. Becker is a legal counsel for the Kennedy Center; and the Arthur Hendricks who are active in the world of music in Washington and New York, and the Wynant Vanderpools. Anne Vanderpool is a veteran Symphony Ball chairman. And the Peter Freylingheusens who support Tanglewood Music Festival at which Joan has appeared with Arthur Fiedler. And, of course, there were close friends and neighbors like the Wyatt Dickersons and the John Hechingers.

JOAN WAS GAY AND PLEASED THAT THE CONCERT HAD GONE SO WELL.

She was enthusiastic about her recent television appearances as musical moderator on the Boston Educational Network, and even more enthusiastic about her work with mentally retarded children.

She said she'd been working with Eunice Shriver on the Kennedy Olympics for the mentally retarded and, besides visiting homes for the retarded twice a week, had been making appearances in Virginia and Maryland at Eunice's for the Olympic Games.

By 1:30 the crowd reluctantly began to disperse. Nobody wanted to go home, which is a rarity in Washington, but Michael Thomas had collapsed on the library couch and the symphony members were worried about getting a little sleep for their upcoming concert in New York's Philharmonic Hall.

And so the long line of cars slowly pulled out of the driveway and headed back toward Washington.

—KANDY STROUD

boston arts

Contents / Volume 3, Number 4 / April 1970

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a rehearsal.

Heckel and Max Beckmann. Among all the New England museums, the Museum of Fine Arts is the greatest, sheltering and protecting priceless works of art on a vast scale. By its very nature, like all art museums, it is a citadel of art and to some extent a place apart. It preserves some of man's highest achievements of the past, many of them unseen by the public for decades and even for generations. At the same time, it shares much of what it has by exhibitions, publications, lectures, television, and other means. It symbolizes some of the ideals of our society, some of our aspirations, some of our interests. It brings together a group of exceptionally keen-minded and perceptive people, the corps of experts who write and lecture, mount exhibitions, and guide the museum's collecting, exhibiting, and publishing. It looms large in the community, although to describe its place in the community is a difficult and puzzling task. In theory it is for everybody, in practice it is for only a fraction of everybody, yet it reaches not one audience but many audiences, and it reaches them in many ways.

Probably only one other Boston institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, could inspire a history on so broad a scale as Walter Whitehill's centennial history of the Museum. Everything I can say is bounced off the tremendous tapestry of people, problems, and events which he has created. In them I see the Museum in a detail and intricacy and wholeness far beyond any perspective I had before. His history is a casebook of museum problems, of changing ideals and concepts, and it is a gold mine of character and anecdote.

An endearing quality of the history is its outspokenness, its willingness on occasion to disagree with museum policies and describe divergent viewpoints. There is a need today to examine our institutions critically. One of the potentially redeeming qualities of this moment in the United States is the seething discontent at the fatness and comfortableness and standpattedness of so many of our institutions. Our world of museums ought to be subjected to scrutiny as intensive as that currently directed at our universities. There are many ways of looking at the Museum: I'll explore a few.

You can look at it as a group of people of high skill and talent; none of these skills are more impressive than the technical knowledge of preserving works of art, and repairing and restoring them, which has been developed by the Museum's conservation staff. In their laboratories a Whitehill points out very literally could other institutions in

The ideal of a g
contributing in his c institution is a very hundred years, I ha to bring together edge may have rea
about 1940. The M 1940, for instance, charge of the Paint
Coomaraswamy as Indian, Persian, an trude Townsend in Rossiter in charge
head of the Departm Swarzenski as Fello
ture and Medieval ner, as Curator of th
Art, was on station
long-term excavatio brought so much E to Boston. These p fields. They and the incredibly well-bala
many talents, many
the bringing togethe
ple is difficult, but eminence. Find exc them authority. Muc ample of this has be seum of Georg Swa
zenski his son. Eve or coherent collec
the presence of s brings works of ar picture changes. Bo for collections of m
two men have don is remarkable indee

Related to the s
the question of a
ity. The centennial
Mrs. Gardner was Fine Arts. In its firs concerned with the cination of great wo wrapped up in teaching by means of illustrative materials like plaster casts and photographs. With a mood of this kind prevailing, there was never, as the history points out, any question of the Gardner Collection ending up in the Boston Museum. But the Museum was transformed by the collecting of a succession

continued on page 46

The stately rotunda at the Museum of Fine Arts

A Citadel of Art

by Sinclair Hitchings

One Observer's View of Boston's Museum of Fine Arts in its Centennial Year

The world of art in Boston, as in many other cities, is a fascinatingly complex interweaving of collectors, dealers, curators, museum directors, that much-sought-after small group of conservationists and restorers, and art enthusiasts by the many thousands. On this Boston ground there have been many happenings in the visual arts; at this moment the two most extraordinary may well be the Museum of Fine Arts, with its perspectives on the art of so many civilizations, and "The Street" — Newbury Street, with more than thirty galleries in five blocks, and with a neighborly group of interests and skills and kinds of knowledge which add up to a human equation just as interesting, to me, as that of the Museum. Prime movers in these corporate happenings have been individuals who were phenomena in themselves, like Denman Ross, whom you might claim with a multitude of evidence of the highest quality to have been the most versatile and the most broadly perceptive of all American art collectors.

Somewhere on the other side of the water there may be people who think of New England as a quaint, remote little place, full of saltbox houses, with a faintly colonial air about it. I may be slightly afflicted with this vision myself, because it continues to amaze me that New England is such a hinterland for art — that the place is literally crowded with museums, and that into its central market for art in Boston come everything from prints by Mantegna and Rembrandt to Homer and LaFarge watercolors, everything from seventeenth-century Dutch portraits to a wealth of contemporary art from here and abroad, everything from ancient art and primitive art to major showings of work by Erich

, and investi-
. The acquisi-
it an unful-
end its mean-
annot do this emely limited
s. I offer an grain of mu-
people I am
laborate cre-
r museums—
of art of many peri
quality, is to be fou
Versatile as our mu
the years to come w
a place for contemp
seum's roof. With th
base in the commu

Our society, our
very quickly, and the less meaning for our world unless it can think in terms of the resources and movements of our times. We are going to live in a society in which people between the ages of 20 and 80, or maybe 15 and 85, will speak to each other on a basis of equality. Authority and responsibility will be held at many different levels of age. A hundred and forty or fifty years ago in New England, it was commonplace for a man to go around the world, before the mast, at 17 or 18, to be a junior officer on his next voyage, and to command his own ship at 21 or 22. We're getting back to a realization of what can be done by the

our libraries, too — as visiting fellows or research fellows, much more of the young talent that is everywhere in our society. Many of these people are under 25, many have only bachelor of arts degrees, and some left college to travel or to work in the arts or poli-friends, and of a succession of curators is staggeringly impressive. So is the Museum's fifty-million-dollar endowment.

There may be cause for regret, though, about the Museum's long tradition of completely private support. A negative landmark in the Museum's history was the unsuccessful effort, in the years from 1909 through 1912, to obtain annual appropriations from the City. A bill giving the city permission to appropriate up to $50,000 a year for the Museum was never passed by the General Court. A positive landmark, in 1968, was the General Court's vote of $100,000 annually to underwrite the free admission of children.

Looking ahead ten years, a development that clearly is coming — has already begun

William J. Young, Head of the Museum's Research Laboratory

MUSIC

Concerts and Recitals

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

Friday afternoon, April 17 at 2; Saturday evening, April 18 at 8:30; and Tuesday evening, April 21 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Mozart, Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425 "Linz"; Gardner Read, Night flight; and Bartok, Duke Bluebeard's Castle. Evelyn Lear, soprano and Arnold Voketaitis, bass will be guest artists.

Tuesday evening, April 14 at 7:30 and Thursday evening, April 16 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Lopatnikoff, Festival overture; Dvorak, Violin Concerto in A minor op. 53; and Toch, Symphony No. 2. Violinist Edith Peinemann will be the guest artist.

Friday afternoon, April 24 at 2 and Saturday evening, April 25 at 8:30. Baritone Vern Shinali, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society join the orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, in performing Shifrin, Three Pieces for orchestra; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F op. 90; and Walton, Belshazzar's Feast (1931).

Open Rehearsal at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

On Thursday evening, April 23 at 7:30, William Steinberg will lead the B.S.O. in an informative and informal rehearsal of the following Friday's program.

Beethoven Festival — In commemoration of the 200th Anniversary of the composer's birth, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a series of concerts of the great artist's works. Pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern will accompany the orchestra in the programs:

Tuesday evening, April 7 at 8:30, "Consecration of the House" Overture; Violin Concerto; and Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" with Isaac Stern.

Wednesday evening, April 8 at 8:30, Leonore Overture No. 2; Piano Concerto No. 1; and Piano Concerto No. 3, with Rudolf Serkin.

Friday evening, April 10 at 8:30, Choral Fantasia; Piano Concerto No. 4; and Symphony No. 5 with Rudolf Serkin and Chorus Pro Musica.

Saturday evening, April 11, Missa Solemnis with soprano, Martina Arroyo; contralto, Lili Chookasian; tenor, Richard Lewis; bass, Thomas Paul; and the Rutgers University Choir.

(Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.)

183.

ton arts

MARVIN SCHOFER
SYMPHONY HALL
251 MASS AVE
BOSTON MASS 02115
APR 1 1970

183.

boston arts

Contents / Volume 3, Number 4 / April 1970

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a rehearsal.

Heckel and Max Beckmann. Among all the New England museums, the Museum of Fine Arts is the greatest, sheltering and protecting priceless works of art on a vast scale. By its very nature, like all art museums, it is a citadel of art and to some extent a place apart. It preserves some of man's highest achievements of the past, many of them unseen by the public for decades and even for generations. At the same time, it shares much of what it has by exhibitions, publications, lectures, television, and other means. It symbolizes some of the ideals of our society, some of our aspirations, some of our interests. It brings together a group of exceptionally keen-minded and perceptive people, the corps of experts who write and lecture, mount exhibitions, and guide the museum's collecting, exhibiting, and publishing. It looms large in the community, although to describe its place in the community is a difficult and puzzling task. In theory it is for everybody, in practice it is for only a fraction of everybody, yet it reaches not one audience but many audiences, and it reaches them in many ways.

Probably only one other Boston institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, could inspire a history on so broad a scale as Walter Whitehill's centennial history of the Museum. Everything I can say is bounced off the tremendous tapestry of people, problems, and events which he has created. In them I see the Museum in a detail and intricacy and wholeness far beyond any perspective I had before. His history is a casebook of museum problems, of changing ideals and concepts, and it is a gold mine of character and anecdote.

An endearing quality of the history is its outspokenness, its willingness on occasion to disagree with museum policies and describe divergent viewpoints. There is a need today to examine our institutions critically. One of the potentially redeeming qualities of this moment in the United States is the seething discontent at the fatness and comfortableness and standpattedness of so many of our institutions. Our world of museums ought to be subjected to scrutiny as intensive as that currently directed at our universities. There are many ways of looking at the Museum: I'll explore a few.

You can look at it as a group of people of high skill and talent; none of these skills are more impressive than the technical knowledge of preserving works of art, and repairing and restoring them, which has been developed by the Museum's conservation staff. In their laboratories and workshops, as Walter Whitehill points out, work takes place which very literally could be achieved in only a few other institutions in the world.

The ideal of a group of able people each contributing in his own way to the work of an institution is a very old one. In the Museum's hundred years, I have a feeling that the effort to bring together people of special knowledge may have reached a high water mark about 1940. The Museum Bulletin of August, 1940, for instance, shows W. G. Constable in charge of the Paintings Department, Ananda Coomaraswamy as Fellow for Research in Indian, Persian, and Muhammadan Art, Gertrude Townsend in charge of textiles, Henry Rossiter in charge of prints, Kojiro Tomita as head of the Department of Asiatic Art, Georg Swarzenski as Fellow for Research in Sculpture and Medieval Art. George Andrew Reisner, as Curator of the Department of Egyptian Art, was on station in Egypt, carrying out the long-term excavations and researches which brought so much Egyptian art of high quality to Boston. These people were giants in their fields. They and their compatriots formed an incredibly well-balanced curatorial staff of many talents, many backgrounds. Undeniably, the bringing together of such a group of people is difficult, but it is indispensable to preeminence. Find exceptional people and give them authority. Much else will follow. An example of this has been the impact on the Museum of Georg Swarzenski and Hanns Swarzenski his son. Even when you lack a large or coherent collection in a particular field, the presence of staff members like these brings works of art of high quality, and the picture changes. Boston has never been noted for collections of medieval art, but what these two men have done to change that situation is remarkable indeed.

Related to the stature of the curators is the question of a museum's own individuality. The centennial history makes it clear that Mrs. Gardner was bored by the Museum of Fine Arts. In its first decades it was too little concerned with the elemental, essential fascination of great works of art, and much more wrapped up in teaching by means of illustrative materials like plaster casts and photographs. With a mood of this kind prevailing, there was never, as the history points out, any question of the Gardner Collection ending up in the Boston Museum. But the Museum was transformed by the collecting of a succession

continued on page 46

among them
rgis Bigelow,
Ross. Walter
n its museum ne country in nese, and Ind Greek and he Museum's ountry). Such ent from the
it in which y expertly, in o be original ncluding the he chance to ollecting, exnding photomple, though head in this oling hard to

Museum is in art it owns.
eums, includ-
everyone has ne art inside doubt it is a er more than of fragments discovered to t importance,
lly, I find this we are never e than a tiny
n collections,
nsibility that is to examine
, and investi-
. The acquisi-
it an unful-
end its mean-
annot do this emely limited
s. I offer an grain of mu-
people I am
laborate cre-
r museums—

of art of many peri
quality, is to be fou
Versatile as our mu
the years to come w
a place for contemp
seum's roof. With th
base in the commu

Our society, our
very quickly, and the less meaning for our world unless it can think in terms of the resources and movements of our times. We are going to live in a society in which people between the ages of 20 and 80, or maybe 15 and 85, will speak to each other on a basis of equality. Authority and responsibility will be held at many different levels of age. A hundred and forty or fifty years ago in New England, it was commonplace for a man to go around the world, before the mast, at 17 or 18, to be a junior officer on his next voyage, and to command his own ship at 21 or 22. We're getting back to a realization of what can be done by the tics or the civilizing of our environment. Believe me, the drive and eagerness and stock of information of many young Americans gets things done. There are millions of Americans under 25 looking for jobs, and you hire them just the way you hire anyone else, by picking the best you can find. But, of course, you have to have the jobs first.

William J. Young, Head of the Museum's Research Laboratory

If we can create a new level of research activity based on staffs that are both larger and younger, you will begin to see surveys of collections now in storage, and studies of objects and groups of objects that no one sees or even thinks about today. In many ways, through many undertakings, our comprehension of the past of humanity will grow. The professor reconciles teaching and scholarship; curators should be able to include in their jobs the advising of a young, able research staff. We talk a lot in this country about creating jobs; we had better start including museums in this goal.

As the Boston Museum and the Metropolitan Museum celebrate their centennials this year, the Met seems to me to have three things going for it. First, and obviously, it is in the financial center, and the art collecting center, of the country. Second, it has a long-standing tradition of annual appropriations as part of the New York City budget. Third, it is frankly interested in contemporary art, it is giving people a chance to see contemporary art on a generous scale, and as a result it is more broadly in touch with our presentday world than the Boston Museum, which has sometimes behaved toward contemporary art like a barefoot man toward a rattlesnake.

The Boston Museum hardly needs to regret being where it is and what it is, for the record of Boston collectors, of more distant friends, and of a succession of curators is staggeringly impressive. So is the Museum's fifty-million-dollar endowment.

There may be cause for regret, though, about the Museum's long tradition of completely private support. A negative landmark in the Museum's history was the unsuccessful effort, in the years from 1909 through 1912, to obtain annual appropriations from the City. A bill giving the city permission to appropriate up to $50,000 a year for the Museum was never passed by the General Court. A positive landmark, in 1968, was the General Court's vote of $100,000 annually to underwrite the free admission of children.

Looking ahead ten years, a development that clearly is coming — has already begun

continued on page 44

MUSIC

Concerts and Recitals

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

Friday afternoon, April 17 at 2; Saturday evening, April 18 at 8:30; and Tuesday evening, April 21 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Mozart, Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425 "Linz"; Gardner Read, Night flight; and Bartok, Duke Bluebeard's Castle. Evelyn Lear, soprano and Arnold Voketaitis, bass will be guest artists.

Tuesday evening, April 14 at 7:30 and Thursday evening, April 16 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Lopatnikoff, Festival overture; Dvorak, Violin Concerto in A minor op. 53; and Toch, Symphony No. 2. Violinist Edith Peinemann will be the guest artist.

Friday afternoon, April 24 at 2 and Saturday evening, April 25 at 8:30. Baritone Vern Shinali, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society join the orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, in performing Shifrin, Three Pieces for orchestra; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F op. 90; and Walton, Belshazzar's Feast (1931).

Open Rehearsal at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

On Thursday evening, April 23 at 7:30, William Steinberg will lead the B.S.O. in an informative and informal rehearsal of the following Friday's program.

Beethoven Festival — In commemoration of the 200th Anniversary of the composer's birth, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a series of concerts of the great artist's works. Pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern will accompany the orchestra in the programs:

Tuesday evening, April 7 at 8:30, "Consecration of the House" Overture; Violin Concerto; and Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" with Isaac Stern.

Wednesday evening, April 8 at 8:30, Leonore Overture No. 2; Piano Concerto No. 1; and Piano Concerto No. 3, with Rudolf Serkin.

Friday evening, April 10 at 8:30, Choral Fantasia; Piano Concerto No. 4; and Symphony No. 5 with Rudolf Serkin and Chorus Pro Musica.

Saturday evening, April 11, Missa Solemnis with soprano, Martina Arroyo; contralto, Lili Chookasian; tenor, Richard Lewis; bass, Thomas Paul; and the Rutgers University Choir.

(Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.)

ston arts

MARVIN SCHOFER
SYMPHONY HALL
251 MASS AVE
BOSTON MASS 02115
APR 1 1970

boston arts

Contents / Volume 3, Number 4 / April 1970

A spacious and recently renovated Asiatic Gallery at the Museum of Fine Arts

At Plays

gs

e

dules

ne Rosenfeld, Pre
Peggy Loeb, Edi
sistant Publishe
ald Rosenfeld, S

blications Inc. All
r part without writt
shed monthly exc
e is published, b
ne Press Publica
postage paid at Bo
75¢. Change of ad
four weeks for cha

ART from page 22

of intensely original people, among them Ernest Fenellosa, William Sturgis Bigelow, Edward Warren, and Denman Ross. Walter Whitehill points out that Boston in its museum was way ahead of the rest of the country in its collections of Japanese, Chinese, and Indian art, of ancient Egyptian and Greek and Roman art, of textiles, of prints (the Museum's print room was the first in the country). Such venturesomeness was very different from the climbing-on-the-bandwagon spirit in which period rooms were built, not very expertly, in the 1920's. There is still room to be original today in a number of fields, including the vast field of contemporary art. The chance to have a consistent program for collecting, exhibiting, and publishing outstanding photographs still exists, as another example, though other institutions are now far ahead in this field and others still are scrambling hard to build coherent collections.

Another way of looking at the Museum is in terms of the sheer quantity of art it owns. One fact about our great art museums, including the Boston Museum, that everyone has come to know about is this: the art inside them is piling up very fast. No doubt it is a sign of great wealth when, after more than fifty years of storage, a group of fragments in the Museum basement are discovered to be an Egyptian sculpture of great importance, and are pieced together. Personally, I find this story disquieting. Granting that we are never going to be able to exhibit more than a tiny fraction of the art in the Museum collections, there is another kind of responsibility that seems to me to be genuine. That is to examine the usefulness of the collections, and investigate ways of making them useful. The acquisition of all this art carries with it an unfulfilled obligation to try to comprehend its meaning and to make it known. You cannot do this job, in a big way, with the extremely limited staffs currently in our museums. I offer an answer that will go against the grain of museum tradition, since many of the people I am talking about would not bring elaborate credentials. We need to take into our museums—our libraries, too — as visiting fellows or research fellows, much more of the young talent that is everywhere in our society. Many of these people are under 25, many have only bachelor of arts degrees, and some left college to travel or to work in the arts or politics or the civilizing of our environment. Believe me, the drive and eagerness and stock of information of many young Americans gets things done. There are millions of Americans under 25 looking for jobs, and you hire them just the way you hire anyone else, by picking the best you can find. But, of course, you have to have the jobs first.

If we can create a new level of research activity based on staffs that are both larger and younger, you will begin to see surveys of collections now in storage, and studies of objects and groups of objects that no one sees or even thinks about today. In many ways, through many undertakings, our comprehension of the past of humanity will grow. The professor reconciles teaching and scholarship; curators should be able to include in their jobs the advising of a young, able research staff. We talk a lot in this country about creating jobs; we had better start including museums in this goal.

As the Boston Museum and the Metropolitan Museum celebrate their centennials this year, the Met seems to me to have three things going for it. First, and obviously, it is in the financial center, and the art collecting center, of the country. Second, it has a long-standing tradition of annual appropriations as part of the New York City budget. Third, it is frankly interested in contemporary art, it is giving people a chance to see contemporary art on a generous scale, and as a result it is more broadly in touch with our presentday world than the Boston Museum, which has sometimes behaved toward contemporary art like a barefoot man toward a rattlesnake.

The Boston Museum hardly needs to regret being where it is and what it is, for the record of Boston collectors, of more distant friends, and of a succession of curators is staggeringly impressive. So is the Museum's fifty-million-dollar endowment.

There may be cause for regret, though, about the Museum's long tradition of completely private support. A negative landmark in the Museum's history was the unsuccessful effort, in the years from 1909 through 1912, to obtain annual appropriations from the City. A bill giving the city permission to appropriate up to $50,000 a year for the Museum was never passed by the General Court. A positive landmark, in 1968, was the General Court's vote of $100,000 annually to underwrite the free admission of children.

Looking ahead ten years, a development that clearly is coming — has already begun to come — is the use tion of tax revenues t enterprises afloat. T

seums are understaf
do their job properly
ing new jobs and try decent level, as far labor costs have to
est on endowment.
greater recognition,
educational work of range goal should b
by the city and the well.

Now for the third museums, their attitu
art. May I point ou been contemporary begins, for it is mos
by living artists, and dead. At this mome credibly diverse, an citing single field for and institutions reco ton Museum is not a community at the mo temporary art largely efforts being made b Street galleries. But large, doesn't speak communications gap
jor centers of art in B
Is it necessary to po
of art of many peri
quality, is to be fou
Versatile as our mus
the years to come w
a place for contemp
seum's roof. With th base in the commun

Our society, our
very quickly, and the less meaning for our world unless it can think in terms of the resources and movements of our times. We are going to live in a society in which people between the ages of 20 and 80, or maybe 15 and 85, will speak to each other on a basis of equality. Authority and responsibility will be held at many different levels of age. A hundred and forty or fifty years ago in New England, it was commonplace for a man to go around the world, before the mast, at 17 or 18, to be a junior officer on his next voyage, and to command his own ship at 21 or 22. We're getting back to a realization of what can be done by the well-known in the Boston area for its contributions to the culture of all races for some twenty years, makes abundant use of the poetry and prose of Black writers. Recitations and oral interpretations of these works give the children a lesson in what it means to be Black as expressed by such articulate men as LeRoi Jones, Ben Caldwell, and Ed Bullins. The lesson also includes the techniques of expression, projection, and enunciation.

William J. Young, Head of the Museum's Research Laboratory

"It's the techniques these kids need. The imagination and creativity are there. All we have to do is channel this creativity and believe me, it's a job just to keep up with them."

continued on page 44

MUSIC

Concerts and Recitals

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

Friday afternoon, April 17 at 2; Saturday evening, April 18 at 8:30; and Tuesday evening, April 21 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Mozart, Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425 "Linz"; Gardner Read, Night flight; and Bartok, Duke Bluebeard's Castle. Evelyn Lear, soprano and Arnold Voketaitis, bass will be guest artists.

Tuesday evening, April 14 at 7:30 and Thursday evening, April 16 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Lopatnikoff, Festival overture; Dvorak, Violin Concerto in A minor op. 53; and Toch, Symphony No. 2. Violinist Edith Peinemann will be the guest artist.

Friday afternoon, April 24 at 2 and Saturday evening, April 25 at 8:30. Baritone Vern Shinali, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society join the orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, in performing Shifrin, Three Pieces for orchestra; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F op. 90; and Walton, Belshazzar's Feast (1931).

Open Rehearsal at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

On Thursday evening, April 23 at 7:30, William Steinberg will lead the B.S.O. in an informative and informal rehearsal of the following Friday's program.

Beethoven Festival — In commemoration of the 200th Anniversary of the composer's birth, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a series of concerts of the great artist's works. Pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern will accompany the orchestra in the programs:

Tuesday evening, April 7 at 8:30, "Consecration of the House" Overture; Violin Concerto; and Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" with Isaac Stern.

Wednesday evening, April 8 at 8:30, Leonore Overture No. 2; Piano Concerto No. 1; and Piano Concerto No. 3, with Rudolf Serkin.

Friday evening, April 10 at 8:30, Choral Fantasia; Piano Concerto No. 4; and Symphony No. 5 with Rudolf Serkin and Chorus Pro Musica.

Saturday evening, April 11, Missa Solemnis with soprano, Martina Arroyo; contralto, Lili Chookasian; tenor, Richard Lewis; bass, Thomas Paul; and the Rutgers University Choir.

(Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.)

ston arts

MARVIN SCHECTER
SYMPHONY HALL
251 MASS AVE
BOSTON MASS 02115

APR 1 1970

183.

boston arts

Contents / Volume 3, Number 4 / April 1970

At Plays

gs

e

dules

ne Rosenfeld, Pre
Peggy Loeb, Edi
ssistant Publishe
ald Rosenfeld, S

blications Inc. All
r part without writt
shed monthly exc
e is published, b
ne Press Publica
postage paid at Bo
75¢. Change of ad
our weeks for cha

A spacious and recently renovated Asiatic Gallery at the Museum of Fine Arts

to come — is the use of at least a small portion of tax revenues to help keep various arts enterprises afloat. To the extent that museums are understaffed, they aren't able to do their job properly. We can't go on creating new jobs and trying to raise salaries to a decent level, as far as I can see, if these labor costs have to be paid out of the interest on endowment. If a short-range goal is greater recognition, at the state level, of the educational work of our museums, a long-range goal should be annual appropriations by the city and the federal government as well.

Now for the third difference between the museums, their attitudes toward contemporary art. May I point out that there has always been contemporary art? That is how all art begins, for it is most broadly defined as art by living artists, and nothing is created by the dead. At this moment the field is vast, incredibly diverse, and probably the most exciting single field for collecting. Many people and institutions recognize this, but the Boston Museum is not among them. The Boston community at the moment gets access to contemporary art largely through the outstanding efforts being made by a number of Newbury Street galleries. But the Museum, by and large, doesn't speak to Newbury Street. The communications gap between these two major centers of art in Boston is to me incredible. Is it necessary to point out that a great deal of art of many periods, much of it of high quality, is to be found on Newbury Street? Versatile as our museum is, I think that in the years to come we can hope for more of a place for contemporary art under the Museum's roof. With that will come a broader base in the community.

Our society, our population, is changing very quickly, and the museum is going to have less meaning for our world unless it can think in terms of the resources and movements of our times. We are going to live in a society in which people between the ages of 20 and 80, or maybe 15 and 85, will speak to each other on a basis of equality. Authority and responsibility will be held at many different levels of age. A hundred and forty or fifty years ago in New England, it was commonplace for a man to go around the world, before the mast, at 17 or 18, to be a junior officer on his next voyage, and to command his own ship at 21 or 22. We're getting back to a realization of what can be done by the young, and we're moving into a society in which people won't wait their turn. They won't have to. In the world of music, or of movie-making, you can find young Americans who have a lot of authority. You can find 25-year-old producers at Channel 2, but try to find them as curators in our art museums. We've got to throw open the doors of our institutions to the young talent in our society. If we can do this, some of our institutions as they grow older will also grow younger, and that is one of my hopes not only for the Museum but for many other cultural institutions in Boston.

Sinclair Hitchings is Keeper of Prints Boston Public Library. His article is based on a talk given at the Boston Citizen Seminar on the Museum Centennial, sponsored by Boston College and held at the Sheraton-Boston Hotel on February 17.

William J. Young, Head of the Museum's Research Laboratory

MUSIC

Concerts and Recitals

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

Friday afternoon, April 17 at 2; Saturday evening, April 18 at 8:30; and Tuesday evening, April 21 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Mozart, Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425 "Linz"; Gardner Read, Night flight; and Bartok, Duke Bluebeard's Castle. Evelyn Lear, soprano and Arnold Voketaitis, bass will be guest artists.

Tuesday evening, April 14 at 7:30 and Thursday evening, April 16 at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in Lopatnikoff, Festival overture; Dvorak, Violin Concerto in A minor op. 53; and Toch, Symphony No. 2. Violinist Edith Peinemann will be the guest artist.

Friday afternoon, April 24 at 2 and Saturday evening, April 25 at 8:30. Baritone Vern Shinali, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society join the orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, in performing Shifrin, Three Pieces for orchestra; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F op. 90; and Walton, Belshazzar's Feast (1931).

Open Rehearsal at Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.

On Thursday evening, April 23 at 7:30, William Steinberg will lead the B.S.O. in an informative and informal rehearsal of the following Friday's program.

Beethoven Festival — In commemoration of the 200th Anniversary of the composer's birth, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a series of concerts of the great artist's works. Pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern will accompany the orchestra in the programs:

Tuesday evening, April 7 at 8:30, "Consecration of the House" Overture; Violin Concerto; and Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" with Isaac Stern.

Wednesday evening, April 8 at 8:30, Leonore Overture No. 2; Piano Concerto No. 1; and Piano Concerto No. 3, with Rudolf Serkin.

Friday evening, April 10 at 8:30, Choral Fantasia; Piano Concerto No. 4; and Symphony No. 5 with Rudolf Serkin and Chorus Pro Musica.

Saturday evening, April 11, Missa Solemnis with soprano, Martina Arroyo; contralto, Lili Chookasian; tenor, Richard Lewis; bass, Thomas Paul; and the Rutgers University Choir.

(Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.)

183.

boston arts

april 75¢

MARVIN SCHEFFER
SYMPHONY HALL
251 MASS AVE
BOSTON MASS 02115
APR 1 1971

184.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 1 1970 New England

Authors meet at Globe party

HUSBAND and WIFE team, novelist Anne Bernays and biographer Justin Kaplan (right), with poet Francis Hatch. (Bill Ryerson photo)

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

Nothing, as the dear old bromide really goes succeeds like success.

This touch of truth out-hoaxed even the weathermen, poet and publisher, editor and edited, swarmed into the Sheraton Plaza Oval Room for one of those benign ear-benders that serves both communication and comaraderie.

Reviewers and reviewed need a special kind of ambulience to find a warm common denominator, and The Globe authors' party yesterday discovered it.

It was the talk, the anticipation, that brought stalwarts through the snow from the Cape and from the Berkshires, that locked poet Sissman (L.E.) with politician Saltonstall (Jock) in deep and avid argument.

Msgr. Lally of the Pilot, plunged into poetic backgrounds with poet-laureate David McCord. Boston University's Millicent Bell and husband Eugene were involved with the Edward Darlings (he's head of the Uni-

Atlantic Monthly's Robert Manning made the rounds with The Globe's Herbert Kenney, and the husband-and-wife team of the day were the Justin Kaplans—she's Anne Bernays, novelist of best-sellers and he's the biographer and Pulitzer Prizer. Proving authorship can be done in tandem, with success. Her parents, the Edward Bernayses (Doris Fleischman) authors and publicists sine qua non, established the pattern.

Others present were bearded author Truman Nelson, Poetry by Request's Jean Harper, Simmons' Richard Sterne, Barre Press's Ronald Johnson, poet Ruth Whitman, Greek scholar Sterling Dow, Houghton Mifflin's Craig Wylie and Stephen Grant, Sinclair Hitchings, Gardiner Read, composer in residence at Boston University, biographer Eleanor Ruggles, Dr. Carl Bearsem Abe and Sylvia Burack, and Boston's own recorder for all statuses, Frank Hatch.

It is devoutly to be hoped that someone from Symphony Hall is latching on to the BSO's favorite trustee with an eye to immortalizing the Maxim's-of-Paris 90th anniversary Symphony Ball this month with a resonant reading of Hatch sonnets linking the BSO with the joys of Paris.

Society
By ROSE WALSH

Boston Symphony Plays for Its Supper

Senator and Mrs. Ted Kennedy have always had great admiration and a warm "family" feeling for the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In fact, Joan has done a comentary with it on a couple of occasions at Symphony Hall. And for the past two years when the orchestra has presented its annual concerts in Washington, the Kennedys have entertained members at their home in McLean, Va.

Last week, the BSO gave two fine concerts in the Capitol's Constitution Hall and Joan and Ted hosted a reception after Tuesday evening's program.

ROSE WALSH

Invited to meet the talented musicians were members of the Washington Performing Arts Society, the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts and some personal friends.

Guests were transported from the concert by chartered bus to the charming, five-acre home overlooking the Potomac River. Joan had left the concert a bit early and was waiting inside the flower-decked patio to graciously welcome every guest.

Joan greeted many of the musicians by their first names and, due to her knowledge of music, carried on chatty conversation.

★

For the orchestra's 25-year-old assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, who had gloriously conducted both Washington concerts, she added a special "bravo."

Washington Post music critic Paul Hume had glowingly reviewed the previous night's performance, stating that "Thomas came off well in every department."

Mrs. Joan Kennedy has long enjoyed a close association with the Boston Symphony

Of the BSO, Hume wrote: "The players of the Boston Symphony are experts of the highest caliber, capable of playing handsomely if given the barest cues."

★

So Tuesday night called for celebration.

Some guests gathered in the spacious weather-oak beamed library where a cheery fire burned in the great open fireplace.

Others congregated in the attractive living room and enjoyed looking at the array of family pictures on a long table and corner desk.

Later everyone adjourned to the beautiful dining room where the buffet table was centered with an antique silver and crystal epergne.

★

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein headed the group of Boston Symphony guests, among whom were Noah Bielski and Alfred Schneider (first violinists); Michael Vital and Victor Manusevitch (second violinists); Martin Hoherman and Hidenobu Tsuchida (cellos).

Also, Joseph Hearne and John Barwicki (basses); Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis (flutes); Lois Schafer (piccolo); Pasquale Cardillo (clarinet); Ernst Panenka (bassoon); James Stagliano and Ralph Pottle (horns); Armando Ghitalla (trumpet).

★

Lovely Benita Valente, who had been soprano soloist at the concert, was accompanied by her husband, Tony Cecchia, managing director of the Marlboro Festival.

The Arthur P. Hendricks and Frederick L. Holborn of the Washington Performing Arts were in the merry gathering. So were Mr. and Mrs. David Rockefeller, Jr., and from the John F. Kennedy Center of Performing Arts came the Roger L. Stevens, the George Londons, Ambassador and Mrs. Sol Linowitz, Mrs. Jouett Shouse and Congressman Peter H. B. Frelinghuysen.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 482,950

APR 5 1970

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Thursday, April 2, 1970 ★

Ikuko Mizuno

'Levels obstacles'

By Nora E. Taylor

Major orchestras in the United States are often chary of taking distaff players. Yet Ikuko Mizuno has hurdled the barriers that separated a small girl in Tokyo, without playmates and bored, from a seat in the violin section of one of America's top five orchestras, the Boston Symphony.

It was a long journey, and it was Miss Mizuno's quiet determination that carried her through, even though her musical career had begun by happenstance.

In childhood days the tiny dark-haired miss constantly wandered far from home seeking a companion. To keep her within sight her mother, a pianist without a piano, which had been lost in World War II, accepted a tiny violin for her little daughter. She sent her to a nearby teacher for lessons.

"I always hated to practice," Miss Mizuno recalls now, "and I still do." But she went twice a week even without practicing. Then her teacher's teacher returned from Germany to found the Toho-Gakuen school of Western music.

Miss Mizuno became a student. So did Seiji Ozawa, the conductor. They even shared classes sometimes. After six years of study with Toshiya Eto, a student of Efrem Zimbalist, the young girl had absorbed all she could. Her teacher told her to go to the United States or Europe for further training. She was more than willing. Her parents, however, were not. "My father didn't like it. He ignored my hope," Miss Mizuno said. "So I decided to do everything." They had reckoned without a young girl's determination in a modern world.

The language barrier, traditional filial respect, possible feminine timidity, were put aside. Young Ikuko began to plan. A concert tour to the United States with her school orchestra had broadened her horizons. "I got a scholarship to go to Boston University," she said, as if it were the easiest thing to do from Japan.

"I sent them a tape and my school grades." The tape was made professionally and signed by Miss Mizuno and those making it to assure authenticity. It was heard by Roman Totenberg, and he accepted her as a pupil. She was given a Spaulding Award.

Next she got her student visa from the American authorities. When she presented all this to her father he "couldn't say no to me, so I went." Her parents did extract a promise that she would return within two years. She did—but only for four weeks.

By that time she was finding her feet in the new country and had become a fellow at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Finally she graduated from BU with a Master of Music degree. Since she was still in the United States her parents began visiting her, her father in 1967, her mother to watch her daughter graduate.

PEOPLE

Photography Incorporated

Violinist

. . . Ikuko Mizuno, who "always hated to practice," has a seat in the violin section of the Boston Symphony.

Miss Mizuno herself still did not know where her future would lie. But in Japan, she said, there are so many violinists that there is little opportunity for one more, and a girl at that.

Then came the big offer from Boston Symphony to be a replacement player. And later, last September, she was offered her present position in the violin section.

Almost at the same time she was invited to join a BSO trio and thereby turn it into a quartet. Miss Mizuno's group, the Festival String Quartet, is a mini-United Nations with Christopher Kimber, violin, from Australia, Yizhak Schotten, viola, from Israel, Jerome Patterson, cello, from the United States, as well as Miss Mizuno.

The young woman has now converted her student visa into a permanent one. That particular process presented its own problem. It denied her the opportunity to go home for a long-planned visit, because of a legal residence requirement. She telephoned Tokyo one evening to break that news. Then, her determination winning out again, she phoned again to suggest that her only sister, whom she had not seen for three years, meet her in Hawaii. They met, and the young girl came with Miss Mizuno to Boston before returning home.

The violinist admits that she has been fortunate. Each thing she needed to do happened at a time when the climate was favorable. But, somehow, one knows that, had circumstances been otherwise, she still would have triumphed. She has that sort of determination that levels obstacles.

College Club in Concert April 12

The Jewish Women's College Club annual fund raising concert will take place at 8:15 p.m.

MAX HOBART

Sunday evening, April 12, Recital Hall, New England Conservatory of Music, 290 Huntington Avenue, Boston. Guest artist will be violinist Max Hobart, accompanied by Newton Wayland.

Mr. Hobart was recently appointed second assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is also a member of the Violone Ensemble, concertmaster and string coach of the Boston Civic and Newton Symphonies and second violinist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Proceeds will benefit the scholarship fund of the Jewish Women's College Club, established 49 years ago. Fund is used exclusively for supplementary scholarships to girls in local colleges and universities.

A contribution of $50.00 or more designates Scholarship Grantors, $25.00 for Patrons, $10.00 for Sponsors and $5.00 for Donors. Contributions are tax deductible.

Invitations may be obtained from Miss Lillian Robbins, president or Mrs. Carl M. Fagerson, Chairman.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

APR 2 1970

Friends Of BSO

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will attend a gala Wine-Tasting Festival at the Marriott Motor Hotel in Newton, Wednesday evening, April 8.

The party will mark the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, whose music will be featured by the Boston Symphony in their concerts during this period. In keeping with the spirit of Beethoven, only German wines will be served at this affair being held in conjunction with the 90th Anniversary Grand Prix to benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seven rare and unusual wines will be provided by the Marriott for the occasion which is under the supervision of Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 482,950

APR 5 1970

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's "Summerthing" at Tanglewood won't be much affected if its musical director, ailing William Steinberg, can't make it to the podium there. Steinberg is slated to conduct only six concerts. The rest will be under the command of Seijo Ozawa . . . The man most interested in whether City Councilor Tom Atkins decides to run against Sam Harmon for the latter's seat in the Senate is Boston Licensing Board member Albert L. O'Neil. If Atkins should go for it and win, he would probably resign his present office and O'Neil would get it. He finished 10th in the election for that office last fall. And — his term on the Licensing Board expires June 1 . . . The agent for John McKenney, fourth draft choice of the Boston Celtics is a $1-a-year man. Dr. James Capps of Norfolk, Va. Capps, who will accompany McKenney here for contract negotiations with "Red" Auerbach this week, took a liking to the fourth leading small college scorer in the country early in his basketball career at Norfolk State College.

HAROLD BANKS

JEWISH TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

APR 2 1970

185

A good year for Major Higginson

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

If Major Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the Boston Symphony and spent the rest of his life (and his fortune) trying to keep it going, could pick a year to hover over the BSO on the wings he certainly earned in this life, what a comforting year this one would be.

The deficit he'd certainly understand—he wrote more than once "I am very close to despair over finances." In fact there's not a problem he didn't have a go at more than 50 years ago. But how that firm believer in "the goodness of people" wold glory in a Talcott Banks, a Henry Cabot, a Michael Tilson Thomas or this week's unpublicized on-stage BSO dinner for its "saving-grace" donors.

And, most especially, in last night's spontaneous gesture by the Marriott Motor Hotel honoring both the Symphony and the gals who founded the Friends and have thought up wonderful things for them to do ever since.

The German wines served also marked Beethoven's 200th birthday anniversary, which the BSO celebrates this week.

Tilson Thomas, the 25-year-old assistant conductor of the BSO, spoke briefly. Serge Koussevitzky lived again in the words he spoke and the flame of his dream that is Tanglewood, and the challenge of this 90th Symphony year suddenly belonged to everyone. Ted Banks' own welcome was like coming home.

This prelude to the prty of this and many another long year, the Symphony Ball Apr. 27 with its entire setting lown in from Maxim's in Paris. saw also the first magic "Grand Prix" slips that can mean you might be the Aga Khan's guest for two weeks.

Or a trip to Paris. There are nine prizes in all.

Familiar Symphony faces in the big panelled room — the Lewis Cabots, Judy Cabot, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Paul Schmid, Austrua's Consul Edward Masterman and his wife, Germany's Hans Sante, consul General, the Richard Ehrliches and Dr. and Mrs. Karl Riemer.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 9 1970 New

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 12 1970 N

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 13 1970 N
Eng

Final BSO Lecture of Season

THE COUNCIL OF FRIENDS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heralds spring with its final program of events. The last in the series of four lectures, "Know Your Orchestra," will be held Friday, April 17, at 11:30, in the basement of Symphony Hall. Charles Smith of the percussion section of the orchestra will be the lecturer. Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird are co-chairmen of these lectures.

The final Symphony Luncheon of the season will be held Friday, April 24, at 12:15, in Horticultural Hall. Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson head this series, and the Andover, Marblehead and North Shore Areas of the Council will be in charge of this luncheon.

Because the luncheon and the lecture series continue to be sellouts due to the tremendous response in support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they will be held again next year. Guests are welcome at these events, but better call Mrs. Kay Whitty, executive secretary, at the Friends office.

So what's wrong with Rock?

Globe 4/8/70

Memory says that Sir Winston Churchill once allowed as to how he would strike up an alliance with the devil if necessary to defeat Hitler. He probably didn't mean it quite the way it sounds, and Rock and Roll is not exactly a devil's export anyway.

But it could be a revenue producer, and one wonders, therefore, why the John B. Hynes Civic Auditorium refuses to strike up an alliance with it. The auditorium operated at a loss of $40,000 last year, and that ought to say something especially with Rock and Roll aficionados standing around unwanted with real cash in their hands.

"It's not the music," explains George Laing, auditorium manager. "It's what happens to the people at these festivals."

But none of the other eight municipal auditoriums in New England and none in the major cities in the East turns up its nose at Rock and Roll, and none, not even Symphony Hall, reports any catastrophes.

"Let's just say that we dislike Rock," says Mr. Laing, coming, probably, closer to the truth of it.

But the kids like it, even some of their parents do, and surely none, not even Mr. Laing, likes the annual auditorium deficit. For $40,000 (and how much is that on the tax rate?) even the stodgiest of us should be able to put up with a perforated eardrum or two.

Newsweek - Apr. 13, 1970

The Kid From Boston

Since conductors, knock wood, frequently enjoy good health and long life, young assistants wait in the wings, hoping against hope, reminding themselves that the 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein leaped to fame and fortune in 1943 when with a few hours' notice he substituted as conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the indisposed Bruno Walter.

Twenty-five-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas emerged even more suddenly. Last fall, when the Boston Symphony was playing at Philharmonic Hall in New York, conductor William Steinberg became ill at intermission. Recalls Thomas, "When Mr. Steinberg left the stage he said, 'Put your suit on, you're going to conduct.' I think I blacked out. I conducted in a daze. I remember standing offstage and asking the musicians as they filed off, 'Was it all right? Was I any good?' But not till much later did I remember actually conducting."

Last week, Thomas, firmly at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to Philharmonic Hall. Steinberg, fully recovered, will not resume his duties until next season. The program Thomas chose—Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1—seemed expressly designed to show off his three-century range.

Thomas conducted the Bach with appropriate eighteenth-century elegance, as if he were wearing white gloves and Frederick II were sitting in the audience. The music emerged crisp, restrained and even tempered. He was less successful, not quite bold enough with Stravinsky's 1945 work, which looks both to the past and the future. Thomas was most at home in the storm and strife of Tchaikovsky, in command of the youthful Weltschmerz and the long swelling passionate seas of melody. He seemed to be smiling at the orchestra at the end, gathering in the lush harvest of sound with great wide sweeps of his arms. He looked a little like a Walter Mitty waking from a daydream to find himself actually conducting the Boston Symphony, inspiring them to that big, ultimate symphonic sound, wowie!

Paul Conklin

Thomas: Hands and eyes

Body: A belief in the physical is a cardinal principle of his conducting technique. "In rehearsal you can tell the orchestra what you want," he says. "But if you have to go out there as I did, cold, with works you have never conducted, before an orchestra prepared by another conductor with different ideas, you've only got your body to rely on. It's a continuing battle, to communicate through the body. That's the real challenge."

For Thomas the body is the eyes as much as the hands: "You can catch the eye of a musician and things get rosy. You can plant a kernel of what you want and see it grow. Of course there are times when you look at someone and he doesn't look back, or they're looking at me and I'm not looking at them."

Tall, lean, Thomas revels in the performing aspects of conducting and comes by it naturally. Paul Muni was his cousin; his father, Ted Thomas, is a filmmaker; his grandparents, Bessie and Boris Thomashefsky, helped found the Yiddish theater in New York. He himself was born in Hollywood, started playing the piano at 5, conducted on the West Coast while still in his teens, acted as assistant to Pierre Boulez both in California and in Bayreuth, Germany, and won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting at Tanglewood in 1968, the next year he was appointed assistant conductor of the BSO. Now a hot property, Thomas will be much more visible next year in Boston—and is also sorting out many offers to conduct here and abroad.

Flying: He's a bright, thoughtful young man who seems still to be counting the changes a few months have brought. "I'm less afraid of the established composers and interpretations," he says. "I remember what Gregor Piatigorsky told a student playing Beethoven. 'Cross out the name Beethoven,' Piatigorsky said. 'Write in Grussmach'." You have to find your own interpretation. Ideally I want every piece analyzed, technically, structurally, formally. And I want it to come out shatteringly integrated, like a crystal, totally whole, defying analysis. What all the intellect must lead to is the non-rational—that feeling out there that you're flying. My grandmother used to say you can give the greatest performance in the world but, if they don't hear you in the balcony, it's worthless."

—H. S.

Music

Fundless Philharmonia

by Harry Neville
HT Music Critc

During the past year cultural columns have been filled with stories about the crisis of the performing arts in the U.S. Most of these stories have dealt with the disastrous financial plight of symphony orchestras throughout the country, and the nature of the crisis has been so well documented and explained that it is necessary here only to summarize a few of the basic facts.

Orchestras are not and have not for many years been self-sustaining organizations. Under the best of circumstances the money generated by ticket sales and recording contracts is insufficient to meet operating expenses. In the past, patrons were able to make up the difference and, in some instances, establish endowment funds which seemed to ensure future solvency.

However, as operating expenses have grown larger—and they inevitably have because of such factors as inflation and the demands of musicians for decent living standards—the gap between income and outgo has also increased. For one thing, ticket revenue has remained relatively fixed; for another, lucrative recording contracts have become increasingly scarce items. As a result, some orchestras have been forced to dip into hitherto sacrosanct endowment funds simply in order to maintain the status quo.

The situation is now well beyond the point at which individual donors alone can supply the needed cash. Some of the onus must be assumed by corporations, foundations and the government if orchestras are to continue their existence. To a degree, all these agencies have been cooperative (minimally so in the case of the government), but to date the response has been inadequate and only a major change of attitude will enable orchestras to weather the crisis.

Needless to say, the problem is not confined to orchestras alone. Art music in general faces rough sledding, and here in Boston the broad nature of the situation was recently dramatized by the revelation that the New England Conservatory, one of the country's oldest and most prestigious musical training centers, confronts the possibility of financial collapse. The Boston Symphony too, one of the world's most venerated performing organizations, has its own full share of money headaches.

Less well known is the plight of the Boston Philharmonia, whose case, it seems to this writer, is unusual and deserving of consideration by all who are concerned with maintaining Boston's vital music tradition. To put first thing first, the Philharmonia needs money. Specifically the Philharmonia needs $25,000. It needs that amount now in order to satisfy immediate requirements, needs it to finish its current financial year in responsible shape, needs it to go on making commitments, needs it to produce its next concert—in short, needs it in order to insure the orchestra's survival.

There are many reasons to justify support of the Philharmonia's appeal. For one thing, the amount needed is modest, completely disproportionate to the Philharmonia's actual and potential contribution to the musical health of Boston, of Massachusetts, and of New England in general. Here are a few other reasons:

The orchestra specializes in significant 17th, 18th and 20th century chamber orchestra works which are otherwise heard infrequently or not at all in Boston.

Because of artistic opportunities such as that outlined above, the Philharmonia provides an important reason for the continued local residence of many free-lance musicians upon whose talents virtually every musical organization in Boston depends.

Its low ticket price policy ($3 average) and the portability made possible by limited size (about 40 members) have made good music available to people and areas that have not previously been able to enjoy live concerts.

It has played free summer concerts for thousands of children and adults for whom orchestral concerts would otherwise have been an unknown experience.

The Philharmonia has developed a large and enthusiastic following among young people to whom, because of its artistic and economic policies, other existing organizations do not present viable alternatives.

The Philharmonia is a fledgling organization whose first concert was given in April, 1968, and obviously it benefits neither from the streamlined organizational impetus nor from the reservoir of good will accumulated by its colleagues of longer standing. It does, however, address itself to exigencies which are urgent, compelling and quite beyond the fate of the individual musicians involved.

This is how Robert Brink, concertmaster of the Philharmonia, articulated the problem: "The present situation arose because of the love of a group of musicians for what they were doing and for the benefits that might accrue to the musical community as a result. To the extent that these musicians and the community can work through a situation that is disastrous for all the arts, the Philharmonia will survive. Everybody is going to have to work hard. Otherwise there will be no New England Conservatory, no Boston Symphony, and no Philharmonia."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 1 1970 N

Wine-Tasting Party to Honor Michael T. Thomas of the BSO

TO HONOR Michael Tilson Thomas, brilliant young assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Council of Friends of the orchestra will give a wine-tasting party, Wednesday evening, April 8, at the Marriott Motor Hotel in Newton. The party will be in conjunction with the ball committee of the 90th Anniversary Dinner and Ball, to be held Monday evening, April 27, in Symphony Hall.

The wines, donated by the Marriott Motor Hotel, will be four German wines, as well as one Austrian selection, to celebrate the 200th birthday of Beethoven, whose music will be featured by the orchestra during its Beethoven Week, which begins Monday, April 6. Cheeses and fondues will be served with the wines in the glamorous new ballroom of the hotel overlooking the Charles River.

Michael Tilson Thomas began his formal musical studies at the age of 10. He studied music while he was at the University of Southern California, where he won the alumni prize as the outstanding student at the time of his graduation.

For four years he was the conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra at the Los Angeles Music Center, and has been conductor of The Ojai Festival, the Los Angeles Philharmonic Youth Concerts and the Los Angeles Monday Evening Concerts. He is also a pianist and has received many awards, including the Koussevitsky conducting prize.

Helping with plans for the evening are Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot of Boston and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld of Chestnut Hill, co-chairmen of the ball, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. James H. Perkins, trustees, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. and Mrs. Howard Davis.

Among those planning to be present are Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Cahners, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Watson 2nd, Mr. and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. Allen Joslin, Mr. and Mrs. Albert England, Mr. and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy and Mrs. James M. Gavin.

186

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 17 1970

Rose Walsh

Impossible Dream Is Coming True

785

What seemed like an impossible dream to the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when they began planning last year for the BSO 90th Anniversary Ball, is materializing beautifully.

The ingenious committee headed by Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome R. Rosenfeld, who have David Rockefeller, Jr., and Richard F. Treadway in charge of the large and distinguished men's committee, wanted a Maxim of Paris theme for the great night of April 27.

Transforming Symphony Hall into that exciting atmosphere was a gigantic task. But where there's a woman's will, you may be sure a way will be found. And it has. Some 2000 pounds of Maxim's own decorations are being flown from Paris to recreate the elegance and gallic ambiance of the famous French restaurant.

Handsome young ushers dressed in Maxim's dashing uniforms (dark blue trousers, brilliant red double breasted jackets with brass buttons and gold epaulets) will greet arriving guests. "Maxim's" emblazoned in gold lettering will adorn the ushers' pill box hats.

The Huntington ave foyer will be decorated with reproductions of the lovely murals at Maxim's and copies of its mirrors will serve as a glittering backdrop. The Museum of Fine Arts has loaned four fine period pieces of statuary to flank the entrance.

Talented Mrs. John M. Ferry and Mrs. Charles F. Hovey are complementing the color scheme of gold and rose red with an abundance of brilliant plants. In addition to the standard red and pink fuchsias and columns of ivy, there will be blue and white hydrangeas to lend a very French touch.

Inside the hall, the stage will be artistically framed with red velvet appliqued with gold and silver design and backed by a reproduction of Maxim's famous ceiling. Against this setting Arthur Fiedler and the lively Boston Pops and Ruby Newman and his popular dance orchestra will deliver music, music, music.

On each dinner table (white-clothed and a rose red overcloth) will be fresh flower centerpieces and candles. Each place will be marked with a rose and gold program and surprise favors.

Among the distinguished guests planning to attend are Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, French Amb. Charles Lucet, Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, the Charles F. Adamses, the Peter D. Fullers, the Perry Rathbones, the George P. Gardners, the Sydney R. Rabbs, Gen. and Mrs. James Gavin, Gen. Robert Cutler, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Hatch, Jr.

Also, the Norman Cahners, the Robert A. Lawrences, the Josiah A. Spaulding, Jrs; Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. David Rockefeller, Jr., Royal Little and the Roland Grimms.

Cocktails at 5:30 will precede Monday night's Boston Opera Ass'ns dinner for Guarantors and their guests in the Commonwealth Room of the Sheraton-Boston Hotel. This will give opera goers plenty of time to go on to the Hynes Civic Auditorium (a stone's throw away) for the opening night performance of "La Boheme," starring Renata Tebaldi and Carlo Bergonzi.

Invitations for dinner have been accepted by the David C. Crocketts, the Nelson W. Aldriches, the Brooks Potters, Mrs. James J. Phelan, the Paul Bernats, Dr. and Mrs. Charles E. Donovan, the George S. Mumfords, Mrs. Reynolds Fuller, the Lawrence Pereras, Miss Rebekah Hobbs and Mrs. J. Clark Boas.

Also, Mrs. William C. Cox, the Russell B. Stearns, the John C. Vosoffs, the Thomas Galligans, Mrs. Robert H. Montgomery, Mrs. Arthur C. Doran and her guests; the Bergen B. Rapalyeas, the Stephen Harrises, the Carl A. Weyerhaeusers, the Harold D. Hodgkinsons and a score more.

And the Women's City Club of Boston has been a beehive of happy activity all this week with its better than ever 8th Antiques Show. Mrs. George P. Condakes was chairman aided by Lloyd Hathaway, manager of the Show; Mrs. William T. Conlan, president of the Club and a great corps of enthusiastic workers.

Across The Country

Musical Boston

In 1869 Mark Twain wrote: "Tomorrow night I appear for the first time before a Boston audience—4,000 critics." Boston is renowned for its demanding audiences. For a select few, the city is also known for its loyalty. One of the objects of its loyalty as well as its criticism is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now in its 90th year, the B.S.O. is an established tradition which has charmed the Cabots, the Lodges, hard-pressed students, and penniless immigrants alike.

783

Tonight the orchestra will hold the first social event of its 90th season—an anniversary dinner and ball at Symphony Hall. The dinner will be prepared by chefs from Maxim's of Paris under the supervision of the restaurant's owner, Louis Vaudable. After the dinner, the Boston Pops Orchestra will join Ruby Newman for an evening of dancing. It is expected that affluent Bostonians will pay the $300-a-couple "donation" for the honor of attending this gala event. The proceeds, which will be matched by a Rockefeller grant, will go toward meeting current expenses estimated at $5 million a year.

Like all American orchestras, the B.S.O. is having its financial difficulties. The pinch is somewhat less pressing than that faced by many other symphonies because of a strong endowment fund, income from recordings and tapes, foundation grants and, most important, private contributions which have accounted for as much as $350,000 a year. Until 1934, fund-raising was in a few hands. The orchestra's founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson, paid the bills from 1881 until 1918, and a group of wealthy trustees carried the burden for the next 16 years. After 1934, loyal patrons became the orchestra's principal support.

Since 1881 and particularly since Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949), its most famous conductor, the B.S.O. has attempted to combine the traditional with the new, and the international with the national. This task has been facilitated by the Boston Pops Orchestra which consists of the Boston Symphony minus its principal players. The existence of the Boston Pops, which caters to lighter and more commercial music, gives the Boston Symphony a kind of artistic freedom enjoyed by few other orchestras. During its 90-year history it has used that freedom well. (M.C.) (E.R.R.)

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

APR 27 1970

APR 27 1970

Tonight is the night of the "really big one" — the 90th Anniversary Symphony Ball at $350 a ticket. On Friday at the last pre-symphony luncheon of this season some of the secrets in store for the lucky ticketholders were let out of the bag. Mrs. John Bradley and Mrs. Alexander Ellis who are the chairmen of the incredibly complicated arrangements for the gourmet dinner being planned and executed by Maxim's of Paris, were at the luncheon at Horticultural Hall, taking time out from their almost continuous duties during the five days leading up to tonight.

On Thursday they had met the Maxim chefs arriving from Paris at Logan Airoprt, and had introduced them to the Boston catering firm with whom they are collaborating on the dinner. To the chairmen's joy they discovered that the head of the Boston firm had trained in Paris for two years and spoke fluent French, so that within minutes the French chefs and their Boston counterparts were getting along like old friends.

One of the big problems of cooking at a place like Symphony Hall is the lack of facilities of any kind. The next problem to arise was the matter of warming ovens. Maxim's uses a certain size and plan their dishes to fit such individual ovens: the ones used in Boston are shallower, smaller and quite different — another problem for Mrs. Bradley and Mrs. Ellis to solve. Real French souffle dishes and the proper spices exactly as available in Paris are other emergencies the chairmen have had to cope with. The menu is fabulous but must not be revealed till after tonight — suffice to say that the like has yet to be seen in Boston.

Balloons and flowering spring branches brightened Horticultural Hall for this last luncheon of the season sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Bright spring colors were revealed as guests removed raincoats and sou'wester hats, in some cases, worn as a protection against the gloom and drizzle that prevailed outside.

Mrs. Louis Cabot's stunning coat and dress caught the eye of many fashion conscious women. Of small purple and black checks the coat's revers were faced with the purple and white Pucci print of the dress worn beneath. Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley wore a suit of off-white edged with navy, and Mrs. Robert Clasby's coat was of huge black and white checks. It is doubtful if this Wellesley resident will be needing this coat on her forthcoming trip to Africa where she and her husband are going on safari.

Many of the guests at the luncheon will be at the ball tonight, where it is certain that some of the most beautiful dresses ever seen in Boston will make their appearance.

MUSIC MEN

AND MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS LIKE TO WORK HARD.

oth involved with music and starting out on new tasks. Besides his records en now is turning to films . . . writing screenplays and directing. Thomas, luctor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now the second associate conchestra's 89-year history. WWD talks with the dynamic pair about their l future ideas.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,211

APR 28 1970

Rod McKuen Photo by Frank Diernhammer

Michael Tilson Thomas Photo by Bill Potter

BOSTON.—

"MUSIC IS SUCH A FUNNY BUSINESS," SAYS MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS.

"While I have an immediate responsibility to the orchestra, someone is constantly hounding me about the future, what I'll be conducting in the 1971-1972 season."

Ever since he took over conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the ailing William Steinberg one month ago, life for the slight 25-year-old assistant conductor has been frenetic.

"Two things have kept me going," Michael says, "—knowing other conductors who've been through this. Another is the warmth and support I've received from the orchestra. What a fantastic group! Their involvement coupled with the audience reaction is enough to keep me perpetually supercharged."

MICHAEL'S FORMAL MUSICAL STUDIES BEGAN AT AGE 10.

Today he has the "freedom and flexibility" that comes with an early success and finds it "remarkable that I am not fighting for a place to show what I can do."

Michael also finds it amusing that so much musical talent has come out of the West Coast. "California is not a 'cultural wasteland' anymore," says Michael, rapidly listing several famous musicians and concert singers who are California natives.

Michael's first musical venture in the East came two years ago at Tanglewood, the Orchestra in Lenox, Mass. But he brought along a lot of West Coast influence, especially from those Monday Evening Concerts he conducted in L.A. He calls them "the most enlightened concerts in the United States" for their varied repertoire and range of music practices.

THOMAS FEELS THE STATE OF MUSIC TODAY IS ONE RICH IN VARIETY.

"The best thing about music today is that there are so many musics available. Thanks to recordings and concerts, one can hear anything from modern tape phrasing to old Bessie Smith records to, God help us, Sonny and Cher."

But Michael's association with orchestra doesn't make him a musical snob. He's a Beatles fan, and he likes "their rhythmic ambiguities, their reference to other pieces. I never listen to classical music for relaxation.

Michael's immediate plans include two more weeks in Boston with the orchestra, followed by appearances with the orchestra at Tanglewood, a guest conducting appearance with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and a trip abroad to edit records.

BUT WHAT REALLY EXCITES HIM ARE HIS LONG-RANGE PLANS.

"I think at one point I'm going to have to teach. I'd like to teach college freshmen a music appreciation course, only I'd call it 'Hearing.' I'd want them to explore all the possibilities in hearing to see what they could perceive and discover."

And he hasn't given up the idea of writing books and more music, nor directing musical theatre. "I have some definite ideas about staging," and he'd like to do collaborative pieces with people in the other arts.

"What I really hope to do is involve many people of my generation in this kind of music. Performances should be exciting, challenging events for the audience and the performers. A musician shouldn't have to sit in the same place every night and do the same thing."

—BRENDA BADOLATO

187.

In Maxim's of Paris Setting

Symphony Ball Glitters

BY ALISON ARNOLD

The 90th Anniversary Ball in Symphony Hall made history last night without the presence of a First Lady. Five years ago, at the Golden Trumpet Ball, Jackie Kennedy stole the show. In her place this year were brother-in-law Ted and his Joan, and the home folks. But it was disappointing for the Jackie-watchers.

Photographers had a field day, however, when Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy and Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White arrived. Joan Kennedy's white gown was topped by a long white coat with a glittering collar and buttons, and Kathryn White's white gown was sashed with pale pink satin.

785

TO HELP the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra meet their annual goal of $440,000, Symphony Hall was transformed into a replica of Maxim's of Paris. A ton of decorations were flown from Paris and arranged under the direction of Maurice Carrere, along with chefs and food in charge of Louis Vaudable of Maxim's.

Greeting arrivals at the entrance were handsome young ushers in Maxim's uniforms—blue trousers, red jackets with brass buttons and gold epaulets, and pill-box hats.

The Huntington Avenue foyer where cocktails and hors d'oeuvres were served, sparkled with copies of Maxim's famous mirrors that reflected Boston's most glamorous ball gowns and jewels. Fuchsia plants of pink and red blended with the rose and gold theme and blue and white hydrangeas lent a French touch.

Inside the hall there were 50 tables for 10 at $300 per couple. A fanfare summoned guests to dinner at 9. The white tablecloths had rose red overcloths and candles in Lalique holders. Flowers were red carnations and gymsophila with ferns and smilax. The white Bavarian china was gold-trimmed. Champagne was served in tulip-shaped glasses similar to Maxim's own.

THE DINNER BEGAN with turtle soup. The menu included partridge raised in France and prepared in Paris with pate de foie gras, and lobster bought and prepared at the Sheraton-Boston by Maxim's chefs. Bibb lettuce for the salad was purchased in Boston, and the dessert—souffle glace—one of the most famous of Maxim's desserts, was prepared at the Sheraton-Boston.

Ruby Newman's orchestra provided music for dancing between courses and, at 10.30, Frank Hatch introduced Arthur Fiedler, who needed no introduction. From then on, the Pops Orchestra alternated with Ruby Newman's.

Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, co-chairmen of the ball, both wore white with pearls and diamonds. Mrs. Albert Goodhue, co-chairman of the Friends of the Symphony with Mrs. John M. Grandin Jr., wore shimmering silver cloth with a diamond necklace, bracelet and earrings.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Symphony's brilliant young associate conductor, wore in his hair a wreath of ivy made for him by Cyril Silberman, whom he escorted to the ball. She was all in white. Erich Leinsdorf, former director of the orchestra, escorted Mrs. Leinsdorf, who wore a black and white print.

Henry B. Cabot, former president of the trustees, was resplendent in white tie and tails, and Mrs. Cabot wore black. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, chairman of the Golden Trumpet Ball wore white with tracings of red and her diamond bracelets glittered brilliantly. She and Mrs. James H. Perkins are the only women trustees of the orchestra. Talcott Banks, president of the trustees, was congratulating the committee on the success of the evening.

AT THE COCKTAIL hour before the ball the din was terrific. Everyone talked at once and jostled each other politely, trying to dodge the trays of hors d'oeuvres. The red and gold rococo background, the palm trees and the fleur de lis made Bostonians feel they were really in Paris.

To list those who were at the ball would be like reading the Social Register from cover to cover, but among them were Mr. and Mrs. Edward Taft, Mrs. John Elliot, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Gardner Jr., Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Karl Riemer, Mr. and Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Rabb, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Rathbone, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Watson, Alden MacIntyre, Mr. and Mrs. E. Morton Jennings Jr. and Mr. and Mrs Edward Mitton

Also, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin T. Green, J. Hampden Robb, Mr. and Mrs. George Draper, William Draper, Mrs. George Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Willman, Mr. and Mrs. George Seybolt, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Fuller, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Grimm and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall.

STILL OTHERS were Dr. and Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Schmid, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Sherman, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Fitzgerland, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ehrlich, Dr. and Mrs. William D. Sohier Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Richard Treadway, Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Blakely Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John S. Ames and Mr. and Mrs. Richard H. Shreve.

And everyone took home the elegant gold and red program, a souvenir of the memorable evening for future generations of Symphony-goers.

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by J. Vincent Connolly)

A TOAST TO SYMPHONY was given by Mrs. Arthur Fiedler; her famous husband, who conducted the Pops Orchestra last night; French Ambassador Charles Lucet, who came from Washington for the ball, and Jacques Massenet, French Consul General in Boston.

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by J. Vincent Connolly)

AT THE ANNIVERSARY BALL in Symphony Hall last evening were Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, Sen. Kennedy, Mrs. Kevin White and Mayor White.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

How many people have wanted to waltz to Arthur Feidler and the Boston Pops Orchestra? How many have wished they could dine at Maxim's, Paris' most famous restaurant? And how many, too, would like the chance to enjoy just once in their lives the biggest, most social occasion in Boston in many a decade?

Well, 520 guests had this privilege last night at the 90th Anniversary Symphony Ball at Symphony Hall. They dined off cream of turtle soup, a special kind of lobster that was a secret recipe of Maxim's of Paris, tiny partridge stuffed with foie gras, and a superb kind of cold raspberry souffle that melted in one's mouth.

It was a fabulous evening, and one that will not be forgotten for a long time. Symphony Hall had been completely changed into a charming intimate Maxim's of another century. The huge barn-like lobby on the Huntington Avenue side of the building was completely changed with mirrors and red velvet material caught up with art nouveau light fixtures. Here the 520 gathered for cocktails, and on the bars where the drinks were dispersed were tall arrangements of pink and red carnations and babies' breath interspersed with twisted and lighted candles.

It is doubtful if it was the foyer of Symphony Hall or the huge hall that drew the most ohs and ahs from the guests. The hall itself is a barn-like building after the seats have been removed after a concert, but last night it had been turned into a fairyland. Tables for 10 were placed around the floor of this prestigious hall where Beethoven and Brahms are more familiar than the gossip and chatter heard last night. Each table held the same tall arrangement that was seen in the foyer and at each place was a gold art nouveau menu listing the dishes to be enjoyed and the souvenir program of the evening.

It is impossible to list all those at this event that will go down for all time as "THE" ball of the 70's. Senator and Mrs. Edward Kennedy arrived at the red canopied and carpeted Huntington Avenue entrance amid a burst of flash bulbs, Mrs. Kennedy in a slender white brocade embroidered with jewels, her blonde hair in a twist and chignon. Accompanying them were Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White — Mrs. White's slim white with a little frill at the neck.

Everyone who was anyone tried to be at this party. After all at $350 a couple it was a status symbol of a kind as well as a benefit for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An event that for a long time to come, like the last Golden Trumpet Ball, the guests are happy to admit they attended.

As might be expected at such a party the dresses worn by the ladies were outstanding. Everyone wore their very best and one defied any other city to outdo them. Mrs. John Grandin, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsors of the ball, wore a coral and white Corregues dress that was most becoming to her tall height. Her cochairman, Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, chose a jewel encrusted dress with a square neckline. One of the loveliest dresses at the ball was that of the chairman, Mrs. Lewis Cabot. Of simple white crepe it had a low square neckline encrusted with crystals and tiny sleeves of the same. Her cochairman, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, chose lemon yellow, also embroidered with jewelry, while Mrs. John Bradley wore a white dress with pearls the size of pear drops decorating the waist, around the neckline and the sleeves. Pants suits were not much in evidence at this most formal of parties.

Everyone was at the ball who could possibly make it. French Consul Jacques Massenet and his lively wife whose silver dress and matching coat were the epitome of chic were among the guests. Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Willmann were there, as were the Jack Parkers and the Howard Hansens of Wellesley. Judge and Mrs. John Pappas of Milton and the David Douglas-Hamiltons, Mrs. Douglas-Hamilton resplendent in full Highland regalia; Mexican consul and Mrs. Jaime Pena-Vera; the Talbot Deweys of Millis; Gen. and Mrs. James Gavin; the Arthur Blacketts of Needham; Mr. and Mrs. George Seybolt of Dedham; the Thomas Chestertons of Wellesley; Mr. and Mrs. Edward Mitton; the Charles Hoveys; the Louville Niles of Hingham; the Samuel Wakemans of Hingham; and so many more enjoying every moment of this terrific party, and many of them expressing the wish that Symphony Hall could always look as beautiful as it did on April 27, 1970.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

APR 28 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 28 1970

Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, cochairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, (left) greets guests Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley, Mrs. Jack Parker of Wellesley and Mrs. Alfred Willmann of Belmont at the 90th Anniversary Symphony Ball held last night at Symphony Hall. (Steve Reilly)

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley pose beside one of the decorations at last night's 90th Anniversary Symphony Ball. (Steve Reilly)

Entering the transformed ballroom is the chairman of the ball, Mrs. Lewis Cabot. (Steve Reilly)

188.

600 Guests Crowd 90th Gala Symphony Ball

By ROSE WALSH

Fantastically beautiful in its decor and magnificently carried out in old and new world splendor, last night's Boston Symphony 90th Anniversary Ball lighted Boston's social and musical sky over Symphony Hall. Its grandeur surpassed expectations and its goal of $150,000 will reduce the Boston Symphony Orchestra deficit.

Planned and sponsored by the Council of Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra, the dazzling ball had Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld co-chairmen; David Rockefeller, Jr., and Richard F. Treadway, co-chairmen of the men's committee.

Close to 600 guests paid $150 per person to attend the memorable event and 3000 paid $10 each with the hope of winning the new Porsche Audi sedan, a 14-day vacation for two at Aga Khan's most distinguished resort at Carla

Transforming Symphony Hall into Maxim's of Paris was a miracle that had the full cooperation of Maxim's and the ability and tremendous work of the home front. One ton of Maxim's own decorations, reproductions of their murals, copies of their famous mirrors, chandeliers and sconces, were flown over by Pan American Airways. Boston's Museum of Fine

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 29 1970

Rose Walsh – BSO in 90th Ball

Fantastically beautiful in its decor and magnificently carried out in old and new world splendor, last night's Boston Symphony 90th Anniversary Ball lighted Boston's social and musical sky over Symphony Hall. Its grandeur surpassed expectations and its goal of $150,000 will reduce the Boston Symphony Orchestra deficit.

Planned and sponsored by the Council of Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra, the dazzling ball had Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld co-chairmen; David Rockefeller, Jr., and Richard F. Treadway, co-chairmen of the men's committee.

Close to 600 guests paid $150 per person to attend the memorable event and 3000 paid $10 each with the hope of winning the new Porsche Audi sedan, a 14-day vacation for two at Aga Khan's most distinguished resort at Carla Di Volpe, Sardinia; a private concert by a quartet of The Boston Symphony Chambers Players, and other spectacular prizes.

Transforming Symphony Hall into Maxim's of Paris was a miracle that had the full cooperation of Maxim's and the ability and tremendous work of the home front. One ton of Maxim's own decorations, reproductions of their murals, copies of their famous mirrors, chandeliers and sconces, were flown over by Pan American Airways. Boston's Museum of Fine Arts lent four pieces of period statuary.

Symphony stage was framed with red velvet appliqued with gold and silver design and backed by a reproduction of Maxim's famous ceiling.

The sumptuous dinner, prepared under the supervision of M. Louis Vaudable of Maxim's in Paris, assisted by Andre Portal of Maxim's Chicago, and Thomas Culbertson of Boston's Seilers had additional help of the Sheraton Corp. which made available and arranged for all the facilities at the Sheraton-Boston for the Parisian greats.

Guests dined on Creme de Tortue Blonde (cream of turkey soup); Hommard du Nouveau Monde a la mode de l'Ancien Riz Pilaff (lobster-amor); Perdreaux en Cocotte farcis de Foie Gras Celeris braises au jus (partridge stuffed foie gras — partridges raised not wild game); Salad Pastorale (the bibb lettuce purchased in Boston market); and Souffle Glace aux Framboises (one of the classic and most famous of Maxim's desserts).

The wines, 1962 Chateau Haut-Brion and Moet and Chandon champagne, and other liquor were donated as a gesture of support for the B. S. O. by the liquor distributors of Boston.

White cloths with rose red overcloths covered the tables centered with floral arrangements of baby's breath, red carnations, ferns and smilax; candles in lalique type holders with garlands of smilax interwoven.

Each place was marked with a gold program book (68 pages) and surprise favors.

Senator and Mrs. Edward Kennedy and Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White, arriving simultaneously, were a stunning foursome. Joan's slim, long white gown, bodiced in rhinestone glitter, was topped with a full-length jewel-buttoned coat. Kathryn's, Empire-line white gown was sashed in pink satin.

Mrs. Rosenfeld wore a Malcolm Starr creation, and Mrs. John M. Gradin, Jr. wore pearls with her white and cyclamen pink gown. Mrs. Jamie Jena-Vera in flowered chiffon and her Mexican Consul husband were seated at the Kennedy table.

Arthur Fiedler, who later conducted his Pops orchestra for dancing, alternating with Ruby Newman, chatted during the cocktail hour with French Ambassador Charles Lucet, Consul-General Jacques Massenet, and Frank Hatch, who was master of ceremonies for the Ball.

Among those participating in the gala event were the Peter D. Fullers, the Sidney Rabbs and their daughters, and son-in-law, the Norman Cahners and the Avram Goldbergs, the Perry Ratbones, the Nelson Aldriches, the Eric Leinsdorfs, Michael Tilson Thomas, Boston Symphony's talented young associate conductor, escorting Cyril Silberman, the Edward Mittons, the Lewis H. Clarks, Dr. and Mrs. Karl Reimer, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Thompson, the Robert Saltonstalls, the Richard Shreves, the Gerald Blakelys and hundreds more.

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant orchestra leader, wears wreath on head as he arrives with Miss Cyril Silberman.
—Record American Photo, John Landers, Jr.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 28 1970

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant orchestra leader, wears wreath on head as he arrives with Miss Cyril Silberman.
—Record American Photo, John Landers, Jr.

The sound of music from the Bradford Hotel this weekend will be made by the Sweet Adelines, 2500 of them competing in the annual northeastern regional convention . . . Fron the Boston Symphony 90th Anniversary Ball, Sen. Ted Kennedy took Joan to The Point After. It was their first visit there.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAY 1 1970

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 209,346

APR 28 1970

Boston Symphony Promotes Assistant, Plans Europe Tour

Boston — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra promoted its 25-year-old assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, to associate conductor Friday and also announced the orchestra will tour Europe next April.

The 1971 concerts in England, Germany, Austria, France and Spain will mark the symphony's first European visit since 1956.

Thomas, born in Hollywood, Calif., joined the symphony this season as assistant to the ailing William Steinberg. Halfway through a New York concert last Oct. 23 he substituted for Steinberg and in February took over leadership for several weeks when Steinberg was unable to return to Boston.

He is conducting the symphony's final concerts of the season this weekend, presenting the Mahler Ninth Symphony.

Previously he served four years as conductor of the Young Music Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company at the Los Angeles Music Center. In 1968 he was a conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., where he won the Koussevitsky Prize for conducting.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 30 1970

Boston Symphony publicist Marvin Shofer can't understand why a report in another newspaper made it appear that he tried to keep Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and former Conductor Erich Leinsdorf away from each other at the 90th Anniversary Ball.

"They're not at odds," Shofer said. "They greeted each other warmly and then gravitated to their own groups."

Proceeds of the ball may have put the Friends of the Boston Symphony close to their goal of $440,000. The 600 or so guests paid $90,000 for dinner. They and others bought $10 raffle tickets, and that raised another $32,000.

In the raffle, the Audi auto contributed by Peter Fuller went to Mrs. John Abbot of Andover, the two-week vacation for two at the Aga Khan's resort on Sardinia to Maurice Ravich of Lowell, the roundtrip tickets to Paris to Louis MacMillan of Concord, the portrait to be done by William Draper, who painted JFK, to Mrs. Maxwell Chamberlain of Beverly Farms, and a ski-lodge weekend in New Hampshire to Mrs. James Whitemore of Marblehead.

The Austin American
AUSTIN, TEXAS
D. 46,726

APR 29 1970

Violin Workshop Slated

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Due at UT

The concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a violin workshop Thursday at the University of Texas.

Joseph Silverstein will conduct the workshop at 7:30 p.m. in the Music Building Recital Hall. He appears in the UT String Project's lecture series on creative ideas in string teaching.

The program is open to the public.

A former prize winner in the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition and recipient of a Naumberg Foundation Award, Mr. Silverstein has been with the Boston Symphony since 1955.

He also performs with the Boston Symphony String Trio and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Will conduct violin workshop

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125

APR 30 1970

Style

When making reservations, the no-go train's guests ran out of steam

By Kay Rutherford

Brooks McCormick Jr. was sputtering the other day at what has become a predictable pattern in party going.

It seems he sent out 56 invitations to a luncheon ballyhooing a fund-raising dinner. He had responses from two of the 56. But a larger contingent actually showed up.

One respondent was Hays MacFarland Jr. He arrived at the Museum of Science and Industry Wednesday with the others to help plan a June 10 testimonial dinner for Elliott Donnelley who is retiring as chairman of the board of the Chicago Area Project, a youth service organization.

Donnelley was not in town for this luncheon but, true to form, the group met on a couple of railroad cars that used to run on the Denver Zephyr. They now belong to the museum for the sake of the posterity which will never ride the railroads.

Donnelley, of course, is one of the area's noted railroad buffs with a couple of miles of his own track and a collection of aging cars.

The dinner for some 1,000 people will be held in the North Court of the museum, particularly because the museum's extensive model train collection is housed in the next hall.

WHAT'S COOKING: The Boston Symphony blew itself to a $200-a-couple ball Monday night and, now that it's all over, a Bean City contingent is coming to town to lunch at Maxim's Thursday. There is some method in this when you know that the Chicago Maxim's and the Paris Maxim's flew chefs to Boston to produce the food for the ball.

Mrs. James Perkins, the only female member of the Boston board, along with trustee ber of the Boston board, along with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, Mrs. Lewis Cabot and co-chairman Frank Hatch are in the group.

They'll meet some of their Chicago counterparts from the symphony over the veal Orloff. Louis Sudler, president of the Orchestral Assn.; Mrs. Paul Oliver; Mrs. John T. Moss, and Mrs. Chauncey Hutchins from the women's board will be there. Trustees Daggett Harvey, Edward Bennett Jr. and Rosecrans Baldwin are also on the luncheon list.

GOINGS-ON: The Woman's Board of the Chicago Urban League held a party at the First National Bank Wednesday evening for some 400 guests. Retiring executive director Edwin C. Berry and Mrs. Berry were toasted along with incoming director Laplois Ashford. . . . The abortion-reform fever comes to the North Shore with the formation of a new committee called Freedom to Choose. Along with the Student Convocation Committee of Lake Forest College, it sponsors the North Shore's first open meeting on abortion repeal Thursday evening at the college, says Mrs. John McCutcheon.

MR. AND MRS. PETER D. FULLER arrive at Symphony Hall for the gala 90th Anniversary Boston Symphony Orchestra Ball, sponsored by the Council of Friends of the B. S. O. for the benefit of the world-famed orchestra.
(Sunday Advertiser photo by John Landers, Jr.)

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 430,050

MAY 3 1970

Michael Thomas Is Promoted by Boston Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was appointed associate conductor yesterday by the trustees of the orchestra. Thomas will become the second associate conductor in the organization's 89-year history. Former concertmaster Richard Burgin held the post from 1943 to 1966.

Halfway through a Boston Symphony concert in New York last Oct. 23 Thomas substituted on a few minutes' notice for ailing music director William Steinberg, and assumed leadership recently for several weeks when Steinberg was unable to return to Boston in February. Thomas will conduct the final pair of winter season concerts this afternoon and tomorrow night at Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 24 1970

189

The Edward Kennedys | Mrs. Edward Redstone | Mrs. Lewis Cabot | Michael Tilson Thomas | Mrs. Paul Schmid | The Josiah Spauldings

Photos by Bill Potter

BOSTON.— PAGE ONE ALMOST EVERY BP IN BOSTON TURNED OUT FOR THE 90TH ANNIVERSARY BALL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"They could have called this 'The Night They Raided Maxim's'," said one amazed Bostonian. Co-chairmen Judy Cabot and Elaine Rosenfeld had Symphony Hall's foyer transformed with a ton of Maxim's furnishings. "It's the most exquisite benefit ever," said Beth Schmid in her Cardin showing plenty of tan.

But there was lots of good solid Boston in that French atmosphere. Ted and Joan Kennedy arrived early, followed by BSO associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White and the Josiah Spauldings (Teddy's likely November competition), who got lots of cheers even from those Kennedy watchers.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

APR 30 1970

Symphony ready for 90th season

785

The 90th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens Sept. 25 under the direction of Music Director William Steinberg, who will conduct 32 concerts during the 1970-71 season. This includes Friday-Saturday concerts during the three periods of time he will be in Boston, as well as concerts on the short series, one of the N. Y. tour weeks, and concerts on the European tour in April, 1971.

Michael Tilson Thomas, who joined the Orchestra as Assistant Conductor at the beginning of the past season, has been appointed associate conductor, effective this summer at Tanglewood. Thomas, the first to hold this title since Richard Burgin in 1962, will assume increased conducting responsibilities during the winter season and will also lead concerts during the European tour.

The tour is the Orchestra's first European trip since 1956 and its first trip abroad since the Far Eastern tour of 1960. Both the Symphony and the Boston Pops, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will give concerts in England, Germany, Austria, France and Spain. Further details, including cities and dates, will be announced shortly.

To permit the additional concerts necessitated by the tour and to permit increased flexibility of scheduling, the Orchestra will play 22 Friday-Saturday program pairs in Boston during the coming season, the final pair being advanced to Wednesday and Thursday, Mar. 31 and April 1 to accommodate the tour schedule.

Guest conductors for 1970-71 include Erich Leinsdorf, Seiji Ozawa, Claudio Abbado, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Bernard Haitink and Rafael Kubelik. Soloists and programs will be announced later.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAY 3 1970

Piston

◆ As part of the Boston Symphony's 90th Anniversary Fund Campaign, the concertmaster's chair and the principal flute chair were named in honor of Charles Munch and Walter Piston, respectively. Endowed with $100,000 by an anonymous donor, the orchestra's principal flute chair, occupied by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, will now be called the Walter Piston Principal Flute, in honor of the composer, for many years Professor of Music at Harvard.

BMI
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 15,000

MAY 1970

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

MAY 4 1970

MUSIC/BSO's unsettled state

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

William Steinberg will conduct the Pittsburgh Symphony concerts next weekend, May 8 and 10, and those on May 22 and 24. He evidently plans to be cautious about going back to work because his Pittsburgh concert performances of Beethoven's "Fidelio" (May 15 and 17), a project particularly dear to him, have been turned over to Julius Rudel. Steinberg is expected at Tanglewood for two full weekends of Beethoven concerts (July 31 and Aug. 14). He will be conducting in Boston 1970-71, though at this point it is not determined how much of the BSO's 22-week season, reduced from the usual 24 weeks because of a European tour in April, will be his responsibility.

785

The long illness — or series of illnesses since last Summer — of the 70-year-old Steinberg completely altered the character of the BSO's 1969-70 season, just ended. It was an interesting season, but it was also an unsettled one in a period that is, in any event, an unsettled one in the orchestra's history.

Just how unsettled the period is depends on your view. Trustees and management are not admitting officially that Steinberg's appointment, set at present for 1969-72, is in any way meant as an interregnum. A junior staff member who asked about the quantity of letterhead with "William Steinberg, Music Director" he should order for his department had his head bitten off for the impertinence of his inquiry. Some observers perceive the present moment as part of a much longer period informed by a certain confusion, believing that the Trustees' last three appointments of Music Directors (Munch 1949, Leinsdorf 1962, Steinberg 1969) were ill-judged, each in its own way, and that therefore there has been artistic instability since Koussevitzky was ushered out 21 years ago.

Erich Leinsdorf was brought here to clean up an orchestra that his predecessor had allowed to slip from extraordinary virtuosity and refinement to rather a shambles. Up to a point Leinsdorf succeeded, but only up to a point, partly because of his limitations of temperament, and partly, there is every reason to believe, because he soon lost the confidence and support of the Trustees. Much of what the orchestra gained from his technical skill was, in effect, concelled because, bored, the players were demoralized.

And so they called Steinberg, one of the profession's respected father figures, a serious, responsible conductor of enormous experience and with great technical efficiency. But when he got here, his famous, precise beat had gone rubbery, and the ear so sensitive about clean intonation was not functioning either. The orchestral playing as such went on being not the sort the BSO ought to be doing, and, though some big, late Romantic pieces were projected splendidly (Elgar No. 2, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," Bruckner No. 6), most of the music-making was soggy. With late April hindsight, one can find a partial explanation of Steinberg's failure in his illness.

Steinberg did interest himself in the task of cleaning up the orchestra. He initiated some reshufflings of personnel, but these matters seem still to be in the talking stage and unsettled.

MUSIC, Page A-34

2

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 505,272

MAY 3 1970

BSO season in review

★ MUSIC

Continued from Page A-31

25 cont'd

The situation here provided an extraordinary opportunity for 25-year old Michael Tilson Thomas, a Koussevitzky Prize winner at Tanglewood in 1968, first brought to Boston by the Philharmonia a year ago, appointed BSO Assistant Conductor for the season just finished, and promoted to Associate Conductor effective this Summer. Thomas was scheduled to conduct a Friday-Saturday pair in October, plus repeats of the same program on the various short series. Steinberg's illnesses both began at times when there were guest conductors in Boston; even so, by time the season was done, Thomas had conducted six Friday-Saturday pairs (Steinberg had seven, eleven going to guests) and had conducted over thirty concerts here and on tour in New York, Washington, and elsewhere.

His repertory included things as rare or as fresh as Ives's "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's Variations, Schoenberg's Five Pieces, the Sibelius 4th Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 1st, works by Ruth Crawford Seeger and Carl Ruggles, Bach's Cantata No. 140 ("Wachet auf!"), and the Mahler 9th. I do not hear Thomas's interpretations as the product of a highly original mind, but he is a musician with a remarkable range of sympathies (his work here with the Philharmonia and the BSO Chamber Players included performances of Monteverdi, Stockhausen, and Earl Brown), and he has vitality, intelligence, taste, confidence, and technical competence. The benefit of his presence and services here was great, and his concerts were occasions of interest and pleasure.

In the order of their appearances, conductors other than Steinberg and Thomas were Carlo Maria Giulini, Seiji Ozawa, Erich Leinsdorf, Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Gunther Schuller, Joseph Silverstein, and, in a special five-concert Beethoven series, Max Rudolf and Leonard Bernstein. Of their work, I now remember with particular gratitude Abbado's performances of Prokofiev's 3rd Symphony and the Debussy Nocturnes, Davis's of the 2nd Symphony by Sir Michael Tippett, the opportunity to hear Schuller's "Spectra" under his own direction, the "Eroica" with Rudolf, and the Beethoven 9th with Bernstein. The finest solo work was contributed by Kinshi Tsuruta and Katsuya Yokoyama playing, respectively, the biwa and the shakuhachi in "November Steps No. 1" by Takemitsu (Ozawa), Joseph Silverstein in the Stravinsky Violin Concerto (Ozawa), Maureen Forrester and Jon Vickers in Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" (Steinberg), Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2" for flute and orchestra (Abbado), Benita Valente singing Mozart (Thomas) and Bethany Beardslee, the soprano soloist in "Wachet auf!" (Thomas). I refrain from offering a catalogue of disappointments or predictable disasters.

BOOKSHELF

By PAUL GOLDBERGER

Inside the Top Two

Stokowski & Ormandy: unstuffy

ONE day in 1926, conductor Leopold Stokowski had Philadelphia's Academy of Music buzzing in amazement. He had begun a concert of the great Philadelphia Orchestra with only half of the orchestra's players on stage. Little by little, other players drifted in and sat down as Stokowski kept on conducting. By the middle of the concert, the full orchestra had arrived – but then the musicians started to drift off as mysteriously as they had come on.

What was going on? It was Stokowski's way of "turning the tables" on his audience for its own frequent habit of arriving late and leaving early. Rather than lecture them, Stokowski had decided to give them a taste of their own medicine!

This anecdote – and many others – make Herbert Kupferberg's Those Fabulous Philadelphians (Scribner's, $7.95) delightful reading. On page after page, Kupferberg's lively history of one of the most admired musical organizations of all time (now celebrating its 70th anniversary) proves that the concert world is far from stuffy. Conductors like Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy come vividly to life, as do composers like Rachmaninoff and Sibelius, guest soloists, and all sorts of people behind the scenes. Some of the most fascinating episodes center in the orchestra's tours. Then there are the episodes in which conductor Ormandy bucks the competition of the race track at Saratoga (the orchestra's summer home), not just for his audience but for his players!

A behind-the-scenes look at another great American orchestra is to be found in Harry Ellis Dickson's Gentlemen, More Dolce Please! (Beacon Press, $7.50), subtitled "An Irreverent Memoir of 30 Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Dickson, a violinist in the Boston Symphony and associate conductor of its Boston Pops, captures many amusing and touching moments in the orchestra's annals. He also has some rather blunt things to say about a few prominent guest conductors.

Dickson makes no pretense at the kind of detailed history Kupferberg has written, and his chatty picture is sometimes disjointed. Students will enjoy both books, but will learn more about what a symphony orchestra really is from Kupferberg.

Interestingly, both books end with the same question: Is the symphony orchestra a dying creature? At least these two authors show that, in 1970 anyway, America's two greatest ones are alive and in good personal spirits. □ 190.

Quick Quiz

ON ARTICLES IN THIS ISSUE

I. THE ARTS

On the line to the left of each statement or question, put the letter of the word or phrase that best answers the question or completes the statement.

__1. The arts include all except
a. music and dance
b. magazines and newspapers
c. painting and sculpture
d. drama and opera

__2. The arts did not thrive in
a. ancient Rome
b. Renaissance Italy
c. Elizabethan England
d. the European Dark Ages

__3. During much of recorded history, the arts
a. were available to society at large
b. were available only to the poor
c. were available only to the rich and powerful
d. were available only in museums

__4. The earnings of most artists from their art are
a. about the same as other professional salaries
b. barely livable
c. extremely high
d. comfortable

__5. President Nixon has said he views the arts as
a. for an elite only
b. not in need of funds
c. worthy of federal financial support
d. none of the above

__6. The artist in today's "machine age" works
a. at the same speed as in past ages
b. much more efficiently and quickly than in the past
c. more slowly and inefficiently than in the past
d. more efficiently but slower than in the past

__7. Most U.S. opera and symphony groups operate
a. without money problems
b. with large deficits
c. with large profits
d. at the break-even point

__8. Most arts organizations in the U.S. depend financially on
a. private patrons
b. corporations and foundations
c. federal, state, and local government funds
d. all of the above

__9. In its support of the arts, how does the U.S. compare with other governments?
a. way ahead
b. about average
c. far behind
d. among the leaders

__10. President Nixon has asked that the annual appropriation for the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities be
a. doubled
b. eliminated
c. reduced by half
d. none of the above

II. READING A CHART

Using the charts as references, answer the questions below.

1. What part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's income is derived from tickets, concert fees and summer festivals?

2. How far does this income go in covering the salaries of the orchestra's musicians?

3. About what part of the symphony's operating revenues derives from home concerts and tours?

4. The Boston Orchestra is reasonably assured of regular income from gifts, trusts, and investments. When this other income is figured in, does the symphony have a surplus or deficit or break even?

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

MAY 4 1970

A Place in...
THE SUN
1127

By Marguerite Lyons

Last week a US Navy bus brought some 50 or more French sailors to Lowell from the South Boston annex of the Naval shipyard where the French helicopter carrier "Jeanne d'Arc" and the escort frigate "Victor Schoelcher" were berthed until today when both left for Quebec. The officers and sailors came to Lowell to pay their respects to their friend, Rev. Armand Morisssette OMI, of St. Jean Baptiste rectory, who has been chaplain of the French Navy personnel in the United States since 1939.

The youthful and colorful "Pompons Rouges" were warmly greeted by Fr. Morissette who had arranged several as a number of d eral Franco-Ame

The sailors were delighted that their visit in Boston coincided with the many celebrations in observance of the 90th anniversary of the Boston Symphony which through the years has featured so many outstanding French artists and conductors including the late Charles Munch.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 48,850 (S) 39,575

MAY 5 1970

Students May Subscribe For Youth Concerts Series

MARLBORO — Mrs. Robert E. Collier, Local Chairman for YOUTH CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL, has announced that subscriptions for the 1970-1971 Boston Symphony Youth Concerts must be returned by May 8.

The Youth Concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson directing members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. A series of three concerts are presented on Saturdays, at Symphony Hall, at 11 a.m., with this year's programs scheduled for November 7 and 14, 1970 and January 30, 1971.

The programs are planned to stimulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the tradition-filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall. In addition, The Ancient Instruments Room, with its priceless collection of rare and unusual instruments, is open to the young concertgoers before and after the concert.

For information or ticket applications, please call Mrs. Robert E. Collier, 485-2203, or your Marlborough Recreation Department, 485-5200.

Tickets are sold by the series only, at $6.00 for three concerts.

CITY POST
MARLBORO, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,500

MAY 7 1970

WHAT ARE CRITICS LIKE?

BY MICHAEL CARACAPPA. Have you ever wondered what music critics —certainly the most powerful single factor in the making or breaking of an artist—are like?

After a bit of sputtering in purple and your blood pressure drops a little, your likely retort would be that critics are an ulcerous and cantankerous lot who can make some people—especially those professionally associated with a performance—shudder at the thought of picking up the morning paper.

Critics hate everybody, you snap, and they hate music, adding that they all undoubtedly suffer from acid tongues, frayed nerves, frustrations, pale sex lives, snobbishness, insecurity, etc., which explains why they are what they are. And then, you bring out what you insist are positively unjustified reviews to prove your point. Right? Wrong!

In point of fact, though a critic is often regarded by disgruntled artists and their entourage of "yes-men" as a kind of Dracula or Frankenstein, a man-eating tiger, a rather shadowy character who steals into the concert hall or opera house, strikes down the culprit—virtuoso, singer, conductor or composer—and then quietly flies away into the night like Dracula, the critic isn't altogether a bad guy and doesn't always hurry home to beat up his wife, cat or canary.

To add a few more chords to the theme, they're a devoted and happy family people, some active in community affairs, and many proud of their children or grandchildren at college or in business, much as you and I.

Surprised? As one of the editors working along with them to make a deadline on the world's greatest newspaper and close to the music scene, I've found critics friendly and pleasant, and trying to do an honest job. They've been known even to rave about a performance! Of course, there are some who occasionally behave like prima donnas, but aren't we all?

Now and then, we'll argue the merits of an artist while sipping a Martini or Scotch, but reluctantly I must confess that I rarely win. Anyway, we don't end up on the sidewalk pummeling each other over who wears the crown: Heifetz or Oistrakh, Tebaldi or Callas, Corelli or Tucker, Horowitz or Gilels, etc.

Admittedly, a segment of the public from time immemorial has viewed critics as frustrated musicians who seemingly want to devour everybody, taking delight in sniping away at some unlucky performer of the moment. Others insist that critics are chronically sour characters who take a dim view of life and are suspicious of anybody in the music business.

The rest are pictured as dwellers in ivory towers and out of touch with reality. But I repeat: they're far from being man-eating ogres, though I've heard some say they'd like to throw them a bone to chew on, and there are others who say unprintable things or wish that critics wouldn't be so haughty.

As an example, a North Carolina industrialist friend was recalling at Sardi's the other day when he found himself with a group of young critics at a Park Avenue soirée given by an art patron, and quite suddenly realized that he was being completely left out of the conversation while they were pompously discussing Bernstein's conducting of a Mahler work of the previous evening.

Perhaps a day never passes that critics aren't involved in controversies over what they write. As an example, a long-simmering quarrel involving the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the city's critics recently erupted into a cause célèbre over what orchestral members and concertgoers termed as "insulting and unethical assaults" on guest conductors.

Michael Steinberg of The Boston Globe was said to have written a highly critical review of a performance by Carlo Maria Gilulini. George Gelles of The Herald Traveler allegedly said that Seiji Ozawa had conducted an "inaccurate and indifferent" performance. As a result, the situation exploded in the columns, radio and television, with the papers on one side and the orchestra and trustees on the other—and some splinter groups.

Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Episcopal Church in Boston, complained that Steinberg had "chosen to write in such a tone of voice and to say things that are both unfair and rude, that major artists are reluctant to come to Boston and some have refused to come. He added that The Boston Herald had added fuel to the fire by hiring Gelles to compete "in the same tone of voice."

In rebuttal, Gelles wrote: "If the critic is to be of any use to a community whatsoever, he has to be more than a mirror and mouthpiece of popular taste. What is the value of criticism if the critic is as easily satisfied as the average member of the audience?"

"Could just as well have been duck-shooting back home for all they cared," said my friend, who's also an amateur musician and a knowledgeable one at that. "I realized there and then that some of these city music critics can be a rude bunch, looking down their noses at the layman. Back where I come from, a critic is polite and takes interest in what others think. Apparently, critics here believe they're a special breed, and who the hell are you as an ordinary listener to have a worthwhile opinion of a performance. . ."

A cry heard in New York is why critics rarely cover some of the more interesting events that don't always end up in the major halls. To cite one instance: the City Symphony Orchestra, an admirable organization founded in 1926 by the late Judge Leopold Prince, was reactivated recently with Jak Zadikov as music director. Zadikov has a long list of appearances in the U.S. and abroad, and despite a lack of funds to keep the orchestra together, he presented a Poor People's Concert in the Salvation Army's auditorium at its West 14th Street headquarters, with the well-known Met tenor George Shirley narrating Copland's Lincoln Portrait, a highlight of the program.

The following day, Zadikov again led his 70-member orchestra in the same program at the Bird S. Coler Hospital —"that grim haunt of the halt, the lame and the blind on Welfare Island." According to private sources, both events were hailed by the grateful audiences, yet, neither was covered by the press.

And there probably are other cases of unusual musical events being similarly bypassed. A regrettable thing, but with New York being reduced to three principal newspapers, the few critics left trek only to the major happenings in the major halls. It's simple economics: fewer newspapers, fewer critics. And fewer critics, less coverage.

At Act One, another favorite haunt in Times Square, a colleague exclaimed, "Gosh, how I envy critics for being able to hear all the world's great music

1739:

"Music birds of passage, bustling vioand different, and that you're putting your best foot forward. □

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,739

MAY 1970

Quick Quiz

ON ARTICLES IN THIS ISSUE

of each the letter that best completes except wspapers pture

ve in and k Ages

rded his-society at ly to the

ly to the y in st artists

as other es

said he ds financial machine

d as in ntly and past ineffipast t slower

__7. Most U.S. opera and symphony groups operate
a. without money problems
b. with large deficits
c. with large profits
d. at the break-even point

__8. Most arts organizations in the U.S. depend financially on
a. private patrons
b. corporations and foundations
c. federal, state, and local government funds
d. all of the above

__9. In its support of the arts, how does the U.S. compare with other governments?
a. way ahead
b. about average
c. far behind
d. among the leaders

__10. President Nixon has asked that the annual appropriation for the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities be
a. doubled
b. eliminated
c. reduced by half
d. none of the above

II. READING A CHART

Using the charts as references, answer the questions below.

1. What part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's income is derived from tickets, concert fees and summer festivals?

_____

2. How far does this income go in covering the salaries of the orchestra's musicians?

_____

3. About what part of the symphony's operating revenues derives from home concerts and tours?

_____

4. The Boston Orchestra is reasonably assured of regular income from gifts, trusts, and investments. When this other income is figured in, does the symphony have a surplus or deficit or break even?

_____

What Are Critics Like?
(Continued from page 78)

run indefinitely, an unflattering review can doom a career as easily as snuffing a cigarette. This is the devastating power of the critic at this typewriter. Pity the young recitalist, then, struggling to break into the concert field and is panned, for it means that he'll have an unsurmountable job in obtaining a managerial contract.

The result? After years of back-breaking study and sky-high expenses, the unlucky soul quietly drops out of sight for a job in Wall Street or in his father's office or factory. As for the established artist, a disastrous review can make it sticky to acquire worthwhile engagements with major orchestras the ensuing season. Conductors also follow the reviews to keep tabs on available performers.

Out-of-town concert managers, who book artists through the New York managements, are also swayed by what they read in the papers. A poor review can make them as indifferent and tough as the Hanoi crowd at the peace table. But in deference to critics, I must say that, while their power is a decisive one—a power that could intoxicate and do much harm—it's a power that, for the most part, isn't abused or misused.

Regarding the pen that can be turned into a bludgeon, Henry Finck, a famed critic on the old New York Evening Post, once wrote: "When I became a music critic at the green age of 20, I undertook as most young critics do, to lay down the law for artists who knew a hundred times as much as I did. I soon got over that silly attitude, having become convinced that the only important function of criticism is to discover and boom genius or superior talent. . . . The 'noble art of praising' is the chief delight of my life. . . ."

So-called rude attacks to Finck were "no more excusable in a civilized community than it would have been for the reviewer, on meeting the artist on the sidewalk, to slap his face or kick him into the gutter. The music critics of leading newspapers are still allowed to act like wolves, hyenas and harpies, sparing neither the dead nor the living. It is a curious phenomenon, which makes one doubt whether music really has charms to soothe the savage breast."

This makes me wonder what Finck would have thought had he read the following from the columns of the Berlin Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung in 1739:

"Music birds of passage, bustling violinists and players of wind instruments are to be seen in every town. It looks as if all the swindlers from the north and south had passed the word to cheat the German philistines and take their money for foolish tricks, which they pass off as artistic productions. Rarely is there a true artist among these travelers. More often, bunglers and quacks come, who would do better to stay home and plant cabbage and beets than to go abroad and labor at music stands, clad in their red trousers and silvery silk coats."

Music critics in those days spared no one and wrote reviews guaranteed to annihilate, as in the following from an English periodical: "Miss Franklin's playing was a good example of her teacher's method, and her teacher's method was abominable."

As a result of editing many reviews, I've gathered that a most important requisite for the performer is his program, for it must not only please the audience but intrigue the critic. Thus, its preparation requires much research, meditation and common sense. There are recitalists about to plunge into the ordeal of a debut who steer away from a challenging selection because they're afraid of being compared with a renowned artist closely identified with the piece. Nonsense! As I asked in my MUSIC JOURNAL violin article last year: Are they mice or are they men?

"What makes a perfect program?" I asked a critic the other day. "The performer should play only what suits his talent, temperament and artistic makeup, and let the chips fall where they may," was the reply. "If a recitalist feels that a certain work is just the thing to end the program and he plays it flawlessly, he shouldn't chicken out on including it. And he shouldn't program a new piece merely because it's dedicated to him if he can't play it brilliantly, or if it doesn't have enough meat."

Another tip: Keep the critics in mind by introducing or including a group or piece that's little known, and it should be played close to intermission time so that the critic will be around to hear it before scurrying to his deadline. Usually, however, the critic will stay until just before the encores.

In his recital days, Jascha Heifetz, to name but one giant among the greats, always offered critics and the audience something out of the ordinary. Performers, therefore, would be wise to do some extensive soul-searching before sending their programs to the printers.

In brief, don't let the critics down, for they go to your thing hoping that somehow your program will be fresh and different, and that you're putting your best foot forward. □

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

MAY 1970

night after night!" A critic, however, doesn't exactly see it that way, for each season subjects him to bad music and some good music poorly performed, and only once in a while is he treated to a glorious performance. Alas, even our great halls aren't always showcases for striking talent.

Also, how many times can one hear the Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky violin or piano concertos, or the same symphonies and operas week after week, year after year, and still respond to them ecstatically? Yet, critics enter a hall or opera house hoping to hear something new in an old warhorse.

Generally, critics can be divided into two classes: musicians who also are newspapermen, and writers who are interested in music. The perfect critic, of course, should be able to play some instrument, compose, be an expert on music history and be a crack writer. However, I don't think I'll be betraying any confidence if I say that hardly any critic has all these qualifications.

I've been told that some reviewers do include composers, teachers and instrumentalists as well as some who began their careers in journalism. Some have even combined a rather successful career as musicians and writers on music.

Music criticism is a male-dominated field, but from time to time a woman comes along like Harriett Johnson, The New York Post's scribe, who's also a composer, pianist and author. Harold C. Schonberg, chief music critic of The New York Times, is a pianist and has written two excellent books on conductors and pianists. He's also a whiz on chess and cards, by the way. The rest of his crew all play some instrument or compose. Winthrop Sargeant of The New Yorker once told me that he played violin under Toscanini.

Despite critics giving the impression that ice water runs through their veins, they have been known to become excited over an exceptional performance, and can be witty and a lot of fun—giving evidence that under that Sphinx-like exterior beats a heart.

From my perch where I sit and go over their copy night after night, I think I'm somewhat qualified to say that a critic's job is anything but strawberries and cream—despite the glamor of the occupation. For one thing, he's bombarded daily by mail or phone calls by drum-beaters seeking publicity for their clients. Secondly, there are the Sunday columns to write, and the number of events he must cover in any given week can be staggering. The Times has six regular critics and a few more on a stand-by basis, while other publications, I believe, have one each.

As chief critic, Schonberg writes about a major happening in considerable detail, and never covers more than one event at a time. On the other hand, his assistants may have to review two or more performances on a busy weekend, spending much time not only in appraising music and artists' but traveling by subway, bus or taxi from hall to hall. And not only must they have an idea when the major parts of each performance occur, but they must also figure out how long it takes to commute around the big town.

As an example, there are weekends when critics around town may have to plan on hearing a Carnegie Hall violin recital, an orchestra at Philharmonic Hall, a rock 'n' roll group at Fillmore East, or possibly rush to catch a new singer at the Met or a pianist making her debut at Tully Hall or at Hunter. An assignment schedule, however, may go awry with one or more events starting late, and with intermissions and encores upsetting the timetable even further. Also, what if he misses some important aspect of a performance? He must then make some calls and settle for the information second-hand, which is then carefully evaluated before it's used.

Many have asked whether negative reviews have ever made critics lock horns with managers, artists, composers and press agents? Happily, though, there are few cases on record during the last century of these irate people invading a critic's sanctum with a horsewhip or pistol. But Italian tenors are another thing.

Once, while singing Il Trovatore at the San Carlo in Naples, Franco Corelli was booed by a student. The tenor raced backstage, bolted up three flights of stairs, broke down the door of the young man's box, scuffled with him, and, when the two were finally separated, Corelli had his stage sword half-drawn.

A question popped at me at parties frequently is whether critics write about a performance without attending it, or if they can be "bought." My answer is always a loud "No!" In either instance, if a critic employed by a reputable publication tried any of these filthy tricks, he'd be out on the street in nothing flat.

A second query is whether critics compare notes before writing their respective reviews. No. Their time is too limited to engage in this unprofessional practice. And woe to him who dares to try to have a word with a critic as he races up the aisle to fly to his office to write up to a column in less than an hour.

Because concerts, operas or recitals aren't like Broadway shows that may

(Continued on page 66)

7 9

SUN

Lyons

s brought some 50 vell from the South
hipyard where the nne d'Arc" and the r" were berthed un-Quebec. The of-vell to pay their re-
Armand Morisssette
tory, who has been rsonnel in the Unit-

"Pompons Rouges"
Morissette who had

The sailors were delighted that their visit in Boston coincided with the many celebrations in observance of the 90th anniversary of the Boston Symphony which through the years has featured so many outstanding French artists and conductors including the late Charles Munch.

39,575

70

Students May Subscribe For Youth Concerts Series

MARLBORO — Mrs. Robert E. Collier, Local Chairman for YOUTH CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL, has announced that subscriptions for the 1970-1971 Boston Symphony Youth Concerts must be returned by May 8.

CITY POST
MARLBORO, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,500

MAY 7 1970

The Youth Concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson directing members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. A series of three concerts are presented on Saturdays, at Symphony Hall, at 11 a.m., with this year's programs scheduled for November 7 and 14, 1970 and January 30, 1971.

The programs are planned to stimulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the tradition-filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall. In addition, The Ancient Instruments Room, with its priceless collection of rare and unusual instruments, is open to the young concert-goers before and after the concert.

For information or ticket applications, please call Mrs. Robert E. Collier, 485-2203, or your Marlborough Recreation Department, 485-8200.

Tickets are sold by the series only at $6.00 for three concerts.

190a

When the Conductor of the Boston Symphony fell ill, Michael Tilson Thomas filled the breach. Now, at 25, he's the new Associate Conductor.

The Stand-In Who Made Good

Sunday Herald Traveler photos by Laban Whittaker

by McLaren Harris

By all assessments the Boston Symphony's morning rehearsal had been productive. Backstage at Symphony Hall Michael Tilson Thomas, the young assistant conductor, sprawled his long, slender frame over a chair, his body temporarily fatigued and dark hair tousled from his exertions on the podium, but his blue eyes and boyish face still shone with the excitement of serious music-making.

He hummed passages from the second movement of Bela Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta," which had received much of the morning's attention, and discussed musical points briefly with several players as they prepared to leave. Then, as if unable to retain his concentration for another minute, he paced the floor like a caged animal and announced, "I'm not in the mood for contemporary music. I want to conduct Tchaikovsky, Mahler, Wagner — 'Parsifal,' that's what I want." And he charged to a nearby piano and produced from memory several bars of Wagnerian chords, revealing a keyboard approach as expert and assured as his manner with a baton.

"That's my bagatelle of springtime," he quipped.

Autumn was approaching when Thomas, who is a bachelor ("I've little time for anything but music now"), moved into his quarters on Berkeley street near Marlboro, a neighborhood which affords him a measure of anonymity — he can easily pass as a member of a sizable student population —and proximity to places of business and pleasure ("I walk a lot"). He is by now a familiar figure in the Symphony's world, but he still remembers vividly his apprehension during the first rehearsal.

"Apprehension isn't the word for it," he said. "I'd say it was more like stark terror. With any orchestra at first — I suppose it's because you don't know the people — there seems to be a sort of glass plate between the conductor and the orchestra. You don't know whether you're getting across to them or not. But that usually dissolves during the first rehearsal, and from then on it's a wonderful experience.

"The Symphony players are great. They're helpful and patient, and I really enjoy working with them. But I still find it amazing. Every now and then — even in the middle of a concert — I look around and think, 'This is the Boston Symphony! All these musicians with their titles, their degrees and accomplishments, and here I am!' Sometimes I can hardly believe it."

Watching him work earlier, one would never suspect Thomas of such feelings of awe. His rehearsal manner is cheerful and direct, his acquaintance with the music painstakingly thorough, as it must be. His conducting gestures are straightforward and unshowmanlike, designed for communication and not for entertainment.

"Bartok second movement from the top," Thomas announces briskly, requesting and getting the orchestra's immediate attention. He knows that rehearsal overtime is one of an orchestra management's worst enemies, and that a 2½-hour rehearsal can pass with dizzying quickness. The music begins and Thomas seems to make a mental note of some ensemble fuzziness, but keeps going. They arrive at a section of staggered, rhythmically intricate entrances, the ensemble sways and seams begin to show.

Thomas calls a halt and says, "First violas alone, please." Then both viola sections. Then all together. Then second cellos. Then together again. The conductor warns about late entrances, rushing the tempo, clipping note-values and upsetting the syncopations. Some five-beat measures are giving trouble, so at a player's suggestion he changes his baton pattern and the problem disappears. Gradually but surely, progress is being made.

But now rehearsal was finished, and it was time for lunch. Thomas vanished into the orchestra's library for a few minutes, then reappeared and set out for a nearby cafe, the favorite retreat for Symphony musicians. On the way his mind was still in rehearsal, and he sang again the troublesome passage from the Bartok.

"Rehearsals are strange affairs," he commented. "Sometimes in sections where you expect real trouble things will go perfectly. Then something which looks relatively simple comes along and you begin to think they'll never catch on."

Michael Tilson Thomas is full of seriousness and devotion to his art, and success has come upon him quickly. At 25, he is already a recording artist, a holder of various prizes for musical accomplishment, a professional pianist and, for a good part of last season, something like an acting music director.

He entered the University of Southern California at 18; by age 20 he was conducting the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra in Los Angeles and later took up the baton for that city's Monday Evening Concerts, the Philharmonic Youth Concerts and California's Ojai Festival. He assisted composer-conductor Pierre Boulez at Ojai and in Bayreuth, Germany, and has prepared premieres of new works by (and with) Boulez, Igor Stravinsky, avant-gardist Karlheinz Stockhaussen, Lukas Foss and others.

Thomas came to the Boston Symphony last September as assistant conductor, a purely subordinate position offering only occasional, isolated opportunities to demonstrate one's talents. All that changed abruptly last Oct. 23 when music director William Steinberg became ill during a Philharmonic Hall concert in New York.

"Put on your suit. I think you're going to conduct," Steinberg told him at intermission. Thomas claims to remember almost nothing of what happened from then on that night, but the next morning's reviews were unanimously admiring, and his career received a decidedly upward jolt. "Study your scores," Leonard Bernstein advised him afterward. The advice was well taken. When Steinberg was unable to return to Boston in February, his young assistant took the orchestra's helm for several weeks of concerts here and on tour, including the final two weeks of the winter season.

At that time the orchestra's trustees, justifiably impressed by his capable leadership, decided that Thomas should be rewarded. On April 23 he was appointed associate conductor,

Continued on next page

May 17, 1970

190a

close uice, any buy it...

you
ay.

The Stand-In

Continued from previous page

thus becoming the second person in the Symphony's 89-year history to hold that position (the first was former concertmaster Richard Burgin).

Before these early accomplishments, Thomas' path to the musical profession was, if anything, circuitous. He is the grandson of New York's famous Yiddish theater personalities, Boris and Bessie Thomashevsky, and the son of writer and film producer Ted Thomas. Michael was born in North Hollywood, California — "in the country," as he recalls his home 20 years ago — and remembers hearing stories of the theater and of childhoods in Russia.

He began to play piano about age 5, but his principal interest through high school continued to be science — mineralogy, crystallography and chemistry — and he won prizes for his projects. As late as undergraduate school he "almost" majored in Asiatic history, but by then music had taken over.

What brought him around?

"Well, it seems to me that ever since Aristotle, Western man has spend most of his time worrying about material and quantitative things, and those people who thought about qualitative things have been looked upon as dropouts or hippies. Now man has developed the means and machinery to handle his quantitative problems and is thrown back to the qualitative question. I think that was part of my decision. Science, of course, still has value for me. I found I could use analytical processes to approach non-rational or non-literal subjects, and music is the least literal of all the arts."

Given the precarious financial position of so many major orchestras, has he ever felt that he is entering a profession whose days are numbered?

"You're not the first person to ask me that question," said Thomas, smiling. "The answer is no. Some of the more exciting possibilities for orchestras remain unexplored, especially where they concern program structure and variety of ensemble. In fact, orchestras should be larger than they are — at least 150 and maybe 200 musicians — and much more diversified. You could have a full orchestra plus several smaller groups, all interchangeable and with more than one conductor, rehearsing at the same time. Such a pool of players could give concerts every night or share the same programs. People's lives would be much more interesting."

Would this arrangement be economically feasible?

"In London, yes. In New York, maybe. In Boston, I don't know. Maybe there would have to be some kind of consolidation. But here's an-

Continued on page 31

Thomas on modern music: Debussy "totally great," Stravinsky admirable, but "could just kick" Schoenberg for "square" rhythms.

The Stand-In Who Made Good

Seated on podium at far left, Thomas rehearses the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in "Night Flight," by Boston University composer Gardner Read, for a performance in honor of the university's centennial.

Continued from page 26

other thing. Some say that concert halls are bad because they have too much of a museum environment. I love museums! And incidentally, the Museum of Fine Arts is one of the things I like best about Boston. They have a special environment where one can accept art on its own terms, where the sense of setting something off makes one so aware of the object and of the space around it.

"In the same way," continued Thomas, "I'm not in favor of orchestras playing in business suits. No. I believe musicians should wear something special when performing — not necessarily full formal dress, but something different from what they wear elsewhere. The process of preparation for performance — from dressing, to coming to the hall, to tuning the instruments — is very important. It gives musi
"I
piece tende ment for e
— no with don't toget
char
"T ity," much

May 17, 1970

190a

qualitative things have oked upon as dropouts
ies. Now man has ded the means and may to handle his quantita-oblems and is thrown o the qualitative ques-think that was part of ecision. Science, of still has value for me.
I could use analytical es to approach non-l or non-literal sub-nd music is the least of all the arts."
the precarious fi-position of so many rchestras, has he ever t he is entering a pro-whose days are num-

re not the first person
ne that question," said
, smiling. "The an-
no. Some of the more possibilities for ors remain unexplored,
ly where they concern
n structure and variensemble. In fact, ors should be larger than
— at least 150 and 00 musicians — and nore diversified. You ave a full orchestra
veral smaller groups, changeable and with an one conductor, re-
at the same time.
pool of players could certs every night or he same programs.
lives would be much eresting."
this arrangement be cally feasible?
ondon, yes. In New naybe. In Boston, I
now. Maybe there
ve to be some kind of tion. But here's an-

Continued on page 31

as on modern music:
ussy "totally great,"
vinsky admirable, but st kick" Schoenberg
r "square" rhythms.

The Stand-In Who Made Good

Seated on podium at far left, Thomas rehearses the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in "Night Flight," by Boston University composer Gardner Read, for a performance in honor of the university's centennial.

Continued from page 26

other thing. Some say that concert halls are bad because they have too much of a museum environment. I love museums! And incidentally, the Museum of Fine Arts is one of the things I like best about Boston. They have a special environment where one can accept art on its own terms, where the sense of setting something off makes one so aware of the object and of the space around it.

"In the same way," continued Thomas, "I'm not in favor of orchestras playing in business suits. No. I believe musicians should wear something special when performing — not necessarily full formal dress, but something different from what they wear elsewhere. The process of preparation for performance — from dressing, to coming to the hall, to tuning the instruments — is very important. It gives music its own special setting.

"I also believe in doing pieces the way they were intended, using all old instruments or all new instruments for early music, for instance — not mixing recorders, say, with modern strings. They don't match, and using them together might distort the character of a work.

"There's another possibility," Thomas went on. "So much music before Bach lies neglected. Sometimes I even think Bach was the last great composer in terms of the esthetic behind his music. He wrote music for its beauty and for what it could express. A performance of Bach's Cantata 140 the other night nearly knocked me out. When you get all the lines moving and the voices balanced, it seems like all time has stopped, like everything is suspended.

"Beginning with the era of

Continued on next page

May 17, 1970

The Stand-In Who Made Good

Continued from page 32

than anyone else. A newspaper critic can walk away from the performance and may forget about it, but I can't. I must live with it and think about the next time. As Leonard Bernstein says, we are always revaluating. It's a process of growth. And if there's one thing my teacher, Ingolf Dahl, did for me, it was to impart to me a certain standard. You may not reach it all the time, but you're always aware of it and must work toward it."

"Do you want to be a full-time music director?"

"I really can't say at this time," he replied frankly. "I'm not sure what I want. What I need right now is some time off to do a little of that revaluation of where I am and where I'm going. But not too much time. I'm not a good vacationer. Two or three weeks is as much as I can take, and then I have to be working, rehearsing, performing."

Thomas will conduct two concerts — Sunday afternoon, July 19, and Saturday night, Aug. 8 — at this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, plus lead the Chicago Symphony at its Ravinia Festival and fill some guest engagements.

Until then, he said, "I'm going to Europe to edit a recording I made for Deutsche Grammophon, visit one of my teachers in Switzerland and see my parents in Los Angeles."

"I thought you didn't like recordings," I said.

"That's not entirely true," he responded. "The impact of the recording industry has been immensely positive and immensely negative — positive in that it has helped establish a standard for technical accuracy, but negative where it has served to rigidify the esthetics of music. The idea that a piece must always be the same — I don't like that. After you have listened to a particular record 20 times there's a tendency to adopt that performance as the 'correct' one. But that's wrong. It hurts music. Can you imagine, if the same principle were applied to drama, that every Hamlet would have to deliver his soliloquy at exactly the same rate, with exactly the same inflections as the Olivier recording or be rejected? It's ridiculous."

Thomas looked at his watch and moaned. His friends were waiting for him. The orchestra's librarian was ready to close the library and needed the score. He hadn't finished with it. "The days are not long enough," he said with sadness, "to have a pleasant lunch, to talk, to sit in the sun and to study scores properly. Just not enough time."

And with almost desperate concentration the young conductor, already more master than apprentice, went back to the music, his eyes riveted on the notes, singing Bartok phrases in a half whisper and with pencil at the ready.

Thomas on conducting: "The audience must know exactly how I feel . . ."

1906.

Robert C. Marsh

Critic at-large

Discovery

Michael Tilson Thomas: destined to be a big name in classical music.

Michael Tilson Thomas seems, at first glance, to be the sort of nice young man that every doting mother secretly hopes her nubile daughters will meet.

Such mamas should have second thoughts. Few families are equal to the strain of a generalmusikdirektor in the younger generation, and Thomas seems destined to acquire such a role. Soon.

Right now he's associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

He was in town briefly last week to talk about his local debut with two concerts at Ravinia in July and August.

When Thomas was engaged as assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra for 1969-70, it was assumed that he would lead one week of subscription programs and perform the other varied musical chores that are the accustomed lot of assistant conductors the world over.

NO ONE RECKONED that William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, would be ill for much of the season and that his 25-year-old aide would have 30 or more concerts as his responsibility.

It was one of those do or die opportunities from which careers are made. After all, you can argue, when the 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein took over for the ailing Bruno Walter a quarter century or so ago, it was for one concert. As soon as that crisis was past, the music director of thte orchestra (Artur Rodzinski) and other guests resumed the announced concert schedule. Bernstein, after his moment of glory, could retire gracefully from the week to week pressure of keeping the season going.

Thomas has been both in the spotlight and on the spot. Just before coming to Chicago, he had to hold auditions for vacancies in the ensemble, a job no 25-year-old would normally be doing for an orchestra as important as the Boston Symphony.

NO ONE QUESTIONED his right to the assignment, After all, he had just completed the winter season with an extremely successful performance of the Mahler Ninth Symphony. Normally, that's no assignment for a 25-year-old either.

Like Bernstein and Seiji Ozawa, Thomas has served a notable apprenticeship and, despite his youth, has acquired the seasoning needed for professional success. Born in Hollywood to a family, (Thomashefsky) long associated with the Yiddish theater, he attended Los Angeles city schools and enrolled at the University of Southern California for wide-ranging studies that included conducting (with Ingolf Dahl) and a large helping of liberal arts outside the usual narrow confines of the musical curriculum.

"IF I EVER finish a thesis, which I probably won't now," he observes, "I was close to a PhD in oriental music."

An excellent pianist, Thomas began his conducting with the orchestra of the Los Angeles Young Musicians Foundation five years ago, moved on to the Monday Evening Concerts, a major Los Angeles series, and in 1968 appeared with the Youth Concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and at the Ojai Festival. Summer study at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony brought the Koussevitzky prize in 1968.

WHAT ABOUT THOSE Ravinia programs?

On July 12, he directs a small orchestra of Chicago Symphony musicians in J. C. Bach's Sinfonia for Double Orchestra, Haydn's Symphony No. 60, "Integrales" by Varese and Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite.

Aug. 1 with the full orchestra he'll play J.S. Bach's Fourth Suite, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 (with John Browning soloist), and for an unexpected second half, Ruggles' "Sun Treader" and extracts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung."

If Thomas conducts as well as he talks, you can expect a couple exciting evenings.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125

MAY 7 1970

PANORAMA - CHICAGO DAILY NEWS, Saturday-Sunday, May 9-10, 1970

Young master of the baton

Michael Tilson Thomas, an orchestral conductor at 25

There's Michael Tilson Thomas. What, you don't recognize the name? You will soon, for at 25 Thomas is already the celebrated associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And this summer he will be making his local debut at the Ravinia Festival—on July 12, with Bach, Haydn, Varese and Stravinsky on the program, and on Aug. 1 with Bach, Mozart, Ruggles and Wagner—all of them old friends.

We found Thomas this week anchored triumphantly amid a clutch of music critics, ping-ponging musical esoterica back and forth with superb aplomb. Aside from a crisp blue blazer and his crisp, careful speech, Thomas draws support from a theatrical heritage (his grandfather starred on the Yiddish stage) and a refined education, including study at the University of Southern California and concertizing with the likes of Pierre Boulez, Igor Stravinsky and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Thomas got his chance to conduct the BSO last season when William Steinberg became ill in mid-concert. With no rehearsal, he extracted an acclaimed performance, although "I still don't remember a thing that happened [illegible] meetings." He finds that his youth [illegible] audiences "more excited at first—but [illegible] quickly overtook it," and he doesn't [illegible] about "behaving like an experimental conductor."

He enjoys popular music "for its own sake," especially James Brown, Peggy Lee and the Beatles, but feels that "when classical players mix with pop music it's successful when conductors do it it's a disaster. The orchestra simply sustains an F for 32 bars while the rock group is doing its thing. What can the orchestra do that's as tight and altogether as the pop? It's just patronizing to mix the two."

As for classical works, "There is no definitive performance. Why should we have the same 'Hamlet' each time — or the same symphony? I want my 'Eroica' to be one you've never heard before." This ambition, without apparent vanity, vouches for an unusual maturity, one which Thomas impresses upon young musicians with these words: "None of my training was as important — in terms of getting into a piece — as my studies in architecture, in literature and philosophy. You conduct with your whole being."

THE LIVELY ARTS

NOWADAYS you can stay in New York all year and manage to hear virtually all of the world's great symphony orchestras — "live." Making it possible: Carnegie Hall's unmatched International Visiting Orchestras series, certainly the most fantastic series of its kind in any city of the world.

From overseas come the major orchestras of Britain, Holland, France, Germany, Italy, and Australia. From the U.S. come the three midwestern orchestras that must now rank in the world's top ten: the Cleveland Orchestra (under Szell), the Chicago Symphony (under Solti), and the Minnesota Orchestra (under Skrowaczewski). Also add the orchestras of Los Angeles, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Baltimore, etc., for a musical feast that no royalty of the past ever had in such [illegible] as modern-day New Yorke[illegible]

Highlight of the '69-7[illegible] evidence that the London [illegible] has moved ahead of the I[illegible] phony as that music capi[illegible] chestra. The reason was [illegible] evident: conductor Bern[illegible] (also conductor of the Ams[illegible] certgebouw). His New Y[illegible] were in every way a perso[illegible]

Season's hits: Haitink (l.), Thomas (r.)

for Haitink, who offered New York some rarely played works — Shostakovich's long-banned (by the Russians) 4th symphony, Bruckner's 2nd, and Holst's space age (even though written in 1914) epic tone poem The Planets. Most important, Haitink, 40, gave them [illegible]

Thomas led other BSO concerts in Boston and New York to tremendous acclaim — quickly establishing himself as the most exciting young American conductor to emerge since Leonard Bernstein similarly shot to fame as a substitute in the 1940's.

At Lincoln Center, the New York Philharmonic spent a guest-conductor "interim year" between Leonard Bernstein's retirement and the arrival next fall of his successor, Pierre Boulez. Among this season's most memorable moments: a concert led by Seiji Ozawa featuring Corky Siegel's Blues Band; the U.S. debut of Brazilian pianist Nelson Freire; a doubling as both conductor and solo violinist by Lorin Maazel; and Wagner's Gotterdammerung led by Bernstein with Eileen Farrell [illegible]

[illegible] highlights: the Phila[illegible]

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

VOGUE'S NOTE BOOK

THE NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY BALL FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

1

2

3

Splashed with champagne, flowers, and the Boston fervour for music, the Ball for the Symphony swung through a red-and-gold replica of the Paris Maxim's set up in Symphony Hall—the dinner flown in from the 'nineties French restaurant. The amazing result of the evening, a loyal Boston tradition, was the $132,000 raised for an orchestra worth every one of its years.

5

6

7

8

9

1. Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra on the stage of Symphony Hall. 2. Mrs. Jaime Peña Vera and Mr. Louis W. Cabot. 3. Mr. and Mrs. David G. Mugar. 4. Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, co-chairmen of the Ball. 5. Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White. 6. Senator and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy. 7. Mr. Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Robert Fitzgerald. 8. Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis and Mrs. Norton Sherman. 9. Mrs. George Peabody Gardner, junior; General and Mrs. James M. Gavin; Mr. George Peabody Gardner, junior.

1906

Robert C. Marsh

Critic at-large

Discovery

Michael Tilson Thomas: destined to be a big name in classical music.

Michael Tilson Thomas seems, at first glance, to be the sort of nice young man that every doting mother secretly hopes her nubile daughters will meet.

Such mamas should have second thoughts. Few families are equal to the strain of a generalmusikdirektor in the younger generation, and Thomas seems destined to acquire such a role. Soon.

Right now he's associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

He was in town briefly last week to talk about his local debut with two concerts at Ravinia in July and August.

When Thomas was engaged as assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra for 1969-70, it was assumed that he would lead one week of subscription programs and perform the other varied musical chores that are the accustomed lot of assistant conductors the world over.

NO ONE RECKONED that William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, would be ill for much of the season and that his 25-year-old aide would have 30 or more concerts as his responsibility.

It was one of those do or die opportunities from which careers are made. After all, you can argue, when the 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein took over for the ailing Bruno Walter a quarter century or so ago, it was for one concert. As soon as that crisis was past, the music director of thte orchestra (Artur Rodzinski) and other guests resumed the announced concert schedule. Bernstein, after his moment of glory, could retire gracefully from the week to week pressure of keeping the season going.

Thomas has been both in the spotlight and on the spot. Just before coming to Chicago, he had to hold auditions for vacancies in the ensemble, a job no 25-year-old would normally be doing for an orchestra as important as the Boston Symphony.

NO ONE QUESTIONED his right to the assignment, After all, he had just completed the winter season with an extremely successful performance of the Mahler Ninth Symphony. Normally, that's no assignment for a 25-year-old either.

Like Bernstein and Seiji Ozawa, Thomas has served a notable apprenticeship and, despite his youth, has acquired the seasoning needed for professional success. Born in Hollywood to a family, (Thomashefsky) long associated with the Yiddish theater, he attended Los Angeles city schools and enrolled at the University of Southern California for wide-ranging studies that included conducting (with Ingolf Dahl) and a large helping of liberal arts outside the usual narrow confines of the musical curriculum.

"IF I EVER finish a thesis, which I probably won't now," he observes, "I was close to a PhD in oriental music."

An excellent pianist, Thomas began his conducting with the orchestra of the Los Angeles Young Musicians Foundation five years ago, moved on to the Monday Evening Concerts, a major Los Angeles series, and in 1968 appeared with the Youth Concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and at the Ojai Festival. Summer study at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony brought the Koussevitzky prize in 1968.

WHAT ABOUT THOSE Ravinia programs?

On July 12, he directs a small orchestra of Chicago Symphony musicians in J. C. Bach's Sinfonia for Double Orchestra, Haydn's Symphony No. 60, "Integrales" by Varese and Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite.

Aug. 1 with the full orchestra he'll play J.S. Bach's Fourth Suite, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 (with John Browning soloist), and for an unexpected second half, Ruggles' "Sun Treader" and extracts from Wagner's "Gotterdaemmerung."

If Thomas conducts as well as he talks, you can expect a couple exciting evenings.

CHICAGO SUN-TIMES
MAY 7 1970

PANORAMA - CHICAGO DAILY NEWS, Saturday-Sunday, May 9-10, 1970

Young master of the baton

Michael Tilson Thomas, an orchestral conductor at 25

There's Michael Tilson Thomas. What, you don't recognize the name? You will soon, for at 25 Thomas is already the celebrated associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And this summer he will be making his local debut at the Ravinia Festival—on July 12, with Bach, Haydn, Varese and Stravinsky on the program, and on Aug. 1 with Bach, Mozart, Ruggles and Wagner—all of them old friends.

We found Thomas this week anchored triumphantly amid a clutch of music critics, ping-ponging musical esoterica back and forth with superb aplomb. Aside from a crisp blue blazer and his crisp, careful speech, Thomas draws support from a theatrical heritage (his grandfather starred on the Yiddish stage) and a refined education, including study at the University of Southern California and concertizing with the likes of Pierre Boulez, Igor Stravinsky and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Thomas got his chance to conduct the BSO last season when William Steinberg became ill in mid-concert. With no rehearsal, he extracted an acclaimed performance, although "I still don't remember a thing that happened onstage." He finds that his youth makes audiences "more excited at first—but they quickly overlook it," and he doesn't worry about "behaving like an experienced conductor."

He enjoys popular music "for its own sake," especially James Brown, Peggy Lee and the Beatles, but feels that "When composers mix with pop music it's successful, when conductors do it it's a disaster. The orchestra simply sustains an F for 75 bars while the rock group is doing its thing. What can the orchestra do that's as tight and altogether as the pop? It's just patronizing to mix the two."

As for classical works, "There is no definitive performance. Why should we have the same 'Hamlet' each time — or the same symphony? I want my 'Eroica' to be one you've never heard before." This ambition, without apparent vanity, vouches for an unusual maturity, one which Thomas impresses upon young musicians with these words: "None of my training was as important — in terms of getting into a piece — as my studies in architecture, in literature and philosophy. You conduct with your whole being."

THE LIVELY ARTS

NOWADAYS you can stay in New York all year and manage to hear virtually all of the world's great symphony orchestras – "live." Making it possible: Carnegie Hall's unmatched International Visiting Orchestras series, certainly the most fantastic series of its kind in any city of the world.

From overseas come the major orchestras of Britain, Holland, France, Germany, Italy, and Australia. From the U.S. come the three midwestern orchestras that must now rank in the world's top ten: the Cleveland Orchestra (under Szell), the Chicago Symphony (under Solti), and the Minnesota Orchestra (under Skrowaczewski). Also add the orchestras of Los Angeles, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Baltimore etc., for a musical feast that no royalty of the past ever had in such [illegible] as modern-day New Yorke[illegible]

Highlight of the '69-7[illegible] evidence that the London [illegible] has moved ahead of the [illegible] phony as that music capi[illegible] chestra. The reason was [illegible] evident: conductor Bern[illegible] (also conductor of the Ams[illegible] certgebouw). His New Y[illegible] were in every way a perso[illegible]

Season's hits: Haitink (l.), Thomas (r.)

for Haitink, who offered New York some rarely played works – Shostakovich's long-banned (by the Russians) 4th symphony, Bruckner's 2nd, and Holst's space age (even though written in 1914) epic tone poem The Planets. Most important, Haitink, 40, gave them [illegible]

Thomas led other BSO concerts in Boston and New York to tremendous acclaim – quickly establishing himself as the most exciting young American conductor to emerge since Leonard Bernstein similarly shot to fame as a substitute in the 1940's.

At Lincoln Center, the New York Philharmonic spent a guest-conductor "interim year" between Leonard Bernstein's retirement and the arrival next fall of his successor, Pierre Boulez. Among this season's most memorable moments: a concert led by Seiji Ozawa featuring Corky Siegel's Blues Band, the U.S. debut of Brazilian pianist Nelson Freire; a doubling as both conductor and solo violinist by Lorin Maazel; and Wagner's Gotterdammerung led by Bernstein with Eileen Farrell [illegible]

[illegible]ighlights: the Finla[illegible]

VOGUE'S NOTE BOOK

THE NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY BALL FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Splashed with champagne, flowers, and the Boston fervour for music, the Ball for the Symphony swung through a red-and-gold replica of the Paris Maxim's set up in Symphony Hall—the dinner flown in from the 'nineties French restaurant. The amazing result of the evening, a loyal Boston tradition, was the $132,000 raised for an orchestra worth every one of its years.

1. Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra on the stage of Symphony Hall. 2. Mrs. Jaime Peña Vera and Mr. Louis W. Cabot. 3. Mr. and Mrs. David G. Mugar. 4. Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, co-chairmen of the Ball. 5. Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White. 6. Senator and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy. 7. Mr. Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Robert Fitzgerald. 8. Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis and Mrs. Norton Sherman. 9. Mrs. George Peabody Gardner, junior; General and Mrs. James M. Gavin; Mr. George Peabody Gardner, junior.

1906.

Robert C. Marsh

Critic at-large

Discovery

Michael Tilson Thomas: destined to be a big name in classical music.

Michael Tilson Thomas seems, at first glance, to be the sort of nice young man that every doting mother secretly hopes her nubile daughters will meet.

Such mamas should have second thoughts. Few families are equal to the strain of a generalmusikdirektor in the younger generation, and Thomas seems destined to acquire such a role. Soon.

Right now he's associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

He was in town briefly last week to talk about his local debut with two concerts at Ravinia in July and August.

When Thomas was engaged as assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra for 1969-70, it was assumed that he would lead one week of subscription programs and perform the other varied musical chores that are the accustomed lot of assistant conductors the world over.

NO ONE RECKONED that William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, would be ill for much of the season and that his 25-year-old aide would have 30 or more concerts as his responsibility.

It was one of those do or die opportunities from which careers are made. After all, you can argue, when the 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein took over for the ailing Bruno Walter a quarter century or so ago, it was for one concert. As soon as that crisis was past, the music director of thte orchestra (Artur Rodzinski) and other guests resumed the announced concert schedule. Bernstein, after his moment of glory, could retire gracefully from the week to week pressure of keeping the season going.

Thomas has been both in the spotlight and on the spot. Just before coming to Chicago, he had to hold auditions for vacancies in the ensemble, a job no 25-year-old would normally be doing for an orchestra as important as the Boston Symphony.

NO ONE QUESTIONED his right to the assignment, After all, he had just completed the winter season with an extremely successful performance of the Mahler Ninth Symphony. Normally, that's no assignment for a 25-year-old either.

Like Bernstein and Seiji Ozawa, Thomas has served a notable apprenticeship and, despite his youth, has acquired the seasoning needed for professional success. Born in Hollywood to a family, (Thomashefsky) long associated with the Yiddish theater, he attended Los Angeles city schools and enrolled at the University of Southern California for wide-ranging studies that included conducting (with Ingolf Dahl) and a large helping of liberal arts outside the usual narrow confines of the musical curriculum.

"IF I EVER finish a thesis, which I probably won't now," he observes, "I was close to a PhD in oriental music."

An excellent pianist, Thomas began his conducting with the orchestra of the Los Angeles Young Musicians Foundation five years ago, moved on to the Monday Evening Concerts, a major Los Angeles series, and in 1968 appeared with the Youth Concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and at the Ojai Festival. Summer study at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony brought the Koussevitzky prize in 1968.

WHAT ABOUT THOSE Ravinia programs?

On July 12, he directs a small orchestra of Chicago Symphony musicians in J. C. Bach's Sinfonia for Double Orchestra, Haydn's Symphony No. 60, "Integrales" by Varese and Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite.

Aug. 1 with the full orchestra he'll play J.S. Bach's Fourth Suite, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 (with John Browning soloist), and for an unexpected second half, Ruggles' "Sun Treader" and extracts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung."

If Thomas conducts as well as he talks, you can expect a couple exciting evenings.

CHICAGO SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125
MAY 7 1970

PANORAMA — CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

Young master of the baton

There's Michael Tilson Thomas. If you don't recognize the name, you will soon. At 25 Thomas is already the celebrated associate conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. And this summer he will [illegible] his local debut at the Ravinia Festival July 12 with Bach, Haydn, Varese and Stravinsky on the program, and on Aug. 1 with Bach, Mozart, Ruggles and Wagner — all of them old friends.

We found Thomas this week anchored triumphantly amid a clutch of music critics, ping-ponging musical esoterica back and forth with superb aplomb. Aside from a crisp blue blazer and his crisp, careful speech, Thomas draws support from a theatrical heritage (his grandfather starred on the Yiddish stage) and a refined education, including study at the University of Southern California and concertizing with the likes of Pierre Boulez, Igor Stravinsky and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Thomas got his chance to conduct the BSO last season when William Steinberg became ill in mid-concert. With no rehearsal, he extracted an acclaimed performance, although "I still don't remember a thing that happened [illegible]

[illegible] Thomas is no definitive performance. Why should we have the same 'Hamlet' each time — or the same symphony? I want my 'Eroica' to be one you've never heard before." This ambition, without apparent vanity, vouches for an unusual maturity, one which Thomas impresses upon young musicians with these words: "None of my training was as important — in terms of getting into a piece — as my studies in architecture, in literature and philosophy. You conduct with your whole being."

THE LIVELY ARTS

NOWADAYS you can stay in New York all year and manage to hear virtually all of the world's great symphony orchestras — "live." Making it possible: Carnegie Hall's unmatched International Visiting Orchestras series, certainly the most fantastic series of its kind in any city of the world.

From overseas come the major orchestras of Britain, Holland, France, Germany, Italy, and Australia. From the U.S. come the three midwestern orchestras that must now rank in the world's top ten: the Cleveland Orchestra (under Szell), the Chicago Symphony (under Solti), and the Minnesota Orchestra (under Skrowaczewski). Also add the orchestras of Los Angeles, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Baltimore, etc., for a musical feast that no royalty of the past ever had in such abundance as modern-day New Yorkers.

Highlight of the '69-'70 series: the evidence that the London Philharmonic has moved ahead of the London Symphony as that music capital's best orchestra. The reason was also plainly evident: conductor Bernard Haitink (also conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw). His New York concerts were in every way a personal triumph for Haitink, who offered New York some rarely played works — Shostakovich's long-banned (by the Russians) 4th symphony, Bruckner's 2nd, and Holst's space age (even though written in 1914) epic tone poem The Planets. Most important, Haitink, 40, gave them performances the likes of which New Yorkers had never heard before. By contrast, the New York concerts of the London Symphony under the popular André Previn could most charitably be called merely routine.

Season's hits: Haitink (l.), Thomas (r.)

Another triumph of the season: 24-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas filling in for the Boston Symphony's ailing music director William Steinberg. Following a last-minute substitution for Steinberg at a Lincoln Center concert in October [Senior, Nov. 10, 1969], Thomas led other BSO concerts in Boston and New York to tremendous acclaim — quickly establishing himself as the most exciting young American conductor to emerge since Leonard Bernstein similarly shot to fame as a substitute in the 1940's.

At Lincoln Center, the New York Philharmonic spent a guest-conductor "interim year" between Leonard Bernstein's retirement and the arrival next fall of his successor, Pierre Boulez. Among this season's most memorable moments: a concert led by Seiji Ozawa featuring Corky Siegel's Blues Band; the U.S. debut of Brazilian pianist Nelson Freire; a doubling as both conductor and solo violinist by Lorin Maazel; and Wagner's Gotterdammerung led by Bernstein with Eileen Farrell and Jess Thomas.

Other season highlights: the Philadelphia Orchestra's introduction of the controversial Shostakovich 13th symphony (with a Yevtushenko text that makes Soviet officials squirm); the St. Louis Symphony's introduction of neglected Czech composer Suk's 2nd symphony; and the continuing adventurousness of the programs of the American Symphony Orchestra under the nation's youngest 88-year-old, Leopold Stokowski. — ROY HEMMING

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000
SEP 1 1970

1

2

3

Splashed with champagne, flowers, and the Boston fervour for music, the Ball for the Symphony swung through a red-and-gold replica of the Paris Maxim's set up in Symphony Hall—the dinner flown in from the 'nineties French restaurant. The amazing result of the evening, a loyal Boston tradition, was the $132,000 raised for an orchestra worth every one of its years.

VOGUE'S SPOTLIGHT

Movies

BY ARTHUR SAINER

Stan Brakhage, "the courage of perception"

One of the giants of cinema, Stan Brakhage is holed up with his wife Jane and the young Brakhage children in a Colorado "ghost town, in an 1890's cabin at 9,000 feet on the Continental Divide." Using family and immediate surrounding external banalities: Brakhage is concerned with internalizing exterior [illegible] boulders, leaves, teacups, floor-[illegible] child.

8

9

1. Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra on the stage of Symphony Hall. 2. Mrs. Jaime Peña Vera and Mr. Louis W. Cabot. 3. Mr. and Mrs. David G. Mugar. 4. Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, co-chairmen of the Ball. 5. Mayor and Mrs. Kevin White. 6. Senator and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy. 7. Mr. Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Robert Fitzgerald. 8. Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis and Mrs. Norton Sherman. 9. Mrs. George Peabody Gardner, junior; General and Mrs. James M. Gavin; Mr. George Peabody Gardner, junior.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAY 10 1970

Green Thumbs Springing Up All Over Boston

Meet Anita Hov A Prime-Mover Garden Club Pa

By MARIAN KARPEN
HT Staff Writer

"For the first time in almost 40 years we're having the Garden Club of America's annual convention here in Boston," says green thumb-er Anita Hovey. "And this time it's sponsored by the Chestnut Hill Garden Club."

More than 500 member delegates from the 177 garden clubs throughout the country and in Hawaii are expected for the tomorrow-through-Thursday series of meetings, lectures, a talk by Chestnut Hill Garden Club-ber Thalassa Cruso, dinners and area garden visits. And Anita is one of the Garden Club's prime movers.

She's co-chairman of tomorrow's Garden Club night at Pops that will be NET-taped for nationwide broadcast in July, but then Anita is a staunch supporter of the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends. She's helped decorate some of their Friday-before-concert luncheons . . . brought in lots of fuschias and big, showy hydrangeas in pink, purple and light blue to help decorate, in keeping with the Maxim's setting, the recent 90th Anniversary BSO Ball.

THE TALL, TRIM BLONDE is carrying on the family gardening tradition. Her mother-in-law was a Garden uncle wife

IN THE WEBSTER GREENHOUSES, Mrs. Charles Hovey shows some of the prize-winning cymbidium orchids . . . all of which, plus the 15-acre grounds of that Chestnut Hill Webster estate, are still under the chief supervision and care of Irish-born Michael Coleman.

Mass
. . .
In th
and chair open teur whal
It past
the weal
"
been bits.
strai
ster Chest
and being Chest of th house like
B Webs
ciety own green cours orchi have them windo
you becau botto orchi cause
Ga
uled Tuesc ster's white now
June.
TH plus the
and has Comm have prope
Hill C of th more the p city.
clubbe years.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAY 10 1970 New England

RAP-UP

If society dying, blame majority

By Gregory McDonald, Globe Staff

"Society is over."

Fred called me from his club at eleven fifteen last night, and asked that I come over immediately. He sounded desperate.

"I really needed someone," he said when I arrived. "I just realized society is over."

"Is your club about to close, Fred?"

"Next Monday. No one under 67 has applied in five years, except for one, who used too much after-shave to be acceptable.

"But that's not all. My old prep school is closing in June for good. Kids aren't even applying for the scholarships.

"But that's not all. My old prep school is closing in June for good. Kids aren't even applying for the scholarships.

"The little white church on the common I've been going to since a boy has been sold to a bowling alley outfit. The congregation had gotten down to 17 old ladies and one chauffer, whose baritone was going.

"My old fraternity has closed, as the freshman these days won't be rushed. They think frat life is old hat. I tried to tell beer manufacturers years ago they shouldn't make beer cans so easy to open. Now anyone can learn.

"Applications for my college fell from 3500 last year to only seve footballers who suffered sudden weight losses this year. The board, as you know, voted against going co-ed.

"All these foundations upon which society has rested simply are going out of business."

"I get your point, Fred. What's one to think?"

"I'll tell you what," he said, as a man in overalls removed the table from between us." It's not these kids out demonstrating in the street, taking over college buildings and what all, who are knocking the foundations out from under society. People of that age never have been able to support symphonies, museums, churches anyway.

"It's the great, broad mass of people, the Silent Majority.

"It is millions of people making millions of decisions. I shall not write a check to Symphony this year. I'll go to the Museum and pay the door fee, but I will not be a patron. I don't need to belong to that club anymore. Is giving to my college fund really that essential to me. My kid wants to go to State U. anyway. It's sexier.

"People are simply withdrawing their support from all these things that have been the cornerstones of society. They have stopped writing checks to institutions.

"They no longer believe in institutions: educational, religious, cultural, even social.

"Yet these institutions have always been the basis of social order.

"You see, it isn't the 20-year-olds who are causing the change. It would take them decades to destroy these institutions.

"It's the fifty and sixty year olds. They are destroying these institutions faster than any demonstrations or riots could — simply by withdrawing their financial support.

"Believe me, Greg. The Silent Majority is tearing this country apart!"

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382

MAY 19 1970

YOUNG LOS ANGELES CONDUCTOR PRAISED

LONDON (AP) — Young Los Angeles conductor Michael Tilson Thomas has won praise from critics for his surprise debut here with the London Symphony Orchestra at the Festival Hall.

Thomas, 25-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was called in as a last minute substitute for Russian conductor Gennadi Rozhdestvensky, who is ill.

The Guardian newspaper's Hugo Cole praised Thomas's interpretation of Igor Stravinsky's Symphony for Winds and the more complex Aldous Huxley variations.

"In all essentials, these performances were very true to Stravinsky, sorting out detail clearly, avoiding the sort of indulgence in confusing sensual sounds for which Stravinsky has declared his special hatred," Cole said.

"Last of all, the symphony in three movements, for long one of the orchestra's show pieces, was given a vigorous and confident performance."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAY 21 1970

VIOLIN SOLOIST — Amnon Levy, violinist, Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist at the Hebrew Arts Festival, Sunday, May 24, at Hebrew College auditorium, Brookline. Gaye Bennes will be piano accompanist. Program includes the Ron Singers, with Ran Avni, accordionist and the Daliah Folk Dancers, with Ayala Goren. Festival is sponsored by New England Association for Hebrew Culture and Histadrut Ivrit.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAY 14 1970

Hebrew Arts Festival

Annual Hebrew Arts Festival, sponsored by New England Association for Hebrew Culture and Histadrut Ivrit of Greater Boston, will be held Sunday, May 24, 8 p. m., in the auditorium of Hebrew College.

Featured will be Amnon Levy, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Ron Singers with Ran Avni, accordionist and the Daliah Folk Dancers, with Ayalah Goren. A film of Israel's Independence Day Parade will be shown and Israeli paintings from Yarkon Galleries will be on display.

Rabbi Zev K. Nelson will bring greetings on behalf of the New England Association for Hebrew Culture and Dr. Moses J. Steiner will chair the evening. A social hour will follow. All friends of Hebrew Culture are invited.

SIKESTON, MO.
STANDARD
D. 7,500

MAY 16 1970

Musical Boston

In 1869 Mark Twain wrote: "Tomorrow night I appear for the first time before a Boston audience -- 4,000 critics." Boston is renowned for its demanding audiences. For a select few, the city is also known for its loyalty. One of the objects of its loyalty as well as its criticism is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now in its 90th year, the B.S.O. is an established tradition which has charmed the Cabots, the Lodges, hard-pressed students, and penniless immigrants alike.

On Monday, April 27, the orchestra held the first social event of its 90th season -- an anniversary dinner and ball at Symphony Hall. The dinner was prepared by chefs from Maxim's of Paris under the supervision of the restaurant's owner, Louis Vaudable. After the dinner, the Boston Pops Orchestra joined Ruby Newman for an evening of dancing. The affluent Bostonians payed the $300-a- couple "donation" for the honor of attending this gala event. The proceeds, which will be matched by a Rockefeller grant, will go toward meeting current expenses estimated at $5 million a year.

Like all American orchestras, the B.S.O. is having its financial difficulties. The pinch is somewhat less pressing than that faced by many other symphonies because of a strong endowment fund, income from recordings and tapes, foundation grants and, most important, private contributions which have accounted for as much as $350,000 a year. Until 1937, fund-raising was in a few hands. The orchestra's founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson, paid the bills from 1881 until 1918, and a group of wealthy trustees carried the burden for the next sixteen years. After 1934, loyal patrons became the orchestra's prinicpal support.

Since 1881 and particularly since Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949), its most famous conductor, the B.S.O. has attempted to combine the traditional with the new, and the international with the national. This task has been facilitated by the Boston Pops Orchestra which consists of the Boston Symphony minus its principal players. The existence of the Boston Pops, which caters to lighter and more commercial music, gives the Boston Symphony a kind of artistic freedom enjoyed by few other orchestras. During its 90-year history it has used that freedom well.

* * *

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
(E) 3,675

MAY 18 1970

Youth Concerts To Be Held Again At Symphony Hall

Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, an annual musical event for thousands of Massachusetts students, will return to Boston's famed Symphony Hall next fall for the twelfth season.

Under the musical direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary works selected to appeal to the young people and to stimulate their interest and appreciation for fine music.

Programs for last season explored the musical scene from Mozart to Benjamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra", and included a highly acclaimed performance by Newton Wayland and the Carl Atkins Jazz Group who joined the Youth Concerts' Orchestra to demonstrate the versatility of musical instruments for playing both symphonic music and jazz. The enthusiastic response of the youthful audiences testifies to the relevance of this popular musical series for today's young people.

The concerts are played in two series of three programs each. Series One will be presented on November 7, 1970; January 30 and March 6, 1971; and Series Two on November 14, 1970; February 6 and March 13, 1971. Tickets are sold for the series only—at $6.00 for three concerts, and may be ordered from local chairmen in cities and towns all over the state, and supervisors of music in the schools.

In Berlin, please contact Mrs. Dean A. Goodwin, 88 Gates Pond Road, Berlin, 562,2428. Berlin attends the second series. This will be the fourth year Berlin young people and adults have participated. Tranportation is provided. Tickets are available to students of Grades 5-12 and to any interested adults.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

MAY 18 1970

Youth concert subscriptions coming due

ROCKPORT — Joel M. Salloway, Rockport Schools Music Director and local chairman for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, announced today that subscriptions for the 1970-1971 series of concerts must be returned by May 22.

The Youth Concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson directing members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. Two series of three concerts are presented on Saturdays at Symphony Hall at 11 a.m. with this year's programs scheduled for November 7, January 30 and March 6.

The programs are planned to stimulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the tradition-filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall. In addition, the Ancient Instruments Room, with its priceless collection of rare and unusual instruments, is open to the young concert-goers before and after the concert.

Tickets are sold by the series only, at $6 for three concerts. Since both series were sold out by October last year, those who wish to subscribe are urged to do so now to avoid disappointment.

192.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

MAY 16 1970

evening in paris

francis w. hatch

the night maxim's invaded the land of the bean and the cod

I am quick to confess that I have never had the privilege of dining at Maxim's in Paris. I can recall savoring the good things at La Pereuse and the Tour D'Argent, but not Maxim's.

But hang around, long enough, and the mountain finally comes to Mahomet. They flew Maxim's into Boston — lock, stock and skillet. The occasion was the 90th anniversary ball, one of those glittering and highly complicated undertakings which young ladies put on for sweet charity, in this case the welfare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Having survived the "Golden Trumpet Ball" of 1965 on which occasion it fell to me to escort Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis onto the ballroom floor for her first, challenging waltz to Arthur Fiedler's music, I was drawn in, once more, this time as master of ceremonies.

What went on backstage in the culinary line was more fun to watch than the glitter out front. French chefs were gesticulating and growing more nervous by the moment, in the unpacking and upheating of the "Perdreaux en Cocotte Farcis de Foie Gras" along with the "Celeris Braises au Jus."

Old pros like Sam Chamberlain and Dan Thompson would have recognized every move. So far as I was concerned, it was a fascinating problem of logistics in an operation that suggested the recovery room at the Massachusetts General Hospitals. The problem was to revive this food which had winged its Pan American way from the Rue Royale to Huntington Avenue and serve it with something of its original French savor.

There were moments when I had to appear on stage locked into a boiled shirt above black tails which have languished, overlong, in mothballs. (Dressing for the fray, my wife had actually taken a pair of pliers out of the closet to coax and wrench the collar button into place.)

Via the microphone, I explained to the assembled diners that the orchestra trustees are constantly engaged in research. My latest project has been an examination of the environment and ecology of Symphony Hall and in particular an appraisal of the Friday audiences.

Via the "Lost and Found" in Symphony Hall, I received many valuable clues. Among the left - behinds at Friday concerts I discovered:

One overshoe, size seven, the buckle type;

Three knitting needles;

Two exhausted hearing - aid batteries;

One small tin, Huntley & Palmer's biscuits;

One half - filled bottle of headache tablets;

One security analyst's report on I.B.M.

By checking the programs it is evident that the ladies bring in their survival packets of food and headache pills on days when the new electronic music is being performed.

Feeding all of this into my song computer I came up with a numbe. called "Friday Afternoon at the Symphony" which I gave to the world, then and there:

Verse:

There's Honeywell and I.B.M. and Minnesota Mining.

Stocks which seem to swim upstream while others are declining,

The very best investment, the safest thing of all,

A season ticket for Friday, Friday at Symphony Hall.

Chorus:

There's absolutely nothing on earth
Like Friday at the Symphony,
Underneath the statues on the wall,
Where ladies occupy the seats
Where Grandma used to sit,
And when they are bored with the music
They take out their bags and knit
At intermission there's plenty of time
To share the latest scuttlebutt.

Those juicy stories float from wall to wall,
"I wish they played more Schubert,
"And do you know my dear,
"Alice is going to get a divorce
"In Mexico I hear,
"And this is the sixth conductor
"They have trotted out this year."

Yes, there's absolutely nothing on earth at all

Like Friday afternoon, Friday afternoon,

Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

As I left the hall in the early hours I noticed a large red cabbage which had fallen to the floor from the decorations of the hors d'oeuvre table. It seemed a shame to leave it there to be swept up. I picked it up and bore it home. We had "Coleslaw Maxim's" the next night following that old gourmet receipt: "Slice cabbage, stir in dressing of olive oil, vinegar, pepper and salt." Nothing like old reliable French receipt!

Francis W. Hatch, our Parnassian columnist at the podium.

Rose Walsh

Symphony Meeting To Be Extraordinary

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAY 18 1970

Nothing ordinary about the 36th annual meeting of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday morning at Symphony Hall.

A special programme is planned for 11:45, with Arthur Fiedler rehearsing the Boston Pops. Following the rehearsal and the business session, Fiedler and the members of the orchestra will be guests of honor at a box luncheon and cocktails.

B. S. O. trustees have invited all Friends of the Orchestra to attend. They will be seated at Pops tables for the meeting and festivity. Co-chairmen Mrs. Louis M. Cabot and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners have asked the area chairman to be hostesses.

The Friends continues to be under the leadership of Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr.

The annual meeting does not end the year as far as becoming a new Friend. already planned is another year of exciting events, luncheons and lectures.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

MAY 19 1970

The 36th annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Wednesday in Symphony Hall at 11:45 a.m.

A special program is planned with Arthur Fiedler rehearsing the Boston Pops Orchestra. Orchestra members will be the guests of honor at the luncheon following the concert.

Cochairmen of the annual meeting, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot and Mrs. Norman Cahners, have planned for the Friends to be seated at Pops tables where they will enjoy their box luncheon preceded by a complimentary cocktail.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill are cochairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which now has more than 3,800 members.

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

90th. Anniversary Ball Nets $132,000 for BSO

THE FINANCIAL RESULTS of the 90th Anniversary Ball in Symphony Hall, April 27, netted the Boston Symphony Orchestra $132,000. This was announced yesterday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, at the 36th annual meeting of the Friends of the Orchestra, in Symphony Hall. The gross income of the ball was $192,000, and expenses were $60,000, an unusually low ratio for such an elaborate occasion.

Mr. Banks also announced that the Friends will be able to accompany the orchestra on its spring tour to Europe from April 2-25, 1971. Among the cities the orchestra will visit are London, Paris, Vienna, Naples and Barcelona. And he ended his talk by saying: "With the continued help of the Friends, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will outlive us all."

The Friends sat at Pops tables while Arthur Fiedler conducted a rehearsal of the Pops Orchestra with the musicians in their shirtsleeves. His elder daughter, Johanna, narrated "Peter and the Wolf" while members of the Boston Ballet Company leaped about the stage in leotards. Lorraine Ippolito Di Gregorio did her best to sing excerpts from "La Traviata" without being drowned out by the orchestra.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John M. Grandin Jr., co-chairmen of the Friends, were there, as were Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. K. Jerome Rosenfeld, co-chairmen of the Anniversary Ball committee. Mrs. Louis Cabot and Mrs. Norman Cahners were in charge of yesterday's meeting. Mrs. Donald Sinclair was stationed at one of the doors to the hall to see that no one tripped on the steps.

Among the 500 enjoying box luncheons after the rehearsal were Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Samuel Levine, Mrs. George Peabody Gardner, Mrs. Morton Prince, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Robert Montgomery, Edward A. Taft, Robert Cutler, Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Mrs. John Knowles, Mrs. S. Abbot Smith, Mrs. John T. G. Nichols and Mr. and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAY 21 1970

Rose Walsh

– Optimism Reigns

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAY 22 1970

1127

Genial, distinguished Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presiding at Wednesday's 36th annual meeting of the friends of the BSO at Symphony Hall was more optimistic about its future than he was a year ago. In fact he predicted that the BSO "in all its glory will outlive us all."

But being factual, Mr. Banks reported on the existing deficit and mounting expenses which he hopes will be lessened as it has in the past by the work and generosity of The Friends. Highlight news at the meeting — held during a 20-minute break in the special Pops and Ballet program being rehearsed by Arthur Fiedler on the stage — was the financial report on the April 27th glittering 90th Anniversary Ball that netted the Orchestra $132,000.

That happy word brought tremendous applause from the 400 "Friends" enjoying the unique event that offered a preview of the Boston Ballet Co.'s performance of "Peter and the Wolf" and narration by talented Johanna ("Yummy") Fiedler, the maestro's attractive daughter.

More about the Ball whose joint chairmen, Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, beamed with joy, was that its expenses were $60,000 and among the larger items of income were ticket sales, $46,700; patrons, $43,000; sponsorship of the pages in the program book, $32,000 and the raffle held in conjunction with the gala evening grossed $34,000.

Area members serving as hostesses of the meeting, followed by cocktails and a box lunch at the Pops tables, were Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., (dedicated leaders of the Council of Friends); Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Howard W. Davis, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. George Draper, Mrs. Walter J. Cahners, Mrs. Allen Joslin, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mrs. Edwin Cole, Mrs. Herbert Abrams, along with others.

193.

(Photos by Laban Whittaker)

(Above) Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mrs. John H. Grandin Jr. (left) and Mrs. Albert Goodhue, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the orchestra.

(Above) Arthur Fiedler conducts a Pops rehearsal of "Peter and the Wolf" while his daughter, Johanna, narrates and members of the Boston Ballet Company perform.

(Left) Checking on the box luncheons are Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld (left) and Mrs. Lewis Cabot, who were co-chairmen of the successful 90th Anniversary Ball.

Time to Order Youth Concert Fall Tickets

BOSTON — Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, an annual musical event for thousands of Massachusetts students, will return to Boston's famed Symphony Hall next Fall for the 12th season.

Under the musical direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary works selected to appeal to young people and to stimulate their interest and appreciation for fine music.

Programs for last season explored the musical scene from Mozart to Benjamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra", and included a highly acclaimed performance by Newton Wayland and the Carl Atkins Jazz Group who joined the Youth Concerts' Orchestra to demonstrate the versatility of musical instruments for playing both symphonic music and jazz. The enthusiastic response of the youthful audiences testifies to the relevance of this popular musical series for today's young people.

The concerts are played in two series of three programs each. Series One will be presented on Nov. 7, 1970, Jan. 30 and March 6, 1971; Series Two on Nov. 14, 1970, Feb. 6 and March 13, 1971. Tickets are sold for the series only — at six dollars for three concerts, and may be ordered from local chairmen in cities and towns all over the state, and supervisors of music in the schools.

In Beverly, those interested may contact Lawrence P. Drouin, director of music, Beverly Public schools.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.

MAY 27 1970

Hub Symphony Nets $132,000 From Dance

BOSTON — At the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony recently, Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, announced that the 90th anniversary ball netted the orchestra $132,000. The Ball was held in April at Symphony Hall.

Banks told the Friends that the gross income of the Ball was $192,000, and expenses were $60,000 (31 per cent), an unusually low ratio for such a gala occasion.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

MAY 28 1970

BOSTON SYMPHONY FRIENDS MEET

The 36th annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall, Wednesday. The Friends sat at Pops tables and enjoyed box luncheons and Arthur Fiedler conducted a rehearsal of the Pops Orchestra, with the musicians in their shirtsleeves. His elder daughter, Johanna, narrated "Peter and the Wolf" and members of the Boston Ballet Company leaped about the stage in leotards. Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, announced that the 90th Anniversary Ball, April 27, netted the orchestra $132,000. He also said that the Friends will be able to accompany the orchestra on its spring tour to Europe in 1971, and that with the continued help of the Friends, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will outlive us all.

ALISON ARNOLD

Anniversary Ball Sweet Music for Hub Symphony

BOSTON — At the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony today, Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees, announced that the 90th Anniversary Ball netted the Orchestra $132,000. The Ball was held on Monday, April 27 at Symphony Hall under the joint chairmanship of Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld.

Banks told the Friends that the gross income of the Ball was $192,000, and expenses were $60,000 (31 P.C.), an unusually low ratio for such a gala occasion.

Among the larger items of income were ticket sales, $46,700; Patrons, $43,500; and the sponsorship of pages in the program book, $52,000. The raffle held in conjunction with the Ball grossed $34.000.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 298,557

JUN 1 1970

CLUM and Clarinets

At least three milestones were marked at last Tuesday evening's annual dinner of the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts ("CLUM"). Noted were the group's 50th anniversary, 20 year executive director Luther Knight Macnair's retirement and Chairman Gerald A. Berlin's retirement after a three year term.

There is some perverse and inverse principle by which the most worthwhile causes are the most inadequately funded. And so it has been with this watchdog of our liberties during its entire distinguished history. But the times have caught up with the Union, particularly during the tenure of Luther Macnair and Gerald A. Berlin. In the recent past it was considered sufficient to station the tall, stately and unflappable Mr. Macnair at a political demonstration as an observer of police propriety. Now local demonstrations are covered by dozens of CLU attorneys in "square" suits and ties, singled out with armbands. In the past the essential public education function of CLUM in schools and colleges has been manfully served by volunteer member attorneys and Mr. Macnair. But this is no longer adequate if, indeed, it ever was. New funding sources must be found, perhaps by a "troika" to succeed Luther Macnair: full time general counsel, full time public education and information specialist and full-time fund raiser and development person.

As for Mr. Berlin, he substantially guaranteed that his recently concluded tenure as state chairman would be incredibly busy. For he was one of those who brought the national organization from a rather narrow approach to defense of draft resisters to a more appropriate broadly conceived present one, where the defendant chooses the premise of his resistance and defense and the attorney accommodates himself accordingly. From the dread days of that Grand Inquisitor Joseph McCarthy's persecution of Harvard physicist Wendell Furry, to the Pedlosky loyalty oath case at M.I.T., to the Izzo harassment at Salem State College, to the Gideon landmark providing free counsel for indigent defendants in serious criminal cases, to the very recent "Hair" victory in the Court of Appeals, Mr. Berlin's profound Constitutional expertise has been brilliantly applied to the defense of our liberties, so casually profaned and unused by so many of us. And when Mr. Berlin insisted that an employment agency recruiting black domestics had a right to engage him as counsel, and he to so serve, in the face of severe criticism from many colleagues in the law and civil rights groups, he was flinty and unyielding, although there was much to be said on both sides of the matter.

Readers of Mr. Berlin's distinguished music criticism in this newspaper well know how often and how severely he takes the Boston Symphony woodwinds to task for an unfortunate penchant for imprecise intonation. Now that he no longer has to stay in the local jails to arrange bail—as in Cambridge recently—until 2 a.m. and then appear the next morning in the appellate courts, as he did in the "Hair" case, we expect that the BSO winds will respond better to his strictures. He is a gifted man, almost unique in his capacity to defend America's democratic legacy, so badly in need of such defense.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
(W) 54,000

MAY 21 1970

Concert Schedule Set for Steinberg

PITTSBURGH (AP) — William Steinberg, 71, fully recovered from an illness for which he was hospitalized in January, returned to conduct the Pittsburgh Symphony in two of its three final programs of the season.

Steinberg, who is music director for both the Pittsburgh and Boston Symphony orchestras, will conduct both during the summer. He will conduct the three opening concerts of the Temple University Music Festival in Ambler, Pa., where the Pittsburgh Symphony will be in residence for six weeks. And at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, he will conduct the Boston Symphony in six summer concerts honoring the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven.

GRANT
WORCESTER, COUNTY

MAY 28 1970

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(S) 37,774

JUN 1 1970

194

BETTER HOMES AND GARDENS
TRAVEL IDEAS 1970
DES MOINES, IOWA
YEARLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

BOSTON

Patriots, Poets, and Presidents have all loved Boston. So will you. The 300-year-old city is a rich mixture of historic shrines and skyscrapers, crooked alleys and sweeping super highways, posh restaurants and atmospheric waterfront cafes. "Why should I travel when I'm already here?" remarked one proper Bostonian.

But most of all, Boston is the city that sired the American Revolution. Rediscover this heritage on the mile-and-a-half Freedom Trail beginning at the Boston Common (there's underground parking). The trail can be done by sight-seeing bus, but you should walk to get the full flavor of the historic old city.

Take time to stroll the country's oldest public park, where a citizen can still graze his cow or shout soapbox philosophies. Hippies now loll beneath giant trees where pirates and witches once dangled by their necks. At the adjoining Public Garden, ride a swan boat. (25 cents.)

A visitors' booth on the Common provides a guidebook of the Freedom Trail. Most of the buildings are open weekdays, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. No admission charges except at Old South Meeting House (25 cents over 12) and Paul Revere House. (25 cents.)

Follow the red brick path to the "new" State House, built in 1795 by Charles Bullfinch, who helped design the Capitol in Washington. Beneath the gold-domed seat of government, you can tour the House and Senate Chambers and see such Revolutionary relics as one of the muskets that fired "the shot heard round the world" at nearby Lexington in 1775.

Walk down to Park Street Church, "the most interesting mass of brick and mortar in America" according to Henry James. At the Granary Burying Ground, weathered stones mark the graves of John Hancock, Paul Revere, Samuel Adams, and Mary Goose, the original Mother Goose.

Continue down School Street, past King's Chapel and the site of the first public school in America to the Old Corner Book Store, favorite hangout for such literary lights as Longfellow, Hawthorne, and Emerson. Look into the Old South Meeting House, where angry colonists disguised as Indians and Negroes set out for Boston Harbor to throw the world's most famous tea party.

From the balcony of the Old State House, the Declaration of Independence was first proclaimed. Inside, you'll see mementos of early Boston. Appropriately near where "the child Independence was born" stands Faneuil Hall, "The Cradle of Liberty." Here, where patriots fanned the flames of the Revolution, John F. Kennedy delivered his windup presidential campaign speech. On the top floor of the combination public market and meeting place is a fascinating military museum. Ask the attendant to tell you about the unique grasshopper weathervane on the roof. See the market, original purpose of the building, on the first floor.

If you'd like to stop for lunch or just sit down over a seafood cocktail, the old Union Oyster House is just one block north on Union Street. Diagonally across from Faneuil Hall is another famous eatery, Durgin Park. Arrive before noon to avoid waiting.

You'll step back two centuries when you enter the Paul Revere House, oldest home in Boston. In the kitchen Mrs. Revere's collection of pans and kettles hang just as she left them in 1770.

In sunny weather, children cavort on Paul Revere Mall and old men play checkers under the shade trees.

At the foot of Hull Street is the last stop on the Freedom Trail—Old North Church. From its belfry flashed the lanterns that started Paul Revere on his famous midnight ride. Next door you can buy replicas of the original lanterns along with Boston Harbor tea, Indian pudding; and, of course, delicious Boston baked beans.

The Freedom Trail doesn't exhaust the historic charms of Boston. On Louisburg Square in Beacon Hill, gas streetlights still cast their pale lime-colored glow on mellowed brick sidewalks. Behind arched doorways many of Boston's most proper citizens live in ancestral homes.

Drive across the Charlestown Bridge to Bunker Hill Monument and let the youngsters scramble up the 294 steps for a sweeping panorama of the bustling harbor. Below, on what is actually Breed's Hill, American troops devastated charging British Grenadiers. The orders American soldiers received: "Aim low; pick off the officers; don't fire till you see the whites of their eyes."

Science, where push-button exhibits all but spring to life. Example: the talking transparent woman. For lunch with a view, try the museum's Skyline Room Cafeteria. The whole family can journey to the stars on celestial sight-seeing tours at the adjoining Charles Hayden Planetarium. ($1.50, children, $1; closed Mondays.)

For the youngsters, Boston has a Children's Art Center and a Children's Museum. And for everyone: a new aquarium. Hundreds of fish and marine life from the world's seas look you in the eye from glass-walled tanks. ($1.50, children 75 cents.)

Mark Twain remarked, "if you don't like the weather in Boston, wait a minute." Sightseers will find the most dependable and pleasant climate late spring through fall. Some say the weather is the only thing that changes in the city of Cabots, Lodges, and the late George Apley. It's hard to believe when you see the new Prudential Center with its landscaped plazas, auditorium, restaurants, and winter skating rink. On a clear day you can see Cape Cod from the 52-story observation deck of "Pru Tower." Another Boston landmark of more recent vintage is the modern—and controversial—City Hall, at 41 School Street.

Take time to explore some of the lesser-known delights of Boston—the exotic shops in Chinatown or the galleries and antiques on Charles Street near Beacon Hill. You can also walk on a glass bridge through a giant world globe as part of your guided, free tour of the workings of the Christian Science Monitor. And green-thumbers will enjoy the ever-growing beauties at the Arnold Arboretum.

If time is limited, pick your spots and take the subway. But don't stay out too late: the transit system—like Cinderella—shuts down at 1 a.m., you'll find most cabs seem to disappear then, too.

Beat the transportation problem and you'll find that Boston offers a wealth of entertainment the year round. Several theaters present pre-Broadway plays at pre-Broadway prices. In Symphony Hall the world-renowned Boston Symphony performs from fall through spring. On late June nights the Boston Pops gives free concerts at Hatch Memorial Shell.

The sports menu is equally varied. It ranges from professional hockey, basketball, football, and baseball to young Harvards sculling on the Charles.

Side trips out of Boston take you to the historic "witch city" of Salem, to picturesque, quaint Marblehead, Gloucester, and Rockport on the coast, and to inland Lexington and Concord.

Near Concord, visit Nathaniel Hawthorne's Old Manse; the Emerson House; and the Orchard House, where Louisa May Alcott wrote Little Women. South of Concord, you can swim at Walden Pond.

FAVORITE VACATION CITIES

At the bottom of the Hill rise the tall masts of the U.S.S. Constitution, permanently berthed at the U.S. Naval Yard. You're welcome to walk the decks of "Old Ironsides" and examine her 44 guns that never lost a battle. (Daily 9:30 a.m.-4 p.m.) For a taste of a sailor's life, take an exhilarating three-hour windjammer cruise aboard the Spray from the historic India Wharf. ($3.75, children $2.50.)

Another excursion across the Charles River takes you to Cambridge, world center of scholarship. Stroll the ivied campuses of Harvard, M.I.T., and Radcliffe. At the Harvard University Museum you can see the unique Ware collection of glass flowers.

Culturally, Boston has been known as "The Athens of America." A score of museums display priceless treasures, from the Museum of Fine Arts with its Revere silver and Pilgrim furniture to the palace-like Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, filled with Greek sculpture, Far East Jade, Renaissance masterpieces, and contemporary paintings. You could spend all day at the Museum of

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

MAY 30 1970

PROFILES

ORCHESTRA

THE symphony orchestra is the most complex musical instrument in existence. A perfectly coördinated orchestra is the supreme achievement of teamwork; it is an integrated organism that breathes, feels, acts, and reacts like one human being. Orchestra players may differ in their intellectual outlook on the music and their emotional approach to it, just as they may disagree with one another about personal, political, and social matters. They may even envy or hate one another. Not all of them are on the same level musically or technically. Some are idealistic and think first of music; others think primarily of the steady income. But when they sit down to play music together, they become a single heart, a single soul, and a triumph of civilization—an orchestra.

A great orchestra depends on the excellence of its individual members, the matching of qualities within each section, the interrelationship of the sections, and a spirit of professional pride and relentless self-criticism in the players themselves. No orchestra can be better than the sum of its individual players. Today, instrumental skill is taken for granted in the members of any distinguished ensemble, and no important symphony orchestra hires a musician who isn't an accomplished master of his instrument. The technical standards are very high, and many orchestra players could become well known as soloists if they had the right personality, the tenacity, or perhaps a little luck. Technically, there is no longer an abyss between a famous violinist performing as a soloist with a great orchestra and the orchestra's best violinists. Moreover, a symphony that might have been regarded as technically difficult in the days of Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann is now said to "play itself."

A hundred virtuoso musicians—give or take five or six—don't always make a great orchestra, of course. The old N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra, for example, often seemed to be a collection of fine instrumentalists rather than a perfectly integrated ensemble. The ideal orchestra musician is a good deal like the ideal chamber-music player—a musician capable of playing as a soloist yet always ready to submerge his own personality sensitively in the ensemble. He must be able to listen constantly both to himself and to all the other players. Four gifted and hard-working string players may transform themselves from four individuals into a quartet, and do it within a few years, but a hundred gifted and hard-working musicians must play together under a competent conductor for perhaps a decade before they can be said to form an integrated orchestra. The conductor's job is to build up the various sections and balance them until he has an orchestral organism in which all components are equally strong—the warm, human-sounding strings; the poignantly expressive woodwinds; the noble brasses; the potent percussion instruments. Bit by bit, an orchestra takes on a distinctive sound and a collective personality. It becomes one instrument—a remarkably complicated phenomenon of human coöperation. "Each player, for better or worse, contributes something to the whole," wrote the late Adam Carse, the English musicologist. "Each player has a name and individuality, and it is only the combination of so many individuals that makes possible the existence of a corporate body."

If it is difficult for any one musician to play every note of a complicated part perfectly, it is next to miraculous when a hundred players do it. Intellectual concentration, emotional discipline, and physical skill are needed. The orchestra musician must have great self-control. For brief periods, he may emerge as a soloist, with a musical personality of his own, and, just as suddenly, he will have to resubmerge himself in the orchestra's collective life. Some excellent instrumentalists are unable to make this adjustment, and therefore can never become good orchestra musicians. The players must understand what the conductor wants and be able to supply it, but not everybody can adapt to somebody else's mood at the flip of a baton. The orchestra musician, moreover, must never become a faceless member of a collective but must at all times preserve his artistic individuality.

Emotional differences exist not only between individuals in an orchestra but also between sections. Violinists, for instance, often become resentful at having to play in chorus. Wind and brass players, who nearly always have solo passages in symphonic works, don't have to worry about that kind of anonymity, but because so much depends on their physical condition and the condition of their instruments, they tend to become tense and nervous. Double-bass players, who believe that they provide the foundation of the orchestra's sound, are usually considered to have a placid temperament, and piccolo players to be a little dizzy sometimes from sitting on top of the orchestra's sound. Yet no matter how the players feel, they must subordinate their feelings to the common good. Music is an emotional art, but to perform well an orchestra musician must be able to control his own emotions.

Today, there are more symphony orchestras, and greater ones, in the United States than in any other country. Among the half-dozen leading orchestras of the world now, four or five are American. In 1909, Gustav Mahler, having just been appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic, wrote to a friend in Vienna, "My or-

"I registered Democrat, yes. But what kind of registered Democrat are you?"

the New York Philharmonic, decided to remain in America. During the next quarter of a century, he changed the whole style of orchestral playing in the United States (as he had done in Europe for three decades before), in part by introducing the high standards of precision that are now associated with the leading American orchestras. In certain European musical circles, it is fashionable to deride the precision of the great Amer-

"Karajan spoke very little," one Michael Charry, who came to Cleveconduceveland ductors.

s 'The
the ors nor I d it to-scratch.
person-tremely
y ideas.
nows so ell them now his is to be rked on ers im-
, precise ous Italings are chestra.
old one a cer-tomati-
s inten-s enjoy to a conductor

nducting has e past hundred important part fter the strict,
s of the post-
and his fellow-a flamboyant
This approach
mannerism and Szell, the great end of the ninerected the com-
he point of ar-
nd, after him,
a much needed
idering himself
ant of the composer." Then, under Willem Mengel-

193.

(Photos by Laban Whittaker)

(Above) Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mrs. John H. Grandin Jr. (left) and Mrs. Albert Goodhue, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the orchestra.

(Above) Arthur Fiedler conducts a Pops rehearsal of "Peter and the Wolf" while his daughter, Johanna, narrates and members of the Boston Ballet Company perform.

(Left) Checking on the box luncheons are Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld (left) and Mrs. Lewis Cabot, who were co-chairmen of the successful 90th Anniversary Ball.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FRIENDS MEET

The 36th annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall, Wednesday. The Friends sat at Pops tables and enjoyed box luncheons and Arthur Fiedler conducted a rehearsal of the Pops Orchestra, with the musicians in their shirtsleeves. His elder daughter, Johanna, narrated "Peter and the Wolf" and members of the Boston Ballet Company leaped about the stage in leotards. Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, announced that the 90th Anniversary Ball, April 27, netted the orchestra $132,000. He also said that the Friends will be able to accompany the orchestra on its spring tour to Europe in 1971, and that with the continued help of the Friends, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will outlive us all.

ALISON ARNOLD

Anniversary Ball Sweet Music for Hub Symphony

BOSTON — At the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony today, Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees, announced that the 90th Anniversary Ball netted the Orchestra $132,000. The Ball was held on Monday, April 27 at Symphony Hall under the joint chairmanship of Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld.

Banks told the Friends that the gross income of the Ball was $192,000, and expenses were $60,000 (31 P.C.), an unusually low ratio for such a gala occasion.

Among the larger items of income were ticket sales, $46,700; Patrons, $43,500; and the sponsorship of pages in the program book, $52,000. The raffle held in conjunction with the Ball grossed $34.000.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 1 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAY 24 1970

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAY 21 1970

Time to Order Youth Concert Fall Tickets

BOSTON — Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, an annual musical event for thousands of Massachusetts students, will return to Boston's famed Symphony Hall next Fall for the 12th season.

Under the musical direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary works selected to appeal to young people and to stimulate their interest and appreciation for fine music.

Programs for last season explored the musical scene from Mozart to Benjamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra", and included a highly acclaimed performance by Newton Wayland and the Carl Atkins Jazz Group who joined the Youth Concerts' Orchestra to demonstrate the versatility of musical instruments for playing both symphonic music and jazz. The enthusiastic response of the youthful audiences testifies to the relevance of this popular musical series for today's young people.

The concerts are played in two series of three programs each. Series One will be presented on Nov. 7, 1970, Jan. 30 and March 6, 1971; Series Two on Nov. 14, 1970, Feb. 6 and March 13, 1971. Tickets are sold for the series only — at six dollars for three concerts, and may be ordered from local chairmen in cities and towns all over the state, and supervisors of music in the schools.

In Beverly, those interested may contact Lawrence P. Drouin, director of music, Beverly Public schools.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,[illegible]

MAY 27 1970

Hub Symphony Nets $132,000 From Dance

BOSTON — At the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony recently, Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, announced that the 90th anniversary ball netted the orchestra $132,000. The Ball was held in April at Symphony Hall.

Banks told the Friends that the gross income of the Ball was $192,000, and expenses were $60,000 (31 per cent), an unusually low ratio for such a gala occasion.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

MAY 28 1970

CLUM and Clarinets

At least three milestones were marked at last Tuesday evening's annual dinner of the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts ("CLUM"). Noted were the group's 50th anniversary, 20 year executive director Luther Knight Macnair's retirement and Chairman Gerald A. Berlin's retirement after a three year term.

There is some perverse and inverse principle by which the most worthwhile causes are the most inadequately funded. And so it has been with this watchdog of our liberties during its entire distinguished history. But the times have caught up with the Union, particularly during the tenure of Luther Macnair and Gerald A. Berlin. In the recent past it was considered sufficient to station the tall, stately and unflappable Mr. Macnair at a political demonstration as an observer of police propriety. Now local demonstrations are covered by dozens of CLU attorneys in "square" suits and ties, singled out with armbands. In the past the essential public education function of CLUM in schools and colleges has been manfully served by volunteer member attorneys and Mr. Macnair. But this is no longer adequate if, indeed, it ever was. New funding sources must be found, perhaps by a "troika" to succeed Luther Macnair: full time general counsel, full time public education and information specialist and full-time fund raiser and development person.

As for Mr. Berlin, he substantially guaranteed that his recently concluded tenure as state chairman would be incredibly busy. For he was one of those who brought the national organization from a rather narrow approach to defense of draft resisters to a more appropriate broadly conceived present one, where the defendant chooses the premise of his resistance and defense and the attorney accommodates himself accordingly. From the dread days of that Grand Inquisitor Joseph McCarthy's persecution of Harvard physicist Wendell Furry, to the Pedlosky loyalty oath case at M.I.T., to the Izzo harassment at Salem State College, to the Gideon landmark providing free counsel for indigent defendants in serious criminal cases, to the very recent "Hair" victory in the Court of Appeals, Mr. Berlin's profound Constitutional expertise has been brilliantly applied to the defense of our liberties, so casually profaned and unused by so many of us. And when Mr. Berlin insisted that an employment agency recruiting black domestics had a right to engage him as counsel, and he to so serve, in the face of severe criticism from many colleagues in the law and civil rights groups, he was flinty and unyielding, although there was much to be said on both sides of the matter.

Readers of Mr. Berlin's distinguished music criticism in this newspaper well know how often and how severely he takes the Boston Symphony woodwinds to task for an unfortunate penchant for imprecise intonation. Now that he no longer has to stay in the local jails to arrange bail—as in Cambridge recently—until 2 a.m. and then appear the next morning in the appellate courts, as he did in the "Hair" case, we expect that the BSO winds will respond better to his strictures. He is a gifted man, almost unique in his capacity to defend America's democratic legacy, so badly in need of such defense.

Concert Schedule Set for Steinberg

PITTSBURGH (AP) — William Steinberg, 71, fully recovered from an illness for which he was hospitalized in January, returned to conduct the Pittsburgh Symphony in two of its three final programs of the season.

Steinberg, who is music director for both the Pittsburgh and Boston Symphony orchestras, will conduct both during the summer. He will conduct the three opening concerts of the Temple University Music Festival in Ambler, Pa., where the Pittsburgh Symphony will be in residence for six weeks. And at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, he will conduct the Boston Symphony in six summer concerts honoring the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
[illegible],525 (M)

MAY 28 1970

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
(E) 30,774

JUN 1 1970

194

BETTER HOMES AND GARDENS
TRAVEL IDEAS 1970
DES MOINES, IOWA
YEARLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

BOSTON

Patriots, Poets, and Presidents have all loved Boston. So will you. The 300-year-old city is a rich mixture of historic shrines and skyscrapers, crooked alleys and sweeping super highways, posh restaurants and atmospheric waterfront cafes. "Why should I travel when I'm already here?" remarked one proper Bostonian.

But most of all, Boston is the city that sired the American Revolution. Rediscover this heritage on the mile-and-a-half Freedom Trail beginning at the Boston Common (there's underground parking). The trail can be done by sight-seeing bus, but you should walk to get the full flavor of the historic old city.

Take time to stroll the country's oldest public park, where a citizen can still graze his cow or shout soapbox philosophies. Hippies now loll beneath giant trees where pirates and witches once dangled by their necks. At the adjoining Public Garden, ride a swan boat. (25 cents.)

A visitors' booth on the Common provides a guidebook of the Freedom Trail. Most of the buildings are open weekdays, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. No admission charges except at Old South Meeting House (25 cents over 12) and Paul Revere House. (25 cents.)

Follow the red brick path to the "new" State House, built in 1795 by Charles Bullfinch, who helped design the Capitol in Washington. Beneath the gold-domed seat of government, you can tour the House and Senate Chambers and see such Revolutionary relics as one of the muskets that fired "the shot heard round the world" at nearby Lexington in 1775.

Walk down to Park Street Church, "the most interesting mass of brick and mortar in America" according to Henry James. At the Granary Burying Ground, weathered stones mark the graves of John Hancock, Paul Revere, Samuel Adams, and Mary Goose, the original Mother Goose.

Continue down School Street, past King's Chapel and the site of the first public school in America to the Old Corner Book Store, favorite hangout for such literary lights as Longfellow, Hawthorne, and Emerson. Look into the Old South Meeting House, where angry colonists disguised as Indians and Negroes set out for Boston Harbor to throw the world's most famous tea party.

From the balcony of the Old State House, the Declaration of Independence was first proclaimed. Inside, you'll see mementos of early Boston. Appropriately near where "the child Independence was born" stands Faneuil Hall, "The Cradle of Liberty." Here, where patriots fanned the flames of the Revolution, John F. Kennedy delivered his windup presidential campaign speech. On the top floor of the combination public market and meeting place is a fascinating military museum. Ask the attendant to tell you about the unique grasshopper weathervane on the roof. See the market, original purpose of the building, on the first floor.

If you'd like to stop for lunch or just sit down over a seafood cocktail, the old Union Oyster House is just one block north on Union Street. Diagonally across from Faneuil Hall is another famous eatery, Durgin Park. Arrive before noon to avoid waiting.

You'll step back two centuries when you enter the Paul Revere House, oldest home in Boston. In the kitchen Mrs. Revere's collection of pans and kettles hang just as she left them in 1770.

In sunny weather, children cavort on Paul Revere Mall and old men play checkers under the shade trees.

At the foot of Hull Street is the last stop on the Freedom Trail—Old North Church. From its belfry flashed the lanterns that started Paul Revere on his famous midnight ride. Next door you can buy replicas of the original lanterns along with Boston Harbor tea, Indian pudding; and, of course, delicious Boston baked beans.

The Freedom Trail doesn't exhaust the historic charms of Boston. On Louisburg Square in Beacon Hill, gas streetlights still cast their pale lime-colored glow on mellowed brick sidewalks. Behind arched doorways many of Boston's most proper citizens live in ancestral homes.

Drive across the Charlestown Bridge to Bunker Hill Monument and let the youngsters scramble up the 294 steps for a sweeping panorama of the bustling harbor. Below, on what is actually Breed's Hill, American troops devastated charging British Grenadiers. The orders American soldiers received: "Aim low; pick off the officers; don't fire till you see the whites of their eyes."

Science, where push-button exhibits all but spring to life. Example: the talking transparent woman. For lunch with a view, try the museum's Skyline Room Cafeteria. The whole family can journey to the stars on celestial sight-seeing tours at the adjoining Charles Hayden Planetarium. ($1.50, children, $1; closed Mondays.)

For the youngsters, Boston has a Children's Art Center and a Children's Museum. And for everyone: a new aquarium. Hundreds of fish and marine life from the world's seas look you in the eye from glass-walled tanks. ($1.50, children 75 cents.)

Mark Twain remarked, "if you don't like the weather in Boston, wait a minute." Sightseers will find the most dependable and pleasant climate late spring through fall. Some say the weather is the only thing that changes in the city of Cabots, Lodges, and the late George Apley. It's hard to believe when you see the new Prudential Center with its landscaped plazas, auditorium, restaurants, and winter skating rink. On a clear day you can see Cape Cod from the 52-story observation deck of "Pru Tower." Another Boston landmark of more recent vintage is the modern—and controversial—City Hall, at 41 School Street.

Take time to explore some of the lesser-known delights of Boston—the exotic shops in Chinatown or the galleries and antiques on Charles Street near Beacon Hill. You can also walk on a glass bridge through a giant world globe as part of your guided, free tour of the workings of the Christian Science Monitor. And green-thumbers will enjoy the ever-growing beauties at the Arnold Arboretum.

If time is limited, pick your spots and take the subway. But don't stay out too late: the transit system—like Cinderella—shuts down

FAVORITE VACATION CITIES

At the bottom of the Hill rise the tall masts of the U.S.S. Constitution, permanently berthed at the U.S. Naval Yard. You're welcome to walk the decks of "Old Ironsides" and examine her 44 guns that never lost a battle. (Daily 9:30 a.m.-4 p.m.) For a taste of a sailor's life, take an exhilarating three-hour windjammer cruise aboard the Spray from the historic India Wharf. ($3.75, children $2.50.)

Another excursion across the Charles River takes you to Cambridge, world center of scholarship. Stroll the ivied campuses of Harvard, M.I.T., and Radcliffe. At the Harvard University Museum you can see the unique Ware collection of glass flowers.

Culturally, Boston has been known as "The Athens of America." A score of museums display priceless treasures, from the Museum of Fine Arts with its Revere silver and Pilgrim furniture to the palace-like Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, filled with Greek sculpture, Far East Jade, Renaissance masterpieces, and contemporary paintings. You could spend all day at the Museum of at 1 a.m., you'll find most cabs seem to disappear then, too.

Beat the transportation problem and you'll find that Boston offers a wealth of entertainment the year round. Several theaters present pre-Broadway plays at pre-Broadway prices. In Symphony Hall the world-renowned Boston Symphony performs from fall through spring. On late June nights the Boston Pops gives free concerts at Hatch Memorial Shell.

The sports menu is equally varied. It ranges from professional hockey, basketball, football, and baseball to young Harvards sculling on the Charles.

Side trips out of Boston take you to the historic "witch city" of Salem, to picturesque, quaint Marblehead, Gloucester, and Rockport on the coast, and to inland Lexington and Concord.

Near Concord, visit Nathaniel Hawthorne's Old Manse; the Emerson House; and the Orchard House, where Louisa May Alcott wrote Little Women. South of Concord, you can swim at Walden Pond.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

MAY 30 1970

PROFILES

ORCHESTRA

THE symphony orchestra is the most complex musical instrument in existence. A perfectly coördinated orchestra is the supreme achievement of teamwork; it is an integrated organism that breathes, feels, acts, and reacts like one human being. Orchestra players may differ in their intellectual outlook on the music and their emotional approach to it, just as they may disagree with one another about personal, political, and social matters. They may even envy or hate one another. Not all of them are on the same level musically or technically. Some are idealistic and think first of music; others think primarily of the steady income. But when they sit down to play music together, they become a single heart, a single soul, and a triumph of civilization—an orchestra.

A great orchestra depends on the excellence of its individual members, the matching of qualities within each section, the interrelationship of the sections, and a spirit of professional pride and relentless self-criticism in the players themselves. No orchestra can be better than the sum of its individual players. Today, instrumental skill is taken for granted in the members of any distinguished ensemble, and no important symphony orchestra hires a musician who isn't an accomplished master of his instrument. The technical standards are very high, and many orchestra players could become well known as soloists if they had the right personality, the tenacity, or perhaps a little luck. Technically, there is no longer an abyss between a famous violinist performing as a soloist with a great orchestra and the orchestra's best violinists. Moreover, a symphony that might have been regarded as technically difficult in the days of Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann is now said to "play itself."

A hundred virtuoso musicians—give or take five or six—don't always make a great orchestra, of course. The old N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra, for example, often seemed to be a collection of fine instrumentalists rather than a perfectly integrated ensemble. The ideal orchestra musician is a good deal like the ideal chamber-music player—a musician capable of playing as a soloist yet always ready to submerge his own personality sensitively in the ensemble. He must be able to listen constantly both to himself and to all the other players. Four gifted and hard-working string players may transform themselves from four individuals into a quartet, and do it within a few years, but a hundred gifted and hard-working musicians must play together under a competent conductor for perhaps a decade before they can be said to form an integrated orchestra. The conductor's job is to build up the various sections and balance them until he has an orchestral organism in which all components are equally strong—the warm, human-sounding strings; the poignantly expressive woodwinds; the noble brasses; the potent percussion instruments. Bit by bit, an orchestra takes on a distinctive sound and a collective personality. It becomes one instrument—a remarkably complicated phenomenon of human coöperation. "Each player, for better or worse, contributes something to the whole," wrote the late Adam Carse, the English musicologist. "Each player has a name and individuality, and it is only the combination of so many individuals that makes possible the existence of a corporate body."

If it is difficult for any one musician to play every note of a complicated part perfectly, it is next to miraculous when a hundred players do it. Intellectual concentration, emotional discipline, and physical skill are needed. The orchestra musician must have great self-control. For brief periods, he may emerge as a soloist, with a musical personality of his own, and, just as suddenly, he will have to resubmerge himself in the orchestra's collective life. Some excellent instrumentalists are unable to make this adjustment, and therefore can never become good orchestra musicians. The players must understand what the conductor wants and be able to supply it, but not everybody can adapt to somebody else's mood at the flip of a baton. The orchestra musician, moreover, must never become a faceless member of a collective but must at all times preserve his artistic individuality.

Emotional differences exist not only between individuals in an orchestra but also between sections. Violinists, for instance, often become resentful at having to play in chorus. Wind and brass players, who nearly always have solo passages in symphonic works, don't have to worry about that kind of anonymity, but because so much depends on their physical condition and the condition of their instruments, they tend to become tense and nervous. Double-bass players, who believe that they provide the foundation of the orchestra's sound, are usually considered to have a placid temperament, and piccolo players to be a little dizzy sometimes from sitting on top of the orchestra's sound. Yet no matter how the players feel, they must subordinate their feelings to the common good. Music is an emotional art, but to perform well an orchestra musician must be able to control his own emotions.

Today, there are more symphony orchestras, and greater ones, in the United States than in any other country. Among the half-dozen leading orchestras of the world now, four or five are American. In 1909, Gustav Mahler, having just been appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic, wrote to a friend in Vienna, "My orchestra, Sinc orch coun the ter livin pean Unit Arth Muc Aust in B draw have tions ed t of va towa orch twen nomi and talen had pean time Euro disco Ame being natio dition mann stand ness They uine to an tion power rope's refug turo had season

the New York Philharmonic, decided to remain in America. During the next quarter of a century, he changed the whole style of orchestral playing in the United States (as he had done in Europe for three decades before), in part by introducing the high standards of precision that are now associated with the leading American orchestras. In certain European musical circles, it is fashionable to deride the precision of the great Amer-

"A registered Democrat, yes. But what kind of registered Democrat are you?"

"Karajan spoke very little," one Michael Charry, who came to Cleveconduc- eveland ductors. s 'The the or- nor I d it to- scratch. person- tremely y ideas. nows so ell them now his is to be rked on ers im- , precise us Ital- ngs are chestra. old one a cer- utomati- s inten- s enjoy to a conductor nducting has e past hundred important part fter the strict, s of the post- and his fellow- a flamboyant This approach mannerism and Szell, the great end of the nine- reted the com- he point of ar- nd, after him, a much needed idering himself ant of the com- poser." Then, under Willem Mengel-

194

BETTER HOMES AND GARDENS
TRAVEL IDEAS 1970
DES MOINES, IOWA
YEARLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

BOSTON

Patriots, Poets, and Presidents have all loved Boston. So will you. The 300-year-old city is a rich mixture of historic shrines and skyscrapers, crooked alleys and sweeping super highways, posh restaurants and atmospheric waterfront cafes. "Why should I travel when I'm already here?" remarked one proper Bostonian.

But most of all, Boston is the city that sired the American Revolution. Rediscover this heritage on the mile-and-a-half Freedom Trail beginning at the Boston Common (there's underground parking). The trail can be done by sight-seeing bus, but you should walk to get the full flavor of the historic old city.

Take time to stroll the country's oldest public park, where a citizen can still graze his cow or shout soapbox philosophies. Hippies now loll beneath giant trees where pirates and witches once dangled by their necks. At the adjoining Public Garden, ride a swan boat. (25 cents.)

A visitors' booth on the Common provides a guidebook of the Freedom Trail. Most of the buildings are open weekdays, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. No admission charges except at Old South Meeting House (25 cents over 12) and Paul Revere House. (25 cents.)

Follow the red brick path to the "new" State House, built in 1795 by Charles Bullfinch, who helped design the Capitol in Washington. Beneath the gold-domed seat of government, you can tour the House and Senate Chambers and see such Revolutionary relics as one of the muskets that fired "the shot heard round the world" at nearby Lexington in 1775.

Walk down to Park Street Church, "the most interesting mass of brick and mortar in America" according to Henry James. At the Granary Burying Ground, weathered stones mark the graves of John Hancock, Paul Revere, Samuel Adams, and Mary Goose, the original Mother Goose.

Continue down School Street, past King's Chapel and the site of the first public school in America to the Old Corner Book Store, favorite hangout for such literary lights as Longfellow, Hawthorne, and Emerson. Look into the Old South Meeting House, where angry colonists disguised as Indians and Negroes set out for Boston Harbor to throw the world's most famous tea party.

From the balcony of the Old State House, the Declaration of Independence was first proclaimed. Inside, you'll see mementos of early Boston. Appropriately near where "the child Independence was born" stands Faneuil Hall, "The Cradle of Liberty." Here, where patriots fanned the flames of the Revolution, John F. Kennedy delivered his windup presidential campaign speech. On the top floor of the combination public market and meeting place is a fascinating military museum. Ask the attendant to tell you about the unique grasshopper weathervane on the roof. See the market, original purpose of the building, on the first floor.

If you'd like to stop for lunch or just sit down over a seafood cocktail, the old Union Oyster House is just one block north on Union Street. Diagonally across from Faneuil Hall is another famous eatery, Durgin Park. Arrive before noon to avoid waiting.

You'll step back two centuries when you enter the Paul Revere House, oldest home in Boston. In the kitchen Mrs. Revere's collection of pans and kettles hang just as she left them in 1770.

In sunny weather, children cavort on Paul Revere Mall and old men play checkers under the shade trees.

At the foot of Hull Street is the last stop on the Freedom Trail—Old North Church. From its belfry flashed the lanterns that started Paul Revere on his famous midnight ride. Next door you can buy replicas of the original lanterns along with Boston Harbor tea, Indian pudding; and, of course, delicious Boston baked beans.

The Freedom Trail doesn't exhaust the historic charms of Boston. On Louisburg Square in Beacon Hill, gas streetlights still cast their pale lime-colored glow on mellowed brick sidewalks. Behind arched doorways many of Boston's most proper citizens live in ancestral homes.

Drive across the Charlestown Bridge to Bunker Hill Monument and let the youngsters scramble up the 294 steps for a sweeping panorama of the bustling harbor. Below, on what is actually Breed's Hill, American troops devastated charging British Grenadiers. The orders American soldiers received: "Aim low; pick off the officers; don't fire till you see the whites of their eyes."

At the bottom of the Hill rise the tall masts of the U.S.S. Constitution, permanently berthed at the U.S. Naval Yard. You're welcome to walk the decks of "Old Ironsides" and examine her 44 guns that never lost a battle. (Daily 9:30 a.m.-4 p.m.) For a taste of a sailor's life, take an exhilarating three-hour windjammer cruise aboard the Spray from the historic India Wharf. ($3.75, children $2.50.)

Another excursion across the Charles River takes you to Cambridge, world center of scholarship. Stroll the ivied campuses of Harvard, M.I.T., and Radcliffe. At the Harvard University Museum you can see the unique Ware collection of glass flowers.

Culturally, Boston has been known as "The Athens of America." A score of museums display priceless treasures, from the Museum of Fine Arts with its Revere silver and Pilgrim furniture to the palace-like Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, filled with Greek sculpture, Far East Jade, Renaissance masterpieces, and contemporary paintings. You could spend all day at the Museum of Science, where push-button exhibits all but spring to life. Example: the talking transparent woman. For lunch with a view, try the museum's Skyline Room Cafeteria. The whole family can journey to the stars on celestial sight-seeing tours at the adjoining Charles Hayden Planetarium. ($1.50, children, $1; closed Mondays.)

For the youngsters, Boston has a Children's Art Center and a Children's Museum. And for everyone: a new aquarium. Hundreds of fish and marine life from the world's seas look you in the eye from glass-walled tanks. ($1.50, children 75 cents.)

Mark Twain remarked, "if you don't like the weather in Boston, wait a minute." Sightseers will find the most dependable and pleasant climate late spring through fall. Some say the weather is the only thing that changes in the city of Cabots, Lodges, and the late George Apley. It's hard to believe when you see the new Prudential Center with its landscaped plazas, auditorium, restaurants, and winter skating rink. On a clear day you can see Cape Cod from the 52-story observation deck of "Pru Tower." Another Boston landmark of more recent vintage is the modern—and controversial—City Hall, at 41 School Street.

Take time to explore some of the lesser-known delights of Boston—the exotic shops in Chinatown or the galleries and antiques on Charles Street near Beacon Hill. You can also walk on a glass bridge through a giant world globe as part of your guided, free tour of the workings of the Christian Science Monitor. And green-thumbers will enjoy the ever-growing beauties at the Arnold Arboretum.

If time is limited, pick your spots and take the subway. But don't stay out too late: the transit system—like Cinderella—shuts down at 1 a.m., you'll find most cabs seem to disappear then, too.

Beat the transportation problem and you'll find that Boston offers a wealth of entertainment the year round. Several theaters present pre-Broadway plays at pre-Broadway prices. In Symphony Hall the world-renowned Boston Symphony performs from fall through spring. On late June nights the Boston Pops gives free concerts at Hatch Memorial Shell.

The sports menu is equally varied. It ranges from professional hockey, basketball, football, and baseball to young Harvards sculling on the Charles.

Side trips out of Boston take you to the historic "witch city" of Salem, to picturesque, quaint Marblehead, Gloucester, and Rockport on the coast, and to inland Lexington and Concord.

Near Concord, visit Nathaniel Hawthorne's Old Manse; the Emerson House; and the Orchard House, where Louisa May Alcott wrote Little Women. South of Concord, you can swim at Walden Pond.

FAVORITE VACATION CITIES

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

MAY 30 1970

able or unwilling to tear ourselves away from what we saw. I can't speak for what Alban thought. What I thought was, So this is marriage. I'd been in it for sixteen years, but I'd never seen it before; never seen before "the matrimonial state," as apart from two married people together, which is just a quantity, not a quality.

But the surface we were looking at wasn't all. The moment of parting was near, when the clasping hand would unclasp and Walt would go back to Joie and her sweet songs. The touching was real for itself, but for El-Dora, anyway, there was desperation in it. She hovered, she touched, fed, listened, in agony. I could feel it. Her heart was breaking. And your heart, I reminded myself, is not breaking. It was some consolation.

• •

tell me it had all been so unnecessary? But sixteen years of keeping silent about what I felt didn't permit any into the kitchen and came back at once with some pretty, fruity drink—non-economical baton technique to those who turn conducting into a ballet performance. "The conductor should conduct the orchestra, not the audience."

chestra is the typical American orchestra, phlegmatic and without talent." Since Mahler's time, the balance of orchestral excellence has shifted to this country. (Europe, however, remains the homeland of opera.) At first, better salaries and a higher standard of living tempted some of the best European instrumentalists to emigrate to the United States, and great conductors—Arthur Nikisch, from Hungary; Karl Muck, from Germany; Mahler, from Austria—became builders of orchestras in Boston and New York. They were drawn to New York by what must have seemed the ideal situation—positions that offered them what amounted to musical dictatorship in a milieu of vast financial resources. The trend toward the consolidation of America's orchestral power was accelerated by the twentieth century's succession of economic and political disasters in Europe and by the forced emigration of many talented musicians who had played with European orchestras. As time went on, the great European conductors discovered that the best American orchestras, being unhampered by national "schools," traditions, restrictions, and mannerisms, were outstanding for their freshness and flexibility. They presented a genuine artistic challenge to an artist of imagination and re-creative power. In 1928, Europe's most celebrated refugee musician, Arturo Toscanini, who had just completed a season as conductor of the New York Philharmonic, decided to remain in America. During the next quarter of a century, he changed the whole style of orchestral playing in the United States (as he had done in Europe for three decades before), in part by introducing the high standards of precision that are now associated with the leading American orchestras. In certain European musical circles, it is fashionable to deride the precision of the great American orchestras, but this appears to be because the American orchestras have reached standards of precision—and, consequently, of brilliance—that few, if any, European orchestras can match.

It is generally agreed that the leading symphony orchestras in this country today are the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic, and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Over the past fifteen years, critics and audiences in both America and Europe have tended to agree that the Cleveland Orchestra, which was founded in 1918 and is the youngest of the five, has become the peer of the four older ones and is perhaps in some respects their superior. "There are many first-class orchestras in the United States, and among them the Cleveland Orchestra is phenomenal," said Aram Khatchaturian, the composer. "Among the great orchestras of the world the Cleveland . . . is probably the most efficient symphonic body of them all," the London Times wrote in 1965. "The Cleveland Orchestra is at this time unequalled," the music critic of the Boston Globe wrote in 1966, and he went on to explain, "It is because of its unanimity as an orchestra even more than for its surpassing virtuosity in other ways that I would call the Cleveland Orchestra uniquely great." After the Cleveland Orchestra's performances at the Edinburgh Festival not long ago, Sir Neville Cardus wrote in the Guardian, "No other orchestra so good is to be found in the United States." "Many friends of music consider the orchestra the best in the world, and George Szell the best of all musical directors," wrote the music critic of Hamburg's Bild Zeitung.

The question of why a particular orchestra plays the way it does has

"Karajan spoke very little," one Michael Charry, who came to Cleveframed decorations from various governments, and glass-encased photostats of musical manuscripts. There was a couch in the room, but no piano; he took their chairs. A few minutes befo ten, everybody was seated, and Rafa Druian, the concertmaster (he is no with the School of Music at the Cal rentice conduc- the Cleveland ant conductors. okofieff's 'The es' with the or- nusicians nor I ve studied it to- g from scratch. ny own person- were extremely d out my ideas. alibre knows so ave to tell them —they know his which it is to be we worked on the players im- the lean, precise he luscious Ital- Such things are this orchestra. oulez told one thing in a cer- ctions automati- nductor's inten- players enjoy to a conductor

nducting has e past hundred important part fter the strict, s of the post- and his fellow- a flamboyant This approach mannerism and Szell, the great end of the nine- reted the com- he point of ar- nd, after him, a much needed idering himself ant of the com-

"A registered Democrat, yes. But what kind of registered Democrat are you?"

Michael Charry, who came to Cleve- poser." Then, under Willem Mengel-

194

BETTER HOMES AND GARDENS
TRAVEL IDEAS 1970
DES MOINES, IOWA
YEARLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

BOSTON

Patriots, Poets, and Presidents have all loved Boston. So will you. The 300-year-old city is a rich mixture of historic shrines and skyscrapers, crooked alleys and sweeping super highways, posh restaurants and atmospheric waterfront cafes. "Why should I travel when I'm already here?" remarked one proper Bostonian.

But most of all, Boston is the city that sired the American Revolution. Rediscover this heritage on the mile-and-a-half Freedom Trail beginning at the Boston Common (there's undergrou trail can be done by sig you should walk to get th historic old city.

Take time to stroll th public park, where a citi his cow or shout soap Hippies now loll beneath pirates and witches once necks. At the adjoining I a swan boat. (25 cents.)

A visitors' booth on the a guidebook of the Free the buildings are open 4 p.m. No admission ch South Meeting House (2 Paul Revere House. (25

Follow the red brick State House, built in 17 finch, who helped des Washington. Beneath t of government, you can Senate Chambers and s ary relics as one of th "the shot heard round t Lexington in 1775.

Walk down to Park most interesting mass in America" accordin At the Granary Buryin stones mark the grave Paul Revere, Samuel Goose, the original Mo

Continue down Scho Chapel and the site of in America to the Old favorite hangout for s Longfellow, Hawtho Look into the Old S where angry colonists and Negroes set out throw the world's m

From the balcony o the Declaration of In proclaimed. Inside, y early Boston. Appropr child Independence Faneuil Hall, "The Here, where patriots the Revolution, John his windup presiden On the top floor of t market and meeting military museum. A you about the unique grasshopper weathervane on the roof. See the market, original purpose of the building, on the first floor.

If you'd like to stop for lunch or just sit down over a seafood cocktail, the old Union Oyster House is just one block north on Union Street. Diagonally across from Faneuil Hall is another famous eatery, Durgin Park. Arrive before noon to avoid waiting.

You'll step back two centuries when you enter the Paul Revere House, oldest home in Boston. In the kitchen Mrs. Revere's collection of pans and kettles hang just as she left them in 1770.

In sunny weather, children cavort on

Science, where push-button exhibits all but spring to life. Example: the talking transparent woman. For lunch with a view, try the museum's Skyline Room Cafeteria. The whole family can journey to the stars on celestial sight-seeing tours at the adjoining Charles Hayden Planetarium. ($1.50, children, $1; closed Mondays.)

For the youngsters, Boston has a Children's Art Center and a Children's Museum. And for everyone: a new aquarium. Hundreds of fish and marine life from the world's seas look you in the eye from glass-walled tanks. ($1.50, children 75 cents.)

Mark Twain remarked, "if you don't like the weather in Boston, wait a minute."

fascinated me since my childhood, when I started to study the violin. Over the years, I have learned that there is no easy answer. Others have reached the same conclusion. In "The Cleveland Orchestra," a book that the music critic Robert C. Marsh published in 1967 as "a birthday present to a remarkable orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary," Marsh wrote that although "little skill is required to discover that the Cleveland Orchestra is a great ensemble . . . it is somewhat more difficult to explain why this orchestra plays the way it does." Obviously, there are things that cannot be entirely explained. An orchestra's collective personality can be sensed and described, but it is ultimately as difficult to analyze as any other personality. Not long ago, in an attempt to find an answer to the somewhat easier question of how an orchestra works, I went out to Cleveland—not because the Cleveland Orchestra is typical but because Szell, who has been the Cleveland's musical director since 1946, and whom I have known for thirty-five years, is said to have molded the ensemble there into "the world's greatest hundred-man string quartet." To me, a lifelong string-quartet player, it thus seemed that the Cleveland Orchestra might afford some clues to the understanding of orchestras in general.

EVERY great orchestra has its own sound, distinguishable from that of any other great orchestra. In terms of physics, sound consists of vibrations varying in frequency and amplitude, and music is the arrangement of such vibrations, within a certain span of time, in a definite rhythm. Musically speaking, matters are more complicated. A great orchestra's sound has been compared to a celebrated singer's timbre, but this is putting the matter too strongly; it is easier to distinguish, say, Caruso from Gigli, Bjoerling, or Corelli than to distinguish the Cleveland from the Philadelphia, the Vienna Philharmonic, or the Berlin Philharmonic. Basically, the so-called Cleveland sound is a homogeneous, chamber-music sound—a classically noble string tone perfectly blended with singing woodwinds and exquisitely clear brasses. Szell has so forcefully emphasized lucid phrasing and clear articulation that these have become second nature for his orchestra. Contributing to them are exact balances within and among the sections, a deeply ingrained sense of rhythm, and concentration upon the long line of the music, which rises through points of tension to a final climax and release. There seems to be a unified approach by the hundred and six members of the orchestra and their conductor to the performance of each particular work of music. Szell himself doesn't particularly like to discuss the Cleveland sound. He maintains that a great orchestra should have no sound of its own, and that the qualities of the ensemble should grow out of the style and the manner in which each work has been written. During a concert, Szell says, the orchestra may switch from a "Mozart sound" to a "Brahms sound" to a "Debussy sound." Szell thinks of Mozart, Brahms, and Debussy as individuals. The re-creation of their music must faithfully represent their ideas. It must be done with style, taste, and a sense of spontaneity and enthusiasm. Szell is pleased when people tell him that no two performances of the same work by the Cleveland Orchestra are alike. They must not be, he says. Great music is a living art, and its performance must never become soulless and mechanical.

The Cleveland sound is quite different from the sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra, which is lush, warm, and rhapsodic—perhaps because Eugene Ormandy, who has been the orchestra's musical director for the past thirty-four years, was once himself a "rhapsodic" violinist. The Berlin sound reflects the dynamic personality of Herbert von Karajan, the musical director of the Berlin Philharmonic—beautiful strings, lean woodwinds, and precise brasses. The Viennese sound is characterized by singing, sweet strings and mellow brasses that convey to nostalgic listeners the magic of the Vienna Woods; warmth and sensuousness are more highly valued on the blue Danube than transparency and precision. In most cases, an orchestra's distinctive sound is probably the reflection of its permanent conductor's personality, as in the cases of Szell, Ormandy, and Karajan, and only rarely of a local tradition, as in Vienna. The Cleveland sound was unquestionably created by Szell, even though he conceives of sound not as an end in itself but as "a means of expression, with the ultimate purpose of communicating each composer's special message." The Cleveland players themselves attribute their orchestra's sound to their long association with Szell and their ability to produce the sort of music he demands. They are aware that their sound sometimes seems "clipped." "Maybe our sound is so clear and perfect that something of the soul gets lost," one player said to me. Another disagreed slightly, saying, "Szell's approach to the music is analytical rather than emotional. He teaches us to seek the meaning behind the notes." A third called the Cleveland "rather a sober orchestra, more work than fun." I soon gathered that Szell's severe sense of responsibility toward music and his austere self-discipline don't encourage frivolity.

Some conductors don't try to get close to the mystery of sound, while for others sound becomes a fetish, and may ruin their orchestras' taste and style. A first-rate conductor may evoke good sound from a minor orchestra; a bad conductor can easily ruin the sound of a first-rate orchestra. In Philadelphia, beauty of sound was developed under Leopold Stokowski and Ormandy to the point where it became part of the orchestra's style, but purists feel that the lush Philadelphia sound is inappropriate for the performance of works by such classical composers as Mozart and Beethoven. Great conductors can perform miracles with sound. When Stokowski rehearsed the Cleveland Orchestra a few years ago, Louis Lane, the orchestra's associate conductor, watched the Maestro, and he told me later that it took Stokowski only a few minutes to evoke from the orchestra the rich, unmistakable "Stokowski sound." "I studied him carefully, trying to get to the bottom of the miracle," Lane said. "Stokowski had seated the orchestra differently—the first violins and violas on his left side, the second violins on his right side, the cellos and double basses behind the woodwinds, and the brass in the rear." The woodwinds, the brasses, and the percussion instruments almost always remain in the rear, but seating arrangements for the string sections vary. The European arrangement seats the first violins at the left of the conductor and the second violins at his right; the violas face him, and the cellos are to the right, with the double basses behind them. The American arrangement places the first and second violins to the left of the conductor and the violas to his right, with the cellos facing him, or he may have the cellos

"He's not to blie anyone for twenty-four hours."

• •

tell me it had all been so unnecessary? But sixteen years of keeping silent about what I felt didn't permit any into the kitchen and came back at once with some pretty, fruity drink—nonwas some consolation.

able or unwilling to tear ourselves away from what we saw. I can't speak for what Alban thought. What I thought was, So this is marriage. I'd been in it for sixteen years, but I'd never seen it before; never seen before "the matrimonial state," as apart from two married people together, which is just a quantity, not a quality.

But the surface we were looking at wasn't all. The moment of parting was near, when the clasping hand would unclasp and Walt would go back to Joie and her sweet songs. The touching was real for itself, but for El-Dora, anyway, there was desperation in it. She hovered, she touched, fed, listened, in agony. I could feel it. Her heart was breaking. And your heart, I reminded myself, is not breaking. It was some consolation.

economical baton technique to those who turn conducting into a ballet performance. "The conductor should conduct the orchestra, not the audience," they say. A player cares less about the cond good lea the cond tion but maximu mum of conducto are muc plain his a particu many or signed to way—do We are it a cer musical have hea hearsals, join us thrilled."

"I do ballet, conservation, starvation, cancer research, the needy, a little art, and a smidgen for Farmington."

• •

RECE son Orchestr plan to Clevelan hearsal, don't yo Clevelan are playe nights, a place on ings, W noon, ar perienced of their Clevelan ule is w vance so exactly w to be re will be g through nine tha horn an the mem wind se locker hall wa spread chairs a on the rear of player, tuning h

I jo private was co rounded tures of with a respectfu framed decorations from various governments, and glass-encased photostats of musical manuscripts. There was a couch in the room, but no piano; he has one in a larger room upstairs, which took their chairs. A few minutes bef ten, everybody was seated, and Ra Druian, the concertmaster (he is n with the School of Music at the Ca fornia Institute of the Arts), came o on his right and the violas facing him. Many leading European orchestras have now adopted one of the American versions. "Stokowski has a way of shaping sound as a sculptor shapes his material," Lane went on. "With a few strong, almost hypnotic gestures, he created full, warm, sensuous sound. The musicians didn't understand what they were doing. They did it instinctively, producing exactly the sort of sound Stokowski wanted. The spiccato disappeared as though by magic and became détaché. Suddenly, the orchestra's sound was richer, darker, juicier in its quality. Yet the whole time Stokowski never said a word. It was incredible!"

A great many members of the Cleveland Orchestra have long been as puzzled as Lane about a conductor's ability to produce his own type of sound from an orchestra, and have tried to analyze it. In 1965, when Pierre Boulez, then the conductor of the Südwestfunk Orchestra in Baden-Baden, first went to Cleveland, it took him only five minutes to get the orchestra to play Debussy as Debussy is played in France—in a style that is subtle and suave, transparent and clean. During the Cleveland Orchestra's European tour in the summer of 1967, Herbert von Karajan conducted two performances of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony. Those players who had previously performed the Prokofieff Fifth under Szell still talk about the amazing transformation that occurred when Karajan started to rehearse the orchestra. Almost instantly, the orchestra switched from a "Szell sound" to a "Karajan sound," with its long, legato lines, its lyrical beauty, its sense of the dramatic, and its feeling for impressionistic effect.

"Karajan spoke very little," one player told me. "His gestures indicated what he wanted—gentle sound and sometimes sensuous sound, different from Szell's lean, sinewy sound. Karajan toned down the cellos. Once, he cautioned the cymbal player against making a clamorous sound. At the beginning of the last movement, he conducted more slowly and tenderly than Szell. He indicated that he wanted us to round off the edges. It wasn't—well, it wasn't such a struggle as under Szell. Karajan seemed to look at the music from the outside going in, while Szell seems to be inside the music, looking out. Incidentally, after our return from Europe we played the Prokofieff Fifth under Szell in Cleveland. We adjusted ourselves at once to Szell's subtle detail and played it completely Szell's way." Karajan kept his eyes open during the rehearsals, but he had them closed during the performance, as is his custom, which slightly unnerved some members of the Cleveland Orchestra. They are used to eloquent signals from Szell, who often indicates increased accents or corrects tonal balance with an expressive glance. A wind player said, "I kept telling myself that Karajan knew the music and that he knew where everybody was sitting. Just the same, I wished that he would look at me at certain moments." A first violinist said, "He asked less of us than Szell does—he didn't make us work so hard. He seemed more concerned with beautiful expression and artistic effect than with clarity of texture and the artistic truth."

The Cleveland Orchestra's ability to create the sound demanded by different conductors is, of course, a great tribute to its musicians' flexibility. "They have great respect for good music and good musicians," I was told by Michael Charry, who came to Cleveland in 1961 as an apprentice conductor and is now one of the Cleveland Orchestra's two assistant conductors. "Once, I studied Prokofieff's 'The Love for Three Oranges' with the orchestra. Neither the musicians nor I knew the work, and we studied it together, doing everything from scratch. I was able to impress my own personality upon them. They were extremely flexible, and they carried out my ideas. An orchestra of this calibre knows so many things. I didn't have to tell them how to play Prokofieff—they know his music and the style in which it is to be performed. Afterward, we worked on 'Gianni Schicchi,' and the players immediately shifted from the lean, precise sound of Prokofieff to the luscious Italian sound of Puccini. Such things are taken for granted in this orchestra. When Karajan or Boulez told one section to do a certain thing in a certain way, the other sections automatically picked up the conductor's intentions. The Cleveland players enjoy responding this way to a conductor when they respect him."

ORCHESTRAL conducting has evolved, over the past hundred and fifty years, into an important part of a performance. After the strict, foursquare time-beaters of the post-classical era, Wagner and his fellow-conductors introduced a flamboyant style of conducting. This approach soon degenerated into mannerism and excess; according to Szell, the great conductors toward the end of the nineteenth century "interpreted the composer subjectively to the point of arbitrariness." Mahler and, after him, Toscanini introduced a much needed corrective, each considering himself "the advocate and servant of the composer." Then, under Willem Mengel-berg, Sir Thomas Beecham, Bruno Walter, and Wilhelm Furtwängler in Europe, and Toscanini, Stokowski, and Serge Koussevitzky in America, the great orchestras became virtuoso symphonic instruments on which the star conductors performed as an eminent violinist performs on his Stradivari. They established high standards of orchestral playing, but their strong personalities did not permit real self-effacement. And this situation prevailed. The great showman conductor, the flamboyant artist whose name appears on the recording album in larger letters than the name of the composer, now dominates orchestral music.

A performance has two main components—interpretation and execution. The conductor's musically correct interpretation of a composition is not always matched by a faultless performance, and the virtuoso execution of a work remains an artistic failure if the conductor is unable to interpret and communicate the spirit of the music. It is no accident that some of the most famous conductors today are more successful when they conduct an extravagant, exciting work by Ravel, Mahler, or Stravinsky than when they present a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, or Schubert, in which everything depends on what Szell calls "the artistic truth." These conductors may bring out every little musical detail with admirable clarity but lose the general line of the music. Orchestra musicians are more concerned with exactness of execution than with the spirit of the musical interpretation. By contrast, Toscanini, during his last years with the N.B.C. Symphony, was sometimes lenient about rhythmical detail and tolerant of the weaknesses of his less distinguished players, but his interpretations were always characterized by clarity and balance, and by integrity, ardor, and power as well.

A great orchestra instinctively forms its collective judgment of an unfamiliar conductor even before he raises his baton. Several members of the Cleveland Orchestra told me that they begin to "feel" a conductor as he walks toward the podium. But there is no mystery about the players' ability to size up a conductor quickly and accurately—his knowledge and competence, his technique and experience. A conductor may fool the audience and the critics, but he can never fool the hundred highly skilled artists facing him. They sense immediately whether the conductor knows the music thoroughly or only superficially. They are not deluded if he stops them at certain trouble spots during rehearsal to point out mistakes; it may be obvious that he prepared these interruptions beforehand and studied his lines. What does impress them is an interruption at a seemingly easy spot which achieves a marked improvement.

"It was nice of you to come back for a visit after your enlightenment."

The Cleveland Orchestra's attitude toward conductors is rather unusual. Orchestra players know a hundred ways of sabotaging or betraying a conductor they dislike or scorn. Very often, musicians get a morbid pleasure out of seeing a bad conductor expose himself to their collective derision. But every member of the Cleveland Orchestra subscribes to Szell's dogma "We are all in the service of music." One player says, "We are always interested in the music and ready to give a competent conductor what he wants if he can hold the attention of the whole orchestra all the way to the rear." Brass players, who sit in the rear, have their difficulties with a conductor who speaks poor English or talks softly. "One tries to catch his words, but after a while one loses interest and gives up," a trumpeter says. "Of course, he may hold our attention without saying anything." The best conductors speak with their eyes and their hands.

Good orchestra players prefer conductors with a clear,

BETTER HOMES AND GARDENS
TRAVEL IDEAS 1970
DES MOINES, IOWA
YEARLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

BOSTON

Patriots, Poets, and Presidents have all loved Boston. So will you. The 300-year-old city is a rich mixture of historic shrines and skyscrapers, crooked alleys and sweeping super highways, posh restaurants and atmospheric waterfront cafes. "Why should I travel when I'm already here?" remarked one proper Bostonian.

But most of all, Boston is the city that sired the American Revolution. Rediscover this heritage on the mile-and-a-half Freedom Trail beginning at the Boston Common (there's undergrour trail can be done by sigl you should walk to get th historic old city.

Take time to stroll th public park, where a citi his cow or shout soap Hippies now loll beneath pirates and witches once necks. At the adjoining P a swan boat. (25 cents.)

A visitors' booth on the a guidebook of the Free the buildings are open 4 p.m. No admission ch South Meeting House (2 Paul Revere House. (25

Follow the red brick State House, built in 17 finch, who helped des Washington. Beneath t of government, you can Senate Chambers and ary relics as one of th "the shot heard round Lexington in 1775.

Walk down to Park most interesting mass in America" accordin At the Granary Buryin stones mark the grave Paul Revere, Samuel Goose, the original M

Continue down Sch Chapel and the site of in America to the Ol favorite hangout for Longfellow, Hawtho Look into the Old S where angry colonists and Negroes set out throw the world's m

From the balcony o the Declaration of I proclaimed. Inside, y early Boston. Appropr child Independence Faneuil Hall, "The Here, where patriots the Revolution, John his windup presiden On the top floor of t market and meeting military museum. A you about the unique grasshopper weathervane on the roof. See the market, original purpose of the building, on the first floor.

If you'd like to stop for lunch or just sit down over a seafood cocktail, the old Union Oyster House is just one block north on Union Street. Diagonally across from Faneuil Hall is another famous eatery, Durgin Park. Arrive before noon to avoid waiting.

You'll step back two centuries when you enter the Paul Revere House, oldest home in Boston. In the kitchen Mrs. Revere's collection of pans and kettles hang just as she left them in 1770.

In sunny weather, children cavort on

Science, where push-button exhibits all but spring to life. Example: the talking transparent woman. For lunch with a view, try the museum's Skyline Room Cafeteria. The whole family can journey to the stars on celestial sight-seeing tours at the adjoining Charles Hayden Planetarium. ($1.50, children, $1; closed Mondays.)

For the youngsters, Boston has a Children's Art Center and a Children's Museum. And for everyone: a new aquarium. Hundreds of fish and marine life from the world's seas look you in the eye from glass-walled tanks. ($1.50, children 75 cents.)

Mark Twain remarked, "if you don't like the weather in Boston, wait a minute."

fascinated me since my childhood, when I started to study the violin. Over the years, I have learned that there is no easy answer. Others have reached the same conclusion. In "The Cleveland Orchestra," a book that the music critic Robert C. Marsh published in 1967 as "a birthday present to a remarkable orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary," Marsh wrote that although "little skill is required to discover that the Cleveland Orchestra is a great ensemble . . . it is somewhat more difficult to explain why this orchestra plays the way it does." Obviously, there are things that cannot be entirely explained. An orchestra's collective personality can be sensed and described, but it is ultimately as difficult to analyze as any other personality. Not long ago, in an attempt to find an answer to the somewhat easier question of how an orchestra works, I went out to Cleveland—not because the Cleveland Orchestra is typical but because Szell, who has been the Cleveland's musical director since 1946, and whom I have known for thirty-five years, is said to have molded the ensemble there into "the world's greatest hundred-man string quartet." To me, a lifelong string-quartet player, it thus seemed that the Cleveland Orchestra might afford some clues to the understanding of orchestras in general.

EVERY great orchestra has its own sound, distinguishable from that of any other great orchestra. In terms of physics, sound consists of vibrations varying in frequency and amplitude, and music is the arrangement of such vibrations, within a certain span of time, in a definite rhythm. Musically speaking, matters are more complicated. A great orchestra's sound has been compared to a celebrated singer's timbre, but this is putting the matter too strongly; it is easier to distinguish, say, Caruso from Gigli, Bjoerling, or Corelli than to distinguish the Cleveland from the Philadelphia, the Vienna Philharmonic, or the Berlin Philharmonic. Basically, the so-called Cleveland sound is a homogeneous, chamber-music sound—a classically noble string tone perfectly blended with singing woodwinds and exquisitely clear brasses. Szell has so forcefully emphasized lucid phrasing and clear articulation that these have become second nature for his orchestra. Contributing to them are exact balances within and among the sections, a deeply ingrained sense of rhythm, and concentration upon the long line of the music, which rises through points of tension to a final climax and release. There seems to be a unified approach by the hundred and six members of the orchestra and their conductor to the performance of each particular work of music. Szell himself doesn't particularly like to discuss the Cleveland sound. He maintains that a great orchestra should have no sound of its own, and that the qualities of the ensemble should grow out of the style and the manner in which each work has been written. During a concert, Szell says, the orchestra may switch from a "Mozart sound" to a "Brahms sound" to a "Debussy sound." Szell thinks of Mozart, Brahms, and Debussy as individuals. The re-creation of their music must faithfully represent their ideas. It must be done with style, taste, and a sense of spontaneity and enthusiasm. Szell is pleased when people tell him that no two performances of the same work by the Cleveland Orchestra are alike. They must not be, he says. Great music is a living art, and its performance must never become soulless and mechanical.

The Cleveland sound is quite different from the sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra, which is lush, warm, and rhapsodic—perhaps because Eugene Ormandy, who has been the orchestra's musical director for the past thirty-four years, was once himself a "rhapsodic" violinist. The Berlin sound reflects the dynamic personality of Herbert von Karajan, the musical director of the Berlin Philharmonic—beautiful strings, lean woodwinds, and precise brasses. The Viennese sound is characterized by singing, sweet strings and mellow brasses that convey to nostalgic listeners the magic of the Vienna Woods; warmth and sensuousness are more highly valued on the blue Danube than transparency and precision. In most cases, an orchestra's distinctive sound is probably the reflection of its permanent conductor's personality, as in the cases of Szell, Ormandy, and Karajan, and only rarely of a local tradition, as in Vienna. The Cleveland sound was unquestionably created by Szell, even though he conceives of sound not as an end in itself but as "a means of expression, with the ultimate purpose of communicating each composer's special message." The Cleveland players themselves attribute their orchestra's sound to their long association with Szell and their ability to produce the sort of music he demands. They are aware that their sound sometimes seems "clipped." "Maybe our sound is so clear and perfect that something of the soul gets lost," one player said to me. Another disagreed slightly, saying, "Szell's approach to the music is analytical rather than emotional. He teaches us to seek the meaning behind the notes." A third called the Cleveland "rather a sober orchestra, more work than fun." I soon gathered that Szell's severe sense of responsibility toward music and his austere self-discipline don't encourage frivolity.

Some conductors don't try to get close to the mystery of sound, while for others sound becomes a fetish, and may ruin their orchestras' taste and style. A first-rate conductor may evoke good sound from a minor orchestra; a bad conductor can easily ruin the sound of a first-rate orchestra. In Philadelphia, beauty of sound was developed under Leopold Stokowski and Ormandy to the point where it became part of the orchestra's style, but purists feel that the lush Philadelphia sound is inappropriate for the performance of works by such classical composers as Mozart and Beethoven. Great conductors can perform miracles with sound. When Stokowski rehearsed the Cleveland Orchestra a few years ago, Louis Lane, the orchestra's associate conductor, watched the Maestro, and he told me later that it took Stokowski only a few minutes to evoke from the orchestra the rich, unmistakable "Stokowski sound." "I studied him carefully, trying to get to the bottom of the miracle," Lane said. "Stokowski had seated the orchestra differently—the first violins and violas on his left side, the second violins on his right side, the cellos and double basses behind the woodwinds, and the brass in the rear." The woodwinds, the brasses, and the percussion instruments almost always remain in the rear, but seating arrangements for the string sections vary. The European arrangement seats the first violins at the left of the conductor and the second violins at his right; the violas face him, and the cellos are to the right, with the double basses behind them. The American arrangement places the first and second violins to the left of the conductor and the violas to his right, with the cellos facing him, or he may have the cell able or unwilling to tear ourselves away from what we saw. I can't speak for what Alban thought. What I thought was, So this is marriage. I'd been in it for sixteen years, but I'd never seen it before; never seen before "the matrimonial state" as apart from two married people together, which is just a quantity, not a quality.

"He's not to blie anyone for twenty-four hours."

But the surface we were looking at wasn't all. The moment of parting was near, when the clasping hand would unclasp and Walt would go back to Joie and her sweet songs. The touching was real for itself, but for El-Dora, anyway, there was desperation in it. She hovered, she touched, fed, listened, in agony. I could feel it. Her heart was breaking. And your heart, I reminded myself, is not breaking. It was some consolation.

Alban brought me to my senses. He

• •

tell me it had all been so unnecessary? But sixteen years of keeping silent about what I felt didn't permit any outburst now.

into the kitchen and came back at once with some pretty, fruity drink—non-alcoholic, of course.

economical baton technique to those who turn conducting into a ballet performance. "The conductor should conduct the orchestra, not the audience," they say. A player cares less about the conductor's personality than about good leadership. What he expects from the conductor is not only musical erudition but a clear beat. "They want a maximum of explanation with a minimum of words," Szell says. Garrulous conductors who lecture on the music are much disliked, but Szell does explain his reasons for doing something in a particular way. One player says, "In many orchestras, the musicians are resigned to doing certain things a certain way—don't ask, just do it. Not here. We are always told why we should do it a certain way—there is always a musical reason. Musicians elsewhere have heard horror stories about our rehearsals, and about Szell, so when they join us they are often surprised and thrilled."

RECENTLY, I arranged to attend some rehearsals of the Cleveland Orchestra. Szell had suggested that I plan to arrive at Severance Hall in Cleveland in time for a Tuesday rehearsal, at 10 A.M., and added, "Why don't you come an hour early?" In Cleveland, the regular weekly concerts are played on Thursday and Saturday nights, and rehearsals generally take place on Monday and Tuesday mornings, Wednesday morning and afternoon, and Thursday morning. (Experienced conductors plan every minute of their allotted rehearsal time. The Cleveland Orchestra's rehearsal schedule is worked out four months in advance so that the musicians will know exactly which pieces of music are going to be rehearsed and how much time will be given to each.) As I walked in through the rear entrance shortly after nine that Tuesday morning, I heard horn and trumpet players practicing; the members of the brass and woodwind sections were warming up in the locker room. Upstairs, the beautiful hall was dim and deserted. Two bulbs spread a pale light over the empty chairs and music stands on the stage. At the rear of the stage one player, a woman, was tuning her harp.

I joined Szell in his private office, where he was comfortably surrounded by framed pictures of famous artists with affectionate or respectful dedications, framed decorations from various governments, and glass-encased photostats of musical manuscripts. There was a couch in the room, but no piano; he has one in a larger room upstairs, which is officially known as the conductor's studio. On his desk when I went in were the scores of the works on that week's program: two of Mozart's Marches for Orchestra, in D major (K. 335) and C major (K. 408); Frank Martin's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra; and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." Szell, who was wearing casual shoes, dark trousers, a long-sleeved dark-gray wool polo shirt, and a black sweater, was sitting behind the desk giving some instructions to Mrs. Margaret Gloves, his longtime special assistant. Among other things, he asked her to have a platform for the cello soloist placed on the stage, because he was going to start the rehearsal with "Don Quixote." Mrs. Gloves nodded, laid the morning mail on his desk, and went out.

"We had a rough runthrough yesterday, without Pierre Fournier, the soloist," Szell said after we greeted each other. "He arrived from Geneva only last night. He did 'Don Quixote' with us in 1951, '52, '56, and '57, and again in 1960, when we recorded the work, and I'm happy to have him doing it with us again. I love 'Don Quixote.' There is more human warmth and compassion in it than in any of Strauss's other symphonic works. And besides that, it displays the whole range of his musical imagination and his virtuoso orchestra technique. There was nothing Strauss could not do."

From the guest soloist's room, next door, came the sound of a cello being played beautifully; Fournier was getting ready. I left Szell and walked to the concert hall and sat down in the middle of the tenth row. Half a dozen people were there, and most of them had orchestra scores. On the stage, the oboist was warming up and adjusting his pitch, and in the rear the timpanist was tuning his kettledrums. Gradually, the other musicians, most of them in shirtsleeves or pullovers, drifted in and took their chairs. A few minutes be ten, everybody was seated, and Ra Druian, the concertmaster (he is with the School of Music at the C fornia Institute of the Arts), came stage and raised his arm. The n ceased, the oboe player sounded an and the musicians began to tune th instruments. The string sections their tuning first, and after them t woodwinds and the brass players. At one minute before ten, the sounds di down, and Fournier came in, escorted by Szell. Fournier shook hands with Druian and some other players nearby, sat down on the soloist's platform, and tuned his cello. Szell waited patiently, and then, when Fournier had finished tuning, rapped the stand with his baton and told the musicians they were going to play the whole piece. He looked at Fournier, who nodded assent. Szell lifted both arms in a commanding gesture and gave the upbeat to the flutes and oboes, and the orchestra began to play the Introduction of "Don Quixote."

I was lucky to be in Cleveland when "Don Quixote" was on the program. The Strauss tone poem is a demanding work that provides a real test for an orchestra and conductor. A noted Viennese musicologist named Richard Specht, who was a friend of Strauss, wrote that "Don Quixote" is "one of the least understood works of the Master . . . owing to the fact that a finished performance is extremely difficult to accomplish, and any other must be misleading with regard to the spirit and fullness of the musical fantasy of this work." Strauss indicated his intention when he subtitled the work "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character." Specht considered the variations "the most comprehensive form which a tone-poet could give when painting the picture of Don Quixote." Using Wagner's leitmotiv method, Strauss created associations with musical phrases and figures and used these with incomparable mastery throughout the work's theme and ten variations framed by the Introduction and the Finale. Over the past three and a half centuries, more than fifty composers have been attracted t Cervantes's "Don Quixote de la Mancha, but it remained fo Strauss, in 1897, t give the work what is generally regarded as its ultimate musical interpretation. "For wit humor, pathos and hu manism, there is notl ing like it in the who competent conductor what he wants if he can hold the attention of the whole orchestra all the way to the rear." Brass players, who sit in the rear, have their difficulties with a conductor who speaks poor English or talks softly. "One tries to catch his words, but after a while one loses interest and gives up," a trumpeter says. "Of course, he may hold our attention without saying anything." The best conductors speak with their eyes and their hands.

"It was nice of you to come back for a visit after your enlightenment."

Good orchestra players prefer conductors with a clear

ETTER HOMES AND ARDENS
RAVEL IDEAS 1970
S MOINES, IOWA
ARLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

button exhibits all but ble: the talking trans-unch with a view, try Room Cafeteria. The
urney to the stars on tours at the adjoining etarium. ($1.50, childlays.)
s, Boston has a Chil-
a Children's Museum.
new aquarium. Hunne life from the world's eye from glass-walled n 75 cents.)
ked, "if you don't like on, wait a minute."

able or unwilling to tear ourselves away from what we saw. I can't speak for what Alban thought. What I thought was, So this is marriage. I'd been in it for sixteen years, but I'd never seen it before; never seen before "the matrimonial state" as apart from two married people together, which is just a quantity, not a quality.

But the surface we were looking at wasn't all. The moment of parting was near, when the clasping hand would unclasp and Walt would go back to Joie and her sweet songs. The touching was real for itself, but for El-Dora, anyway, there was desperation in it. She hovered, she touched, fed, listened, in agony. I could feel it. Her heart was breaking. And your heart, I remindedmyself, is not breaking. It was some consolation.

"He's not to bite anyone for twenty-four hours."

tell me it had all been so unnecessary? But sixteen years of keeping silent about what I felt didn't permit any into the kitchen and came back at once with some pretty, fruity drink—non-alcoholic, of course.

"Alban," she cried, "I've made pression, with the ultimate purpose of mmunicating each composer's spe-al message." The Cleveland players emselves attribute their orchestra's und to their long association with zell and their ability to produce the rt of music he demands. They are ware that their sound sometimes seems clipped." "Maybe our sound is so ear and perfect that something of the al gets lost," one player said to me.

nother disagreed slightly, saying,
Szell's approach to the music is ana-tical rather than emotional. He ches us to seek the meaning behind e notes." A third called the Cleve-nd "rather a sober orchestra, more ork than fun." I soon gathered that zell's severe sense of responsibility ward music and his austere self-dis-pline don't encourage frivolity.

Some conductors don't try to get se to the mystery of sound, while others sound becomes a fetish, and y ruin their orchestras' taste and ie. A first-rate conductor may evoke od sound from a minor orchestra; bad conductor can easily ruin the nd of a first-rate orchestra. In iladelphia, beauty of sound was de-loped under Leopold Stokowski and rmandy to the point where it became t of the orchestra's style, but purists l that the lush Philadelphia sound nappropriate for the performance of rks by such classical composers as ozart and Beethoven. Great con-ctors can perform miracles with nd. When Stokowski rehearsed the eveland Orchestra a few years ago, uis Lane, the orchestra's associate nductor, watched the Maestro, and told me later that it took Stokowski a few minutes to evoke from the hestra the rich, unmistakable "Stovski sound." "I studied him carey, trying to get to the bottom of miracle," Lane said. "Stokowski seated the orchestra differently—first violins and violas on his left the second violins on his right the cellos and double basses be- the woodwinds, and the brass in ear." The woodwinds, the brasses, the percussion instruments almost ys remain in the rear, but seating gements for the string sections
The European arrangement seats rst violins at the left of the con-r and the second violins at his the violas face him, and the cele to the right, with the double behind them. The American arment places the first and second to the left of the conductor and olas to his right, with the cellos him, or he may have the cellos library of music," the late English critic Ernest Newman wrote in the London Times. "Certainly, to anyone who knows Strauss's music to 'Don Quixote,' Cervantes is henceforth inconceivable without it; the story itself, indeed, has not half the humor and the profound sadness which is infused into it by Strauss." In forty minutes of music, Strauss brings the noble and tragic figure of the knight vividly to life. The various instruments, artfully contrasted and blended, speak almost like singers; in fact, "Don Quixote" has been called "an opera without voices." It is an extremely difficult work, demanding virtuoso technique from the individual players and the complete integration of the whole orchestra. Only a great conductor is able to blend the small, colorful pieces into the large tonal mosaic and to bring alive the character of the idealistic eccentric who fights and dies for his lost causes.

After a few bars, I forgot that this was a rehearsal. To me, the term "orchestra rehearsal" had always conjured up a scene of slack playing and casual attitudes, of musicians going reluctantly through the motions, looking bored, chatting, and making life hard for the conductor. But there was nothing casual about this rehearsal. No one looked bored, and there was none of the kidding and horseplay that musicians often inject into a dull rehearsal. The players sat on the edges of their chairs, and they played with a happy intensity that reminded me of a successful performance by a string quartet. Everybody played as though this were an important concert, and the players obviously enjoyed making the music. Later, Szell said to me, "The Cleveland Orchestra plays seven concerts a week and admits the public to the final two. We do some of our best playing during rehearsals."

The first rehearsal I heard in Cleveland must have been one of the great ones, being more finished than some concert performances of "Don Quixote" I have heard. During a few solo passages, Fournier smiled at the men around him, who were supporting him beautifully. At the end of the third variation, after a particularly difficult passage that is played by the solo cello and the concertmaster, Fournier and Druian exchanged a happy glance, and Szell, too, smiled. After the Finale, a moving part that Fournier played with great simplicity, Szell conducted the final bars and held up both hands for several seconds after the last pianissimo chord had died away. Then he put down his baton, applauded, and bowed to Fournier in a gesture of old-fashioned grace. The entire orchestra joined Szell in an ovation for Fournier, who was obviously touched by this tribute from his fellow-artists.

Szell then said that, after an intermission, the players were going to work on certain passages, and asked them "to take the cue from the music." The players nodded. One of them later explained to me, "Taking the cue from the music means that you don't play the phrase mechanically but concentrate on its particular quality and its relation to the musical line, considering the phrase as a part of the musical statement. It means in practice that you play the phrase with special feeling, and that the last note will possibly be a hairbreadth later than anticipated. If the man playing the next phrase didn't listen and take his cue from the music, he might be too early."

A few players had questions for Szell, and three of them came up to him with their parts. Szell explained the problems in a few words; he seemed to know more about each part, and the instrument it was written for, than the player himself. Throughout the rehearsal, there was little discussion of technical matters, because the members of the Cleveland Orchestra are expected to work these out for themselves. Moreover, Szell relies on his section leaders to help all the musicians develop clarity of intonation and homogeneity in phrasing. Yet in rehearsal he listens to every instrumental part and instantly judges whether a man must be reminded of an error or will later correct it for himself. Before a rehearsal, the basic elements of the interpretation have been prepared. The music has been annotated with Szell's interpretive markings. The musicians know the style of the composer and how to re-create it, and they have practiced their parts at home. Thus, the quality of rehearsals in Cleveland is extremely high.

During intermission, I saw Szell in the corridor. He seemed to be in a benevolent mood, and not at all the tyrant he is often made out to be.

"Now you've heard how we make music in Cleveland," he said. " 'Don Quixote' is a challenge. Many orchestra soloists are required to play little snatches and small bits of music, and the whole thing must be put together carefully to get real meaning and continuity. It's not yet what it must be, but this is only Tuesday."

I observed that I had been surprised by the musicians' coöperation during the rehearsal.

"They are fine musicians, and they love to play good music," Szell said. "During our last European tour, the orchestra was split by a serious labor dispute. There were two factions, and there was the possibility of a strike. But when they were playing, all these things were forgotten, and they were happy. That is one secret of this orchestra. The other, as you may have noticed, is that there are no weak spots. All the sections are perfectly balanced."

AFTER the rehearsal, I went to see Druian, the concertmaster. A graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, in Philadelphia, Druian is a noted soloist. From 1949 to 1960, he was concertmaster of the Minneapolis Symphony, and in 1960, when he was in his late thirties, he was hired by Szell. At Severance Hall, the concertmaster enjoys the privilege of a small private study, down the corridor from the conductor's room, and it was there that I found Druian. He was practicing the difficult solo-violin passage in the Introduction of "Don Quixote." He motioned to me to come in, and when he had finished the passage he showed me his violin—the Nightingale Stradivari, which owes its name to its tonal character. Alfred Hill, the great London violin-maker, called it "an admirable specimen." Stradivari made it in 1717, when he was seventy-three—during his Golden Period, from 1711 to 1720. The back of Druian's violin is maple cut on the slab, and the varnish has a lovely reddish color. Druian put the violin in its case, and I asked him about his work as concertmaster.

"In England, the concertmaster is called the leader," he said. "Some of us visibly lead our section, but a concertmaster can never assert leadership without having the support of the men. You must make them do what you want them to do. Also, you must lead them and remain with them at the same time. In some orchestras, the concertmaster visibly and audibly leads the attack, and the section players follow him, but Szell hates that—considers it in poor taste. Unlike the soloist, who is always ahead of the ensemble and may do what he wants—within the limits of taste and style, of course—the concertmaster is bound by the ensemble. If I played my part independently, competent conductor what he wants if he can hold the attention of the whole orchestra all the way to the rear." Brass players, who sit in the rear, have their difficulties with a conductor who speaks poor English or talks softly. "One tries to catch his words, but after a while one loses interest and gives up," a trumpeter says. "Of course, he may hold our attention without saying anything." The best conductors speak with their eyes and their hands.

"It was nice of you to come back for a visit after your enlightenment."

Good orchestra players prefer conductors with a clear

195

are no clarinets in went up to the bal
sensed the rapport fr
suddenly I had a mo
ering exhilaration. I
group, I was part of i

Marcellus is proud
because he is a first-r
sician he willingly sur
artistic personality t
admires. "If I respec
go all the way to d
from me," he said

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing iden-slightly ahead of the first-violin section, I would break up the ensemble. The concertmaster's job is to provide the necessary courage for what the men have to do, but he should never push them. The job is a matter of instinct—almost a sixth sense.

"Some concertmasters act as a buffer between the orchestra and the conductor. I won't do it. Our men are highly skilled professionals. They need no buffer, and they can work out their problems on their own. During a rehearsal—but never during a performance—I may give them some signs. Holding up the bow means 'Play softer.' Or I may turn around and tell them not to rush. The men know they have to play differently, depending on whether the orchestra plays alone or accompanies a soloist during a concerto. While the orchestra plays alone—in the beginning of the Beethoven or Brahms Violin Concerto, for instance—the orchestra performs with its collective musical personality. But the moment the soloist comes in we instinctively get out of his way. A great soloist, in turn, engages in a kind of give-and-take with an accompanying orchestra. He always listens to the orchestra while he is playing his solo part. He knows the passages where the orchestra may have trouble following him, and he is ready to make subtle adjustments. When we play the syncopations in the last movement of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, say, an expert soloist will play with us, not on his own."

The concertmaster's job, Druian went on, differs under different conductors. As a rule, after studying his part carefully, the concertmaster organizes things both for himself and for the conductor; after discussing fingering and bowing problems with the conductor, he marks a master part for the other section leaders and the orchestra's librarian. (For the Cleveland, Szell himself carefully annotated the scores for many years, indicating not only subtle degrees of dynamics and phrasing but also the exact bowings for the strings, and he sometimes delegated the bowings to Druian.) The concertmaster also copes with periodic outbreaks of "malignant anonymitis," a sickness well known in the string sections of most major orchestras. It never affects the woodwinds, the brass, or the percussion players, all of whom play individual parts instead of playing in sections. Every oboist or horn player has an occasional solo passage in a symphony, and such passages give him artistic satisfaction of a kind that a second-violin player on the fourth or fifth stand never experiences. A section player is almost never called upon to play a solo passage; instead, he plays a second-violin passage with fifteen other second-violin players. In the early Haydn and Mozart symphonies, he may have to play whole pages of repeated eighth notes. Anonymitis, a state of despair caused by a permanent lack of professional recognition, is in part the result of ignorance on the part of the audience. Many listeners believe that the players in the rear do not play as well as the ones in front. The contrary is often true. Able conductors like well-balanced string sections, and often put exceptional players in the rear, to support less experienced players. But to be sitting at a front stand gives a player status inside the orchestra, and even in the community. Another name for the violinists' affliction, Druian said, is Heifetz disease. Parents, uncles, and teachers may tell the budding violinist, "Someday you're going to be another Heifetz." Teachers are the worst offenders in this respect, turning a gifted pupil's ambitions to their own ends; the next-best thing to being another Heifetz, after all, is to be the teacher of a Heifetz. A good teacher knows that the number of potential Heifetzes is extremely small, and that many would-be Heifetzes wind up eventually in the second-violin section of a symphony orchestra.

Another problem that Druian had to cope with involved a more specific recognition of status, in the form of a player merit system introduced by Szell. (Some orchestras work on a seniority system.) Under Szell's merit system, everybody has a chance of becoming a first-chair man. A young section player may work hard and audition for the first chair in the second-violin section, say, but if a man from outside also auditions, and plays better, the outsider will get the first chair. Druian then had to console the disappointed player. "Success under such conditions can be a matter of lucky timing, but it is more often a matter of ability," Druian told me. "The man now sitting next to me in the orchestra started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-

esting not so much fo
as for what you can'
"It will help you und
the practical problem
When I told Szell abo
that I sit at the rear
the final rehearsal, he
it was a good idea. Ac minutes before ten on
a chair between Duff
and Emil Sholle, who
a master of the cymba
ber of the percussion
Weiner, was shaking
and trying out the wi
one paid any attention
mosphere was tense
Three trumpeters in f
practicing the difficult
in the Introduction,
together. Duff was t
drums, bending down
left ear close to the dr
didn't seem to be bothe
pets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to h
nalled the oboist for a onds later, Trogdon e
and Szell to the fro
and then went to the
his place among the d
ers. Szell greeted the o
the score of "Don Q
he knows the work by
score in rehearsal to
ence points), and qu
few matters. The o
in silence, and a few
cil markings in their p
for "long, sustained n
reminded the horns "
simo as possible" at No
to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins bars I am caught up in the spirit of the music. Good music always does that to a good musician; only bad music is a bore. But I know good musicians who wouldn't want to play in our orchestra. They wouldn't be temperamentally suited to it. You have to have exceptional artistic discipline to become a successful member of this group. You have to have your own standards and adhere to them—then you have a sense of personal accomplishment. I suppose we are artistic-minded, whereas some orchestras are commercial-minded. I know musicians who tell me, 'It's ridiculous to make so much fuss about a little detail,' but we not only become accustomed to it—we like it. Szell considers the orchestra an extension of himself, and so do we—we seem to react with him. He no longer drills the orchestra; he coördinates it, watches it, and criticizes it. This attitude creates self-discipline and a sense of spontaneity, and it puts you in the right frame of mind to rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the hundredth time. A musician who didn't accept group discipline, and who didn't believe in the virtues of clarity and exactness, would be of no use here. I may be as casual as I like offstage, but I must always be alert when I play. On the other hand, I must never become tense and stiff, because that would ruin my tone quality."

Even a kettledrum player, I learned, modifies his sound to the conductor's wishes. Under Karajan, Duff told me, he found himself unaccountably playing "with less sharpness and with longer lines" than under Szell. There was clarity, but it was "external rather than internal clarity." He explained, "You don't change the level of your exactness, but you do mold yourself in a different way. You adjust yourself to the conductor's spoken or indicated demands, like a painter changing the subtle nuances of a certain color."

ARTHUR H. BENADE, a nuclear physicist and professor of physics at Case Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, writes in "Horns, Strings and Harmony," "I know of one major orchestra in which the French-horn section once had a standing agreement: they would go out and drink champagne after any public performance in which none of them burbled or otherwise missed a note. Sad to say, these men never got their fill of champagne!" The French horn is an incredibly difficult instrument. A slightly conical tube curled around itself and opening into a wide bell, it would be twelve feet long if it were uncoiled. The player, blowing through compressed lips, makes the air inside the tube vibrate, and the vibrations must travel a long way. The speed of vibration of the lips affects the speed of vibration of the air column, thus determining the pitch of the note.

"The brass player 'makes' the note, and his lips can do some very complicated things to the physics of musical brasses, not all of them understood scientifically," writes Benade. The French horn is probably the most unpredictable instrument in the orchestra. Brass players have trouble sustaining a note for a long time. To produce a nasal tone, the player inserts his hand in the bell and blows hard in a way that would ordinarily produce a note a semitone lower. Almost anything can happen with a French horn, and even the most accomplished horn player is unable to explain why. Years ago, the Cleveland Orchestra was performing the Brahms Second Symphony, the first movement of which includes a solo passage for French horn. There was a sudden, terrible silence where the horn passage was supposed to be. Szell calmly continued to beat time, and went on with the symphony. Afterward, Myron Bloom, the orchestra's principal horn player, came to Szell to apologize.

"What happened?" Szell asked.

"I don't know," Bloom said, still shaken. "I just don't know. The instrument wouldn't speak."

"Well, don't get upset about it," Szell said.

Bloom, a native of Cleveland, studied at the Eastman and the Juilliard Schools of Music, and is considered one of the great horn players in the country. But he still cannot explain what went wrong that night. "In my younger years, I would break out in a cold sweat when the horn wouldn't play," he told me. "Now I'm more adjusted to it. To play the horn, one must be in perfect physical and mental condition. It's not merely a matter of lip control or strength of breath. The instrument is so complicated that it takes perfect coördination to master it. A sleepless night, a fight with your wife, slight indigestion, some bad news—any little thing may cause a momentary lack of coördination, and then it happens. To remain in top condition, daily practice is absolutely necessary. On tours, I always worry when I can't practice every day. Physical exercise is important, too. In Cleveland, had an imperious will, and he was able him, so he wont stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews

ices, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

TIME TO CH
FROM MAY
SIX IDENTIC
FOR THE PR
Here's a wonderfu
hand-crafted Stief
plete your service
time you purchase
place setting piec
piece free. The sa
size place settings
sixth is our gift to Stieff's sixteen ele
luxury weight ster
gracious dining. S
for full details . . .
time to get your fr
mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou
ROYAL DYNASTY
LADY CLAIRE
Wyman Part
Baltimore, Maryland

y talk about it
money. When returned from
nal success, the ring of 1957,
es were below
four other ma-
s. Since then,
e to be called
test orchestras,
nably, its play-
to be paid ac-
the minimum
st section play-
hundred and
is now two ty-five, and a
tember is still
n. Some wind
s much as four
and the string
complain that
too large. It's pply and de-
are more vio-
le.
stra is an eco-
nd-raisers for ra are often
much money
is often sold
eek, there are
ans a total of eight tickets
five dollars a
thus takes in
but there are
ers, and the three hundred
ly payroll of
ars. The pay-
teen thousand
office receipts,
and soloists'

ox has gone into the computer business, will their c out punched with those little square holes?"

are no clarinets in
went up to the bal
sensed the rapport fr
suddenly I had a mo
ering exhilaration. I
group, I was part of i

Marcellus is proud
because he is a first-r
sician he willingly sur
artistic personality t
admires. "If I respec
go all the way to d
from me," he said.
summate knowledge
conducts. I know th
of a hundred and orchestra, I could n
picture, even if I
most gifted player a note by note. And hear the integrated
the efforts of the hur ers, it is my job to pl
as I can. Only the c
the whole. He must or sixty-six or a hun and blend them int
good instrumentalist erably after coming I
to sustain a melodic
greater maturity.
that Szell is a terrif
of the old school, b
that he is an artist
Years ago, some of rehearsed the Beet
violin, viola, cello, d
bassoon, and horn.
instrumentalists and sicians, but after two
a sense of impending
us played his own
what we played tog
thoven's music. Szel
about it, because he we'd mind if he att hearsal. He listened
a word. Afterward
things—some specifi
conveyed a sense o
member that Szell a talked together for a played the music on
we were no longer
but a septet. All t
place, and there wa
that we had been una

The orchestra m
do things that go a education, forcing l something he was on lus told me. "You with a famous teac
thinking of the instr
of the future inst
to the ensemble," h
asked by young playe

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which stead of trying to coöperate with us, he became furious. 'What's the matter with you?' he said. 'My beat is perfect.' Everyone roared with laughter. He was done for. There was chaos. Under Szell, integrity and integration have become a musical way of life with us. Many of us were able musicians when we came here but have become finished artists under his guidance. Last season, he asked me whether I wanted to record four Mozart sonatas for violin and piano with him. I told him I would be delighted. Szell is a great pianist, and many of us regret that he doesn't play the piano more often. Nothing more was said about the recording plan, but I heard that during his summer vacation, in Switzerland, Szell had a piano sent up from Zurich to his hotel room in Crans-sur-Sierre, and practiced there. Then, just before we left for the European tour, Szell and I met one morning at the Columbia recording studios. We hardly rehearsed. We just played the four sonatas, one after another, from beginning to end, and that was the recording. Szell listened to the playback and O.K.'d it. He plays Mozart perfectly—with clarity and style and a kind of transparent beauty, and never a wrong idea."

Druian said that although Szell plays none of the instruments in the orchestra, he is thoroughly familiar with the technical problems of each one, and knows what every player can and cannot do. Druian would rather discuss intricate problems of violin playing with Szell than with another violinist. "If I were to discuss the same problem with Szell and with Isaac Stern, I would get different answers," he told me. "To Szell, the violin means one thing, and to Stern another. Although Szell is not a string player, he has an intimate knowledge of bowing technique, and he is more detached and less hidebound than any violinist could be."

"OBOISTS, clarinettists, and bassoonists are entirely dependent upon a short-lived vegetable matter of merciless capriciousness, with which, however, when it behaves, are wrought perhaps the most tender and expressive sounds in all wind music," the British musicologist Anthony Baines wrote in the book "Woodwind Instruments and Their History." Two forms of the "short-lived vegetable matter," better known as reed, are used. Clarinettists and saxophonists play with a single reed; oboists and bassoonists use a double reed. Most symphonic players make in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing identical parts. It was terrible. Here, their own reeds. "I have to make my reeds myself," John Mack, the Cleveland Orchestra's principal oboe, told me. "No one else can make a reed to suit me. Only a reed I make gives me correct pitch and intonation."

The orchestra depends on Mack and his reed for its correct pitch. Through long trial and error, it has been established that the oboe is the most reliable instrument in the orchestra from which to take the pitch, because it is influenced less by climate and temperature than any of the others. Nevertheless, it is the most delicate and complicated of the woodwinds, and oboe players have more trouble with their reeds than other woodwind players have. Reeds are made from a special kind of cane, which grows near the town of Fréjus, in the South of France. The cane is harvested between December and February. Formerly, it used to be stripped and put in storage for about two years, but nowadays it is sometimes sold soon after the harvest, and oboists complain bitterly. Oboists are obsessed by reeds, and spend much of their nights sitting up and making new ones. The oboist first selects a strip of cane, then doubles it over and ties it tightly to a small conical brass tube called the staple. Finally, the fold is cut and the two remaining ends are scraped to the thinness of paper, to provide the vibrating tip. When the tip of the reed is pressed between the player's lips, the edges touch, closing the air passage. Changing lip tension alters the curvature and shape of the reed, and of the puffs of air that the lips generate, to produce varied vibrations. The reed transfers the vibrations to the air inside the instrument. Only a minute stream of air is needed, so the player's lungs must be capable of a constant restraint. Moreover, even a trace of moisture may choke the tiny orifice. The life and the quality of the tone, though, depend on the fineness and elasticity of the reed. A very fine reed gives the oboist flexibility in pitch and the plaintive, bittersweet sound for which the oboe is admired. When Mack plays a lot, a reed may last only two or three days. Reeds are an unending source of anxiety to him, and he always carries a few of them around in a small case.

"A bassoon player needs more time than other reed players to make a reed, but after it's broken in he may be able to use it for weeks and weeks," Mack told me. "I've never used a reed for more than two weeks. The reed gives you not only pitch and intonation but also the quality of your tone and quick-

esting not so much fo
as for what you can'
"It will help you und
the practical problem
When I told Szell abo
that I sit at the rear
the final rehearsal, he
it was a good idea. Ac
minutes before ten on
a chair between Duff
and Emil Sholle, who
a master of the cymba
ber of the percussion
Weiner, was shaking and trying out the w
one paid any attention
mosphere was tense
Three trumpeters in f
practicing the difficult
in the Introduction,
together. Duff was t
drums, bending down
left ear close to the dr
didn't seem to be bothe
pets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to h
nalled the oboist for a onds later, Trogdon e
and Szell to the fro
and then went to the
his place among the d
ers. Szell greeted the
the score of "Don Q
he knows the work by
score in rehearsal to
ence points), and qu
few matters. The o
in silence, and a few
cil markings in their p
for "long, sustained n
reminded the horns "
simo as possible" at No
to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins

bars I am caught up in the spirit of the music. Good music always does that to a good musician; only bad music is a bore. But I know good musicians who wouldn't want to play in our orchestra. They wouldn't be temperamentally suited to it. You have to have exceptional artistic discipline to become a successful member of this group. You have to have your own standards and adhere to them—then you have a sense of personal accomplishment. I suppose we are artistic-minded, whereas some orchestras are commercial-minded. I know musicians who tell me, 'It's ridiculous to make so much fuss about a little detail,' but we not only become accustomed to it—we like it. Szell considers the orchestra an extension of himself, and so do we—we seem to react with him. He no longer drills the orchestra; he coördinates it, watches it, and criticizes it. This attitude creates self-discipline and a sense of spontaneity, and it puts you in the right frame of mind to rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the hundredth time. A musician who didn't accept group discipline, and who didn't believe in the virtues of clarity and exactness, would be of no use here. I may be as casual as I like offstage, but I must always be alert when I play. On the other hand, I must never become tense and stiff, because that would ruin my tone quality."

Even a kettledrum player, I learned, modifies his sound to the conductor's wishes. Under Karajan, Duff told me, he found himself unaccountably playing "with less sharpness and with longer lines" than under Szell. There was clarity, but it was "external rather than internal clarity." He explained, "You don't change the level of your exactness, but you do mold yourself in a different way. You adjust yourself to the conductor's spoken or indicated demands, like a painter changing the subtle nuances of a certain color."

ARTHUR H. BENADE, a nuclear physicist and professor of physics at Case Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, writes in "Horns, Strings and Harmony," "I know of one major orchestra in which the French-horn section once had a standing agreement: they would go out and drink champagne after any public performance in which none of them burbled or otherwise missed a note. Sad to say, these men never got their fill of champagne!" The French horn is an incredibly difficult instrument. A slightly conical tube curled around itself and opening into a wide bell, it would be twelve feet long if it were uncoiled. The player, blowing through compressed lips, makes the air inside the tube vibrate, and the vibrations must travel a long way. The speed of vibration of the lips affects the speed of vibration of the air column, thus determining the pitch of the note.

"The brass player 'makes' the note, and his lips can do some very complicated things to the physics of musical brasses, not all of them understood scientifically," writes Benade. The French horn is probably the most unpredictable instrument in the orchestra. Brass players have trouble sustaining a note for a long time. To produce a nasal tone, the player inserts his hand in the bell and blows hard in a way that would ordinarily produce a note a semitone lower. Almost anything can happen with a French horn, and even the most accomplished horn player is unable to explain why. Years ago, the Cleveland Orchestra was performing the Brahms Second Symphony, the first movement of which includes a solo passage for French horn. There was a sudden, terrible silence where the horn passage was supposed to be. Szell calmly continued to beat time, and went on with the symphony. Afterward, Myron Bloom, the orchestra's principal horn player, came to Szell to apologize.

"What happened?" Szell asked.

"I don't know," Bloom said, still shaken. "I just don't know. The instrument wouldn't speak."

"Well, don't get upset about it," Szell said.

Bloom, a native of Cleveland, studied at the Eastman and the Juilliard Schools of Music, and is considered one of the great horn players in the country. But he still cannot explain what went wrong that night. "In my younger years, I would break out in a cold sweat when the horn wouldn't play," he told me. "Now I'm more adjusted to it. To play the horn, one must be in perfect physical and mental condition. It's not merely a matter of lip control or strength of breath. The instrument is so complicated that it takes perfect coördination to master it. A sleepless night, fight with your wife, slight indigestion, some bad news—any little thing may cause a momentary lack of coördination, and then it happens. To remain in top condition, daily practice is absolutely necessary. On tours, I always worry when I can't practice every day. Physical exercise is important, too. In Cleveland,

TIME TO CH
FROM MAY
SIX IDENTIC
FOR THE PR
Here's a wonderfu
hand-crafted Stief
plete your service
time you purchase
place setting piec
piece free. The sa
size place settings
sixth is our gift to Stieff's sixteen ele
luxury weight ster
gracious dining. S
for full details . . .
time to get your fr
mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou

Wyman Par
Baltimore, Maryland
® Stieff's trademark of Wilma

him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews

Reese Pal

y talk about it
money. When returned from al success, the ring of 1957,
es were below
four other ma-
s. Since then,
e to be called
test orchestras,
nably, its play-
to be paid ac-
the minimum
st section play-
hundred and
is now two ty-five, and a
tember is still
n. Some wind
s much as four
and the string
complain that
too large. It's pply and de-
are more vio-
le.
estra is an eco-
nd-raisers for ra are often
much money
is often sold
eek, there are
ans a total of
eight tickets
five dollars a
thus takes in
but there are yers, and the
three hundred
ly payroll of lars. The pay-
teen thousand
office receipts,
and soloists'
fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

195

tox has gone into the computer business, will their c e out punched with those little square holes?"

are no clarinets in
went up to the bal
sensed the rapport fr
suddenly I had a mo
ering exhilaration. I
group, I was part of i

Marcellus is proud
because he is a first-r
sician he willingly sur
artistic personality t
admires. "If I respec
go all the way to d
from me," he said.
summate knowledge
conducts. I know th
of a hundred and s orchestra, I could ne
picture, even if I most gifted player an note by note. And s hear the integrated the efforts of the hun
ers, it is my job to pla
as I can. Only the c
the whole. He must or sixty-six or a hund and blend them into good instrumentalist erably after coming
to sustain a melodic
greater maturity.
that Szell is a terrif
of the old school, b
that he is an artist
Years ago, some of rehearsed the Beet
violin, viola, cello, d
bassoon, and horn.
instrumentalists and
sicians, but after two
a sense of impending
us played his own
what we played tog
thoven's music. Szel
about it, because he we'd mind if he atte hearsal. He listened
a word. Afterward,
things—some specifi
conveyed a sense o
member that Szell a talked together for a played the music on
we were no longer
but a septet. All t
place, and there was that we had been unable to re-create."

The orchestra musician must often do things that go against his musical education, forcing himself to unlearn something he was once taught, Marcellus told me. "You may have studied with a famous teacher—but he was thinking of the instrument rather than of the future instrumentalist's duty to the ensemble," he said. "I'm often asked by young players what is expected

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which are just about the same all over the world, different models of most of the woodwinds and the brass instruments exist, creating different nuances of sound. American wind players have the chance to listen to all sorts of wind instruments, and can select the ones most responsive to their way of playing. Many of the Cleveland's woodwind players use French instruments, but they play them in a different manner from the French, who produce a slighter and more nasal tone. The Cleveland woodwinds have a mellow, round tone by comparison.

Mack practices a great deal. "I don't practice just the notes I have to play," he said. "The notes are relatively easy. I give a lot of thought to what I want to do with those notes. All of us in this orchestra do. This is the most difficult part of the craft. Years ago, a member of our section joined another famous orchestra in the East. The next time I saw him, he said he was living the life of Riley, because all that mattered was that he should play well during the concerts. It's not that way here. In our section, everybody is constantly trying to do better."

ROBERT MARCELLUS, the Cleveland Orchestra's principal clarinet, is convinced that an orchestra musician can be successful only if he really loves to play in a symphonic ensemble. "Playing in an orchestra is my life," Marcellus told me during my visit to Cleveland. "I suppose there are some people in the string section who failed to become soloists and consider playing in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing identical parts. It was terrible. Here, each of the clarinettists plays a different, solo part. Naturally, we are not true soloists, in the sense that a great violinist or a pianist is. Instead, we have the satisfaction that comes from being part of a fine orchestra and playing the magnificent repertory of symphonic music."

Marcellus, a native of Omaha, began his musical studies on the piano, and took up the clarinet when he was eleven. He joined the Cleveland Orchestra in 1953, when he was twenty-five. "I came to Cleveland with more talent and skill than style or experience," he told me. Szell's habit of holding four or five rehearsals for a concert pleased him from the start, he said, and he went on, "Szell taught me to re-create and sustain a musical line. The orchestra player needs the conductor's impulse. Even when we are happy and well integrated, the impulse from the podium makes all the difference between merely playing the notes and recreating the very spirit of the music. With a superior impulse, we can give a superior performance. All of a sudden, the orchestra doesn't sound just good—it sounds great. Part of it is our own skill, no doubt. Part is the inspiration of the moment, which we're getting from the great conductor. He knows what we can do, he uses our skill, he enables us to sound great. It's often said that orchestra musicians become cold-blooded, cynical, blasé. Not the musicians in this orchestra. Most of us have a total commitment to the music. I remember an evening in Carnegie Hall, during a performance of Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony. There

See the most capable automatic camera in the world at your dealer's, and ask for a demonstration. With f/2.8 lens, less than $250; with ultra-fast f/1.9 lens, less than $300.
Prices subject to change without notice.

The Kodak Instamatic Reflex camera.

Kod

esting not so much fo
as for what you can'
"It will help you und
the practical problem
When I told Szell abo
that I sit at the rear
the final rehearsal, he
it was a good idea. Ac
minutes before ten on
a chair between Duff
and Emil Sholle, who
a master of the cymbal
ber of the percussion
Weiner, was shaking
and trying out the wi
one paid any attention
mosphere was tense
Three trumpeters in f
practicing the difficult
in the Introduction,
together. Duff was t
drums, bending down
left ear close to the dr
didn't seem to be bothe
pets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to h
nalled the oboist for a onds later, Trogdon e
and Szell to the fro
and then went to the
his place among the d
ers. Szell greeted the
the score of "Don Q
he knows the work by
score in rehearsal to ence points), and qui
few matters. The o
in silence, and a few
cil markings in their p
for "long, sustained n
reminded the horns "
simo as possible" at No
to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins bars I am caught up in the spirit of the music. Good music always does that to a good musician; only bad music is a bore. But I know good musicians who wouldn't want to play in our orchestra. They wouldn't be temperamentally suited to it. You have to have exceptional artistic discipline to become a successful member of this group. You have to have your own standards and adhere to them—then you have a sense of personal accomplishment. I suppose we are artistic-minded, whereas some orchestras are commercial-minded. I know musicians who tell me, 'It's ridiculous to make so much fuss about a little detail,' but we not only become accustomed to it—we like it. Szell considers the orchestra an extension of himself, and so do we—we seem to react with him. He no longer drills the orchestra; he coördinates it, watches it, and criticizes it. This attitude creates self-discipline and a sense of spontaneity, and it puts you in the right frame of mind to rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the hundredth time. A musician who didn't accept group discipline, and who didn't believe in the virtues of clarity and exactness, would be of no use here. I may be as casual as I like offstage, but I must always be alert when I play. On the other hand, I must never become tense and stiff, because that would ruin my tone quality."

Even a kettledrum player, I learned, modifies his sound to the conductor's wishes. Under Karajan, Duff told me, he found himself unaccountably playing "with less sharpness and with longer lines" than under Szell. There was clarity, but it was "external rather than internal clarity." He explained, "You don't change the level of your exactness, but you do mold yourself in a different way. You adjust yourself to the conductor's spoken or indicated demands, like a painter changing the subtle nuances of a certain color."

ARTHUR H. BENADE, a nuclear physicist and professor of physics at Case Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, writes in "Horns, Strings and Harmony," "I know of one major orchestra in which the French-horn section once had a standing agreement: they would go out and drink champagne after any public performance in which none of them burbled or otherwise missed a note. Sad to say, these men never got their fill of champagne!" The French horn is an incredibly difficult instrument. A slightly conical tube curled around itself and opening into a wide bell, it would be twelve feet long if it were uncoiled. The player, blowing through compressed lips, makes the air inside the tube vibrate, and the vibrations must travel a long way. The speed of vibration of the lips affects the speed of vibration of the air column, thus determining the pitch of the note.

"The brass player 'makes' the note, and his lips can do some very complicated things to the physics of musical brasses, not all of them understood scientifically," writes Benade. The French horn is probably the most unpredictable instrument in the orchestra. Brass players have trouble sustaining a note for a long time. To produce a nasal tone, the player inserts his hand in the bell and blows hard in a way that would ordinarily produce a note a semitone lower. Almost anything can happen with a French horn, and even the most accomplished horn player is unable to explain why. Years ago, the Cleveland Orchestra was performing the Brahms Second Symphony, the first movement of which includes a solo passage for French horn. There was a sudden, terrible silence where the horn passage was supposed to be. Szell calmly continued to beat time, and went on with the symphony. Afterward, Myron Bloom, the orchestra's principal horn player, came to Szell to apologize.

"What happened?" Szell asked.

"I don't know," Bloom said, still shaken. "I just don't know. The instrument wouldn't speak."

"Well, don't get upset about it," Szell said.

Bloom, a native of Cleveland, studied at the Eastman and the Juilliard Schools of Music, and is considered one of the great horn players in the country. But he still cannot explain what went wrong that night. "In my younger years, I would break out in a cold sweat when the horn wouldn't play," he told me. "Now I'm more adjusted to it. To play the horn, one must be in perfect physical and mental condition. It's not merely a matter of lip control or strength of breath. The instrument is so complicated that it takes perfect coördination to master it. A sleepless night, a fight with your wife, slight indigestion, some bad news—any little thing may cause a momentary lack of coördination, and then it happens. To remain in top condition, daily practice is absolutely necessary. On tours, I always worry when I can't practice every day. Physical exercise is important, too. In Cleveland,

TIME TO CH
FROM MAY
SIX IDENTIC
FOR THE PR

Here's a wonderfu
hand-crafted Stief
plete your service
time you purchase
place setting piec
piece free. The sa
size place settings
sixth is our gift to Stieff's sixteen ele
luxury weight ster
gracious dining. S
for full details . . .
time to get your fr

Wyman Part
Baltimore, Maryland
* Mounted trademark of Wilson

mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou

Reese Pal

him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews

y talk about it
money. When returned from
nal success, the ring of 1957,
es were below
four other ma-
s. Since then,
e to be called
test orchestras,
nably, its play-
to be paid ac-
the minimum
st section play-
hundred and
is now two ty-five, and a
tember is still
n. Some wind
s much as four
and the string
complain that
too large. It's pply and de-
are more vio-
le.
estra is an eco-
nd-raisers for a are often
much money
is often sold
eek, there are
ans a total of
eight tickets
five dollars a
thus takes in
but there are yers, and the
three hundred
kly payroll of
ars. The pay-
teen thousand
office receipts,
and soloists'
fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."
—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

are no clarinets in the score, and I went up to the balcony to listen. I sensed the rapport from the stage, and suddenly I had a moment of overpowering exhilaration. I belonged to this group, I was part of it. I was happy."

Marcellus is proud of his work, but because he is a first-rate orchestra musician he willingly surrenders part of his artistic personality to a conductor he admires. "If I respect a conductor, I'll go all the way to do what he wants from me," he said. "Szell has a consummate knowledge of the music he conducts. I know that I am just one of a hundred and six. Sitting in the orchestra, I could never get the entire picture, even if I were the world's most gifted player and knew the score note by note. And since I can never hear the integrated whole, the sum of the efforts of the hundred and six players, it is my job to play my part as well as I can. Only the conductor can hear the whole. He must be able to hear six or sixty-six or a hundred and six voices and blend them into music. I've seen good instrumentalists improve considerably after coming here. They learned to sustain a melodic line, and showed greater maturity. Everybody knows that Szell is a terrifying authoritarian of the old school, but they also know that he is an artist of terrific ability. Years ago, some of our first-chair men rehearsed the Beethoven septet for violin, viola, cello, double bass, clarinet, bassoon, and horn. All of us were fine instrumentalists and accomplished musicians, but after two rehearsals we had a sense of impending disaster. Each of us played his own part correctly, but what we played together wasn't Beethoven's music. Szell must have heard about it, because he asked us whether we'd mind if he attended our next rehearsal. He listened quietly, never said a word. Afterward, he told us a few things—some specific orientations that conveyed a sense of structure. I remember that Szell and the seven of us talked together for a while, and then we played the music once more. Suddenly we were no longer seven individuals but a septet. All the parts fell into place, and there was the line of music that we had been unable to re-create."

The orchestra musician must often do things that go against his musical education, forcing himself to unlearn something he was once taught, Marcellus told me. "You may have studied with a famous teacher—but he was thinking of the instrument rather than of the future instrumentalist's duty to the ensemble," he said. "I'm often asked by young players what is expected

The 24 hour camera.

Runs automatically on sunlight, moonlight, candlelight, any light you've got.

This is the Kodak Instamatic Reflex camera—for "pictures unlimited, without complications.

It combines the best of everything. Big, bright reflex viewing and focusing. Automatic electronic shutter that times exposures from 1/500 up to 20 seconds. Lens interchange, for wide-angle, telephoto. Flashcube, and electronic flash. Drop-in cartridge loading for color snapshots, color slides, black-and-whites. Everything, in fact, to make picture-taking fast, easy, and sure—any time, anywhere.

See the most capable automatic camera in the world at your dealer's, and ask for a demonstration. With f/2.8 lens, less than $250; with ultra-fast f/1.9 lens, less than $300.

Prices subject to change without notice.

The Kodak Instamatic® Reflex camera.

Kod

ox has gone into the computer business, will their c
e out punched with those little square holes?"

esting not so much fo
as for what you can'
"It will help you und
the practical problem
When I told Szell abo
that I sit at the rear
the final rehearsal, he
it was a good idea. Ac
minutes before ten on
a chair between Duff
and Emil Sholle, who
a master of the cymbal
ber of the percussion
Weiner, was shaking
and trying out the wi
one paid any attention
mosphere was tense
Three trumpeters in f
practicing the difficult
in the Introduction,
together. Duff was t
drums, bending down
left ear close to the dr
didn't seem to be bothe
pets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to h
nalled the oboist for a onds later, Trogdon e
and Szell to the fro
and then went to the
his place among the d
ers. Szell greeted the o
the score of "Don Q
he knows the work by
score in rehearsal to
ence points), and qui
few matters. The o
in silence, and a few
cil markings in their p
for "long, sustained n
reminded the horns "
simo as possible" at No
to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins bars I am caught up in the spirit of the music. Good music always does that to a good musician; only bad music is a bore. But I know good musicians who wouldn't want to play in our orchestra. They wouldn't be temperamentally suited to it. You have to have exceptional artistic discipline to become a successful member of this group. You have to have your own standards and adhere to them—then you have a sense of personal accomplishment. I suppose we are artistic-minded, whereas some orchestras are commercial-minded. I know musicians who tell me, 'It's ridiculous to make so much fuss about a little detail,' but we not only become accustomed to it—we like it. Szell considers the orchestra an extension of himself, and so do we—we seem to react with him. He no longer drills the orchestra; he coördinates it, watches it, and criticizes it. This attitude creates self-discipline and a sense of spontaneity, and it puts you in the right frame of mind to rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the hundredth time. A musician who didn't accept group discipline, and who didn't believe in the virtues of clarity and exactness, would be of no use here. I may be as casual as I like offstage, but I must always be alert when I play. On the other hand, I must never become tense and stiff, because that would ruin my tone quality."

Even a kettledrum player, I learned, modifies his sound to the conductor's wishes. Under Karajan, Duff told me, he found himself unaccountably playing "with less sharpness and with longer lines" than under Szell. There was clarity, but it was "external rather than internal clarity." He explained, "You don't change the level of your exactness, but you do mold yourself in a different way. You adjust yourself to the conductor's spoken or indicated demands, like a painter changing the subtle nuances of a certain color."

ARTHUR H. BENADE, a nuclear physicist and professor of physics at Case Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, writes in "Horns, Strings and Harmony," "I know of one major orchestra in which the French-horn section once had a standing agreement: they would go out and drink champagne after any public performance in which none of them burbled or otherwise missed a note. Sad to say, these men never got their fill of champagne!" The French horn is an incredibly difficult instrument. A slightly conical tube curled around itself and opening into a wide bell, it would be twelve feet long if it were uncoiled. The player, blowing through compressed lips, makes the air inside the tube vibrate, and the vibrations must travel a long way. The speed of vibration of the lips affects the speed of vibration of the air column, thus determining the pitch of the note.

"The brass player 'makes' the note, and his lips can do some very complicated things to the physics of musical brasses, not all of them understood scientifically," writes Benade. The French horn is probably the most unpredictable instrument in the orchestra. Brass players have trouble sustaining a note for a long time. To produce a nasal tone, the player inserts his hand in the bell and blows hard in a way that would ordinarily produce a note a semitone lower. Almost anything can happen with a French horn, and even the most accomplished horn player is unable to explain why. Years ago, the Cleveland Orchestra was performing the Brahms Second Symphony, the first movement of which includes a solo passage for French horn. There was a sudden, terrible silence where the horn passage was supposed to be. Szell calmly continued to beat time, and went on with the symphony. Afterward, Myron Bloom, the orchestra's principal horn player, came to Szell to apologize.

"What happened?" Szell asked.

"I don't know," Bloom said, still shaken. "I just don't know. The instrument wouldn't speak."

"Well, don't get upset about it," Szell said.

Bloom, a native of Cleveland, studied at the Eastman and the Juilliard Schools of Music, and is considered one of the great horn players in the country. But he still cannot explain what went wrong that night. "In my younger years, I would break out in a cold sweat when the horn wouldn't play," he told me. "Now I'm more adjusted to it. To play the horn, one must be in perfect physical and mental condition. It's not merely a matter of lip control or strength of breath. The instrument is so complicated that it takes perfect coördination to master it. A sleepless night, a fight with your wife, slight indigestion, some bad news—any little thing may cause a momentary lack of coördination, and then it happens. To remain in top condition, daily practice is absolutely necessary. On tours, I always worry when I can't practice every day. Physical exercise is important, too. In Cleveland, had an imperious will, and he was able him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

Reese Pal

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews

TIME TO CH
FROM MAY
SIX IDENTIC
FOR THE PR

Here's a wonderfu
hand-crafted Stief
plete your service
time you purchase
place setting piec
piece free. The sa
size place setting
sixth is our gift to Stieff's sixteen ele
luxury weight ster
gracious dining. S
for full details . . .
time to get your fr

Wyman Part
Baltimore, Maryland
* Identifies trademark of Wilson

mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou

ey talk about it

money. When returned from
nal success, the pring of 1957,
es were below
four other ma-
s. Since then,
e to be called
test orchestras,
nably, its play-
to be paid ac-
the minimum
st section play-
hundred and
is now two ty-five, and a
tember is still
n. Some wind
s much as four
and the string
complain that
too large. It's pply and de-
are more vio-
le.
estra is an eco-
nd-raisers for ra are often
much money
is often sold
eek, there are
ans a total of
eight tickets
five dollars a
thus takes in
but there are yers, and the
three hundred
kly payroll of lars. The pay-
teen thousand
office receipts,
and soloists'
ices, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

ox has gone into the computer business, will their c
e out punched with those little square holes?"

a member of the Cleveland Orches-
. First, he must have technical skill—taken for granted that he'll know instrument. Second, he must rend both to the music and to the conctor. And, third, he must be able to en—not only to the orchestra and himself but also to the line of the usic." Marcellus nodded thoughtful-and added, "I think that's what we so well here—listen."

ZELL has said that the most sensitive ensemble playing comes when hundred and six men are playing, ch of them listening, so far as is ssible, to the hundred and five others, d trying to make music together the y a string quartet does." Few mem-rs of the Cleveland Orchestra listen intently to the hundred and five her voices as does Cloyd Duff, a tall, thletic Ohioan who studied at the urtis Institute of Music and has been the orchestra's timpani player since 1942. Duff is the principal of the percussion section, which consists of five men, playing various drums, the cymbals, the triangle, the glockenspiel, the castanets, and other instruments. In "Don Quixote," one man plays the tambourine. In the seventh variation, when the knight and Sancho Panza believe themselves to be flying through the air, another plays the wind machine—a cloth-covered cylinder turned by a handle. The cloth is in contact with wooden slats, and as the handle is turned faster the pitch of the wind-like noise rises and the volume increases. Gershwin's "An American in Paris" calls for two automobile horns, and Erik Satie's "Parade" for a typewriter.

It may seem that life is never dull for the percussion players, but, because composers use them sparingly, they must listen and count silently for longer stretches of time than the other members of the orchestra. Duff handles three kettledrums of different sizes, he largest of which gives the lowest notes. He tunes his kettledrums whenever the whole orchestra is playing fortissimo, and at the same time he keeps counting. Counting has become second nature to him, he told me.
He counts subconsciously. He counts ven when he is listening to an orches-ra on the radio or on records at home.
When he is playing, he does not rely on e conductor's cue but uses it merely a double check. Even in a symphony hat gives him little to do, he does not lax and just listen to the other sections. Instead, he counts relentlessly.
"Nothing must distract my alertness," he said. "As long as I let my reflexes do the counting, I feel safe."

The timpani—which produce notes, whereas many other percussion instruments produce sounds of indefinite pitch—are said to have originated in Arabia; in any event, they have been standard orchestra instruments since the beginning of the eighteenth century. Bach and Handel and their successors used two timpani, tuned to the tonic and the dominant. Octave tuning for the timpani was probably invented by Beethoven in his last two symphonies; in the Ninth Symphony, the timpani player becomes a soloist.

Duff told me he had always wanted to play the timpani. He took up the drum at the age of six, and has never stopped playing it. "You have to be an extrovert and a man of some courage to play the timpani," he said. "You also need perfect pitch, a strong sense of rhythm, and good muscular coordination." Duff sits on a small platform in the rear of the orchestra, from which he can see everybody around him. He always sits on the edge of his chair, even if he doesn't have to play for the next hundred bars.

"When you think you know the music so well that you can afford to sit back and relax and wait for your cue, you are in trouble," he said. "Under Szell, I've learned to think of a rest as a special kind of silent sound. Our orchestra is trained to react very fast and with great precision. We are not given as much leeway as other orchestras. We don't go in for long, sweeping notes.
The Cleveland Orchestra is known for clarity, precision, and inner voicing, because that's the way Szell wants the music performed. Few conductors take such trouble today. Many are satisfied to perform the score and miss the deeper meaning behind the notes. I'm sure that if we were to play without a conductor, we would play in the style in which Szell trained us for over twenty years. Here, everybody instinctiely seeks out the music behind the notes.
This way of playing is ingrained in our orchestra."

In the Cleveland Orchestra, the musicians often rehearse the standard works of the repertory—works they have played for many years and could almost play by heart. "When we rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, my initial reaction is 'Oh gosh, again!'" Duff told me. "But after the first few wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the wood-winds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins bars I am caught up in the spirit of the music. Good music always does that to a good musician; only bad music is a bore. But I know good musicians who wouldn't want to play in our orchestra.

They wouldn't be temperamentally suited to it. You have to have exceptional artistic discipline to become a successful member of this group. You have to have your own standards and adhere hen you have a sense of perplishment. I suppose we are ded, whereas some orchesmmercial-minded. I know who tell me, 'It's ri-make so much fuss
e detail,' but we not e accustomed to it—
Szell considers the n extension of him-
do we—we seem to
him. He no longer drills the he coördinates it, watches it, es it. This attitude creates e and a sense of spontaneits you in the right frame of ehearse Beethoven's Fifth for the hundredth time. A ho didn't accept group dis-who didn't believe in the larity and exactness, would here. I may be as casual as age, but I must always be
I play. On the other hand, er become tense and stiff,
at would ruin my tone

ettledrum player, I learned, sound to the conductor's
der Karajan, Duff told me, mself unaccountably playing sharpness and with longer under Szell. There was it was "external rather than rity." He explained, "You ge the level of your exact-u do mold yourself in a dif-
You adjust yourself to the spoken or indicated dea painter changing the sub-of a certain color."

H. BENADE, a nuclear cist and professor of physics stern Reserve University, in writes in "Horns, Strings ny," "I know of one major n which the French-horn had a standing agreement:
go out and drink cham-any public performance in of them burbled or other-a note. Sad to say, these got their fill of chamhe French horn is an inficult instrument. A slightly e curled around itself and will, and he was able opening into a wide bell, it would be twelve feet long if it were uncoiled.

The player, blowing through compressed lips, makes the air inside the tube vibrate, and the vibrations must travel a long way. The speed of vibration of the lips affects the speed of vibration of the air column, thus determining the pitch of the note.

"The brass player 'makes' the note, and his lips can do some very complicated things to the physics of musical brasses, not all of them understood scientifically," writes Benade. The French horn is probably the most unpredictable instrument in the orchestra. Brass players have trouble sustaining a note for a long time. To produce a nasal tone, the player inserts his hand in the bell and blows hard in a way that would ordinarily produce a note a semitone lower. Almost anything can happen with a French horn, and even the most accomplished horn player is unable to explain why. Years ago, the Cleveland Orchestra was performing the Brahms
Second Symphony, the first movement of which includes a solo passage for French horn. There was a sudden, terrible silence where the horn passage was supposed to be. Szell calmly continued to beat time, and went on with the symphony. Afterward, Myron Bloom, the orchestra's principal horn player,
came to Szell to apologize.

"What happened?" Szell asked.

"I don't know," Bloom said, still shaken. "I just don't know. The instrument wouldn't speak."

"Well, don't get upset about it,"
Szell said.

Bloom, a native of Cleveland, studied at the Eastman and the Juilliard Schools of Music, and is considered one of the great horn players in the country. But he still cannot explain what went wrong that night. "In my younger years, I would break out in a cold sweat when the horn wouldn't play," he told me. "Now I'm more adjusted to it. To play the horn, one must be in perfect physical and mental condition. It's not merely a matter of lip control or strength of breath. The instrument is so complicated that it takes perfect coördination to master
it. A sleepless night, a fight with your wife, slight indigestion, some bad news—any little thing may cause a momentary lack of coördination, and then it happens. To remain in top condition, daily practice is absolutely necessary. On tours, I always worry when I can't practice every day. Physical exercise is important, too. In Cleveland,

TIME TO CH
FROM MAY
SIX IDENTIC
FOR THE PR
Here's a wonderfu
hand-crafted Stief
plete your service
time you purchase
place setting piec
piece free. The sa
size place setting
sixth is our gift to Stieff's sixteen ele
luxury weight ster
gracious dining. S
for full details . . .
time to get your fr
mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews

y talk about it
money. When
returned from al success, the ring of 1957,
es were below
four other ma-
s. Since then,
e to be called
test orchestras,
nably, its play-
to be paid ac-
the minimum
st section play-
hundred and
is now two ty-five, and a
tember is still
n. Some wind
s much as four
and the string
complain that
too large. It's pply and de-
are more vio-
le.
stra is an eco-
nd-raisers for ra are often
much money
is often sold
eek, there are
ans a total of
eight tickets
five dollars a
thus takes in
but there are yers, and the
three hundred
kly payroll of lars. The pay-
teen thousand
office receipts,
and soloists'
fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says
A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

195

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing identical parts. It was terrible. Here

are no clarinets in
went up to the ba sensed the rapport f
suddenly I had a m
ering exhilaration.
group, I was part of

Marcellus is prou
because he is a first-
sician he willingly su
artistic personality t
admires. "If I respe
go all the way to
from me," he said

slightly ahead of the first-violin section, I would break up the ensemble. The concertmaster's job is to provide the necessary courage for what the men have to do, but he should never push them. The job is a matter of instinct—almost a sixth sense.

"Some concertmasters act as a buffer between the orchestra and the conductor. I won't do it. Our men are highly skilled professionals. They need no buffer, and they can work out their problems on their own. During a rehearsal—but never during a performance—I may give them some signs. Holding up the bow means 'Play softer.' Or I may turn around and tell them not to rush. The men know they have to play differently, depending on whether the orchestra plays alone or accompanies a soloist during a concerto. While the orchestra plays alone—in the beginning of the Beethoven or Brahms Violin Concerto, for instance—the orchestra performs with its collective musical personality. But the moment the soloist comes in we instinctively get out of his way. A great soloist, in turn, engages in a kind of give-and-take with an accompanying orchestra. He always listens to the orchestra while he is playing his solo part. He knows the passages where the orchestra may have trouble following him, and he is ready to make subtle adjustments. When we play the syncopations in the last movement of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, say, an expert soloist will play with us, not on his own."

The concertmaster's job, Druian went on, differs under different conductors. As a rule, after studying his part carefully, the concertmaster organizes things both for himself and for the conductor; after discussing fingering and bowing problems with the conductor, he marks a master part for the other section leaders and the orchestra's librarian. (For the Cleveland, Szell himself carefully annotated the scores for many years, indicating not only subtle degrees of dynamics and phrasing but also the exact bowings for the strings, and he sometimes delegated the bowings to Druian.) The concertmaster also copes with periodic outbreaks of "malignant anonymitis," a sickness well known in the string sections of most major orchestras. It never affects the woodwinds, the brass, or the percussion players, all of whom play individual parts instead of playing in sections. Every oboist or horn player has an occasional solo passage in a symphony, and such passages give him artistic satisfaction of a kind that a second-violin player on the fourth or fifth stand never experiences. A section player is almost never called upon to play a solo passage; instead, he plays a second-violin passage with fifteen other second-violin players. In the early Haydn and Mozart symphonies, he may have to play whole pages of repeated eighth notes. Anonymitis, a state of despair caused by a permanent lack of professional recognition, is in part the result of ignorance on the part of the audience. Many listeners believe that the players in the rear do not play as well as the ones in front. The contrary is often true. Able conductors like well-balanced string sections, and often put exceptional players in the rear, to support less experienced players. But to be sitting at a front stand gives a player status inside the orchestra, and even in the community. Another name for the violinists' affliction, Druian said, is Heifetz disease. Parents, uncles, and teachers may tell the budding violinist, "Someday you're going to be another Heifetz." Teachers are the worst offenders in this respect, turning a gifted pupil's ambitions to their own ends; the next-best thing to being another Heifetz, after all, is to be the teacher of a Heifetz. A good teacher knows that the number of potential Heifetzes is extremely small, and that many would-be Heifetzes wind up eventually in the second-violin section of a symphony orchestra.

Another problem that Druian had to cope with involved a more specific recognition of status, in the form of a player merit system introduced by Szell. (Some orchestras work on a seniority system.) Under Szell's merit system, everybody has a chance of becoming a first-chair man. A young section player may work hard and audition for the first chair in the second-violin section, say, but if a man from outside also auditions, and plays better, the outsider will get the first chair. Druian then had to console the disappointed player. "Success under such conditions can be a matter of lucky timing, but it is more often a matter of ability," Druian told me. "The man now sitting next to me in the orchestra started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-

esting not so much fo
as for what you can'
"It will help you und
the practical problem
When I told Szell abo
that I sit at the rear
the final rehearsal, he
it was a good idea. Ac
minutes before ten on a chair between Duf
and Emil Sholle, who
a master of the cymba
ber of the percussion
Weiner, was shaking
and trying out the wi
one paid any attention
mosphere was tense
Three trumpeters in f
practicing the difficult
in the Introduction,
together. Duff was t
drums, bending down left ear close to the d
didn't seem to be bothe
pets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to h
nalled the oboist for a onds later, Trogdon e
and Szell to the fro
and then went to the
his place among the d
ers. Szell greeted the d
the score of "Don Q
he knows the work by
score in rehearsal to
ence points), and qu
few matters. The o
in silence, and a few
cil markings in their p
for "long, sustained n
reminded the horns "
simo as possible" at No
to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins bars I am caught up in the spirit of the music. Good music always does that to a good musician; only bad music is a bore. But I know good musicians who wouldn't want to play in our orchestra. They wouldn't be temperamentally suited to it. You have to have exceptional artistic discipline to become a successful member of this group. You have to have your own standards and adhere to them—then you have a sense of personal accomplishment. I suppose we are artistic-minded, whereas some orchestras are commercial-minded. I know musicians who tell me, 'It's ridiculous to make so much fuss about a little detail,' but we not only become accustomed to it—we like it. Szell considers the orchestra an extension of himself, and so do we—we seem to react with him. He no longer drills the orchestra; he coördinates it, watches it, and criticizes it. This attitude creates self-discipline and a sense of spontaneity, and it puts you in the right frame of mind to rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the hundredth time. A musician who didn't accept group discipline, and who didn't believe in the virtues of clarity and exactness, would be of no use here. I may be as casual as I like offstage, but I must always be alert when I play. On the other hand, I must never become tense and stiff, because that would ruin my tone quality."

Even a kettledrum player, I learned, modifies his sound to the conductor's wishes. Under Karajan, Duff told me, he found himself unaccountably playing "with less sharpness and with longer lines" than under Szell. There was clarity, but it was "external rather than internal clarity." He explained, "You don't change the level of your exactness, but you do mold yourself in a different way. You adjust yourself to the conductor's spoken or indicated demands, like a painter changing the subtle nuances of a certain color."

ARTHUR H. BENADE, a nuclear physicist and professor of physics at Case Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, writes in "Horns, Strings and Harmony," "I know of one major orchestra in which the French-horn section once had a standing agreement: they would go out and drink champagne after any public performance in which none of them burbled or otherwise missed a note. Sad to say, these men never got their fill of champagne!" The French horn is an incredibly difficult instrument. A slightly conical tube curled around itself and opening into a wide bell, it would be twelve feet long if it were uncoiled. The player, blowing through compressed lips, makes the air inside the tube vibrate, and the vibrations must travel a long way. The speed of vibration of the lips affects the speed of vibration of the air column, thus determining the pitch of the note.

"The brass player 'makes' the note, and his lips can do some very complicated things to the physics of musical brasses, not all of them understood scientifically," writes Benade. The French horn is probably the most unpredictable instrument in the orchestra. Brass players have trouble sustaining a note for a long time. To produce a nasal tone, the player inserts his hand in the bell and blows hard in a way that would ordinarily produce a note a semitone lower. Almost anything can happen with a French horn, and even the most accomplished horn player is unable to explain why. Years ago, the Cleveland Orchestra was performing the Brahms Second Symphony, the first movement of which includes a solo passage for French horn. There was a sudden, terrible silence where the horn passage was supposed to be. Szell calmly continued to beat time, and went on with the symphony. Afterward, Myron Bloom, the orchestra's principal horn player, came to Szell to apologize.

"What happened?" Szell asked.

"I don't know," Bloom said, still shaken. "I just don't know. The instrument wouldn't speak."

"Well, don't get upset about it," Szell said.

Bloom, a native of Cleveland, studied at the Eastman and the Juilliard Schools of Music, and is considered one of the great horn players in the country. But he still cannot explain what went wrong that night. "In my younger years, I would break out in a cold sweat when the horn wouldn't play," he told me. "Now I'm more adjusted to it. To play the horn, one must be in perfect physical and mental condition. It's not merely a matter of lip control or strength of breath. The instrument is so complicated that it takes perfect coördination to master it. A sleepless night, a fight with your wife, slight indigestion, some bad news—any little thing may cause a momentary lack of coördination, and then it happens. To remain in top condition, daily practice is absolutely necessary. On tours, I always worry when I can't practice every day. Physical exercise is important, too. In Cleveland, him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

TIME TO CH
FROM MAY
SIX IDENTIC
FOR THE PR
Here's a wonderfu
hand-crafted Stief
plete your service
time you purchase
place setting piec
piece free. The sa
size place settings
sixth is our gift to Stieff's sixteen ele
luxury weight ster
gracious dining. S
for full details . . .
time to get your fr

y talk about it
money. When
returned from
nal success, the
pring of 1957,
es were below
four other ma-
s. Since then,
e to be called
test orchestras,
nably, its play-
to be paid ac-
the minimum
st section play-
hundred and
is now two ty-five, and a
tember is still
n. Some wind
s much as four
and the string
complain that
too large. It's pply and de-
are more vio-
le.
stra is an eco-
nd-raisers for ra are often
much money
is often sold
eek, there are
ans a total of
eight tickets
five dollars a
thus takes in
but there are yers, and the
three hundred
kly payroll of lars. The pay-
teen thousand
office receipts,
and soloists'

mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou

a cathedral out of pebbles."
—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

sponse, and the ability to pass m low to high notes. The you go, the better your reed And the oboe presents other Because the bore of the oboe ittle more than an eighth of an e top, the instrument responds s of altitude. The air at high- es, being less dense, vibrates d it makes the reed heavier. ast European tour, we played rg and in Lucerne, both of fourteen hundred feet, and vent to Edinburgh, which is evel, and there I broke three ccession. You've heard 'You don't have to o play the oboe, but it tually, there is some- t. Originally, the oboe tdoor instrument, and portant to play it loud, g it so loud caused the o mad."

n of a kind that a second- ver on the fourth or fifth stand periences. A section player is ever called upon to play a solo instead, he plays a second-vio- ge with fifteen other second- yers. In the early Haydn and symphonies, he may have to ple pages of repeated eighth nonymitis, a state of despair a permanent lack of profes- cognition, is in part the result nce on the part of the audi- any listeners believe that the the rear do not play as well nes in front. The contrary is e. Able conductors like well- string sections, and often put al players in the rear, to sup- experienced players. But to be a front stand gives a player side the orchestra, and even in munity. Another name for the affliction, Druian said, is Hei- se. Parents, uncles, and teach- tell the budding violinist, y you're going to be another Teachers are the worst of- n this respect, turning a gifted mbitions to their own ends; t-best thing to being another after all, is to be the teacher ifetz. A good teacher knows number of potential Heifetzes nely small, and that many e Heifetzes wind up eventually econd-violin section of a sym- rchestra.

her problem that Druian had with involved a more specific ion of status, in the form of merit system introduced by Some orchestras work on a system.) Under Szell's merit everybody has a chance of g a first-chair man. A young layer may work hard and au- r the first chair in the second- ction, say, but if a man from lso auditions, and plays better, sider will get the first chair. then had to console the dis- d player. "Success under such s can be a matter of lucky ut it is more often a matter of Druian told me. "The man ing next to me in the orchestra in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing identical parts. It was terrible. Here started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-esting not so much fo as for what you can't "It will help you und the practical problem When I told Szell abo that I sit at the rear the final rehearsal, he it was a good idea. Ac minutes before ten on a chair between Duf and Emil Sholle, who a master of the cymbal ber of the percussion Weiner, was shaking and trying out the wi one paid any attention mosphere was tense Three trumpeters in f practicing the difficult in the Introduction, together. Duff was t drums, bending down left ear close to the dr didn't seem to be bothe pets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to h nalled the oboist for a onds later, Trogdon e and Szell to the fro and then went to the f his place among the d ers. Szell greeted the o the score of "Don Q he knows the work by score in rehearsal to ence points), and qui few matters. The o in silence, and a few cil markings in their p for "long, sustained n reminded the horns " simo as possible" at No to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins comes in, by what seems a miracle of simultaneity, with its ta-ta-ta-tah? Exactly when does it come in? Under the late Wilhelm Furtwängler, a great musician with an erratic beat, members of the Berlin Philharmonic used to say, "We come in when the conductor's downbeat reaches the second button of his white vest." Whatever the truth of that, the players all came in beautifully, at the same instant. The conductor must indicate the exact tempo with his preliminary upbeat. "It is a general rule that the conductor gives one extra beat, strictly in tempo, before the music actually begins. . . . It is equivalent to lifting the bow in the string instruments and to taking a breath in the winds," the conductor Max Rudolf writes in his book "The Grammar of Conducting."

Not all orchestras react to the conductor in the same way. In fact, each orchestra has its own method of attack. Some orchestras play during the downbeat or near its end. The Cleveland Orchestra comes in "a tiny little bit after the beat," Szell says. The Berlin Philharmonic is rather late, coming in only after the downbeat. The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky was known for its late attack. Koussevitzky would shake his arm at them, and nobody would play. Some people claimed that at a mysterious moment Richard Bourgin, the concertmaster, would give an almost imperceptible nod and they would all come in at the same moment. But one must not underestimate Koussevitzky's contribution. Lane, the Cleveland Orchestra's associate conductor, remembers attending the rehearsal of a student orchestra in Tanglewood under a poor conductor which Koussevitzky also attended. The conductor tried to get the players started on the first movement of Beethoven's Second Symphony, which begins with a thirty-second note followed by a longer note that is sustained at the discretion of the conductor—a situation in which it is impossible to indicate the tempo by an upbeat. The conductor made a half-hearted sign with his baton, and no one understood it. The players came in at different times, and there was confusion. The conductor, flushing, tried again, and the confusion only grew worse. He just couldn't get the orchestra started. Then Koussevitzky said, shaking his head, "What's the matter with you? It's so simple." He stepped up in front of the orchestra, lifted his arms, and let them fall in a powerful gesture, and the players all came in with absolute precision. "He had an imperious will, and he was able

Reese Pal

M

Here's the most elegant steel tape r
Gleaming chrome, upholstered in bla loaded 10' rule. Not just feet and and centimeters too. Hairline read useful! It's a square. It's a level, w gauge. Retractable point to scribe
If you have a special man, this is his

By mail and phone - Please add tax and 50

House of W
assorted east side a 884 Madison at 72nd—1053
Trafalgar 9-8090

I. MAG
CALIFORNIA • PORTLAND •
mail orders (add 55¢ shipping) to 135 Stockton Street, San Francisco or 3240 Wilshire Bou

I go to the Y.M.C.A. four times a week for a workout."

"The brass in general, by nature laggard, come in with as much precision as the woodwinds," Paul Henry Láng, the noted musicologist, wrote about the Cleveland Orchestra. Szell has molded the brass section into a miracle of homogeneity. "When I joined the orchestra, I didn't think that fourteen members of the brass section could be trained to breathe collectively, but I've since learned that with discipline it can be done," says Martin Morris, one of the orchestra's five French-horn players.

Szell calls his brass section's skill "the result of relentless admonition and intolerance of any imprecision." The French-horn players play American instruments of the same type, they use the same type of mouthpiece, and they have had similar training. By playing with each other and listening to each other, they have come to have the chamber-music approach of the strings and the woodwinds. They know instinctively how to lift a note and attack the next phrase.

Unlike the trombone and the trumpet, which are quite alike in tone color, the French horn at its best has an "unbrassy" sound, and therefore sometimes joins the woodwinds in quintets. The modern French horn, with valves, was introduced only around the middle of the nineteenth century; before that the horn could produce only the notes of the harmonic series. The horn player uses a mouthpiece that is narrow and deep. Unlike a trumpet player, whose instrument has a wide, shallow mouthpiece that produces an incisive tone and makes the player feel reasonably sure of hitting the desired harmonic, the horn player can never be sure. But if his professional life is always tense, he has the satisfaction of playing the instrument with the most expressive solo voice in the orchestra and the most romantic of all brass instruments. "A horn player's professional life is shorter than a violinist's," I was told by Morris, who played the violin before he took up the French horn. "With some luck, a string player may work beyond the retirement age of sixty, but a brass player suffers from nervous tension, high blood pressure, overexertion, lack of breath control, and trouble with his lips and teeth. If I lose my teeth, I could go back to playing the violin in a section, but I would certainly miss the chance of playing on my own."

The Cleveland's brass players are sometimes astonished by their own performance. "During a concert, you are often preoccupied with details and have no time to notice how the whole thing sounds," Morris said. "But afterward, when you hear the recording or the playback of a broadcast, you wonder how it was possible to do it together so well, and you're filled with a tremendous sense of satisfaction. At such moments, you don't mind the ordeals ahead of you. I believe that that satisfaction is the main reason we love to play together. Many of us would very likely play together even if we got almost no money for it. There is an exhilaration that comes when you sit in a fine concert hall, anywhere on earth, and fill it with magnificent music. That's the bonus of playing with a great orchestra."

ALL orchestral markings are merely indications, and give the players a great deal of leeway. ("Composers write intentions and sometimes pious hopes rather than executions," Szell says.) Exactly how loud is forte, how soft is piano, and what is the difference between mezzo forte and mezzo piano? When a composer indicates rubato, which allows the player additional freedom of expression, where does freedom degenerate into distortion? In the eighteenth and the early nineteenth centuries, composers didn't write elaborate directions in their scores, because they were close to the musicians and could always tell them how they wanted their music played. A musician playing under Haydn, Mozart, or Beethoven and not sure how a certain nuance was expected to sound had only to ask the composer. Wagner started a new trend when he wrote in his scores not the desired effect but the manner of playing required from the player, and Mahler and Strauss put exact markings in their scores. Yet Strauss also wrote in the score of "Don Quixote" such instructions as "Even faster" and "With knightly gallantry" and "Slowing down toward the end," thereby creating problems of taste and musicality that weigh heavily on the conductor's artistic conscience. Every musician knows that metronomic markings are of limited use. The free flow of the musical line cannot be controlled by a mechanical device. It's up to the conductor to secure the all-important nuances.

Exactly what happens at the beginning of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, when the conductor gives his preparatory beat and the entire orchestra

him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

onse, and the ability to pass low to high notes. The you go, the better your reed And the oboe presents other Because the bore of the oboe le more than an eighth of an top, the instrument responds of altitude. The air at high-s, being less dense, vibrates it makes the reed heavier. t European tour, we played and in Lucerne, both of fourteen hundred feet, and ent to Edinburgh, which is el, and there I broke three cession. You've heard 'You don't have to play the oboe, but it ually, there is some- Originally, the oboe door instrument, and rtant to play it loud, it so loud caused the mad."

of a kind that a second-r on the fourth or fifth stand eriences. A section player is er called upon to play a solo nstead, he plays a second-vio- with fifteen other second-ers. In the early Haydn and mphonies, he may have to e pages of repeated eighth onymitis, a state of despair a permanent lack of profes-gnition, is in part the result nce on the part of the audi-ny listeners believe that the the rear do not play as well s in front. The contrary is . Able conductors like well-string sections, and often put l players in the rear, to sup-xperienced players. But to be a front stand gives a player de the orchestra, and even in unity. Another name for the affliction, Druian said, is Hei-se. Parents, uncles, and teach-tell the budding violinist, you're going to be another Teachers are the worst of-this respect, turning a gifted nbitions to their own ends; best thing to being another after all, is to be the teacher fetz. A good teacher knows number of potential Heifetzes ely small, and that many Heifetzes wind up eventually cond-violin section of a sym-chestra.

r problem that Druian had with involved a more specific n of status, in the form of merit system introduced by Some orchestras work on a system.) Under Szell's merit everybody has a chance of a first-chair man. A young layer may work hard and au-the first chair in the second-tion, say, but if a man from so auditions, and plays better, der will get the first chair. hen had to console the dis-player. "Success under such s can be a matter of lucky ut it is more often a matter of Druian told me. "The man g next to me in the orchestra

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing iden-started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-esting not so much for what you hear as for what you can't hear," he said. "It will help you understand a few of the practical problems players face." When I told Szell about the suggestion that I sit at the rear of the stage for the final rehearsal, he said he thought it was a good idea. Accordingly, a few minutes before ten on Thursday, I took a chair between Duff, the timpanist, and Emil Sholle, who is recognized as a master of the cymbals. A third member of the percussion section, Richard Weiner, was shaking the tambourine and trying out the wind machine. No one paid any attention to me. The atmosphere was tense and businesslike. Three trumpeters in front of me were practicing the difficult staccato passage in the Introduction, which they play together. Duff was tuning his kettledrums, bending down and putting his left ear close to the drumskins, and he didn't seem to be bothered by the trumpets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to his place and signalled the oboist for an A. A few seconds later, Trogdon escorted Fournier and Szell to the front of the stage, and then went to the far side and took his place among the double-bass players. Szell greeted the orchestra, opened the score of "Don Quixote" (though he knows the work by heart, he uses the score in rehearsal to provide reference points), and quietly explained a few matters. The orchestra listened in silence, and a few men made pencil markings in their parts as he asked for "long, sustained notes" at No. 13; reminded the horns "to play as pianissimo as possible" at No. 17; and turned to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins

"The Baker
reference. Over 500
335
NEW YORK • CHI
SAN FRANCISCO

Some day, whe
Boehm Birds

Reese Pal

chestra has such status problems. But a player's status is determined, ultimately, by the orchestra's musical director, who is more concerned with the balance of its sections and the excellence of the orchestra as a whole than he is with the emotions of the players. The role that Trogdon plays is that of the orchestra's father confessor. He advises the players about their personal problems, their financial troubles, and their vocational illnesses. Violin players suffer from cramps in their arms, double-bass players from rheumatism in their shoulders, wind and brass players from troubles with their lips and teeth. Some people come to him because it helps them just to talk about their problems. Others, too shy to talk about what really bothers them, come in to talk about practically anything else; Trogdon understands what they are doing, and often manages to help them. His position is delicate: he needs to have the confidence of both the players and the management, for he must help the men relax so they can play the music well. "There are men who have few friends in the orchestra," he told me. "Others have friends in their section—especially the string players, who experience common disappointments. On tours, the brass players seem to stick together, and there is a fraternity of wind players who worry about their reeds. Common pressures and a common outlook often work to form friendships. But there are friendships across all sections, too. Every society has small groups, but I try to prevent the formation of cliques, which so often make life difficult in other orchestras. When a player gets angry, I talk to him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews to communicate his command," says Lane.

"At the beginning of Beethoven's Fifth, Szell gives his downbeat and somehow we all come in at the same time," says Hyman Schandler, a member of the second-violin section, who has played in the Cleveland Orchestra for forty-three years. Schandler is able to judge the conductor's problem from both the player's and the conductor's viewpoint, since he is the conductor of the Cleveland Women's Orchestra.

I asked Schandler what he meant by that "somehow."

"I never tried to analyze how it is that we begin in unison," he said, looking uncomfortable. "It's partly that we've worked together so many years and are so well integrated, and that we listen to each other until we feel one another. That still doesn't explain how Szell slowly turns his right hand down for a slow, soft entrance and we all come in together a certain fraction of a second later. When two people have been married for many years, they begin to think alike. Maybe the orchestra is a sort of super-marriage. Some conductors give us a furtive downbeat, as if it were a secret between the conductor and the orchestra. Szell doesn't do that, but neither does he try to give us a physically unmistakable downbeat—he isn't conducting for the audience. When we are supposed to come in on a sforzando, he signals the accent with his eyes one beat earlier, and then we come in all together, since we are prepared. When you think of a hundred and six players doing it, with absolute precision, it staggers the imagination. Yet I don't think it's a matter of intuition; in fact, I don't think there's any mystery about it. It is a sudden occurrence, but it is the result of hard work and playing together for years. When we violins play a pizzicato with the woodwinds, which happens frequently in Brahms, it wouldn't do for us to come in with the conductor's beat; we would be too early. We've got to listen to the wind sound and then we come in. The acoustics of Severance Hall were changed in 1958, and we couldn't hear one another for a while after that—we had to learn to listen all over again. We second violins couldn't hear the violas at all until we found a new way of listening. You've got to learn to listen in different acoustical situations, just as you've got to learn how to follow different conductors. Stokowski, for instance, insists that we play on the beat. Young players who join the orchestra have a lot to learn. This year, we have several new ones, and we older men watch their integration carefully. It may take them four weeks to get integrated, or it may take them a whole season. If a man hasn't integrated by his second season, he'll probably leave. But in most cases the new player's reflexes get faster, and he acquires the exact timing that our orchestra is known for. He learns to play phrases rather than single notes. He learns to watch the conductor instinctively before approaching a change of tempo, a ritardando or accelerando. He watches the conductor's beat and his eyes. And he learns to read the material. The well-printed parts of older symphonies present no problem, but some modern works are played from imperfectly copied manuscripts. The parts contain accidentals and sudden changes in metre, and there may be outlandish intervals—and those are only some of the problems. But there are joys, too. In a Bruckner symphony, the full orchestra plays a divine pianissimo after a fortissimo—a beautiful, soft sound made by a hundred and six people. It sends a chill down my back. Or when we second violins come in during the overture to 'The Bartered Bride,' all of us playing like one player. After we played that overture in Carnegie Hall, a friend of mine from the New York Philharmonic said, 'I've never heard a second-violin section like it.'"

SINCE the artistic temperament presents a great many problems, it is not surprising that a famous symphony orchestra should employ someone to avert temperamental chaos. In the Cleveland, the man concerned with the players' emotional and vocational problems is Olin Trogdon, a double-bass player, who was appointed the orchestra's personnel manager a few years ago and has now given up playing in the orchestra. Trogdon, a tall, outgoing man, sits in the personnel manager's office backstage, trying to repair hurt feelings and calm jealousies. Who should sit next to the first cellist—the second-best section player or the weakest? Which violinist enjoys higher status in the orchestra—the one at the second stand of the second-violin section or the one at the last stand of the first-violin section? When only sixty members of the orchestra are assigned to make a recording, quite a few of the remaining forty-six want to know why they weren't chosen. Every large or-fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing iden-

are no clarinets in
went up to the ba sensed the rapport f
suddenly I had a m
ering exhilaration.
group, I was part of

Marcellus is prou
because he is a firstsician he willingly su
artistic personality t
admires. "If I respe
go all the way to
from me," he said

Norwegian sunset, 2:00 a.m.
SCANDINAVIAN JOURN
mer of 1970
most anything can
French horn, and c
complished horn playe
plain why. Years ag
Orchestra was perfor
Second Symphony, th
of which includes a French horn. There
rible silence where the supposed to be. Szell must always be to beat time, and w
symphony. Afterward flying via Scandinavian the orchestra's princ copenhagen and board came to Szell to apolo
-ton M.T.S. Argonaut world's largest privat
laxed three-week voyag grandeur of Leningrad lands of Visby and Born
"Well, don't gethe magnificent fjords o
Szell said.
Bloom, a native will be brilliant, th studied at the Eastmanuniquely visible twent Schools of Music, humidity-free warm sun one of the great hing this private yachtin country. But he sy you will meet friend what went wrong with the gaiety of releas play," he told me. "nsportation terminals.
cold sweat when ing, over-crowded hote justed to it. To p 1st to August 22nd must be in perfect to New York rates are fro condition. It's not 2085 per person, doubl

slightly ahead of the first-violin section, I would break up the ensemble. The concertmaster's job is to provide the necessary courage for what the men have to do, but he should never push them. The job is a matter of instinct—almost a sixth sense.

"Some concertmasters act as a buffer between the orchestra and the conductor. I won't do it. Our men are highly skilled professionals. They need no buffer, and they can work out their problems on their own. During a rehearsal—but never during a performance—I may give them some signs. Holding up the bow means 'Play softer.' Or I may turn around and tell them not to rush. The men know they have to play differently, depending on whether the orchestra plays alone or accompanies a soloist during a concerto. While the orchestra plays alone—in the beginning of the Beethoven or Brahms Violin Concerto, for instance—the orchestra performs with its collective musical personality. But the moment the soloist comes in we instinctively get out of his way. A great soloist, in turn, engages in a kind of give-and-take with an accompanying orchestra. He always listens to the orchestra while he is playing his solo part. He knows the passages where the orchestra may have trouble following him, and he is ready to make subtle adjustments. When we play the syncopations in the last movement of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, say, an expert soloist will play with us, not on his own."

The concertmaster's job, Druian went on, differs under different conductors. As a rule, after studying his part carefully, the concertmaster organizes things both for himself and for the conductor; after discussing fingering and bowing problems with the conductor, he marks a master part for the other section leaders and the orchestra's librarian. (For the Cleveland, Szell himself carefully annotated the scores for many years, indicating not only subtle degrees of dynamics and phrasing but also the exact bowings for the strings, and he sometimes delegated the bowings to Druian.) The concertmaster also copes with periodic outbreaks of "malignant anonymitis," a sickness well known in the string sections of most major orchestras. It never affects the woodwinds, the brass, or the percussion players, all of whom play individual parts instead of playing in sections. Every oboist or horn player has an occasional solo passage in a symphony, and such passages give him artistic satisfaction of a kind that a second-violin player on the fourth or fifth stand never experiences. A section player is almost never called upon to play a solo passage; instead, he plays a second-violin passage with fifteen other second-violin players. In the early Haydn and Mozart symphonies, he may have to play whole pages of repeated eighth notes. Anonymitis, a state of despair caused by a permanent lack of professional recognition, is in part the result of ignorance on the part of the audience. Many listeners believe that the players in the rear do not play as well as the ones in front. The contrary is often true. Able conductors like well-balanced string sections, and often put exceptional players in the rear, to support less experienced players. But to be sitting at a front stand gives a player status inside the orchestra, and even in the community. Another name for the violinists' affliction, Druian said, is Heifetz disease. Parents, uncles, and teachers may tell the budding violinist, "Someday you're going to be another Heifetz." Teachers are the worst offenders in this respect, turning a gifted pupil's ambitions to their own ends; the next-best thing to being another Heifetz, after all, is to be the teacher of a Heifetz. A good teacher knows that the number of potential Heifetzes is extremely small, and that many would-be Heifetzes wind up eventually in the second-violin section of a symphony orchestra.

Another problem that Druian had to cope with involved a more specific recognition of status, in the form of a player merit system introduced by Szell. (Some orchestras work on a seniority system.) Under Szell's merit system, everybody has a chance of becoming a first-chair man. A young section player may work hard and audition for the first chair in the second-violin section, say, but if a man from outside also auditions, and plays better, the outsider will get the first chair. Druian then had to console the disappointed player. "Success under such conditions can be a matter of lucky timing, but it is more often a matter of ability," Druian told me. "The man now sitting next to me in the orchestra started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. Interesting not so much for what you hear as for what you can't hear," he said. "It will help you understand a few of the practical problems players face." When I told Szell about the suggestion that I sit at the rear of the stage for the final rehearsal, he said he thought it was a good idea. Accordingly, a few minutes before ten on Thursday, I took a chair between Duff, the timpanist, and Emil Sholle, who is recognized as a master of the cymbals. A third member of the percussion section, Richard Weiner, was shaking the tambourine and trying out the wind machine. No one paid any attention to me. The atmosphere was tense and businesslike. Three trumpeters in front of me were practicing the difficult staccato passage in the Introduction, which they play together. Duff was tuning his kettledrums, bending down and putting his left ear close to the drumskins, and he didn't seem to be bothered by the trumpets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to his place and signalled the oboist for an A. A few seconds later, Trogdon escorted Fournier and Szell to the front of the stage, and then went to the far side and took his place among the double-bass players. Szell greeted the orchestra, opened the score of "Don Quixote" (though he knows the work by heart, he uses the score in rehearsal to provide reference points), and quietly explained a few matters. The orchestra listened in silence, and a few men made pencil markings in their parts as he asked for "long, sustained notes" at No. 13; reminded the horns "to play as pianissimo as possible" at No. 17; and turned to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins

"The Baker
reference. Over 500
NEW YORK • CH
SAN FRANCISCO

chestra has such status problems. But a player's status is determined, ultimately, by the orchestra's musical director, who is more concerned with the balance of its sections and the excellence of the orchestra as a whole than he is with the emotions of the players. The role that Trogdon plays is that of the orchestra's father confessor. He advises the players about their personal problems, their financial troubles, and their vocational illnesses. Violin players suffer from cramps in their arms, double-bass players from rheumatism in their shoulders, wind and brass players from troubles with their lips and teeth. Some people come to him because it helps them just to talk about their problems. Others, too shy to talk about what really bothers them, come in to talk about practically anything else; Trogdon understands what they are doing, and often manages to help them. His position is delicate: he needs to have the confidence of both the players and the management, for he must help the men relax so they can play the music well. "There are men who have few friends in the orchestra," he told me. "Others have friends in their section—especially the string players, who experience common disappointments. On tours, the brass players seem to stick together, and there is a fraternity of wind players who worry about their reeds. Common pressures and a common outlook often work to form friendships. But there are friendships across all sections, too. Every society has small groups, but I try to prevent the formation of cliques, which so often make life difficult in other orchestras. When a player gets angry, I talk to him, so he won't stay angry. As long as one can talk to people, one can prevent chaos."

The attitude of the players toward the orchestra suggests that Trogdon does his job well. "Even when we have disputes and are not happy, we play well for Szell," a member of the second-violin section told me. "We do it out of respect for him, and perhaps out of fear."

A viola player said, "There is often a lingering discontent in our section, but then there will come an evening in New York when the viola section wins the respect of the audience and of players from other orchestras, and that soothes our hurt egos. In another important orchestra I've played in, there was a lot of professionalism. Here we have a lot of idealism. In New York, our men rush out to buy the reviews after a concert, and they talk about it for hours."

They also talk about money. When the Cleveland Orchestra returned from its first great international success, the European tour in the spring of 1957, the players' annual wages were below the average paid by the four other major American orchestras. Since then, the Cleveland has come to be called one of the world's greatest orchestras, and, perhaps not unreasonably, its players feel that they ought to be paid accordingly. Last year, the minimum weekly salary, which most section players got, was two hundred and forty dollars. It is now two hundred and fifty-five, and a contract for September is still under negotiation. Some wind players may get as much as four hundred dollars, and the string players tend to complain that the discrepancy is too large. It's simply a question of supply and demand, however; there are more violinists than oboists available.

A big symphony orchestra is an economic monstrosity. Fund-raisers for the Cleveland Orchestra are often asked why it needs so much money "when Severance Hall is often sold out." In an average week, there are two concerts, which means a total of forty-one hundred and eight tickets sold, at an average of five dollars a ticket. The orchestra thus takes in twenty thousand dollars, but there are a hundred and six players, and the average weekly salary is three hundred and ten dollars—a weekly payroll of thirty-three thousand dollars. The payroll alone, then, is thirteen thousand dollars more than the box-office receipts, and there are conductors' and soloists' fees, staff wages, the cost of the hall's upkeep, and so on. "Before the orchestra plays a note, we are thirty thousand dollars a week in the red," says A. Beverly Barksdale, its general manager. "The whole business is of necessity a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

are no clarinets in
went up to the ba sensed the rapport fi
suddenly I had a m
ering exhilaration.
group, I was part of

Marcellus is prou
because he is a firstsician he willingly su
artistic personality t
admires. "If I respe
go all the way to
from me," he said

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing iden-

slightly ahead of the first-violin section, I would break up the ensemble. The concertmaster's job is to provide the necessary courage for what the men have to do, but he should never push them. The job is a matter of instinct—almost a sixth sense.

"Some concertmasters act as a buffer between the orchestra and the conductor. I won't do it. Our men are highly skilled professionals. They need no buffer, and they can work out their problems on their own. During a rehearsal—but never during a performance—I may give them some signs. Holding up the bow means 'Play softer.' Or I may turn around and tell them not to rush. The men know they have to play differently, depending on whether the orchestra plays alone or accompanies a soloist during a concerto. While the orchestra plays alone—in the beginning of the Beethoven or Brahms Violin Concerto, for instance—the orchestra performs with its collective musical personality. But the moment the soloist comes in we instinctively get out of his way. A great soloist, in turn, engages in a kind of give-and-take with an accompanying orchestra. He always listens to the orchestra while he is playing his solo part. He knows the passages where the orchestra may have trouble following him, and he is ready to make subtle adjustments. When we play the syncopations in the last movement of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, say, an expert soloist will play with us, not on his own."

The concertmaster's job, Druian went on, differs under different conductors. As a rule, after studying his part carefully, the concertmaster organizes things both for himself and for the conductor; after discussing fingering and bowing problems with the conductor, he marks a master part for the other section leaders and the orchestra's librarian. (For the Cleveland, Szell himself carefully annotated the scores for many years, indicating not only subtle degrees of dynamics and phrasing but also the exact bowings for the strings, and he sometimes delegated the bowings to Druian.) The concertmaster also copes with periodic outbreaks of "malignant anonymitis," a sickness well known in the string sections of most major orchestras. It never affects the woodwinds, the brass, or the percussion players, all of whom play individual parts instead of playing in sections. Every oboist or horn player has an occasional solo passage in a symphony, and such passages give him artistic satisfaction of a kind that a second-violin player on the fourth or fifth stand never experiences. A section player is almost never called upon to play a solo passage; instead, he plays a second-violin passage with fifteen other second-violin players. In the early Haydn and Mozart symphonies, he may have to play whole pages of repeated eighth notes. Anonymitis, a state of despair caused by a permanent lack of professional recognition, is in part the result of ignorance on the part of the audience. Many listeners believe that the players in the rear do not play as well as the ones in front. The contrary is often true. Able conductors like well-balanced string sections, and often put exceptional players in the rear, to support less experienced players. But to be sitting at a front stand gives a player status inside the orchestra, and even in the community. Another name for the violinists' affliction, Druian said, is Heifetz disease. Parents, uncles, and teachers may tell the budding violinist, "Someday you're going to be another Heifetz." Teachers are the worst offenders in this respect, turning a gifted pupil's ambitions to their own ends; the next-best thing to being another Heifetz, after all, is to be the teacher of a Heifetz. A good teacher knows that the number of potential Heifetzes is extremely small, and that many would-be Heifetzes wind up eventually in the second-violin section of a symphony orchestra.

Another problem that Druian had to cope with involved a more specific recognition of status, in the form of a player merit system introduced by Szell. (Some orchestras work on a seniority system.) Under Szell's merit system, everybody has a chance of becoming a first-chair man. A young section player may work hard and audition for the first chair in the second-violin section, say, but if a man from outside also auditions, and plays better, the outsider will get the first chair. Druian then had to console the disappointed player. "Success under such conditions can be a matter of lucky timing, but it is more often a matter of ability," Druian told me. "The man now sitting next to me in the orchestra started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-esting not so much for what you hear as for what you can't hear," he said. "It will help you understand a few of the practical problems players face." When I told Szell about the suggestion that I sit at the rear of the stage for the final rehearsal, he said he thought it was a good idea. Accordingly, a few minutes before ten on Thursday, I took a chair between Duff, the timpanist, and Emil Sholle, who is recognized as a master of the cymbals. A third member of the percussion section, Richard Weiner, was shaking the tambourine and trying out the wind machine. No one paid any attention to me. The atmosphere was tense and businesslike. Three trumpeters in front of me were practicing the difficult staccato passage in the Introduction, which they play together. Duff was tuning his kettledrums, bending down and putting his left ear close to the drumskins, and he didn't seem to be bothered by the trumpets' fortissimo.

Druian walked to his place and signalled the oboist for an A. A few seconds later, Trogdon escorted Fournier and Szell to the front of the stage, and then went to the far side and took his place among the double-bass players. Szell greeted the orchestra, opened the score of "Don Quixote" (though he knows the work by heart, he uses the score in rehearsal to provide reference points), and quietly explained a few matters. The orchestra listened in silence, and a few men made pencil markings in their parts as he asked for "long, sustained notes" at No. 13; reminded the horns "to play as pianissimo as possible" at No. 17; and turned to the first violins, sang a few bars of a phrase, and said, "Start near the middle of the bow, so it can bounce." A wind player asked a question, and Szell said, "Mezzo piano would be better than mezzo forte. When one sees the 'f' sign, one is always tempted to play louder." The wind player nodded and made a note on his part. Szell then asked the woodwinds "to get a little more involved" before No. 19. To the three trombones, in the rear, he said, "Make that entrance we talked about yesterday very soft. It should be a completely impassive piano."

There was some last-minute tuning, and then there was a silence filled with concentration. Everybody looked up at Szell, who raised his arms. The communication between him and the orchestra was almost palpable. After a couple of tense moments, Szell indicated the tempo. The flutes and oboes began the D-major motif, and the violins

"The Baker Book"—a new, handsome reference. Over 500 choice designs, room sellin

Baker Furnu
CABINET MAK
335 MILLING ROAD, HOLLAND, M
NEW YORK • CHICAGO • LOS ANGELES • PH
SAN FRANCISCO • ST. LOUIS • DALLAS • A Division of The Magnavo

Some day, when we have suffo
Boehm Birds may be the best

Reese Palley

eu 4008
ble
c Zoom
ures?
the "Regiomatic" system microsmits exposure data from the iris diaphragm of the zoom lens.
setting ring adjusts automatically change in light intensity and ts the ideal aperture. Beaulieu
-lasting nickel-cadmium recharr-hoot 8 to 12 Super-8 50 ft. car-echarging).
h more .... get all the facts on ZM, the Ultimate Super-8! See at your finest camera store or aulieu, 14225 Ventura Boulevard, California 91403. We will send full color 16-page brochure on 4008ZM.
low down zooming speed

icert, and they talk about it so talk about money. When and Orchestra returned from eat international success, the tour in the spring of 1957, rs' annual wages were below

ge paid by the four other marican orchestras. Since then, eland has come to be called
e world's greatest orchestras, haps not unreasonably, its play-that they ought to be paid ac-
y. Last year, the minimum alary, which most section play-rs got, was two hundred and orty dollars. It is now two hundred and fifty-five, and a contract for September is still under negotiation. Some wind players may get as much as four hundred dollars, and the string players tend to complain that the discrepancy is too large. It's a question of supply and de-however; there are more vio-
than oboists available.

big symphony orchestra is an ecomonstrosity. Fund-raisers for Cleveland Orchestra are often why it needs so much money
n Severance Hall is often sold
In an average week, there are concerts, which means a total of
-one hundred and eight tickets at an average of five dollars a t. The orchestra thus takes in nty thousand dollars, but there are undred and six players, and the rage weekly salary is three hundred ten dollars—a weekly payroll of ty-three thousand dollars. The payalone, then, is thirteen thousand lars more than the box-office receipts, l there are conductors' and soloists'
s, staff wages, the cost of the hall's keep, and so on. "Before the orches-plays a note, we are thirty thou-nd dollars a week in the red," says Beverly Barksdale, its general manger. "The whole business is of necesy a deficit operation."

DURING my visit to Cleveland, several orchestra members suggested that I sit on the stage among the players during the final rehearsal of "Don Quixote," on Thursday morning. "It might give you the musicians' frog's-eye view of the conductor," a cello player said. "And on Thursday night, from the auditorium, you'll have the bird's-eye view of the whole orchestra." A trumpeter said I would do well to stay close to the brass and percussion, in the rear, where the orchestral balance is upside down. "It will be inter-

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

of response, and the ability to pass from low to high notes. The er up you go, the better your reed be. And the oboe presents other lems. Because the bore of the oboe ly a little more than an eighth of an at the top, the instrument responds hanges of altitude. The air at high- ltitudes, being less dense, vibrates r, and it makes the reed heavier. our last European tour, we played alzburg and in Lucerne, both of h are fourteen hundred feet, and we went to Edinburgh, which is sea level, and there I broke three in succession. You've heard aying 'You don't have to azy to play the oboe, but it .' Actually, there is some- to it. Originally, the oboe an outdoor instrument, and as important to play it loud, playing it so loud caused the st to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing iden-

sfaction of a kind that a second- in player on the fourth or fifth stand er experiences. A section player is ost never called upon to play a solo sage; instead, he plays a second-vio- passage with fifteen other second- in players. In the early Haydn and zart symphonies, he may have to whole pages of repeated eighth es. Anonymitis, a state of despair sed by a permanent lack of profes- nal recognition, is in part the result gnorance on the part of the audi- e. Many listeners believe that the yers in the rear do not play as well the ones in front. The contrary is en true. Able conductors like well- anced string sections, and often put eptional players in the rear, to sup- rt less experienced players. But to be ting at a front stand gives a player tus inside the orchestra, and even in community. Another name for the linists' affliction, Druian said, is Hei- z disease. Parents, uncles, and teach- may tell the budding violinist, someday you're going to be another eifetz." Teachers are the worst of- nders in this respect, turning a gifted pil's ambitions to their own ends; e next-best thing to being another eifetz, after all, is to be the teacher a Heifetz. A good teacher knows at the number of potential Heifetzes extremely small, and that many ould-be Heifetzes wind up eventually the second-violin section of a sym- hony orchestra.

Another problem that Druian had cope with involved a more specific ecognition of status, in the form of player merit system introduced by zell. (Some orchestras work on a eniority system.) Under Szell's merit ystem, everybody has a chance of ecoming a first-chair man. A young ection player may work hard and au- ition for the first chair in the second- iolin section, say, but if a man from utside also auditions, and plays better, he outsider will get the first chair. Druian then had to console the dis- ppointed player. "Success under such onditions can be a matter of lucky iming, but it is more often a matter of bility," Druian told me. "The man ow sitting next to me in the orchestra started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-down from his small platform. "Such lovely sound! Such wonderful music!" he said, shaking his head in wonderment, as though he had played "Don Quixote" for the first time. "What a genius Strauss was!"

Lane joined us as we walked off the stage. "What Szell does so beautifully with 'Don Quixote' is something that can't be marked in the score," he said. "He gives each phrase the character that suits it exactly, and at the same time he keeps the flow of the music as a whole. If you were to beat time with him, you would soon be lost. He makes small ritardandi and accelerandi that you don't even notice. And Fournier plays his part superbly—with no trace of sentimentality."

Backstage, we met William Hebert, who plays the piccolo, and Lane complimented him on "that passage." I asked what passage it was, and Lane explained, "After the Introduction, in the exposition of the Sancho Panza themes, the piccolo and the solo viola play a fast, difficult phrase together. Abraham Skernick, who plays the solo viola, hears the piccolo but cannot see Hebert. And Hebert neither sees nor hears Skernick. During all the rehearsals, the phrase has come off precisely in unison. No one talks about it. This is one of the many mysteries of orchestra playing that are taken for granted, and noticed only when they don't come off."

Hebert showed me the phrase in his part—very delicate, with figurations in sixteenth and thirty-second notes. "Usually, we play it a few times together in the locker room before we come up here," he said. "Practicing it makes us feel safer. Then we both watch the conductor carefully. The viola can hear me, so he makes the adjustment. It's tricky, because if it's not done right everybody will notice it. It's hard to be discreet on the piccolo, the highest instrument in the orchestra. 'Don Quixote' is especially difficult for me, because it's not only high but soft. The piccolo has a tendency to become flat when you play soft, and I play several times with the clarinet, which has a tendency to get sharp when one is playing soft." Hebert shrugged, and added, "You've got to balance your intonation. If you know what the other man is doing, you adjust yourself to him, and he, in turn, adjusts himself to you. It's give-and-take—a matter of listening, skill, and flexibility, and of carefully studying not only your part but the parts of those who are playing with you."

Hebert excused himself, and Lane came in with the theme of the gallant, errant knight. From where I sat, I could hardly hear the grazioso violin passages. Even the virtuoso figurations of the solo violin were almost inaudible. The balance of the orchestra sound seemed completely reversed, and sometimes the sound seemed to bounce off the rear wall of the stage. But the trumpets played their staccato passage with virtuosity, and the pieces of the musical mosaic were apparently falling into the right places. Although the music sounded unfamiliar from where I sat, I could tell that Szell was shaping the continuity and the line of the work, using his baton and his eyes. Sometimes he seemed to lengthen the value of a tone almost imperceptibly by making a soothing gesture with his left hand, and, again, his eyes gave a particular section advance notice for a sudden sforzando. His gestures and commands were unmistakable—clear and powerful, almost hypnotic. One had to follow them.

The subtle colors of Strauss's great tone painting began to emerge, but I was still confused by the imbalance of the sound. At one point, the first trombone player, who sat in front of me, came in exactly with the solo violin, and I wondered how he could do it. In the second variation, the woodwinds and muted brasses, playing a succession of minor seconds in flutter-tonguing, produced a startlingly realistic imitation of the army of sheep bleating, and I recalled that Strauss's biographer Norman Del Mar wrote of this effect, "[His] onomatopoeic representation . . . is one of the best-known features of the tone poem."

I began to notice little things. The trombone players had small bottles of oil under their chairs. In the percussion section, Weiner stepped behind the triangle and stood there, counting rests by beating time with his foot. In the third variation, during the Don's description of the fairyland that he and Sancho Panza must conquer, Weiner played a few notes on the triangle and then put down again. The three trumpet players in front of me seemed less tense now. After bringing off another difficult passage in virtuoso style, they nodded to each other happily. The trombones came in with short, staccato thrusts—too early, I thought, but Szell went on, so they must have been right. Several times, too, when the orchestra played sustained notes, some sections came in earlier than others. To be exact, some sections seemed, from where I sat, to come in earlier. I hadn't learned to listen as a player listens to an orchestra. It was fascinating to hear the continuing thread of the musical line woven by groups of instruments. Szell's beat has been called precise and angular, but there was nothing angular about the music; it was beautiful and smooth and round. Szell's movements seemed caressing, delicate, almost baroque.

In the sixth variation, Weiner handled the tambourine, and in the seventh he turned the handle of the wind machine to produce an eerie, windlike noise. During that variation, when Don Quixote and Sancho Panza imagine they are flying through the air, their themes are raised four octaves, but a low D sustained by the timpanist and contrabassoonist reminds the listener that they have never left solid ground. In "Don Quixote," the orchestra always tells the truth.

Duff had been busy producing a constant drum roll during the flying episode. Now he was again tuning his kettledrums. He touched a drumskin lightly with the fourth finger of his right hand and then changed its pitch. At No. 75, Szell stopped the orchestra and asked the woodwinds to be "a little less heavy." They tried twice. He shook his head. The third time, he was evidently satisfied, for he called out "That was nice now!" without stopping again.

When Fournier began to play the Finale, Szell at one point put his left forefinger warningly to his lips, and then stretched his left hand, palm down, above the orchestra, as though reminding the players not to interfere during the immensely moving solo melody, the beautiful resolution in calm harmony, and the Don's melancholy transfiguration in death. Fournier played with great simplicity toward the end, making the death of Don Quixote a deeply emotional experience. "The composer bids him a fond farewell," as Klaus G. Roy says in his program notes, "in six grateful and touching measures."

After the last bar, Szell held his left hand up, to prevent any talk, and said, "Could you try for more pianissimo in the last two bars? This is full orchestra but still pianissimo." The full orchestra played the last two bars once more, with a beautiful, warm sound, and very pianissimo. Szell nodded to indicate his satisfaction and gave the sign for the intermission.

Everybody relaxed. Duff stepped

a cathedral out of pebbles."

—JOSEPH WECHSBERG

ness of response, and the ability to pass easily from low to high notes. The higher up you go, the better your reed must be. And the oboe presents other problems. Because the bore of the oboe is only a little more than an eighth of an inch at the top, the instrument responds to changes of altitude. The air at higher altitudes, being less dense, vibrates faster, and it makes the reed heavier. On our last European tour, we played in Salzburg and in Lucerne, both of which are fourteen hundred feet, and then we went to Edinburgh, which is near sea level, and there I broke three reeds in succession. You've heard the saying 'You don't have to be crazy to play the oboe, but it helps.' Actually, there is something to it. Originally, the oboe was an outdoor instrument, and it was important to play it loud, and playing it so loud caused the oboist to go mad."

Unlike string instruments, which

in an orchestra a sort of substitute profession. This attitude doesn't exist among the wind players. All of us are here because this is what we want to do more than anything else. I could make more money teaching at a conservatory, and perhaps I would have more security. But I wouldn't be happy. This orchestra takes great pride in its achievements. We are respected by our peers, the members of other great orchestras; in fact, some of those peers have called the Cleveland the orchestras' orchestra. That's more important to us than applause. And our pride gives us an esprit de corps. I do sympathize with our string players, though. It isn't rewarding to have to play in a section all one's life. During my military service, I played for three years in the Air Force Band, in Washington, D.C., in a section of five clarinets, all playing iden-

satisfaction of a kind that a second-violin player on the fourth or fifth stand never experiences. A section player is almost never called upon to play a solo passage; instead, he plays a second-violin passage with fifteen other second-violin players. In the early Haydn and Mozart symphonies, he may have to play whole pages of repeated eighth notes. Anonymitis, a state of despair caused by a permanent lack of professional recognition, is in part the result of ignorance on the part of the audience. Many listeners believe that the players in the rear do not play as well as the ones in front. The contrary is often true. Able conductors like well-balanced string sections, and often put exceptional players in the rear, to support less experienced players. But to be sitting at a front stand gives a player status inside the orchestra, and even in the community. Another name for the violinists' affliction, Druian said, is Heifetz disease. Parents, uncles, and teachers may tell the budding violinist, "Someday you're going to be another Heifetz." Teachers are the worst offenders in this respect, turning a gifted pupil's ambitions to their own ends; the next-best thing to being another Heifetz, after all, is to be the teacher of a Heifetz. A good teacher knows that the number of potential Heifetzes is extremely small, and that many would-be Heifetzes wind up eventually in the second-violin section of a symphony orchestra.

Another problem that Druian had to cope with involved a more specific recognition of status, in the form of a player merit system introduced by Szell. (Some orchestras work on a seniority system.) Under Szell's merit system, everybody has a chance of becoming a first-chair man. A young section player may work hard and audition for the first chair in the second-violin section, say, but if a man from outside also auditions, and plays better, the outsider will get the first chair. Druian then had to console the disappointed player. "Success under such conditions can be a matter of lucky timing, but it is more often a matter of ability," Druian told me. "The man now sitting next to me in the orchestra started a few years ago at the end of the first-violin section. He wanted to move ahead, and he built his career constructively. In a great orchestra, there is always room at the top."

I asked Druian how he felt about playing under different conductors.

"An orchestra musician must have his own artistic convictions," he said. "But his job is to translate the conductor's ideas into sound. It's easy as long as one's own artistic convictions don't clash with those of the conductor. It's no problem to play for Szell, whom all the members of the orchestra admire—even those who may not like him. It's also relatively easy when we play under somebody whose musical ideas we respect, though they may be quite different from Szell's. The conductor must know what he's doing and be forceful enough to tell us how to do it, and then we'll do it. These things are fundamental. We'll do what an able conductor wants us to do. Individually, each of us may disagree with him, but as an ensemble we'll play beautifully under him."

When the orchestra has to play under an indifferent conductor or a bad one, it's a different story, Druian went on. "We play for ourselves then, and unless the conductor is stupid, he doesn't interfere," he said. "Then I become the leader, and the men follow me, even though not all of them can see me. Under those circumstances, an experienced orchestra musician 'feels' me, because he plays more with his ears than with his eyes. In an orchestra, it is always more important to listen than to watch. Ideally, each man in the orchestra should know the entire score—all the parts. I instinctively listen to the others while I listen to myself, and I do this constantly. When I was a student in Philadelphia, we used to play string quartets sitting back to back, so we couldn't see each other. We had to listen to each other very carefully in order to carry on the flow of the music."

Druian shrugged. "Unfortunately, once in a while we get a conductor who is stupid but thinks he is great. For a while, we try our best, but when he does nothing to help us to maintain our artistic standards we have to admit defeat. Then the malcontents who are in every orchestra take over—at last they have their chance to get even with 'the enemy.' Years ago, we half killed ourselves trying to please a conductor whose beat we couldn't understand; maybe he couldn't understand it himself. In-realized how much he and the orchestra had achieved in the past few days. Perhaps the performance lacked some of the happy spontaneity that I had admired on Tuesday, but it was close to perfection. I could hear all the voices in Szell's translucent reading, and once again I admired the virtuosity of the players in all the sections and, at the same time, the magnificent integration of the orchestra into one instrument. Although the attack of the trombones had seemed puzzling to me this morning, it now seemed perfect; their entrance was not delayed, not early, but just right. And the many solo phrases never broke the flow of the musical line; the melodic thread went on and on. The climax of the performance was the Finale, which Fournier played beautifully. It made me think of the death of the noble knight, never of the cello part's technical difficulties.

When Szell lowered his arms after the two final pianissimo bars, there was a long moment of silence. It was a far greater tribute to the composer, and to the performers, than a sudden burst of applause would have been. Clearly, many people were deeply moved. I was moved, and I was also surprised that I had been able to enjoy the performance so much—that the rehearsals had not taken the bloom off the music. I mentioned this to Mrs. Szell, and she said, "Yes, but this music is very beautiful, and very close to George's heart."

Downstairs, people began to file out.

In the corridor that leads from the stage to the rooms of the conductor, the soloist, and the concertmaster, Fournier stood talking with a violinist. The two men looked both exhausted and elated.

Fournier said, "I'm so glad we'll do it once more, on Saturday. We'll do it exactly as we did it tonight. Nothing must be different."

We were joined by Szell and Lane. "This is a real red-letter evening," Mrs. Szell whispered to me. "George looks almost pleased tonight."

"C'était très, très beau," Fournier said, touching Szell's arm. "Merci."

Szell smiled and put his arms around Fournier. "Yes," he said. "We've built a cathedral out of pebbles."

—Joseph Wechsberg

most anything can
French horn, and ev
complished horn playe
plain why. Years ag
Orchestra was perform
Second Symphony, th
of which includes a French horn. There w
rible silence where the supposed to be. Szell
to beat time, and w
symphony. Afterward
the orchestra's princi came to Szell to apolog
"What happened?"
"I don't know,"
shaken. "I just don strument wouldn't sp
"Well, don't get
Szell said.
Bloom, a naturalist studied at the Eastman umidity-free warm sun
ing this private yacht you will meet friend
with the gaiety of releas what went wrong this winter. You will trave country. But be su
one of the great ho
Schools of Music,
younger years, I wowoiding constant packin cold sweat when thing, over-crowded hote play," he told me. "Unsportation terminals.
justed to it. To pl
must be in perfect pl
New York rates are fro
Norwegian sunset, 2:00 a.m.
1st to August 22nd

ARTHUR H. BENADE, a nuclear physicist and professor of physics orchestra, he coordinates [illegible] and criticizes it. This attitude creates self-discipline and a sense of spontaneity, and it puts you in the right frame of mind to rehearse Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the hundredth time. A musician who didn't accept group discipline, and who didn't believe in the virtues of clarity and exactness, would be of no use here. I may be as casual as I like offstage, but I must always be alert when I play. On the other hand, I must never become tense and stiff, because that would ruin my tone quality."

Even a kettledrum player, I learned, modifies his sound to the conductor's wishes. Under Karajan, Duff told me, he found himself unaccountably playing "with less sharpness and with longer lines" than under Szell. There was clarity, but it was "external rather than internal clarity." He explained, "You don't change the level of your exactness, but you do mold yourself in a different way. You adjust yourself to the conductor's spoken or indicated demands, like a painter changing the subtle nuances of a certain color."

looked after him as he walked away. "There are not many orchestras in which the players get involved so painstakingly and carry their sense of responsibility to such lengths," he said.

In the corridor, we met Fournier. He looked happy. "I love this piece," he said. "Every time I play it, the music seems to get better. Years ago, when Szell and I happened to be at the Suvretta House, in St. Moritz, we worked together on the Finale. I've recorded it both under him and under Karajan, and in both cases it was a memorable experience. I wish, though, that I could play it every year with this great orchestra and under Szell, who makes the music so warm and full of compassion."

BACKSTAGE that night, the musicians—the men in tailcoats and white ties, and the women in long black dresses—were a somewhat unfamiliar sight, since I had become used to seeing them dressed for rehearsals. Several men stood by the door leading to the stage and looked out into the auditorium. It was almost eight-thirty, but quite a few seats in the front rows were empty, and a viola player said that they would probably remain empty, even though the entire Thursday-night subscription series was sold out and there were always a few people at the box office before a concert hoping to buy a ticket that was returned. "These subscribers won't come, but they won't call Severance Hall and let other people use their tickets," he said, looking disgusted.

In the program, I knew, there is always a notice reading, "Subscribers who are unable to use their tickets for any concert are urged to telephone the locations to the box office so that the seats may be resold for the benefit of the Orchestra Maintenance Fund. With both the Thursday and Saturday concerts sold out, demand for any available tickets is greater than ever. . . . The value of the turned-in tickets is income-tax deductible as a contribution."

A woodwind player complained about the lukewarm attitude of the listeners on Thursday nights. I gathered that Thursday was the night in Cleveland, when the orchestra performed for a socially prominent but rather uninterested audience. He said that the same program usually got a much warmer reception on Saturday night.

A violinist agreed. "We love to perform on tour, either in Europe or in New York and along the Eastern seaboard, because we're appreciated and cheered," he said. "And then we come home and nobody seems to care."

"People's enthusiasm seems to taper off from east to west in this country," the viola player said. "The best audiences are in New York and the worst in the Middle West. In the Middle West, the people applaud after the concert, and the orchestra and the conductor take a bow. Then everybody gets up and applauds again, and the orchestra takes a second bow. And that's it—everybody files out. The second applause was a substitute for prolonged applause."

A bell rang, and the players filed onstage, took their seats, and began to tune their instruments. I walked upstairs and joined Mrs. Szell in her box, from which I was going to hear the concert. The rear rows below and the boxes and balconies were crowded, but in the front rows there were still some gaping holes.

"Only in Cleveland will you see empty seats when the Cleveland Orchestra performs," Mrs. Szell said. "Naturally, some people who live far away have trouble getting to the hall in bad weather, but why not let other people have their tickets? Too many Clevelanders take their orchestra and George for granted. When we played in Tiflis, people crowded all the aisles and sat on the floor in front of the orchestra, and in some seats there were two people."

The tuning subsided, and Szell came onstage. He was greeted by much less applause than he had received in New York, Salzburg, or Vienna when I heard him conduct the orchestra there.

The rarely performed Mozart Marches for Orchestra, from K. 335 and K. 408, showed Szell and the orchestra at their best. The music was as clear and fresh as spring water, with just the right tempos, dynamic nuances, and tonal shadings. Then came Frank Martin's Cello Concerto, which I thought showed musical taste and erudition but had rather weak thematic material, making the music seem dry and academic. This was the American première of the work, and Fournier and the orchestra played it beautifully.

I wondered how "Don Quixote" would sound to me now, from the box. I had enjoyed it at the first rehearsal I attended, on Tuesday morning, and since I had heard it several more times, I felt that I almost knew the complicated music by heart. Now, as Szell unfolded the great tone painting, I 196.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,210,382

MAY 17 1970

Music

Pierre Boulez—The Success Story of a Noncampaigner

BY PAUL HUME

Pierre Boulez returns to Southern California this month to conduct the final program of the Los Angeles Philharonic's Contempo '70 series (May 31) and oversee the Ojai Festival (June 5-7). Hume, music critic of the Washington Post, wrote these impressions of Boulez after observing the maestro at work with the Cleveland Orchestra.

• Watching Pierre Boulez conduct a great orchestra and talking to Pierre Boulez about the world of music provide more than enough clues about the wisdom and imagination of the New York Philharmonic's board of directors in naming the 44-year-old Frenchman to succeed Leonard Bernstein as music director.

Like Bernstein and Gustav Mahler, among his predecessors on the New York podium, Boulez is a composer. He is also a pianist whose gifts are at least as impressive as Bernstein's considerable gifts.

His named is pronounced "boo-lez" to rhyme with "says," but if you ask him why, he smiles and says, "I don't know."

When Bernstein announced that he would retire from the juicy New York spot at the end of the 1968-69 season, ambitious conductors began to mount campaigns to get one of the music world's most prestigious assignments.

Boulez did not campaign at all. He was not even accorded the dubious distinction of being included among those Life magazine called "a portfolio of young comers," one of whom was said to be a sure thing for the Philharmonic post. These included Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Lorin Maazel, Zubin Mehta, Seiji Ozawa, Istvan Kertesz and Thomas Schippers.

After the Philharmonic board considered several possibilities, Boulez simply proved to be "the first man to whom the post was actually offered," according to board chairman David M. Keiser.

Boulez took two months to think about the job before he finally agreed to take on what some people who should know think is the most demanding conducting post in the world.

Search for Solutions

In the formal statement he issued when he said "yes" to the Philharmonic's proposal, Boulez also explained his view of the role of the symphony orchestra today.

"To work in a city as important as New York and with an orchestra of such stature will make it possible for me to approach from a new angle the problems which the development of today's musical life poses.

"I hope that this collaboration will give us the opportunity to bring creators and interpreters together in a joint search for solutions," he added.

Pierre Boulez does not seem like a man who contains elements of an enfant terrible composer, yet he is not only the foremost French composer of his generation, but one whom Henry Pleasants recently thought dangerous enough to use in the title of an unconvincing magazine article called "Who's Afraid of Pierre Boulez?"

Born on March 26, 1925, in the Loire Valley city of Montorison, Boulez studied mathematics and engineering in the schools of Saint-Etienne and Lyons before he made it to the famous Paris conservatoire where he worked with Olivier Messiaen.

I visited with Boulez while he was working as guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. At that time, Boulez expanded on his views of the role of the modern orchestra.

"A symphony orchestra is not a delicatessen where you can get some of this and some of that," he said. "There should be a planned program."

Boulez speaks English with complete facility. His slight accent is a charming touch that can only compound the social havoc this attractive bachelor is bound to create when he arrives on the New York scene. Not since the days of Dimitri Mitropoulos has the Philharmonic had an unmarried music director.

Boulez at 44 is completely oriented toward young people. "I am going to conduct both the pops concerts in New York and at the Proms in London. These are important concerts and they have younger audiences."

The day we talked about music was one that would have floored many conductors, few of whom would have taken its changing demands with the unruffled cool that stems from Boulez's calm temperament. It was a Saturday that began when the renowned leader of major orchestras on two continents drove his rented car 25 miles through the rural towns that dot northern Ohio to a 9 a.m. assignment on the campus of Kent State.

Here, as part of his work as guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, Boulez spent three solid hours working with five student players on Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Zeitmasse." Scored for oboe, flute, English horn, clarinet and bassoon, the music is a fiendishly complicated essay in tempos. Its slow passages go at a rate determined purely by the breath capacity of the player, who has to perform a particular series of notes on a single breath.

Stockhausen is hard enough for the best of pros. For college players, it can be a devastating experience to learn and prepare.

And Stockhausen was far from all. The day before, the students had spent the same amount of time in rehearsing, with Boulez, the Berg chamber concerto for piano, violin, and chamber orchestra.

But the lithe, friendly conductor showed such patience and, when it was precisely right, such fine humor that he drew results from his young students that would amaze many.

At noon it was back in the American car, about which Boulez was less than enthusiastic, except for its air-conditioning which he called "very relaxing." At lunch, one of the many differences between Boulez and, for example, Herbert von Karajan occurred to me. Whereas Karajan had said, when we first met, "I hope to heaven we are not talking about music," Boulez's conversation was all about music.

"It is the music director of an orchestra wh · is vital today," he pointed out. "He must have a program. And then he must have, as his guest conductors, great conductors who will have something of the same view of programs.

"When I am conductor of the New York Philharmonic and the BBC in London" (the two assignments begin at the same time, fall 1971) "then I will do absolutely no guest conducting. Then the work will not be too much. Seven hours to fly from London to New York is the same time it takes on the train from Baden-Baden to Hamburg."

What about recordings, which are so vital a part of the lives of both orchestras, and music lovers as well?

"While I never believe that records take the place of live music, I am, of course, very interested in them. Since both of these orchestras record for the same company, CBS, what I record with each one will depend on programs and costs."

Boulez is also a composer and I asked about his own music as well as that of other men.

"As conductor of the Philharmonic and the BBC, I will have four months a year to work on my own music. Even this summer, when I am finished here, I will do one guest appearance with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. I am going to work on my "Improvisation Sur Mallarmé," to expand it for an orchestra of 70 pieces."

The improvisation is a work Boulez wrote a little over a decade ago, scoring it for chamber orchestra. Like all of his music, it is composed according to the 12-tone system about which Boulez has written, "It is not devilry but only the most ordinary common sense which makes me say that, since the discoveries made by the Viennese, all composition other than 12-tone is useless. The 12-tone system has been assimilated. Now it must be expanded."

PIERRE BOULEZ: A NEW ANGLE

Among his other notable compositions are three piano sonatas, a flute sonatine, "Pli Selon Pli," and, perhaps the best known of all, "Marteau Sans Maitre," or "The Hammer Without a Master," which is recorded on Odyssey 32160154. His cantata, "Le Soleil Des Eaux," for soprano and chamber orchestra, is also recorded on Angel 36295.

In style, Boulez's music, built on Schoenberg's serial system, is in the manner of Webern in intensive exploration into exquisitely minute gradations of timbre. The vocal lines move in wide leaps, but not without a strong sense of melodic curve. In his staggering second piano sonata, he has achieved a significant milestone in post-Schoenbergian writing for the keyboard. But in his orchestral programs, Boulez must seem very reassuring to those who do not yet want to listen to quantities of music of too recent vintage.

His manner with the expert Cleveland Orchestra was low-keyed, though no detail escaped his acute perception. He and pianist Grant Johannesen spent no more than 10 minutes in a discussion of the concerto, yet they sailed through it without a single hitch.

Again showing his complete lack of temperamental display, Boulez at first ignored and then merely smiled at some offstage noises that became increasingly intrusive during the final quiet pages of the Beethoven slow movement. While a musician rushed backstage to locate and silence an offending tuba player who was warming up for Debussy, Boulez continued to direct the music to its proper, serene closing. Many of his more famous colleagues would have blown their stacks, left the stage in a huff and demanded all kinds of apologies.

Boulez is, according to the testimony of many who have made music with him, a musicians' musician. The newly appointed concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra, Daniel Majeske, who has played for Boulez in the several seasons he has guested in Cleveland, raves about him. So do soloists he has accompanied, both instrumentalists and singers.

His undemonstrative manner on the platform is going to be a vast change for New York. Gone is the pelvic twist that went with Bernstein's Stravinsky. No more will the Philharmonic's music director fling his arms wide to the heavens at the emotional heights of a Mahler symphony, though Stravinsky and Mahler will both be on Boulez's programs.

Without a baton, but happy to have the score in front of him, quiet in his gestures, but with every note and nuance in place, Boulez looks like a man who will maintain the New York Philharmonic—one of the world's toughest aggregations of orchestral players—at its own best. There is no higher.

Esplanade Concerts Take to 'Road'

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 3 1970

The Boston Symphony people will announce Wednesday ~~that, in cooperation~~ with Summerthing, four of the Esplanade concerts conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson will be performed away from the Hatch shell for the first time — Hyde Park, Brighton, City Hall Plaza and Bunker Hill Monument.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 4 1970

BSO Esplanade plans Summerthing role

The Boston Symphony's Esplanade Concerts, which again will be played in the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River, will take briefly to wheels for four Summerthing concerts.

Summerthing's Showmobile will be the stage for the orchestra July 14 at the Bunker Hill Monument, Charlestown; July 15 at Smith Field, Hyde Park, both at 8 p.m.; July 16 at 11:45 a.m. in City Hall Plaza of the Government Center, and that evening at 8, in Rodgers Park, Brighton. Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct.

Admission is free and there are no rain dates for the Esplanade and Summerthing concerts.

The Esplanade series itself will open on July 13, when founder Arthur Fiedler will conduct. Dickson will lead the remaining concerts, July 17-18 and 20-25, all at 8:30 and a children's concert on July 22 at 10:15 a.m. Programs for the Esplanade and Summerthing concerts will be announced later.

Rose Walsh

Music to Their Ears

Music to the ears of the dedicated women who form the ingenious Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Talcott M. Banks, chairman of the Trustees of the BSO accolade. "We could not exist without you," he told them at their annual meeting Tuesday noon at Symphony Hall, and added, speaking of the world-famous orchestra, "We have a priceless treasure here to preserve with your help."

All the reports read showed heart-warming financial returns from the various activities of the Council of Friends, numbering 3897 members. Abram T. Collier, chairman of the Board of Overseers of the Orchestra, expressed his admiration of the organization's fine work. He quoted Serge Koussevitsky's definition of the board of overseers. "They oversee everything and overlook nothing."

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, presented their special reports as did Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding, secretary of the steering committee; Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld (chairman of the brilliant Boston Symphony's 90th Anniversary Ball which brought in almost $140,000 to the Orchestra) and Mrs. James H. Perkins, a trustee of the orchestra.

Harry J. Kraut, associate manager of public affairs, announced plans for the orchestra's 1971 European trip scheduled from April 2 to the 24th. This will be the first time the BSO 106 members has played in Europe since 1958 (it made a visit there in 1960) and will play 17 concerts in 13 different cities and 6 different countries.

Daisy Weichel, Boston public relations director who is going to make her home in Washington, D. C., is wished well by her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. O. Kelley Anderson at a party given in her honor. —Record American Photo, Leo Renehan Chatting about the Anniversary Ball, Mrs. Amory told us the names of the Grand Prix Raffle Winners. Louis McMillen of Concord won the trip to Paris; Mrs. J. Maxwell Chamberlain of Beverly Farms, the Draper portrait; John Abbot of Andover, the Porsche Audi; Maurice Ravich of Lawrence, the trip to Sardinia.

Miss Dorothy A. Brown of Boston was the winner of a concert by the BSO Chamber Players; Mrs. James Whitemore of Marblehead, a Ski Lodge holiday; Mrs. Thomas Cooch of Weston, Miss Eleanor Jones of Boston, and Mr. and Mrs. David Cheever, each 3 cases of wine.

Friday night's Eire Society's Annual Evening at Boston Pops in Symphony Hall has the distinction of launching the Boston Public Library's campaign for an endowment fund in the area of Irish culture and history.

Michael E. Hager, president of the Society, and Mrs. Hager, head the list of sponsors for the evening of music.

Others are Hon. Frank J. Donahue, Hon. Philip J. Philbin, Msgr. George W. Casey, Philip J. McNiff, Joseph Gannon, John T. Galvin, Lenahan O'Connell, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Gomperts, Dean Thomas J. O'Toole, Dr. Anna Reinauer, Mr. and Mrs. Peter F. McLaughlin, Mr. and Mrs. Walter L. Landergan, Jr., the Francis J. Thompsons, Robert J. Kelley and the Michael F. Donlans. Mrs. Kenneth G. Lyons is chairman of reservations.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 4 1970

Touring Europe with the BSO

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (S) 566,377 (E) 194,700
JUN 3 1970

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

This sounds like something straight out of Channel 2's buy-a-dream.

How would you like to travel across Europe with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 days in six countries beginning with a champagne Pops in Royal Albert Hall in London.

A party in Vienna given by the Society of the Friends of Music which dates back to Brahms among its presidents, your hosts the Vienna Philharmonic.

Castles and embassies and the great concert halls of Paris and Barcelona, Naples, Frankfurt, Stuttgart and Bonn.

The BBC will film you, the red carpets will be rolled out wherever you go and you'll be the first "amateurs" ever to tour with the BSO.

There's only one hurdle — you have to be a Friend of the Boston Symphony and, though take-off isn't until next Apr. 2, the seats on the two planes that must contain the tour are already at a premium. (And you'll have to be able to play belotte, the only accepted BSO card game.

Three conductors will be sharing the baton — William Steinberg, associate director Michael Tilson Thomas and Arthur Fiedler. Seeing that you meet everyone you'd like to meet will be Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock and the Stephen Van Cortland Morrises of Washington and Tanglewood.

Morris is a member of the Overseers of the BSO and joined Chairman Abram Collier at yesterday's annual meeting of the Friends at Symphony Hall. Betsy (Mrs. Albert) Goodhue picked the coolest of the marble halls for this party on a hot day and the table was a delight with a long U of white geraniums and petunias to frost the pale pink cloth.

There was a lot to applaud — Harry Kraut's itinerary for the tour, Elaine (Mrs. Jerome) Rosenfeld's final figure for the 90th anniversary ball — $132,000, Mrs. David Bird and Mrs. George Bates with $5182 to hand over from the "stage door" talks which took Friday morning audiences in the stage entrance of the hall and downstairs to share a backstage box lunch and off-the-record glimpses of BSO life with some of its best-known players.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
JUN 1970

APPOINTMENTS Michael Tilson Thomas, who joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as assistant conductor at the beginning of this past season, has been appointed associate conductor, effective this summer at Tanglewood. He is the first to hold this title since Richard Burgin. Thomas won acclaim in New York in October, 1969, when he completed a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for William Steinberg when the latter became ill. He later conducted over thirty Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Boston, Washington and New York at the end of the 1969-70 season. He will conduct two Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer and also conduct in New York and at the Ravinia Festival in Chicago. During the 1970-71 season, in addition to increased conducting responsibilities with the orchestra during the winter season, he will conduct concerts on its European tour in April, 1971 . . . Melvin Strauss has been named conductor-in-residence of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra for the 1970-71 season. He has served as associate conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra since 1967. Lukas Foss, the present music director, will be the principal guest conductor next season . . .

BSO joins 'Summerthing'

The Boston Symphony and the city's burgeoning three-year-old "Summerthing" are joining forces for four off-the-Esplanade concerts in July by the orchestra, according to a joint announcement made Wednesday by BSO officials and Katherine D. Kane, director of the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs.

On July 13 at 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler will inaugurate the 42nd season of free concerts, which he founded in 1929, in Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade. The three following evenings, the orchestra under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, will be the big "Summerthing" attraction at Bunker Hill, Charlestown (July 14); Smith Field, Hyde Park (July 15) and Rodgers Park, Brighton (July 16). These concerts, with the musicians playing on the Wenger Showmobile, will all be at 8 p.m. At 11:45 a.m. on July 16, the orchestra will perform in City Hall Plaza at Government Center. Programs and soloists will be announced shortly.

There will be one special children's concert on the Esplanade on July 22 at 10:15 a.m. Evening concerts, at 8:30 p.m., will continue in Hatch Shell July 20 through 25 with Mr. Dickson conducting.

Locations chosen for this first BSO-"Summerthing" collaboration are the result of a 200-mile tour of sites in the greater Boston area by Mrs. Kane and David Rockefeller, the orchestra's coordinator for this project, to find those most generally accessible to "Summerthing s" wide audiences.

Pops pianist

Patricia Michaelian will be soloist in Schumann's A minor Piano Concerto, with the Boston Pops under Arthur Fiedler's direction, on June 12 and 13 at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JUN 5 1970

THERE IS NO REASON for music critics to be flattered by Harry Ellis Dickson's new book, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" — "an irreverent memoir of 30 years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is a handsome publication by Beacon Press in Boston.

Dickson declares that "music critics are an unnecessary evil. They serve no useful purpose and, fortunately, have had no effect whatsoever upon the course of musical history. Many of them don't know anything about music and those who know a great deal about it have no feeling for it. They go to concerts to criticize, not to enjoy."

If paid music critics should not attend concerts to criticize, perhaps there should be a change in terminology.

Since a goodly percentage of music "criticism" is favorable to the music and performers, there is reason to suspect that the critic may have enjoyed it.

Most music critics who don't specialize in paeans of joy no matter how rank the performance soon learn that their favorable reviews are written by geniuses and the unfavorable ones by lunatics.

Notwithstanding, Dickson has written an entertaining and informative book. It contains a wealth of amusing anecdotage, factual information, and personality sketches that give the reader backstage studies of famed personalities.

Material Well Assembled

The writing is good and the material is well assembled.

Milton Feinberg's photographs are particularly well done, especially the one of Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the BSO.

Drawings by Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor, have originality and realism.

Raymond Morin

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Symphony 'Friends' Hear Plan For 23-Day European Tour

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give 17 concerts in 13 cities in 6 countries during its 23-day visit to Europe next spring. This will be the first time since 1960 that the orchestra has played outside the country, and this time members of the Council of Friends are invited to go, too. William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas and Arthur Fiedler will conduct, and the first concert will be by the Pops Orchestra in London's Albert Hall, April 2.

All this was discussed yesterday at the annual meeting of the Council of Friends in the Huntington Avenue lobby of Symphony Hall. While a bust of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, looked sternly on, chicken salad and iced drinks were served at long tables. And the pale pink tablecloths and pots of frilly white petunias and white geraniums were cool notes on a sweltering day.

Talcott Banks, president of the trustees, thanked the Friends for their untiring and very substantial support of the orchestra, and reports were read by Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. James H. Perkins, whose yellow Panama hat was banded in navy blue to blend with her navy, yellow and white print dress. As one admirer exclaimed: "Toots always has the nicest hats!"

Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock are the only two women trustees of the orchestra, and Mrs. Fahnestock is chairman of the orchestra's spring tour, which will take the orchestra to Berlin for Easter and will end in Paris, April 24.

Friends of Mrs. S. Abbot Smith were admiring the diamond circle pin her husband gave her for their 50th wedding anniversary. Among others at the luncheon were Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Karl Riemer, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding, Mrs. Edwin T. Green and Mrs. Richard Ely.

Also, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Harold Blanchard, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Frederick Whiskin and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUN 3 1970
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
AUG 2 1970

MUSIC NOTES:

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critc

AWARDS — Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, was recently named first prize winner, book category, of ASCAP's second annual Deems Taylor Award. The $1,000 prize was given in recognition of Schuller's book "Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development," the first of a projected two-volume history of jazz.

TV—Benjamin Britten's modern opera classic "Peter Grimes" will be shown on various TV stations throughout the country this month. The work was filmed by the BBC under the composer's direction. Tenor Peter Pears, who created the title role at the opera's 1945 opening, will agin sing Peter Grimes. Soprano Heather Harper and baritone Owen Brannigan are also among the cast. Local viewings will take place June 10, at 8 p.m., on Channels 2 and 44.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Talcott Banks, president of the BSO trustees, recently announced that the 90th anniversary ball grossed a total of $192,000 from ticket sales, patrons' donations and the sponsorship of pages in the program book. Net proceeds to the orchestera, after expenses, were $132,000.

ODDS AND ENDS—On June 11, Andre Kostelanetz will direct the New York. Philharmonic in the world premiere of Alan Hovhaness' "And God Created Great Whales." The 12-minute work utilizes the recorded songs of humpback whales played against a live orchestral background.

"Sensitivity groups," according to the May issue of "Massachusetts Physician," are the latest mental therapy fad to sweep the nation. Among such groups on eof the techniques used to restore bruised psyches is that of "holding hands in the nude, often in a swimming pool."

The magazine goes on to suggest some pos ible benefits for the local musical scene: "Perhaps the trustees of the Symphony, the orchestra members and the critics should all sit, possibly in the nude, in a great circle in Symphony Hall and hold hands in order to establish a real rapport." The mind boggles. . . .

Schuller Book Wins Award

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUN 6 1970

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JUN 25 1970

Dear Mrs. Edward Mullaney of Quincy:

This superb Cheddar Cheese Fondue appeared at a recent Wine and Cheese Tasting Party given by the Marriott Motor Hotel in Newton for Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was so good that I called the Marriott and asked their executive chef if Swap Shop could have the recipe. He agreed and here it is. Don't save the recipe till the winter snow sets in. Fondue is just as marvelous for summertime entertaining. It's especially tasty served as part of a light dinner with a crunchy green salad and dessert course of fresh, seasonal fruit.

Cheddar Cheese Fondue

1 split clove of garlic
1 cup of dry white wine
1 lb. sharp cheddar cheese, grated
2 tsps. of cornstarch
4 tbsps. of Kirsch
Freshly ground black pepper
French bread cut in 1-inch cubes

Rub pot with garlic. Add wine and heat on stove until bubbles begin to rise. Do not boil. Toss grated cheese with cornstarch and add to hot wine, a handful at a time, cooking over low heat on stove until cheese is melted and smooth, stirring constantly with wooden spoon. Stir in Kirsch and sprinkle with pepper. Light burner. Set pot on fondue unit. Spear bread with fondue fork and dip away! Enough for 4.

Barbara B. Kay
Editor — Swap Shop

Touring Europe with the BSO

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 3 1970

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

This sounds like something straight out of Channel 2's buy-a-dream.

How would you like to travel across Europe with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 days in six countries beginning with a champagne Pops in Royal Albert Hall in London.

A party in Vienna given by the Society of the Friends of Music which dates back to Brahms among its presidents, your hosts the Vienna Philharmonic.

Castles and embassies and the great concert halls of Paris and Barcelona, Naples, Frankfurt, Stuttgart and Bonn.

The BBC will film you, the red carpets will be rolled out wherever you go and you'll be the first "amateurs" ever to tour with the BSO.

There's only one hurdle — you have to be a Friend of the Boston Symphony and, though take-off isn't until next Apr. 2, the seats on the two planes that must contain the tour are already at a premium. (And you'll have to be able to play belotte, the only accepted BSO card game.

Three conductors will be sharing the baton — William Steinberg, associate director Michael Tilson Thomas and Arthur Fiedler. Seeing that you meet everyone you'd like to meet will be Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock and the Stephen Van Cortland Morrises of Washington and Tanglewood.

Morris is a member of the Overseers of the BSO and joined Chairman Abram Collier at yesterday's annual meeting of the Friends at Symphony Hall. Betsy (Mrs. Albert) Goodhue picked the coolest of the marble halls for this party on a hot day and the table was a delight with a long U of white geraniums and petunias to frost the pale pink cloth.

There was a lot to applaud — Harry Kraut's itinerary for the tour, Elaine (Mrs. Jerome) Rosenfeld's final figure for the 90th anniversary ball — $132,000, Mrs. David Bird and Mrs. George Bates with $5182 to hand over from the "stage door" talks which took Friday morning audiences in the stage entrance of the hall and downstairs to share a backstage box lunch and off-the-record glimpses of BSO life with some of its best-known players.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
JUN 1970

APPOINTMENTS Michael Tilson Thomas, who joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as assistant conductor at the beginning of this past season, has been appointed associate conductor, effective this summer at Tanglewood. He is the first to hold this title since Richard Burgin. Thomas won acclaim in New York in October, 1969, when he completed a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for William Steinberg when the latter became ill. He later conducted over thirty Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Boston, Washington and New York at the end of the 1969-70 season. He will conduct two Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer and also conduct in New York and at the Ravinia Festival in Chicago. During the 1970-71 season, in addition to increased conducting responsibilities with the orchestra during the winter season, he will conduct concerts on its European tour in April, 1971 . . . Melvin Strauss has been named conductor-in-residence of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra for the 1970-71 season. He has served as associate conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra since 1967. Lukas Foss, the present music director, will be the principal guest conductor next season . . .

THERE IS NO REASON for music critics to be flattered by Harry Ellis Dickson's new book, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!" — "an irreverent memoir of 30 years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is a handsome publication by Beacon Press in Boston.

Dickson declares that "music critics are an unnecessary evil. They serve no useful purpose and, fortunately, have had no effect whatsoever upon the course of musical history. Many of them don't know anything about music and those who know a great deal about it have no feeling for it. They go to concerts to criticize, not to enjoy."

If paid music critics should not attend concerts to criticize, perhaps there should be a change in terminology.

Since a goodly percentage of music "criticism" is favorable to the music and performers, there is reason to suspect that the critic may have enjoyed it.

Most music critics who don't specialize in paeans of joy no matter how rank the performance soon learn that their favorable reviews are written by geniuses and the unfavorable ones by lunatics.

Notwithstanding, Dickson has written an entertaining and informative book. It contains a wealth of amusing anecdotage, factual information, and personality sketches that give the reader backstage studies of famed personalities.

Material Well Assembled

The writing is good and the material is well assembled.

Milton Feinberg's photographs are particularly well done, especially the one of Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the BSO.

Drawings by Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor, have originality and realism.

Raymond Morin

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Symphony 'Friends' Hear Plan For 23-Day European Tour

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give 17 concerts in 13 cities in 6 countries during its 23-day visit to Europe next spring. This will be the first time since 1960 that the orchestra has played outside the country, and this time members of the Council of Friends are invited to go, too. William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas and Arthur Fiedler will conduct, and the first concert will be by the Pops Orchestra in London's Albert Hall, April 2.

All this was discussed yesterday at the annual meeting of the Council of Friends in the Huntington Avenue lobby of Symphony Hall. While a bust of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, looked sternly on, chicken salad and iced drinks were served at long tables. And the pale pink tablecloths and pots of frilly white petunias and white geraniums were cool notes on a sweltering day.

Talcott Banks, president of the trustees, thanked the Friends for their untiring and very substantial support of the orchestra, and reports were read by Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. James H. Perkins, whose yellow Panama hat was banded in navy blue to blend with her navy, yellow and white print dress. As one admirer exclaimed: "Toots always has the nicest hats!"

Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock are the only two women trustees of the orchestra, and Mrs. Fahnestock is chairman of the orchestra's spring tour, which will take the orchestra to Berlin for Easter and will end in Paris, April 24.

Friends of Mrs. S. Abbot Smith were admiring the diamond circle pin her husband gave her for their 50th wedding anniversary. Among others at the luncheon were Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Karl Riemer, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding, Mrs. Edwin T. Green and Mrs. Richard Ely.

Also, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Harold Blanchard, Mrs. Charles P. Lyman, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Frederick Whiskin and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUN 3 1970
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,370
AUG 2 1970

MUSIC NOTES:

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critc

AWARDS — Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, was recently named first prize winner, book category, of ASCAP's second annual Deems Taylor Award. The $1,000 prize was given in recognition of Schuller's book "Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development," the first of a projected two-volume history of jazz.

TV—Benjamin Britten's modern opera classic "Peter Grimes" will be shown on various TV stations throughout the country this month. The work was filmed by the BBC under the composer's direction. Tenor Peter Pears, who created the title role at the opera's 1945 opening, will agin sing Peter Grimes. Soprano Heather Harper and baritone Owen Brannigan are also among the cast. Local viewings will take place June 10, at 8 p.m., on Channels 2 and 44.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Talcott Banks, president of the BSO trustees, recently announced that the 90th anniversary ball grossed a total of $192,000 from ticket sales, patrons' donations and the sponsorship of pages in the program book. Net proceeds to the orchestera, after expenses, were $132,000.

ODDS AND ENDS—On June 11, Andre Kostelanetz will direct the New York. Philharmonic in the world premiere of Alan Hovhaness' "And God Created Great Whales." The 12-minute work utilizes the recorded songs of humpback whales played against a live orchestral background.

"Sensitivity groups," according to the May issue of "Massachusetts Physician," are the latest mental therapy fad to sweep the nation. Among such groups on eof the techniques used to restore bruised psyches is that of "holding hands in the nude, often in a swimming pool."

The magazine goes on to suggest some pos ible benefits for the local musical scene: "Perhaps the trustees of the Symphony, the orchestra members and the critics should all sit, possibly in the nude, in a great circle in Symphony Hall and hold hands in order to establish a real rapport." The mind boggles. . . .

BSO joins 'Summerthing'

The Boston Symphony and the city's burgeoning three-year-old "Summerthing" are joining forces for four off-the-Esplanade concerts in July by the orchestra, according to a joint announcement made Wednesday by BSO officials and Katherine D. Kane, director of the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs.

On July 13 at 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler will inaugurate the 42nd season of free concerts, which he founded in 1929, in Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade. The three following evenings, the orchestra under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, will be the big "Summerthing" attraction at Bunker Hill, Charlestown (July 14); Smith Field, Hyde Park (July 15) and Rodgers Park, Brighton (July 16). These concerts, with the musicians playing on the Wenger Showmobile, will all be at 8 p.m. At 11:45 a.m. on July 16, the orchestra will perform in City Hall Plaza at Government Center. Programs and soloists will be announced shortly.

There will be one special children's concert on the Esplanade on July 22 at 10:15 a.m. Evening concerts, at 8:30 p.m., will continue in Hatch Shell July 20 through 25 with Mr. Dickson conducting.

Locations chosen for this first BSO-"Summerthing" collaboration are the result of a 200-mile tour of sites in the greater Boston area by Mrs. Kane and David Rockefeller, the orchestra's coordinator for this project, to find those most generally accessible to "Summerthing s" wide audiences.

Pops pianist

Patricia Michaelian will be soloist in Schumann's A minor Piano Concerto, with the Boston Pops under Arthur Fiedler's direction, on June 12 and 13 at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JUN 5 1970

Schuller Book Wins Award

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUN 6 1970

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 433,300
JUN 5 1970

Dear Mrs. Edward Mullaney of Quincy:

This superb Cheddar Cheese Fondue appeared at a recent Wine and Cheese Tasting Party given by the Marriott Motor Hotel in Newton for Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was so good that I called the Marriott and asked their executive chef if Swap Shop could have the recipe. He agreed and here it is. Don't save the recipe till the winter snow sets in. Fondue is just as marvelous for summertime entertaining. It's especially tasty served as part of a light dinner with a crunchy green salad and dessert course of fresh, seasonal fruit.

Cheddar Cheese Fondue

1 split clove of garlic
1 cup of dry white wine
1 lb sharp cheddar cheese, grated
2 tsps. of cornstarch
4 tbsps. of Kirsch
Freshly ground black pepper
French bread cut in 1-inch cubes

Rub pot with garlic. Add wine and heat on stove until bubbles begin to rise. Do not boil. Toss grated cheese with cornstarch and add to hot wine, a handful at a time, cooking over low heat on stove until cheese is melted and smooth, stirring constantly with wooden spoon. Stir in Kirsch and sprinkle with pepper. Light burner. Set pot on fondue unit. Spear bread with fondue fork and dip away! Enough for 4.

Barbara B. Kay
Editor — Swap Shop

-198.

GENERAL ARTICLES PRINTED IN THE PROGRAMS FOR THE FRIDAY-SATURDAY SERIES

		Page
JOHN N. BURK	Composer from Connecticut	172
	Bruckner – the lone symphonist	619
	The old family piece	696
	Liszt and the 'eternal feminine'	825
	Dvořák and the West	875
	The early versions of Schumann's D minor symphony	955
PHILIP HALE	The youth of Brahms	235
	Schubert, the man and the composer	299
	Brahms the man	365
M. A. DeWOLFE HOWE	Henry Lee Higginson	437
TAMARA KARSAVINA	A recollection of Stravinsky	508
SIR MICHAEL TIPPETT	'The composer is . . . a poet of tones'	1132
IAN WOODWARD	Tippett on his music – and on the Beatles'	1130

A new recording contract for the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras	44
New members of the Orchestra	176
The Cabot-Cahners Room	178
G. Wallace Woodworth – an obituary	214
Members of the Orchestra	239, 303, 889
An exchange member of the Orchestra	239
A new book about the Orchestra	370
Arthur Fiedler's 75th Birthday	892
Four channel stereo	1090
Orchestra chairs named in honor of Charles Munch and Walter Piston	1215
Symphony tickets by auction	1275
Norman S. Shirk – an obituary	1433
The Orchestra's new recording of Schubert's Symphony no. 9	1466
Reviews of the Orchestra's final tour of the season	1529

ARTICLE PRINTED IN THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL PROGRAM

VICTOR FORD — On first hearing Beethoven in Boston

EXHIBITIONS AT SYMPHONY HALL

The exhibitions shown in the Gallery through the past season were loaned by the following artists and associations:

Cambridge Art Association (September 26 – October 18)
Mrs Virginia Precourt (October 28 – December 5)
Copley Society (December 16 – January 9)
Gallery of World Art (January 13 – January 31)
Subscribers' exhibition (February 10 – February 21)
New England Artists Group (March 3 – March 21)
Boston Watercolor Society (March 27 – April 25)

A portrait of Beethoven by Ferdinand Schimon, owned by Mr and Mrs F. Michael Bosch, was on view in the Gallery during the Beethoven Festival and until the end of the Symphony season.

ARTHUR FIEDLER'S 75TH BIRTHDAY

Mr and Mrs Fiedler and the cake

RETIRING MEMBERS, NEW MEMBERS AND AN EXCHANGE

Four members of the Orchestra will retire at the end of the 1969-70 season. They are Phillip Kaplan, flute, who joined the Orchestra in 1939; Buell Neidlinger, double bass, who has played with the Orchestra since 1967; Josef Orosz, trombone, who has played with the Boston Symphony since 1943; and Karl Zeise, cello, who joined the Orchestra in 1939.

Two players joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the start of the 1969-1970 season: Ann Hobson, harp, and Ikuko Mizuno, violin.

Hidenobu Tsuchida, principal cello of the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra, has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1969-1970 season in a one season exchange with Carol Procter.

"...happy summer days," wrote Brahms
"...friendly memories," wrote Johann Strauss

It was 1894. Brahms was 61, Johann Strauss was 69 when they met at Jschl and had their picture taken, silver-haired Brahms in his sober frock coat and dark-haired Strauss in his natty checked trousers. On August 6, the picture was cordially inscribed to Otto Roth, a violinist in the Boston Symphony from 1881 until 1920. He treasured it.

Years later, Otto Roth gave the photograph to Mrs. Lytle Hull, long a guiding force in the musical life of New York, asking that she leave the picture to the Boston Symphony. This fall she presented it to the Orchestra.

It's within the power of only a few to leave an Orchestra the legacy of Brahms or Strauss. Nor can we all leave some marvelous memento, as Otto Roth did, to show our affection.

But each of us who loves the music of the Boston Symphony can surely leave something. Gifts are needed. A bequest or deferred gift need not be large to be meaningful. Information may be obtained from Mr. Harold D. Hodgkinson, chairman of Symphony's Deferred Giving program, or any member of the Board of Trustees.

And the picture of Brahms and Strauss? It can be seen at this concert, in the second floor Gallery of Symphony Hall.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN
December 1770 — March 1827

BEETHOVEN'S PORTRAIT

The portrait by Ferdinand Schimon is reproduced by kind permission of Mr and Mrs F. Michael Bosch, the owners. Schimon, who was born in 1797 and died in 1852, was both an artist and a singer. He painted a portrait of Beethoven in 1818 and 1819, at the time the Missa solemnis was being written; this picture hangs in the Beethoven-Haus in Bonn. Later Schimon made a copy of his original and gave it to Mr Bosch's ancestors. The painter made his sketches while Beethoven was at work; he painted the eyes while he conversed with the composer over coffee. Some critics consider the later copy a better painting than the original.

Mr and Mrs Bosch have kindly loaned their painting to the Orchestra during the Festival and until the end of the 1969-1970 season. It is on view in the Gallery.

SYMPHONY TICKETS BY AUCTION

At a time when ticket sale by computer is already a fact, and will no doubt become standard practice for theatres, concerts and sports events within a year or two, it is pleasant to remind oneself of more leisurely days. During the summer of 1969 a letter arrived addressed to Thomas D. Perry from Mr Edward S. Bentley of New York City, who wrote of his recollections of the sale by auction of season tickets to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some fifty-five years ago. The following excerpts are from Mr Bentley's letter and are printed by his kind permission.

It was in the late spring of 1915, after the regular Boston Symphony season had ended and before the Pops had started, that my Harvard Law School roommate and I went to the auction at Symphony Hall in order to obtain seats for the 1915-1916 season. One day, or possibly two days, were devoted to the sale of the orchestra seats, and another day to the balcony and gallery. We were interested in the balcony.

A huge diagram showing all of the seats in Symphony Hall was set up on the stage, where the auctioneer had his desk. The bidders sat in the orchestra. It was not necessary for previous season subscribers to bid over again in order to retain their seats for another year. Their seats were blocked out on the diagram and were not included in the sale.

Using the diagram, the auctioneer started at one end of the front row, while an assistant indicated, with a pointer, the seat being offered for sale. There was a starting price, which I have forgotten, and the bidders called out their bids above that price in half dollars (or perhaps in quarters). The high bidder for one seat had the right to buy the next seat, without bidding, at the same price. I don't remember what happened if somebody wanted more than two seats. When the auctioneer was through with one row, he would continue with the next one.

There were a few quirks in the bidding. A bidder who wanted two seats had to be careful that he didn't find that the ones he succeeded in getting were separated by an aisle. Also, somebody who wished to have two seats on the aisle had to make sure that he was the successful bidder for the inside seat (which would give him an option on the aisle seat), unless the auctioneer happened to offer the aisle seat first. Pugnacious bidders had to remember that, regardless of who won, they would probably find themselves sitting next to each other throughout the following Symphony season.

There were assistants who took down the names and addresses of the successful bidders. Eventually bills were issued and, when paid for, tickets were sent out. In case of default, the tickets were sold at the box office.

It was all very polite and sociable. People drifted in and out until the auctioneer reached the area in which they were interested. Many of them knew each other, and were trying to get seats that they preferred to the ones that they already held.

Prices usually increased in the center of the rows and declined with the less desirable seats at the ends. Prices in the first and second rows of the balcony ran higher than the third row where we bought our seats. They moved up later in the rear rows when it looked as if there would not be enough balcony seats to go around. Occasionally a less desirable seat might, through some freak, bring a higher bid than a better located one. As a rule, however, the prices were pretty consistent, and followed the desirability of the seats.

It seemed to me to be a very good way of handling things. Attending the Boston Symphony concerts was a privilege, well worth the inconvenience of going to the auction. If a person couldn't get there himself, it was always possible to arrange for somebody else to do the bidding for him. The Management was virtually assured of receiving a known minimum amount from the sale, plus the bonus that the auction would provide.

I do not know when or why the auction was given up. Perhaps it became impracticable. At the time, it was a pleasant, interesting and important event in the Boston musical scene.

Mr Bentley was in fact present at the last occasion on which seats to Symphony were sold by auction. Instituted originally to facilitate the purchase of tickets and to prevent scalpers, the system had by 1915 become time-consuming and unpopular. As H. Earle Johnson wrote in his Symphony Hall, Boston (Little, Brown and Company, 1950), 'Holders of seats at the final auction were given the privilege of continuing them by subscription; seats according to location would henceforth be sixty dollars and twenty-four dollars for Friday concerts, and sixty to fifteen for Saturday evenings. Rush seats would remain at twenty-five cents.'

Program Editor ANDREW RAEBURN

BEETHOVEN FESTIV
Wednesday evening April 8 at 8.30

MAX RUDOLF conductor

Overture 'Leonore no. 2'*

Piano concerto no.
Allegro con b
Largo
Rondo

THE FUTURE O

. . . rests in large measur
goers who, like you, attend

You can help insure the Orche deferred gift to Symphony. The sa contribution can be joined to the p
future.

A bequest . . . a life income agreement
insurance: these are the four ways of ma
Each has it advantages.

The bequest: in his will, the donor prov
amount or a remainder interest. Th donor gives capital to Symphony an life. The annuity: the donor gives c
to the donor a fixed annual income
if the donor continues to pay pre
table deductions for the donor.

Questions about these alternatives can be or tax adviser, by Harold D. Hodgkinson, chairman o
Deferred Giving Program, or by any other of the Orchestra's Trustees.

STEINBERG Music D ORCHES

PENSION FUND

Sunday January 11 1970

BOSTON
WILLIAM

DAVID O

David Oistrakh, one of the world
linists, will play two concertos at th fund concert. The program will be an will be dedicated to the memory of Her of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who
November 14 1919.

Priority ordering of tickets is offered to the C
ers, who may obtain them at the Symphony Hal mail, using the coupon below. The sale to the opens on December 22 at the box office.

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $7, $8 and $10.

Box Office, Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

Please send me _____ tickets at _____ for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund Concert on Sunday
evening, January 11 at 8.30 pm

My check for _____ is enclosed.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

I enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

SUMMARY OF THE SEASON 1969-1970

CONCERTS GIVEN IN THE FRIDAY-SATURDAY SERIES DURING THE SEASON 1969-1970

Program	Date	Conductor
1	September 26 & 27	WILLIAM STEINBERG
2	October 3 & 4	WILLIAM STEINBERG
3	October 10 & 11	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
4	October 17 & 18	WILLIAM STEINBERG
5	October 31 & November 1	CARLO MARIA GIULINI
6	November 7 & 8	CARLO MARIA GIULINI
7	November 14 & 15	SEIJI OZAWA
8	November 21 & 22	SEIJI OZAWA
9	November 28 & 29	ERICH LEINSDORF
10	December 5 & 6	ERICH LEINSDORF
11	December 19 & 20	WILLIAM STEINBERG
12	January 2 & 3	WILLIAM STEINBERG
13	January 9 & 10	WILLIAM STEINBERG
14	January 16 & 17	WILLIAM STEINBERG
15	January 23 & 24	CLAUDIO ABBADO
16	January 30 & 31	CLAUDIO ABBADO
17	February 13 & 14	COLIN DAVIS
18	February 20 & 21	COLIN DAVIS
19	March 6 & 7	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
20	March 13 & 14	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
21	March 20 & 21	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
22	March 27 & 28	GUNTHER SCHULLER
23	April 17 & 18	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS* / JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN†
24	April 24 & 25	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

WORKS PLAYED AT THE FRIDAY-SATURDAY SERIES

	Program	Page
J. S. BACH Symphony for double orchestra in E flat op. 18 no. 1 first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra	20	1255
J. S. BACH Violin concerto no. 2 in E BWV 1042†	23	1435
Cantata no. 140 'Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme' first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston	24	1511
BARBER Die natali, chorale preludes for Christmas op. 37	12	742
BARTÓK Piano concerto no. 2 (1931)	15	937
Music for strings, percussion and celesta (1935)*	23	1463
BEETHOVEN Overture to 'The consecration of the house' op. 124	1	22
Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont' op. 84	19	1191
BERG Three movements from the 'Lyric suite' arranged for string orchestra op. 4	9	550
Five Altenberg songs op. 4 first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra	9	551
Three excerpts from the opera 'Wozzeck' op. 7	9	571
		1544

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

TEN TUESDAY CONCERTS at 8.30

in

SYMPHONY HALL

beginning on

Septer

sold through the Council of Friends, with or in Symphony Hall.

These activities will be continued next season,
sent to all Friends currently enrolled. The first luncheons will take place on September 25, the o concert of the Ninetieth Anniversary Season; the o ber 18, February 12 and a day in March still to be c lectures are planned for October 9, November
February 26.

[199]

RADIO BROADCASTS

The Friday afternoon concerts of the Orc
cast regularly by WGBH-FM (Boston), WAM
The Saturday evening concerts in Symphon
WGBH-FM (Boston), WCRB-AM-FM (Boston
dence) and WCRX-FM (Springfield). WGBH
and successful four-channel transmissions
association with Acoustic Research Inc. of

Most of the Tuesday evening concerts of
broadcast by WGBH-FM (Boston), WAM
Concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Festival
(Boston). The nine Saturday evening Pop
by WGBH-FM (Boston), WCRB-AM-FM (

All the concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Fe
(Boston), WFCR (Amherst) and WA
WCRX-FM (Springfield) and WPJB-FM
evening concerts.

During 23 of the 24 weeks of the seas on Thursday and Saturday 'This week
the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And

Complete transcriptions of the Friday
of the Boston Pops and of the 1969
the Boston Symphony Transcription
mercial and educational. Where kn

UNITED STATES

Akron, Ohio	WAKR
Albany, N. Y.	WAMC
Albuquerque, N. M.	KHFM
Allentown, Pa.	WFMZ
Ames, Iowa	WOI-AM-FM
Amherst, Mass.	WFCR
Anchorage, Alaska	KNIK
Appleton, Wisc.	WLF
Archbold, Ohio
Baltimore, Md
Birmingham
Bloomi
Bloo
East L
Ellswor
Fairbanks
Fargo, N. Da
Fort Lauderdal
Fort Wayne, Ind.
Gainesville, Fla.
Grand Island, Neb.
Grand Rapids, Mich.	WOOD
Greensboro, N. C.	WQMG
Greenville, S. C.	WMUU
Hanover, N. H.	WDCR
Honolulu, Hawaii	KFOA
Indianapolis, Ind.
Kalama

BOSTON POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER SEVENTY-FIFTH
BIRTHDAY SEASON

OPENING TUESDAY NIGHT APRIL 28

BOSTON POPS
ARTHUR FIED
Conductor

April 2
SYMPHON
concerts

1970 Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
JULY 3/AUGUST 23
Lenox, Massachusetts 01240

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Highlights of the season include

Opening Weekend Concerts

JULY 3, 4, 5

Two concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa, including a performance of Bernstein's Chichester Psalms for chorus and orchestra

Mahler's Second symphony, Resurrection, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, with Christa Ludwig and Lorna Haywood as soloists

Beethoven Concerts

Two weekends of concerts conducted by William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The six concerts include all the Piano concertos, the Triple concerto, overtures, and symphonies, including the Ninth.

The Beethoven concerts are given in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Berlioz Requiem

Conducted by Seiji Ozawa, with Leopold Simoneau as soloist.

This performance is given in memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director, 1949-1962

Mozart's Così fan tutte

A concert staging of Mozart's comic masterpiece,

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE

is the annual day-long demonstration of the work of the Berkshire Music Center, Tuesday, July 28, culminating in the evening with the Gala Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This

To: Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
Boston, Mass 02115

I subscribe $..... to the $440,000 goal of the Frie
the Boston Symphony Orchestra toward meeting the Orchestra'
mated deficit for the 1969-70 season September 1 1969—August 37

☐ Check enclosed ..... ☐ Payable on ..... Please bil

Name .....

Address .....

..... Zip Code .....

Everyone making
for the current are planned for $ 15 and over
50 and ove
00 and ov
se make to the

a Friend

"GENTLEMEN, MORE DOLCE PLEASE!"

An Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY HARRY ELLIS DICKSON

"I sat down and read the whole thing, and with enormous pleasure. It is the work of a fine and gentle man, a splendid musician, and a charming teller of stories. It is perceptive, funny, wise, and plea naughty. Everyone interested in the mu 'll find it fascinating, and I cannot e with a special interest resist it at all. M 94% righ

BEETHOVEN FESTIV
Wednesday evening April 8 at 8.30

MAX RUDOLF conductor

Overture 'Leonore no. 2'*
Piano concerto no. 1
Allegro con b
Largo
Rondo
R

THE FUTURE O

. . . rests in large measur
goers who, like you, attend

You can help insure the Orche deferred gift to Symphony. The s contribution can be joined to the p
future.

A bequest . . . a life income agreement
insurance: these are the four ways of ma
Each has it advantages.

The bequest: in his will, the donor prov
amount or a remainder interest. Th
donor gives capital to Symphony an
life. The annuity: the donor gives c
to the donor a fixed annual income
if the donor continues to pay pre
table deductions for the donor.

Questions about these alternatives can be
or tax adviser, by Harold D. Hodgkinson, chairman o
Deferred Giving Program, or by any other of the Orchestra's Trustees.

STEINBERG Music D ORCHES

PENSION FUND

Sunday January 11 1970

BOSTON
WILLIAM

DAVID O

David Oistrakh, one of the world
linists, will play two concertos at th
fund concert. The program will be an will be dedicated to the memory of Her
of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who
November 14 1919.

Priority ordering of tickets is offered to the C
ers, who may obtain them at the Symphony Hal mail, using the coupon below. The sale to the opens on December 22 at the box office.

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $7, $8 and $10.

Box Office, Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

Please send me_____tickets at_____for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund Concert on Sunday
evening, January 11 at 8.30 pm

My check for_____is enclosed.

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

I enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

SUMMARY OF THE SEASON 1969-1970

CONCERTS GIVEN IN THE FRIDAY-SATURDAY SERIES
DURING THE SEASON 1969-1970

Program	Date	Conductor
1	September 26 & 27	WILLIAM STEINBERG
2	October 3 & 4	WILLIAM STEINBERG
3	October 10 & 11	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
4	October 17 & 18	WILLIAM STEINBERG
5	October 31 & November 1	CARLO MARIA GIULINI
6	November 7 & 8	CARLO MARIA GIULINI
7	November 14 & 15	SEIJI OZAWA
8	November 21 & 22	SEIJI OZAWA
9	November 28 & 29	ERICH LEINSDORF
10	December 5 & 6	ERICH LEINSDORF
11	December 19 & 20	WILLIAM STEINBERG
12	January 2 & 3	WILLIAM STEINBERG
13	January 9 & 10	WILLIAM STEINBERG
14	January 16 & 17	WILLIAM STEINBERG
15	January 23 & 24	CLAUDIO ABBADO
16	January 30 & 31	CLAUDIO ABBADO
17	February 13 & 14	COLIN DAVIS
18	February 20 & 21	COLIN DAVIS
19	March 6 & 7	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
20	March 13 & 14	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
21	March 20 & 21	MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
22	March 27 & 28	GUNTHER SCHULLER
23	April 17 & 18	{MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS*
24	April 24 & 25	{JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN†
		MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

WORKS PLAYED AT THE FRIDAY-SATURDAY SERIES

	Program	Page
J. S. BACH Symphony for double orchestra in E flat op. 18 no. 1 first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra	20	1255
J. S. BACH Violin concerto no. 2 in E BWV 1042†	23	1435
Cantata no. 140 'Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme' first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston	24	1511
BARBER Die natali, chorale preludes for Christmas op. 37	12	742
BARTÓK Piano concerto no. 2 (1931)	15	937
Music for strings, percussion and celesta (1935)*	23	1463
BEETHOVEN Overture to 'The consecration of the house' op. 124	1	22
Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont' op. 84	19	1191
BERG Three movements from the 'Lyric suite' arranged for string orchestra op. 4	9	550
Five Altenberg songs op. 4 first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra	9	551
Three excerpts from the opera 'Wozzeck' op. 7	9	571
		1544

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

TEN TUESDAY CONCERTS at 8.30

in

SYMPHONY HALL

beginning on

Septer

sold through the Council of Friends, with ord
in Symphony Hall.

These activities will be continued next season,
sent to all Friends currently enrolled. The first luncheons will take place on September 25, the concert of the Ninetieth Anniversary Season; the o ber 18, February 12 and a day in March still to be d
lectures are planned for October 9, November
February 26.

To: Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
Boston, Mass 02115

I subscribe $..... to the $440,000 goal of the Frie
the Boston Symphony Orchestra toward meeting the Orchestra
mated deficit for the 1969-70 season September 1 1969—August 31

☐ Check enclosed ..... ☐ Payable on ..... Please bil

Name .....

Address .....

..... Zip Code .....

Everyone making
for the current are planned for $ 15 and over
50 and ove
00 and ov
se make to the

Friend

[199]

RADIO BROADCASTS

The Friday afternoon concerts of the Orc
cast regularly by WGBH-FM (Boston), WAM
The Saturday evening concerts in Symphon
WGBH-FM (Boston), WCRB-AM-FM (Bostor
dence) and WCRX-FM (Springfield). WGBH
and successful four-channel transmissions
association with Acoustic Research Inc. of

Most of the Tuesday evening concerts of
broadcast by WGBH-FM (Boston), WAM
Concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Festival
(Boston). The nine Saturday evening Pop
by WGBH-FM (Boston), WCRB-AM-FM (

All the concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Fe
(Boston), WFCR (Amherst) and WA
WCRX-FM (Springfield) and WPJB-FM
evening concerts.

During 23 of the 24 weeks of the seas
on Thursday and Saturday 'This week
the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And

Complete transcriptions of the Friday
of the Boston Pops and of the 1969
the Boston Symphony Transcription
mercial and educational. Where kn

UNITED STATES

Akron, Ohio	WAKR
Albany, N. Y.	WAMC
Albuquerque, N. M.	KHFM
Allentown, Pa.	WFMZ
Ames, Iowa	WOI-AM-FM
Amherst, Mass.	WFCR
Anchorage, Alaska	KNIK
Appleton, Wisc.	WLF
Archbold, Ohio
Baltimore, Md
Birminghar
Bloomir
Bloc
D
East L.
Ellswor
Fairbanks
Fargo, N. Da
Fort Lauderdal
Fort Wayne, Ind.
Gainesville, Fla.
Grand Island, Neb.
Grand Rapids, Mich.	WOOD
Greensboro, N. C.	WQMG
Greenville, S. C.	WMUU
Hanover, N. H.	WDCR
Honolulu, Hawaii	KFOA
Indianapolis, Ind.
Kalamaz

BOSTON POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER SEVENTY-FIFTH
BIRTHDAY SEASON
OPENING TUESDAY NIGHT APRIL 28

BOSTON POPS
ARTHUR FIED
Conductor

April 2
SYMPHO concerts

1970 Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
JULY 3/AUGUST 23
Lenox, Massachusetts 01240

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Highlights of the season include

Opening Weekend Concerts

JULY 3, 4, 5

Two concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa, including a performance of Bernstein's Chichester Psalms for chorus and orchestra

Mahler's Second symphony, Resurrection, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, with Christa Ludwig and Lorna Haywood as soloists

Beethoven Concerts

Two weekends of concerts conducted by William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The six concerts include all the Piano concertos, the Triple concerto, overtures, and symphonies, including the Ninth.

The Beethoven concerts are given in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Berlioz Requiem

Conducted by Seiji Ozawa, with Leopold Simoneau as soloist.

This performance is given in memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director, 1949-1962

Mozart's Così fan tutte

A concert staging of Mozart's comic masterpiece,

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE
is the annual day-long demonstration of the work of the Berkshire Music Center, Tuesday, July 28, culminating in the evening with the Gala Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This

"GENTLEMEN, MORE DOLCE PLEASE!"

An Irreverent Memoir of Thirty Years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY HARRY ELLIS DICKSON

"I sat down and read the whole thing, and with enormous pleasure. It is the work of a fine and gentle man, a splendid musician, and a charming teller of stories. It is perceptive, funny, wise, and plea naughty. Everyone interested in the mu 'll find it fascinating, and I cannot ne with a special interest resist it at all. M 1947 right

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND